This account is palpably inconsistent with itself, as it makes a man who lived in the time of Nero, A. D. 54—68, the father of another who was alive under Philip, A. D. 244—249. Besides, the connection between the second and the third Philostrati is unintelligible, and, if we are to take every thing as it stands, is contradicted by a passage in the leitourgikon of a later-mentioned, where he speaks of the second as Μηθύπαταρ, which Patricus, following an alteration of Meursius on the text of Suidas, translates avtvncis. These difficulties are rendered insuperable by the fact that the second Philostratus, in his Lives of the Sophists, though he speaks of an Egyptian and a Lemnian Philostratus, does not give the remotest hint that his father ever practised his own art. He was sufficiently impressed with the honour of the profession, which he often magnifies; and he shows his sense of this in his dedication of the Lives of the Sophists, in his allusion to the descent of An-tonius Gordianus the consul from Hercules Atticus, whom he there expressly names "the sophist." It is inconceivable, then, that he should never have alluded to the distinctions gained, and the works written by his own father. With regard to the third Philostratus, he repeatedly names a Lemnian of that name, whose intimate friend he was. But he classes him along with other intimate friends, of whom, at the close of the work, he declines to say anything, on the ground of that very intimacy,— but not a word of relationship. No shifting of the names, such as that adopted by Meursius, and followed by Vossius and others, of referring the lives of the sophists to the third and not the second Phi-lostratus, removes these difficulties, which are increased by the singular coincidence of three generations born in Lemnos, teaching in Athens, then in Rome, then returning to Lemnos, to perpetuate Lemnian sophists. If the Eikónas attributed to the third Philostratus be actually his, then μηθυπαταρ stares us in the face, and, to make the tale intelligible, we must alter the text of Suidas as Meursius does, and understand the word in an unusual sense, or disbelieve Suidas in an important portion of his evidence, as is done by Kayser. But the truth seems to be that the mention of two other Philo-strati, in the Lives of the Sophists, and the very probable occurrence of imitations of the writings of the biographer, whose works, from the unbroken chain of quotations in succeeding authors, we know to have been exceedingly popular, led Suidas into an error which has been the source of so much perplexity. We can easily believe that, finding many works ascribed to men of that name, with fictitious genealogies, purposely contrived, he carelessly assumed the truth of the title, and inserted the name in his list without inquiry.

Confining ourselves to the evidence of the biographer, we find another distinguished sophist of his time, who was his intimate friend, and may have been a relation, though he takes no notice of it. He uniformly calls him the Lemnian. The first notice that we have of him is that when twenty-two years old he received instructions at the Olympic games, held a. d. 213 (see Clinton, Fasti Rom. p. 225), from the aged and magnanimous Hippodromus (7. S. ii. 37. § 2). He received exemption from public duties at the hands of Camcalla, whom Philostratus calls Antonius, the son of Julia, τῆς φιλοσοφοῦν — an exemption generally attached to the rhetorical chair of Athens, but,
on this occasion, withheld from Philiscus, the professor, and bestowed on Philostratus. The Lemnian was then twenty-four years old, a. d. 215 (ii. 30).
He once found Aelian reading with great veneration
a declamation against an unmanly emperor (Τύνωνδος), recently deceased. Philostratus rebuked him, saying,
"I could have admired you if you had attacked him for his lifestyle as a tyrant, but only a man can be a living tyrant, any one can when dead." (ii. 32. § 2).
Vossius and others had fallen into the error of supposing that this tyrant was Domitian, but Perizo-

PHILOSTRATUS.

nias pointed out the impossibility of a man who was twenty-four years old in the reign of Caracalla, being placed near the time of an emperor dead upwards of 110 years before. He conjectures (and his idea has since then been universally acquiesced in) that it was Flaccabulus, slain a. d. 222, whom Aelian had attacked (V. J. praefat. p. 50). At the close of his work, Philostratus the biographer praises his powers in forensic, popular, and extemporaneous eloquence, in rhetorical exercises, and for his writings, and naming him with Nicogoras and Apsines, he says, οὐκ ἐμε ἔνα γράφων, καὶ γὰρ ἐν καὶ ἀπιστικὴν ὡς χαρασμένον, ἐπειδῆ φιλιὰ μοῦ ἀντὶ αὐτῶν ἔχει. It has been held that this last cause infers the death of the Lemnian, previously to the finishing of these memoirs. (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. v. p. 555.) But this by no means follows. Among the parties mentioned is Nicogoras, of whom he expressly says, that he is ἑστίφειος, not on the best authority. Then χαρασμένος, in its plain meaning, would lead us to suppose that Philostratus was afraid of appearing the πράξει, on account of the relation of Nicogoras, that he had accounted for by the indirect narration, and as preceded by ἐν καὶ ἀπιστικῇ. From this then we can infer nothing as to the time of his death. But Suidas says he died and was buried in Lemnos.

It is hardly possible that he can have been a grandson of the biographer, as Kayser in his preface supposes, as the latter was writing vigorously in the reign of Philip (a. d. 244—249), when, according to the computation already given, the Lemnian, born in 191, would have been between 53 and 58 years old. We have already seen that the biographer notices no relationship. Hence the Prooemium to the Εἰκόνες, printed along with the Εἰκόνες of the elder writer, is highly suspicious. He mentions that the work of the same nature, written by his namesake and grandfather τοῦδ’ ἐμοῦ ἄνδρον καὶ μοήτρον, led him to undertake his. If so we must add another to the Philostrati, and suppose the Lemnian married the biographer's daughter, and that this writer was the issue of the marriage. But the truth is, that although this work is not destitute of merit, it has very much the appearance of a clever imitation by a later sophist, who found Philostratus a convenient name. This is confirmed by the fact, that while the Εἰκόνες of the elder writer furnish favourable materials for imitation, quotation, and reference to subsequent poets, collectors, grammarians, and critics, not a single quotation from this by any subsequent writer can be traced, and only three MSS. have yet been discovered. The writer, whoever he was, after rather a clumsy Prooemium, discusses seventeen pictures, which are almost all mythological, and in describing them he appeals to the poets more than his predecessor does.

From the first, this work has been uniformly printed along with the Εἰκόνες of the other Philostratus. It forms the part of Blaise de Vigenere's translation into French; with Callistratus, it forms the eighth volume of Jacobus's translation, already mentioned.

4. The AEGYPTIAN, was in Africa with Juba when Cato and Scipio took the command against Julius Caesar, B. c. 47, on which occasion a rebuke given to Juba for the honours paid to Philostratus, led to the reconciliation of the two noble Romans, who had previously been at variance. (Plut. Cat. Min. 57.) He afterwards attached himself to the party of Antony and Cleopatra, and his morals were not improved by this connection. (Epigr. apud Philostrat. V. S. i. 5.) Hence the indignation of Augustus, when he entered Alexandria a. d. 30, at finding a professed follower of the Academic school so degraded. He granted him his life, however, that no odium might attach to the philosopher Areius, whom Philostratus, with long white beard and funereal garb, followed, importuning for mercy. (Plut. Ant. 30.) His familiarity with princes, and his wealth, the result of a life of labour, are contrasted with the condition to which, alive and dead, he was subjected by the Roman soldiers, in an epigram of Crinagoras. (Anthol. Graec. ed. Jacobs, vol. ii. p. 139, vol. viii. p. 415.) Philostratus ranks him among the sophistical philosophers, and speaks of him as devoting himself to the panegyric and varied styles of rhetoric. (Phil. V. S. i. c.) Vossius, who has read the lives of the Philostrati very carefully, places this contemporary of Augustus as contemporary with Philostratus the Later. The letters of the last (cf. Act. Min.) translates rival, instead of voici. Vos is the translation of Morellius. This strange error has escaped the notice of Westermann. (De Hist. Graec. p. 280.)

5. An historian mentioned by Josephus (Ant. x. 11. § 2) as having written accounts of India and Phoenicia; and again (c. Apion, i. 20, p. 1343, ed. Hudson) as having written in his history of the siege of Tyre. It is probable that it was in consequence of being confounded with this writer that Philostratus the biographer was sometimes called the Tyrian. Even Vossius, through singular inadvertence, thinks that Josephus refers to the writer of the life of Apollonius (de Hist. Graec. i. c.), at which passage Westermann, correcting the mistake, suggests that this writer is alluded to by Cassianus Bassus. (Geopon. i. 14.)

6. An historian who flourished in the reign of the emperor Aurelian. (Synecclus, Chronograph. p. 384; Dict. of Antiq. p. 607.)

PHILOSTRATUS. C. FUFUS, an artist, whose name appears on a gem; but it cannot be said with certainty whether the name is that of the engraver or of the owner. (Spilitary Gems, No. 31; Sillig, Catal. Artif. s. c.) [P. S.]

PHILOSTAS (Φιλόστας), a descendant of Peneus of Thebes, is said to have led a colony to Priene. (Paus. vii. 2. § 7; Strab. xiv. p. 633, &c.) [L. S.]

PHILOSTAS (Φιλόστας). 1. A Macedonian, father of Parmenion, the general of Alexander the Great (Arr. Anab. iii. 11. § 16). It appears that he had two other sons, Asander and Agathon. (Id. ib. i. 17. § 8; Diod. xix. 75.)

2. Son of Parmenion, was one of the most distinguished officers in the service of Alexander. He appears to have already enjoyed a high place in the friendship and confidence of that monarch before his accession to the throne (Philostr. V. S. 20), and in the first military enterprises of the young king against the Thracians, Triballi, and Gaulaeus, king of Illyria, Philotas bears a conspicuous part (Arr. Anab. i. 2, 5). In the organization of the army for the expedition to Asia, Philotas obtained the chief command of the whole body of the ιάτροι, or native Macedonian cavalry, a post of such importance as to rank probably second only to that of his father Parmenion. But besides this special command, which he held without interruption, from the first landing in Asia until after the defeat and death of Dareius, we frequently find him entrusted with a more extensive authority, and placed in command of several independent bodies of troops. In this manner we find him rendering important services not only in the battles of the Granicus and Arbela, but at the sieges of Miletus and Halicarnassus, in the march through Cilicia, and again at the passage of the Pyhe Persicæ (Diod. xvii. 17, 57; Arr. Anab. i. 14, 19, 21, ii. 5, iii. 11, 18; Curt. v. 4. §§ 20, 30, vi. 9. § 26).

The estimation in which Alexander held his military talents is sufficiently attested by these facts: nor does it appear that any thing had occurred up to this time to interrupt the familiar and friendly intercourse between them: though according to Plutarch (Alex. 48) information had been secretly given to the king at a much earlier period that Philotas was holding seditious language, if not entertaining treasonable designs, against him (see also Arrian, Anab. iii. 26. § 1). On the advance into Bactria (b. c. 330) Philotas was left behind with a detachment to pay funeral honours to his brother Nicanor, while Alexander himself pushed forward in pursuit of Bessus (Curt. vi. 6. § 19), but he soon rejoined the main army. It was not long after this, during the halt in Drangiana, that the events occurred which led to his destruction.

It appears certain that a plot had been at this time organised by a Macedonian named Dimmus, against the life of Alexander, though what was really its extent or nature it is now impossible to determine. The information of this conspiracy was accidentally brought to the footing of Philotas by one Crehalines; but he treated the whole matter with contempt on account of the character of the parties concerned, and neglected for two days to apprise the king of the intelligence. Alexander having subsequently become acquainted with this fact was indignant with Philotas for his carelessness, and the enemies of the latter, especially Craterus, took advantage of the opportunity to inflame the resentment of the king, and persuaded him that Philotas could not possibly have concealed so important a communication, had he not been himself implicated in the plot. Alexander yielded to their suggestions, and caused Philotas to be arrested in the night. The next day he was brought before the assembled Macedonian army, and vehemently accused by the king himself, who asserted that Parmenion was likewise an accomplice in the meditated treason. No proof, however, of the guilt either of Philotas or his father was brought forward, for Dimmus had put an end to his own life, and Nicomachus, who had originally revealed the existence of the conspiracy, had not mentioned the name of Philotas among those supposed to be concerned in it. But in the following night a confession was wrung from the unhappy Philotas by the torture, in which, though he at first denied any knowledge of the plot of Dimmus, he admitted that he had previously joined with his father in entertaining treasonable designs against the king; and ultimately, overcome by the application of fresh tortures, he was brought to acknowledge his participation in the conspiracy of Dimmus also. On the strength of this confession he was the next day again brought before the assembled troops, and stoned to death after the Macedonian custom (Curt. vii. 7—11; Arr. Anab. iii. 26; Plut. Alex. 48, 49; Diod. xvii. 70, 80; Justin xii. 5). It is difficult to pronounce with certainty upon the guilt or innocence of Philotas, especially as we know not what authorities were followed by Curtius, the only author who has left us a detailed account of his trial; but there seems little doubt that he fell a victim to the machinations of his rivals and enemies among the Macedonian generals, at the head of whom was Craterus, whose conduct throughout the transaction presents itself in the darkest colours. That Alexander should have lent so ready an ear to their representations, will ever be a reproach to the memory of the great king: but it is clear that his mind had been already alienated from Philotas by the haughty and arrogant demeanour of the latter, and the boastful manner in which he assumed to himself a large share in the merits of Alexander's exploits. Similar defects of character had also it appears rendered Philotas unpopular with the army, and thus disposed the Macedonians to listen readily to the charges against him (Curt. vi. 8. §§ 3, 11. § 1—8; Plut. Alex. 48). Nor is it unlikely that in common with Cleitus and others of the elder Macedonians, he looked with disappointment upon the course that Alexander was taking after the death of Dareius; but of his direct participation in any plots against the king's life, there is certainly no sufficient evidence. Among the tales subsequently circulated was one that represented him as holding communications with Cilithenes, which were interpreted as having reference to the assassination of Alexander. (Arr. Anab. iv. 10.)

4. Son of Carsis, a Thracian, was one of the pages in the service of Alexander the Great, who were induced by Hermolaus and Sostratus to join in the conspiracy against the king's life [Hermolaus]. He was put to death together with the other accomplices. (Arr. Anab. iv. 13; Curt. viii. 6. § 9.)

5. A Macedonian officer in the service of Alexander the Great, who commanded one taxi or division of the phalanx during the advance into Sogdiana and India. (Arr. Anab. iii. 29, iv. 24.) It seems probable that he is the same person mentioned by Curtius (v. 2. § 5), as one of those rewarded by the king at Babylon (b. c. 331) for their distinguished services. There is little doubt also, that he is the same to whom the government of Cilicia was assigned in the distribution of the provinces after the death of Alexander, b. c. 323 (Arrian ap. Phot. p. 69, a; Deyippus, ibid. p. 64, a; Curt. x. 10. § 2; Justin. xiii. 4; Diod. xviii. 3) who, however, in a subsequent passage (ib. 12), appears to speak of him as holding the lesser Phrygia, which was in fact given to Leonnatus. See Droysen, Helenen, vol. i. p. 68, note.) In b. c. 321, he was deprived of his government by Perdiccas and replaced by Philo-PHILOTHEUS.

Philanthus, but it would seem that this was only in order to employ him elsewhere, as we find him still closely attached to the party of Perdiccas, and after the death of the regent united with Alcetas, Attalus, and their partizans, in the contest against Antigonus. He was taken prisoner, together with Attalus, Docimus, and Polemon, in B.C. 320, and shared with them their imprisonment, as well as the daring enterprise by which they for a time recovered their liberty [Attalus, No. 2]. He again fell into the power of Antigonus, in B.C. 316. (Diod. xiii. 45, xix. 16; Just. xii. 6; Droysen, l.c. pp. 115, 268.)

6. A Macedonian officer in the service of Antigonus, who was employed by him in B.C. 319, to endeavour by bribes and promises to corrupt the Arcygraspids in the service of Eumenes, and especially their leaders Antigenes and Tentamus. But his efforts were unavailing: Teutamus was tempted for a moment, but was recalled to the path of duty by his firmer-minded colleague, and the Arcygraspids continued faithful. (Diod. xivii. 62, 63.)

7. An officer in the service of Antiochus the Great, who commanded the garrison of Abydos in the war against the Romans. He was besieged by the Roman fleet under C. Lüvinus (B.C. 190), and was desirous to capitulate; but before the terms could be agreed upon, the men of the Rhian fleet under Pamphilus caesed Lüvinus to withdraw in all haste in order to oppose Polyzeniadas. (Liv. xxxvii. 12.) [E. H. B.]

PHILO'TAS (Φιλωτας), a dithyrambic poet and musician, the disciple of Philoxenus, is only worthy of notice as having once gained a victory over his great contemporary Timotheus. (Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichkunst, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 324.) [P. S.]

PHILO'TAS (Φιλωτας), a physician of Amphissa in Locris, who was born about the middle of the first century B.C. He studied at Alexandria, and was in city at the same time with the triumvir Antony, of whose profusion and extravagance he was an eye-witness. He became acquainted with the triumvir's son Antyllus, with whom he sometimes supped, about B.C. 30. On one occasion, when a certain physician had been annoying the company by his logical and forward behaviour, Philotas silenced him at last with the following epigram:—"Cold water is to be given in a certain fever; but every one who has a fever has a certain fever; therefore cold water is to be given in all fevers," which so pleased Antyllus, who was at table, that he pointed to a sideboard covered with large goblets, and said, "I give you all these, Philotas." As Antyllus was quite a lad at that time, Philotas scrupled to accept such a gift, but was encouraged to do so by one of the attendants, who asked him if he did not know that the giver was a son of the triumvir Antonius, and that he had full power to make such presents. (Plist. Anton. 26.)

He may perhaps be the same physician, of whose medical formulae one is quoted by Celsius (De Med. v. 19, p. 89) and Asclepiades Pharmaczon (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medic. sec. Gen. iv. 13, vol. xiii. p. 744), and who must have lived in or before the first century B.C. (See also Gal. l.c. pp. 542; and De Compos. Medicin. sec. Loc. iv. 8, v. 3, vol. xii. pp. 752, 838.) [W. A. G.]

PHILOTHEUS (Φιλοθεος), 1. Patriarch of ALEXANDRIA, a man of luxurious habits and a most scandalous course of life, lived about A. D. 995. He wrote four works, the titles of which, as translated from the Arabic, are, 1. Declarator; 2. Harta Commentatorum, et Depravatione Hereticiorum; 3. Delectio Areareorum; 4. Autobiographia. The whole of these works is lost, and it does not appear whether the author wrote in Arabic or in Greek. A sermon, De Mandulis Domini nostri Jesu Christi, ed. Greek and Latin by P. Possinus in his Aretologia, is ascribed to one S. Philotheus, perhaps the aforesaid. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 995.)

2. COCCINUS, patriarch of CONSTANTINOPLE, a man of great and deserved renown. He was probably born in the beginning of the 14th century, and early took the monastic habit. After living for a considerable time as a monk, and afterwards superior of the convent of St. Laura on Mount Sinai, he was appointed archbishop of Herculeia (before 1354). In 1355 he was employed by the emperor John Cantacuzenus, in bringing about a reconciliation between Michael, the son, and John Palaeologus, the son-in-law of the emperor; and in the same year he was chosen patriarch of Constantinople, in the place of Callistus, who, however, recovered his see after John Palaeologus had taken possession of Constantinople. Callistus, however, died soon afterwards, and now Philotheus was once more placed and the patriarchal chair, which post he occupied with great dignity till 1371 according to Cave, or 1378 according to the Chronologia reformatata of J. B. Riccioli quoted by Fabricius. We give below the titles of the most important of the numerous works of Philotheus, very few of which have been published. 1. Liturgia et Oratio instituendi Diaconom, printed in Latin in the 26th vol. of Bibl. Pat. Mar. 2. Libri XV. Antirheticci, a defence of his friend the celebrated Palamata, extant in different libraries. 3. Sermo Encomiasticus in tres Hierarchas, Basiliam, Gregorium Theologum, et Joannam Chrysostomum, Latin, in the 26th vol. of Bibl. Pat. Mar., Gr. and Lat., by Jac. Pontanus, together with Philippus Solitarii Diontra, Ingolstadt, 1604, 8vo.; by Fronto Duceus, in the 2d vol. of Auctorum Patr. Paris, 1624. 4. Oratio de Cruce. Gr. and Lat. 5. De apud Multas Domini nostri Jesu Christi, 1616, fol., vol. ii.; there is another Oratio de Cruce, in the same volume, which is attributed by some to our Philotheus. 4. Oratio in tertiam Jejuniorum Dominicum, Gr. and Lat. Ibd. 5. Refutatio Anathematismorum ad Harnemopolus scriptorum, Gr. and Lat. apud Leunclav. Jus. Gr. Rom. lib. iv. 6. Contra Rupit Capitum XIV. Acrindicym et Barthani, extant in MS. 7. Homilia. 8. Compendium de Oeconomia Christi, &c. &c. Wharton in Cave and Fabricius give a catalogue of the numerous works of Philotheus. (Fabric. Bibl. Græca, vol. xi. p. 513, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 1362.)

3. MONACHUS OF SANCTUS, an unknown monk, wrote De Mandulis Domini nostri Jesu Christi, ed. Gr. and Lat. in P. Possinus, Ascetica, Paris, 1684. Although this work bears the same title as the one quoted above under the head Philotheus Coccius, the works as well as the authors are different persons. (Fabric. Bibl. Græca, vol. xi. p. 519; Cave, Hist. Lit. Dissert. i. p. 17, ed. Oxon.)

4. Archbishop of SKYLIMBRIA, of unknown age, wrote Oratio in T. Agathonicianum, which is still extant in MS.
PHILOTUSUS (Φιλότους), is supposed to be the same person as Theophilus Protopatharius. [THOPHILUS PROTOS.] There is extant under his name a commentary on the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, which is in a great measure compiled from Galen's commentary on the same work, and is attributed to different persons in different MSS. It was first published in a Latin translation by Ludov. Coradius, Venet. 8vo. 1549, and again, Spire, 8vo. 1581: and it is in a great measure, if not entirely, the same work that has lately been published in Greek by F. R. Dietz in the second volume of his Scholia in Hippocratem et Galenum (Regim. Pruss. 8vo. 1834) under the name of Theophilus. A short work relating to a MS. of Philotheus at Aldford is mentioned by Choulant, with the title, J. Andr. Nagel, Programma sibiens Memoriis Domini Ducis Trenswaece, Alfort 4to. 1788. (See Preface to vol. ii. of Dietz's Schol. in Hippocr. et Gal.; Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin.) [W. A. G.]

PHILOTA or PHILOTIS (Φιλότα, Φιλότις), a woman of Epieirus, mother of Charo's the younger. She aided and seconded her son throughout in his cruelty and extortion, having quite thrown over her woman's nature, as Polybius and Diodorus tell us. (Polyb. xxxix. 21; Diod. Exc. de Virt. et Vì. p. 587.) [E. E.]

PHILOMUS, a freedman of Cicero, or rather of Terentius, is constantly mentioned in Cicero's correspondence. He had the chief management of Cicero's property. (Cic. ad Att. iii. 4, iv. 10, v. 3, et alibi.)

PHILOMUSUS (Φιλόμυς), an eminent Greek physician, a pupil of Praxagoras (Galen, De Aliment. Facult. i. 12, vol. vi. p. 569), and a fellow-pupil of Herophilus (Id. De Math. Med. i. 3, vol. iii. p. 28). He was also a contemporary of Ensiatnus (id. Comment. in Hippocr., "Aphor." vi. 1, xviii. pt. i. p. 7), and is quoted by Heracleides of Tarentum (ap. Gal. Comment. in Hippocr., "De Artic." iv. 40, vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 736), and therefore must probably have lived in the fourth and third centuries n. c. Celsius mentions him as one of the eminent physicians of antiquity (De Medici. viii. 20, p. 185); and he is quoted by several of the ancient medical writers, viz. by Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Acut. ii. 16, De Morb. Chron. i. 4. pp. 115, 323), Oribasius (Med. Coll. i. 69, iv. 16, v. 22, pp. 236, 235, 279), and Aetius* (iii. 3, 12, p. 555), and very frequently by Galen. He belonged to the medical sect of the Dogmatici or Logici (Galen, De Ven. Sect. adt. Exaeris. cc. 5, 6, vol. xi. pp. 163, 169; Cramer's Analectae Graecae Parisii, vol. iii. p. 395), and wrote several medical works, of which only a few fragments remain. Athenaeus quotes a work on Cookery, "Οφαστηριώδος (vii. 81, p. 308), and another on Food, Πετροφάσι, consisting of at least thirteen books (iii. 20, 24, pp. 81, 82): this latter work is several times quoted by Galen (De Aliment. Facult. i. 11, iii. 30, 31, vol. vi. pp. 507, 720, 726, et alibi). Some modern critics suppose that he wrote a commentary on Hippocrates, Κατ' Τυρτείων, De Officina Medicis; but this is a mistake, as M. Littre observes (Oeuvres d'Hippocr. vol. i. pp. 32, 307), for Galen only says that he composed a work on the same subject, and with the same title. (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Offic. Med." i. praef., 5, vol. xviii. pt. ii. pp. 629, 666.) In an anatomical treatise which he wrote he pronounced the brain and heart to be useless organs (Galen, De Usu Part. viii. 3, vol iii. p. 625), and the former to be merely an excessive development and offshoot (φυσιολογία και φαλάθυμα) of the spinal marrow. (Ibid. c. 12, p. 671.) Philoxenus is quoted in various other parts of Galen's writings (see Fabr. Bibl. Gr. vol. iii. p. 583, ed. vet.), and Plutarch relates an anecdote of him. (De Rebus Rer. Auth. c. 10; De Adulat. et Amicis, c. 35.) He is also quoted by the Scholiast on Homer (λ. 424). [W. A. G.]

PHILOXENUS (Φιλόξενος), a Macedonian officer in the service of Alexander the Great, who was appointed by him after his return from Egypt (n. c. 331) to superintend the collection of the tribute in the provinces north of Mount Taurus (Arr. Anab. iii. 6 § 8). It would appear, however, that he did not immediately assume this command, as shortly afterwards we find him sent forward by Alexander from the field of Arbela to take possession of Susa and the treasures there deposited, which he effectuated without opposition (Id. iii. 16 § 9). After this he seems to have remained quietly in the discharge of his functions in Asia Minor (see Plut. Alex. 22; Paus. ii. 33 § 4), until the commencement of the year 325, when he conducted a reinforcement of troops from Caria to Babylon, where he arrived just before the last illness of Alexander (Id. vii. 23, 24). In the distribution of the provinces which followed the death of that monarch we find no mention of Philoxenus, but in n. c. 321 he was appointed by Perdiccas to succeed Philotas in the government of Cilicia. By what means he afterwards conciliated the favour of Antipater we know not, but in the partition at Tripinadæus after the fall of Perdiccas he was still allowed to retain his satrapy of Cilicia (Justin. xii. 6; Arrian, ap. Plat. p. 71 b.; Diod. xviii. 39). From this time we hear no more of him. [E. H. B.]

PHILOXENUS (Φιλόξενος). Among several literary persons of this name, by far the most important is Philoxenus of Cythern, who was one of the most distinguished dithyrambic poets of Greece. The accounts respecting his life are, however, strangely confused, owing to the fact that there was another Philoxenus, a Lucian, living at Athens about the same time or a little earlier: both these persons are ridiculed by the poets of the Old Comedy; both seem to have spent a part of their lives in Sicily; and it is evident that the grammarians were constantly confusing the one with the other. In order to exhibit the subject as clearly as possible, it is best to begin with the younger, but more important of these two persons. 1. Philoxenus, the son of Eleutidas, was a native of Cythera, or, as others said, of Hanaela on the Pontus (Suid. s. v.) but the former account is no doubt the correct one. We learn from the Parian Marble (No. 70) that he died in Ol. 100, n. c. 390, at the age of 55; he was, therefore, born
The brief account of his life in Suidas involves some difficulties; he states that, when the Cythereans were reduced to slavery by the Lacedaemonians, Philexenus was bought by a certain Agesyllas, by whom he was brought up, and was called Mopsus, and that, after the death of Agesyllas, he was bought by the lyric poet Melanippides, by whom he was also educated. Now there is no record of the Lacedaemonians having reduced the Cythereans to slavery; but we know that the island was seized by an Athenian expedition under Nicias, in b. c. 424 (Thuc. iv. 53, 54; Diod. Sic. xii. 65; Plut. Nic. 6); and therefore some critics propose to read Athēnas auv for Lakedaimonion (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. iv. p. 635). This solution is not quite satisfactory, and another, of much ingenuity, is proposed by Schmidt (Dithyramb. pp. 5, 6); but it is not worth while here to discuss the question further, since the only important part of the statement, namely, that Philexenus was really a slave in his youth, is quite sustained by other testimonies, especially by the allusions to him in the comic poets (see Hesych. s. v. Δοξάκωας; Meineke, l.c.). Schmidt (pp. 7, 8) very ingenuously conjectures that there is an allusion to Philexenus in the Frogs of Aristophanes (v. 1506), in the name Μωρύξε, which we have seen that Suidas says to have been given to him by his first master, and which belongs to a class of words which seem to have been often used for the names of slaves. Others, however, suppose the name to have been a nickname given to him by the comic poets, to express the impiety of his musical strains, the δις ταιόνεως μυρικίδας, as Pherecrites calls them (see below).

He was educated, says Suidas, by Melanippides, of course in that poet's own profession, that of dithyrambic poetry, in which, if the above interpretation of the allusion in the Frogs be correct, he had already attained to considerable eminence before b. c. 406; which agrees very well with the statement of Diodorus (L. c.), according to which he was at the height of his fame seven years later. Pherecrites says there is an allusion to him in his Orithyia to the list of the corruptors of music; at least Pindar applies to him a part of the passage; and if this application be correct, we have another allusion to his name Μωρύξε, in the mention of δις ταιόνεως μυρικίδας (Plut. de Mus. 30, p. 1146, as explained and corrected by Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 326—335). In the Gorgyidas of Aristophanes, which was also on the prevalent corruptions of poetry and music, and which seems to have been acted some little time after the Frogs, though Philexenus is not mentioned by name, there are passages which are, to all appearance, parodies upon his poem entitled Δείπνον (Fr. xii. xiii. ed. Bergk, ap. Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 1009, 1010). In the Ecclesiazusae also, b. c. 392, there is a passage which is almost certainly a similar parody (vv. 1167—1178; Bergk, Comment. de Phil. Com. Att. Antiq. p. 212). There is also a long passage in the Piados of the comic poet Plato, which seems to have been acted in the year after the Ecclesiazusae, b. c. 391, professing to be read from a book, which the person who has it calls Φιλοξένου κατι της δίνομαι, which is almost certainly a parody on the same poem, although Athenaeus and some modern critics suppose the allusion to be to a poem by Philexenus, the Lycadian, on the art of cookery. It is true that the latter was known for his fondness of luxurious living; but the coincidence would be too remarkable, and the confusion between the two Philexeni utterly hopeless, if we were to suppose, with Schmidt and others, that they both wrote poems of so similar a character about the same time. (Meineke, *Frag. Com. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 672—674; Bergk, Comment. pp. 211, 212; Schmidt, Dithyramb. p. 11, &c.)

These testimonies all point to the very end of the fifth and the beginning of the fourth centuries b. c., as the time when Philexenus flourished. There is, indeed, a passage in the Clouds (332), which the scholar explains as referring to him, but which must allude to Philexenus the Lycadian, if to either, as Philexenus of Cythera was only in his 11th year at the time of the first exhibition of the Clouds, and in his 15th at the time of the second. Possibly, however, the comment results from a mere confusion in the mind of the scholar, who, seeing in the text of Aristophanes a joke on the vileness of the dithyrambic poets of his day, and having read of the gluttony of Philexenus of Lycadia, identified the latter with Philexenus the dithyrambic poet, and therefore supposed him to be referred to by Aristophanes.

At what time Philexenus left Athens and went to Sicily, cannot be determined. Schmidt (p. 15) supposes that he went as a colonist, after the first victories of Dionysius over the Carthaginians, b. c. 396; that he speedily obtained the favour of Dionysius, and took up his abode at his court at Syracuse, the luxury of which furnished him with the theme of his poem entitled Δείπνον. However this may be, we know that he soon offended Dionysius, and was cast into prison; an act of oppression which most writers ascribe to the wounded vanity of the tyrant, whose poems Philexenus not only refused to praise, but, on being asked to revise one of them, said that the best way of correcting it would be to draw a black line through the whole paper. Another account ascribes his disgrace to too close an intimacy with the tyrant's mistress Callirhoe, or—better, perhaps—this like a fiction, arising out of a misinterpretation of his poem Ecclesiazusae.

It appears that, after some time, he was released from prison, and restored outwardly to the favour of Dionysius; but either in consequence of some new quarrel, or because he had a distrust of the tyrant's feelings towards him, he finally left his court: other accounts say nothing of his reconciliation, but simply that he escaped from prison, and went to the country of the Cythereans, where he composed his poem Galatea (Schol. ad Aristoph. Plut. 290). According to Suidas he went to Tarentum (s. v. Φιλοξένου γραμματώτρ). There is a curious story related by Pindar, that he gave up his estate in Sicily, and left the island, in order that he might not be seduced, by the wealth he derived from it, into the luxury which prevailed around him (Plut. de Vit. Aer. attic. p. 831). Schmidt endeavours to reconcile this statement with the former, by supposing that, after he left the court of Dionysius, he resided for some time on his Sicilian estate, and afterwards gave it up, in the way mentioned by Pindar, and then departed finally from the island. It is doubtful where the last years of his life were spent, whether in his native island, whither the scholiast just quoted says that he fled, or at Ephesus, where Suidas states that he died, and whither Schmidt thinks it likely that he may have gone, as the worship of Dionysus prevailed there. In this point, however, as in so many others, we encounter the difficulty arising from the confusion of the two Philoxen, for the Lencadian is also said to have spent the latter part of his life in Ephesus.

It is time to dismiss these doubtful questions; but still there is one tradition respecting Philoxenus, which passed into a proverb, and which must not be omitted. It is said that, after his quarrel with Dionysius at Syracuse, and during his subsequent residence at Tarentum or Cythera, he received an invitation from the tyrant to return to his court, in reply to which he wrote the single letter O, that is, either as the ancient mode of writing ϒ, or, as some think, what Philoxenus wrote was σ, as the contracted sign for ϒ. Hence a flat refusal was proverbially called Φιλοξένου γραμμάτιον (Suid. s. e.; Schmidt, p. 17).

Respecting the works of Philoxenus, Suidas relates that he wrote twenty-four dithyrambs, and a genealogy of the Aenidae. The latter poem is not mentioned by any other writer; but another poem, which Suidas does not mention, and which it is hardly likely that he reckoned among the twenty-four dithyrambs, is the Δίκαιων already mentioned, which appears to have been the most popular of his works, and of which we have more fragments than of any other. These fragments, which are almost all in Athenaeus, are so corrupted, owing to the very extraordinary style and phraseology, which the poet purposely adopted, that Casaubon gave up the emendation of them as hopeless (Animad. in Ath. iv. p. 470). Contributions to their restoration have, however, been made by Jacobs, Schweighauser, and Fiorillo, in their respective annotations upon Athenaeus, and by Bergk, in the Act. Soc. Gr. Lips. for 1836; and recently most of the fragments have been edited by Meineke (Frag. Com. Græc. vol. iii. Epitometrum de Philoxeni Cytheri Conveio, pp. 655—646, comp. pp. 148, 657, 658, 659, and vol. ii. p. 306), and the whole by Bergk (Post. Lyr. Græc. pp. 851—868), and by Schmidt (Dithyramb. pp. 29—51), who has also added a discussion on the metre, dialect, and style of the poem (pp. 52—54). The poem is a most minute and satirical description of a banquet, written in a style of language of which no idea can be formed without reading it, but of which the following specimen may convey some slight notion (v. 9):

\[\pi\alpha\nu\tau\tau\alpha\eta\eta\xiς, \lambda\iota\pi\rho\alpha\tau\iota\epsilon\iota \ ζ\iota\kappa\kappa\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\varsigma\varsigma\varsigma \ \rho\iota\iota\sigma\iota\varsigma,\]

with which a line from the parody of it by Aristophanes, in the Ecclesiasticoe may be compared (v. 1169):

\[\lambda\epsilon\alpha\iota\nu\delta\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu}\]
PHILOXENUS.

The other Philoxenus already referred to, the Leucadian, was the son of Eryxius, and seems himself also to have had a son of the name of Eryxius (Aristoph. Ran. 945). He was a most notorious parasite, glutton, and effeminate deliauke; but he seems also to have had great wit and good-humour, which made him a great favourite at the tables which he frequented. The events of his life are of so little importance in themselves, and the statements concerning him are so combined with those which relate to Philoxenus of Cythera, that this writer refers for further information to the works upon that poet, quoted above, especially Schmidt (p. 9, &c.). He seems to be the same person as the Philoxenus surnamed Ἀρεχονομίς, and also the same as the Philoxenus of the Diomeian demus, both of whom are ridiculed by the comic poets for their effeminacy.

5. The author of an epigram in the Greek Anthology, on Telepolens, the son of Polycrates, who gained an Olympic victory in Ol. 131, n. c. 256 (Paus. v. 8). This must, therefore, be somewhere about the date of the poet, of whom nothing more is known. (Bruck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 58; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 58, vol. xiii. p. 937.)

7. A Persian by birth, who afterwards was made a bishop, A. D. 485, and became one of the first leaders of the iconoclasts (Schmidt, p. 23). (P. S.)

PHILOXENUS (Φιλοξένος), an Egyptian surgeon, who, according to Celsius (De Med. viii. Praef. p. 137), wrote several valuable volumes of surgery. He is no doubt the same person whose medical formulae are frequently quoted by Galen, and who is called by him Claudius Philoxenus. (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. ii. 17, iii. 9, vol. xiii. pp. 539, 643.) As he is quoted by Asclepiades Pharmacian (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. iv. 7, vol. xii. p. 731; De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. iii. 9, vol. xiii. pp. 543, 738), he must have lived in or before the first century after Christ. He is quoted also by Soranus (De Arte Osler. p. 136), Paulus Aegineta (De Med. iii. 32, vii. 11, pp. 453, 658), Aëtius (i. 3. 77, iv. 5. 7, iv. 4. 43, pp. 331, 744, 800), and Nicolaus Myrepsus (De Compos. Medicam. i. 239, 240, p. 411), and also by Avicenna (Canon, v. 2. 2, vol. ii. p. 249, ed. Arab.), where the name is corrupted into Φιλοξένιος, in the old Latin version (vol. ii. p. 319, ed. 1553), and into Phlegoceans by Sumtheimer in his recent German translation (Zusammengezogte Heilmitte der Aruber, &c. p. 215). (W. A. G.)

PHILOXENUS, a painter of Erechthe, the disciple of Nicomachus, whose speed in painting he imitated and even surpassed, having discovered some new and rapid methods of colouring (such, at least, appears to be the meaning of Pliny's words, breviiores etiamnum quasdam picturas complendiorum invenit, H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 22). Nevertheless, Pliny states that there was a picture of his which was inferior to none, of a battle of Alexander with Darius, which he painted for king Cassander. A picture of this sort is represented in a cele- brated mosaic found at Pompeii, which, however, the best critics think has been copied, more probably, from Helena's picture of the battle of Issus (see Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 163, n. 6). As the disciple of Nicomachus, who flourished about B. C. 360, and as the painter of the battle above-mentioned, Philoxenus must have flourished under Alexander, about B. C. 330 and onwards. The words of Pliny, "Cassandro regi," if taken literally, would show that the date of his great picture must have been after B. C. 317 or 315, for from one of those two years the reign of Cassander must be dated. (Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 236.)

PHILOXENUS, C. AVIANUS, recommended by Cicero to the procusol Aécilius, n. c. 46. (Cie. ad Fam. xii. 35.)

PHILOZOS. [TELEPOLEUMUS.]

PHILETEAS (Φιλήτας), of Calchedon, an historical writer, an author of a work in the Ionic dialect, entitled Νέαδακ, of which the third book is quoted by Tzetzes (Schol. ad Lyogph. 633). He is also mentioned in a passage of Eustathius (ad Hom. p. 1885, 51), where, however, the name is corrupted into Φιλητας, and Eudocia, copying the error, places the Νέαδακ among the works of Philetas of Cos (Violar. p. 424). That Phileta is the true form of the name is clear from a passage in the Elythogelmen Maqum (p. 795. 12), which, however, contains another error, in the words ὁ καλοκαρνιος ἐνταξιο, where the Cod. Leid. has ὁ καλοκαρνιος, and the true reading is no doubt ὁ καλοκαρνιος, which should probably also be substituted for ἐφρῄ καλῶς in the passage of Eustathius (see Meineke, Anal. Alex. pp. 351—353).

PHILITIAS, a vase painter, whose name occurs on two of the vases in the Canino collection, in the forms ΦΙΛΙΤΑΣ and ΦΙΤΤΙΑΣ, which Raoul-Rochette and Gerhard also read Philitas, but which most antiquaries, including R. Rochette, now read Philias. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 55, 2d ed.)

PHILUMENUS, (Φιλομένος), a Greek physician, mentioned by an anonymous writer in Dr. Cramer's "Anecdota" (Anecd. Graecia Paris. vol. iv. p. 196) as one of the most eminent members of his profession. Nothing is known of the events of his life, and with respect to his date, as the earliest author who quotes him is Orissabius (Coll. Med. viii. 45. p. 361; Synops. iii. pp. 45, 49, viii. 6, 8, 11, 17, pp. 121, 122, 123, 124), it can only be said that he must have lived in or before the fourth century after Christ. None of his writings are extant, but numerous fragments are preserved by Aëtius (see Fabric. Bibliol. Gr. viii. p. 328, ed. vet.). He is quoted also by Alexander Trallianus (viii. 5, 8, pp. 246, 251), and Rhazes (Cont. v. 1).

PHILUS.

PHILUS, the name of a family of the priestric

1. P. Furius Sp. f. M. N. Philus, was consul b. c. 223 with C. Flaminius, and accompanied his colleague in his campaign against the Gauls in the north of Italy. [FELICINUS, No. 1.] He was elected praetor in the third year of the second Punic war, b. c. 216, when he obtained the jurisdictio inter ciues Romanos et peregrinos; and after the fatal battle of Cannae in this year, he and his colleague M. Pomponius Matho summoned the senate to take measures for the defence of the city. Shortly afterwards he received the fleet from M. Claudius Marcellus, with which he proceeded to Africa, but having been severely wounded in an engagement off the coast he returned to Lilibeum. In b. c. 214 he was censor with M. Attilius Regulus, but he died at the beginning of the following year, before the solemn purification (lustrum) of the people had been performed; and Regulus accordingly, as was usual in such cases, resigned his office. These censors visited with severity all persons who had fallen in their duty to their country during the great calamities which Rome had lately experienced. They reduced to the condition of aemariam all the young nobles, who had formed the project of leaving Italy after the battle of Cannae, among whom was L. Caecilius Metellus, who was quaeator in the year of their consulship, b. c. 214. As, however, Metellus was elected tribune of the plebs for the following year notwithstanding this degradation, he attempted to bring the censors to trial before the people, immediately after entering upon his office, but was prevented by the other tribunes from prosecuting such an unprecedented course. [METELLUS, No. 3.] Philus was also one of the augurs at the time of his death. (Liv. xxiv. 35, 55, 57, xxiii. 21, xiv. 11, 18, 43, xxv. 2; Val. Max. ii. 9. § 6.)

2. P. Furius Philus, the son of the preceding, informed Scipio in b. c. 216, after the battle of Cannae, of the design of L. Caecilius Metellus and others to leave Italy, to which reference has been made above. (Liv. xxxii. 53.)

3. P. Furius Philus, praetor b. c. 174, obtained Nearer Spain as his province. On his return to Rome he was accused by the provincials of repetundae. The elder Cato spoke against him: on the first hearing the case was adjourned (ampliatus), but fearing a condemnation, when it came on again, Philus went into exile to Praeneste, b. c. 171. (Liv. xii. 21, xiii. 2; Cic. in Caecl. Disc. 20; Pseudo-Ascon. in loc. p. 124, ed. Orelli; Meyer, Orat. Rom. Fragm. p. 97, 2nd ed.)

4. L. Furius Philus, probably brother of the preceding, was praetor b. c. 171, and obtained Sardina as his province. He was one of the pontifices, and died in b. c. 170. (Liv. xiiii. 26, 31, xiii. 13, 21; [FLAMININUS, No. 1].)

5. L. Furius Philus, was consul b. c. 136 with Sex. Attilius Severus. He received Spain as his province, and was commissioned by the senate to deliver up to the Numantines C. Hoelilius Mancinus, the consul of the preceding year. [MANCINUS, No. 3.] On that occasion Philus took with him as legati Q. Pompeius and Q. Metellus, two of his greatest enemies, that they might be compelled to bear witness to his uprightness and integrity.

A contemporary of the younger Scipio and of Laelius, Philus participated with them in a love for Greek literature and refinement. He cultivated the society of the most learned Greeks, and was himself a man of no small learning for those times. He was particularly celebrated for the purity with which he spoke his mother-tongue. He is introduced by Cicero as one of the speakers in his dialogue De Republica, and is described by the latter as a man "moderatisation et continensimus." (Dion Cass. Fragm. Ixxxv. p. 36, ed. Reimar; Val. Max. iii. 7. § 5; Cic. de Off. iii. 30, de Rep. iii. 18, Brut. 28, de Or. ii. 57, pro Arch. 7, de Leg. Agr. ii. 24, de Rep. i. 11, ad Att. iv. 16, Lael. 4, 6, 19, 27.) His praenomen was Philus, and not Publius, as it is erroneously given in one passage of Cicero (ad Att. xii. 5. § 3), and by many modern writers.

6. M. Furius Philus, occurs only on coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Janus with the legend M. FOVRIL. L. F., the reverse Pallus or Rome crowning a trophy, and below PHILI.

COIN OF M. FURIUS PHILUS.

L. PHILUS'SCIUS, was proscribed by Sulla and escaped, but was again proscribed by the triumvirs in b. c. 43, and perished. (Dion Cass. xivii. 11.)

PHILYLLUS (Φιλιλλυς). 1. A daughter of Oceanus, and the mother of Cheiron. (Pind. Nem. iii. 82; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1241; comp. CHEIRON.)

2. The wife of Nauplius, according to some traditions, for she is commonly called Clymene (Apollod. ii. 1. § 4). [L.S.]

PHILYLLUS (Φιλιλλαος), an Athenian comic poet, contemporary with Diocles and Sannyrion (Suid. s. v. Διοςκυρί). He belongs to the latter part of the Old Comedy, and the beginning of the Middle; for, on the one hand, he seems to have attained to some distinction before the time when the Ecclesiastes were of Aristophanes was acted, b. c. 392 (Schol. ad Aristoph. Plat. 1195), and, on the other, nearly all the titles of his plays belong evidently to the Middle Comedy. He is said to have introduced some scenic innovations, such as bringing lighted torches on the stage (Schol. Plat. l. e.; Ath. xvi. 700, c.). With regard to his language, Meineke mentions a few words and phrases, which are not pure Attic. His name is corrupted by the Greek lexicographers and others into Φιλιλαος, Φιλα̊λαος, Φιλα̊λαος, and other forms. The following titles of his plays are given by Suidas and Eudocia, and in the following order:—Αγγειος, Αβγη, Άστειος (εταθρας άνωθω), Δοκικετα, Έρακλης, Πλαντία τρ Ναυσιάδας, Πόλις (better Πόλεις), Φενοφις, Άπελάντη, Σελήνη, where the last two titles look suspicious, as being out of the alphabetical order. (Meineke, Fragm. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 236—261, ii. pp. 857—866; Bergk, Comment. de Reliq. Com. Att. Ant. p. 428.) [P.S.] PHINEUS.

2. One of the sons of Lycaon. (Apollod. iii. 8. § 1.)

3. A son of Agenor, and king of Salmydessus in Thrace (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 178, 237 ; Schol. ad enunt. ii. 177). Some traditions call him a son of Phoenix and Cassipieia, and a grandson of Agenor (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 178), while others again call him a son of Poseidon (Apollod. i. 3. § 21). Some accounts, moreover, make him a king in Paphlagonia or in Arcadia. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. l.c.; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 209.)

He was first married to Cleopatra, the daughter of Boreas and Oreithyia, by whom he had two children, Oreithyus (Oartus) and Crambis (some call them Parthenius and Crambis, Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 140; Plexippus and Pandion, Apollod. iii. 15. § 3; Gerynas and Asponus, Schol. ad Soph. Antig. 977; or Polydeuctus and Polydorus, Or. Th. 273). Afterwards he was married to Idena (some call her Dia, Eurytis, or Eidithen, Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. l.c.; Schol. ad Hom. Od. xii. 70; Schol. ad Soph. Antig. 980), by whom he again had two sons, Thynnus and Miarindynus. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 140, 178; Apollod. iii. 15. § 3.)

Phineus was a blind soothsayer, who had received his prophetic powers from Apollo (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 190). The cause of his blindness is not the same in all accounts; according to some he was blinded by the gods for having imprudently communicated to mortals the divine counsels of Zeus about the future (Apollod. i. 3. § 20); according to others, seeing that he was a soothsayer, hearing that the sons of Phrixus had been saved by Phineus, cursed him, and Helios hearing the curse, carried it into effect by blinding him (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 207, comp. 181); others again relate, that Boreas or the Argonauts blinded him for his conduct towards his sons (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 209). He is most celebrated in ancient story on account of his being exposed to the annoyances of the Harpyes, who were sent to him by the gods for his cruelty towards his sons by the first marriage. His second wife charged them with having behaved improperly to her, and Phineus punished them by putting their eyes out (Soph. Antig. 973) or, according to others, by exposing them to be devoured by wild beasts (Orph. Argon. 671), or by ordering them to be half buried in the earth, and then to be scourgèd (Diod. iv. 44; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 207).

Whenever Phineus wanted to take a meal the Harpyes came, took away a portion of his food, and soiled the rest, so as to render it unfit to be eaten. In this condition the unfortunate man was found by the Argonauts, whom he promised to instruct respecting their voyage, if they would deliver him from the monsters. A table accordingly was laid out with food, and when the Harpyes appeared they were forthwith attacked by Zetes and Calais, the brothers of Cleopatra, who were provided with wings. There was a prophecy that the Harpyes should perish by the hands of the sons of Boreas, but that the latter themselves must die if they should be unable to overtake the Harpyes. In their flight one of the monsters fell into the river Tigris, which was henceforth called Harpyss; the other reached the Echimadian islands, which, from her returning from that spot, were called Strophades, but the Harpyes, as well as her pursuer, were worn out with fatigue, and fell down. Both Harpyes were allowed to live on condition that they would no longer molest Phineus (comp. Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 236, 297; Tzetzs. Chil. i. 217). Phineus now explained to the Argonauts the further course they had to take, and especially cautioned them against the Symplegades (Apollod. i. 3. § 21, &c.). According to another story the Argonauts, on their arrival at the place of Phineus, found the sons of Phineus half buried, and demanded their liberation, which Phineus refused. The Argonauts used force, and a battle ensued, in which Phineus was slain by Hercules. The latter also delivered Cleopatra from her confinement, and restored the kingdom to the sons of Phineus, and on their advice he allotted the second wife of Phineus back to her father, who ordered her to be put to death (Diod. iv. 43; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 207; Apollod. iii. 15. § 3). Some traditions, lastly, state that Phineus was killed by Boreas, or that he was carried off by the Harpyes into the country of the Bistones or Millichessians. (Orph. Argon. 675, &c.; Strab. vii. p. 302.)

Those accounts in which Phineus is stated to have blinded his sons, add that they had their sight restored to them by the sons of Boreas, or by Asclepius. (Orph. Argon. 674; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. xiii. 96.)

PHINTIAS (Φιντιάς). 1. A Pythegorean, the friend of Damon, who was condemned to die by Dionysius the elder. The well-known anecdote of their friendship, and the effect produced by it on the tyrant, has been already related under Damon. Valerius Maximus writes the name Pythias; but it is possible that the Greek authors in adopting the form Phintias.

2. Tyrant of Agrigentum, who appears to have established his power over that city during the period of confusion which followed the death of Agathocles (b. c. 289), about the same time that Hicetas obtained the chief command at Syracuse. War soon broke out between these two despots, in which Phintias was defeated near Ibyla. But this success having induced Hicetas to engage with a more formidable enemy, the Carthaginians, he was defeated in his turn, and Phintias, who was probably in alliance with that power, was now able to extend his authority over a considerable part of Sicily. Among the cities subject to his rule we find mention of Agrigum, which is a sufficient proof of the extent of his dominions. He at the same time made a display of his wealth and power by founding a new city, to which he gave his own name, and whither he removed all the inhabitants from Gela, which he razed to the ground. His oppressive and tyrannical government subsequently alienated the minds of his subjects, and caused the revolt of many of the dependent cities; but he had the wisdom to change his line of policy, and, by adopting a milder rule, retained possession of the sovereignty until his death. The period of this is not mentioned, but we may probably infer from the fragments of Diodorus, that it preceded the expulsion of Hicetas from Syracuse, and may therefore be referred to b. c. 279. (Diod. xxii. Exe. Hesiodi. p. 493, Exe. Vales. p. 562.)

There are extant coins of Phintias, from which we learn that he assumed the title of king, in imitation of Agathocles. They all have the figure of a boar running on the reverse, and a head of Apollo or Diana on the obverse. Those which have been published with the head of Phintias himself are probably spurious. (See Eckhel, vol. i. p. 266.)

PHLEGETHON (Φλήγεθων), i.e. the flaming, a river in the lower world, is described as a son of Cocythus; but he is more commonly called Pyrephethon. (Virg. Aen. vi. 265, 550; Stat. Theb. iv. 522.)

PHLEGON (Φλέγων), one of the horses of Sol. (Ov. Met. ii. 154; Hygin. Fab. 183.)

PHLEGON (Φλέγων), a native of Tralles in Lydia, was a freedman of the emperor Hadrian, and not of Augustus, as has been erroneously asserted by some writers, on the authority of Suidas (comp. Phot. Cod. 97; Spartan. Hadr. 16, Sever. 20; Vopisc. Saturn. 7). Phlegon probably survived Hadrian, since his work on the Olympiads came down to Ol. 229, that is, A. D. 197, which was the year before the death of this emperor. The following is a list of the writings of Phlegon.

1. Περὶ Δαυαμωσίων, a small treatise on wonderful events, which has come down to us, but the beginning of which is wanting. It is a poor performance, full of the most ridiculous tales, and with the exception of the work of Psellus, the worst of the Greek treatises on this subject.

2. Περὶ μακροβίων, which is likewise extant, consists of only a few pages, and gives a list of persons in Italy who had attained the age of a hundred years and upwards. It was copied from the registers of the censors (εἰς αὐτῶν τῶν ἀποτυπωμένων), that is, a bare enumeration of names, and is not worthy to be compared with the work on the same subject ascribed to Lucian. At the end there is an extract from the Sibylline oracles of some sixty or seventy lines. These are the only works of Phlegon which have come down to us.

3. Οὐλομαντικὰ καὶ χρωματικά συναγωγά, which is sometimes quoted under the title of χρωματογαρφία, or Οὐλομάτες, was in seventeen books, and gave an account of the Olympiads from Ol. 1 (A. D. 776) to Ol. 229 (A. D. 137). It was dedicated to Alcibiades, who was one of the body-guards of Hadrian. This was by far the most important of the works of Phlegon. The commencement of the book is preserved in the manuscripts of the other works of Phlegon, and an extract from it relating to the 177th Olympiad is given by Photius (Cod. 97); but with these exceptions, and a few references to it in Stephanus Byzantinus, Eusebius, Origen, and others, the work is entirely lost. The style of it is characterized by Photius as not very mean, but at the same time as not pure Attic; and he blames likewise the excessive care and attention bestowed by the author upon oracles.

4. Οὐλοματεῖς ἐν βεβλίων χρής, was on the same subject as the preceding work, and must be regarded as a sort of abridgement of it: Clinton has remarked, with justice, that Photius probably quoted from this shorter work in eight books, and not from the larger work in sixteen. Photius tells us that the fifth book completed Olympiad 177; now we learn from other quarters that Phlegon in his 13th book described Ol. 203; and it is therefore not likely that he employed 8 books (ibid. 6—13) on 26 Olympiads, and 5 on 177. But if Photius quoted the epitome in eight books, the first five might contain 177 Olympiads, and the last three the remaining 52. Photius himself did not read further than Ol. 177.

5. Ἑποτικὰ Ὀλυμπιανικά ἐν βεβλίων β', is expressly mentioned by Suidas as an epitome, and probably differed from the preceding abridgment in containing no historical information, but simply a list of the Olympic victors.

6. Ἔκφρασις Σικέλιας.

7. Περὶ τῶν παρὰ Ῥωμαίους εὐρήτων βεβλίων γ',

8. Περὶ τῶν ἐπὶ Ρώμη τῶν καὶ ἐν ἑπότικως Σικελίων. These works are mentioned only by Suidas.

9. A Life of Hadrian, was really written by the emperor himself, though published as the work of Phlegon. (Spartian. Hadr. 16.)

10. Ποιμάκης ἐν τολμαῖς συνεταλ καὶ ἄρεθρα, a small treatise, first published by Heeren (in Bibli. d. Alten. Literatur. und Kunst, part vi. Göttingen, 1789), by whom it is ascribed to Phlegon; but Westermann, who has also printed it, with the other works of Phlegon, thinks that it was not written by him.

The Edictus Princeps of Phlegon was edited by Xylander, along with Antoninus Liberalis, Antigonus, and similar writers, Basel, 1568. The next edition was by Meursius, Lugd. Batav. 1620, which was reprinted by Gronovius, in his Thesaurus of Greek Antiquities, vols. vii. and ix. The third edition was by Fr. Franz, 1775, of which a new edition appeared in 1822, Halle, with the notes of Bast. The most recent edition is by Westermann in his Παράδοσιςφιλεγόνων, Σκηνήρων Μετάφρασεν Γραείς, Brunswick, 1839. The fragments on the Olympiads have also been published in the edition of Pinard published at Oxford in 1697, fol., and in Kruse's Olympia, Wien, 1839. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 255; Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 261, ed. Westermann; Clinton, Fasti Romani, vol. i. p. 127; Westermann, Præfatio ad Paradoxygōnōn, p. xxxvii. &c.}

PHLEGONAS (Φλεγώνας), a king of the Lapithae, a son of Ares and Chryse, the daughter of Halusma, succeeded Eteocles, who died without issue, in the government of the district of Orchomenos, which he called after himself Phlegyasant. (Paus. ix. 36. § 1; Apollod. iii. 5. § 5.) By Chryse he became the father of Coronis, who became by Apollo the mother of Asclepius. Enraged at this, Phlegyas set fire to the temple of the God, who killed him with his arrows, and condemned him to severe punishment in the lower world. (Hom. Hymn. xv. 3; Pind. Pyth. iii. 14; Apollod. iii. 10. § 3, ii. 26. § 4; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 618; Stat. Theb. i. 713.) According to another tradition Phlegyas had no children, and was killed by Lycurgus and Nycteus. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 5.) Strabo (ix. p. 442) calls him a brother of Ixion. [L. S.]

PHLEON (Φλέων), i.e. the giver of plenty, is a surname of Dimyenus, describing the god as promoting the fertility of plants and trees. (Aelian, V. H. iii. 41.) A similar surname of the god is Phylus (from φλεύς; Schol. ad Apollon. Iphod. i. 115. [L. S.] 2 PHILIAS (Φίλιας), a son of Dionysus and Chthonophyle, also called Phlius, was a native of Arathyrea in Argolis, and is mentioned as one of the Argonauts, (Apollon. Rhod. i. 115, with the Schol.; Paus. ii. 12. § 6; Val. Flacc. i. 411.) According to Pausanias, he was a son of Ceius and Arathyrea, and the husband of Chthonophyle, by whom he became the father of Andromanos; and Hyginus (Fab. 14) calls him Phlius, and a son of Dionysus and Ariadne. The town of Phlius (formerly called Arathyrea) was believed to have derived its name from him. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Φιλιάς.)

PHOBUS (Φόβος), Latin Metus, the personification of fear, is described as a son of Ares and Cythereia, a brother of Deimos, and is one of the ordinary companions of Ares. (Hom. Il. xii. 339, xxvii. 119; Hes. Theog. 934.) Phobus was represented on the shield of Agamemnon, on the chest of Cypselus, with the head of a lion. (Paus. v. 19. § 1.)

PHOCAS (Φωκάς), emperor of Constantinople from A.D. 602 to 610. The circumstances under which this monster was raised to the throne are related at the end of the life of the emperor Mauricius. Phocas was of base extraction, and a native of Cappadocia. For some time he was a centurion, and his conduct was such as to gain the respect and admiration of the country; but his hope for the future was not able to stop the progress of the enemy, and from the Black Sea to the confines of Egypt the Persians ravaged the country. During this time Dometionius entered into negotiations with Narses with a view of reconciling him with the emperor. Beguiled by the brilliant promises of Dometionius, Narses imprudently left his stronghold, and finally proceeded to Constantinople. While he hoped to be placed again at the head of the Roman armies, he was suddenly arrested, and without further inquiries condemned to death. He was burnt alive. Thus perished the worthy namesake of the great Narses, with whom he has often been confounded, although the one was a centenarian when the other first tried his sword against the Persians. This Narses was so much feared by the Persians that mothers used to frighten their children with his name. His murder increased the unpopularity of the emperor. While the Germans disdained the law of the empire, Theodius, the eldest son of Mauricius, who had once had a chance of obtaining the crown, now persuaded the captive empress Constantina to form a plot against the life of the tyrant. She consented, being under the impression that her son Theodius was still alive, and accompanied by one Scholasticus, who seems to have been the scape-goat in this affair, she left her dwelling, together with her three daughters, and followed him to the church of St. Sophia. At her aspect the people were moved with pity. They took up arms, and a terrible riot ensued. But for the bad will of John, the leader of the Greens, who paid for his conduct by being burnt alive by the mob, the outbreak would have been crowned with success. As it was, however, Phocas had the upper hand. The riot was quelled; Scholasticus was put to death; and Germanus was forced to take the monastic habit: he had managed things so discreetly that the emperor was unable to bring any charge against him: else he would have paid for the plot with his life. The empress Constantia found a protector in the person of the patriarch Cyriacus, and her life was spared; but she was confined in a monastery with her three daughters. The general hatred against Phocas, however, was so great that Constantina braved the dangers of another conspiracy which broke out in 607, and in which she interested several of the principal personages of the empire: she still believed that her son Constantine was alive. A woman contrived this plot, and a woman frustrated it. This was Petronia, who, being in the entire confidence of the empress, was employed by her as a messenger between the different parties, and who sold the secret to Phocas as soon as she had gathered sufficient evidence against its leaders. The tyrant quelled the plot by bloody, but decisive measures. Constantina and her three daughters had their heads cut off at Chaledon, on the same spot where her husband and her five sons had suffered death. Among those of her chief adherents who paid for their rashness with their lives were Georgius, governor of Cappadocia; Romanus, advocatus curiae; Theodorus, praefectus Orientis; Joannes, primus e

secretarius; Athanasius, the minister of finances; David, master of the palace, and many others besides great number of inferior persons, all suffered death under the most horrible torments. The tyrant's fury, the devastations of the Avars, the alarming success of the Persians, threw the empire into consternation and despair. Dam, the bulwark of the empire towards the Tigris, was taken by Chosroes in 606; Edessa, of no less importance, shared its fate; Syria was a heap of ruins; Mesopotamia yielded to the king; whosoever was suspected of having been a friend to Mauricius, or of being opposed to the present state of things, was seen bleeding under the axe of the executioner. At last Phocas insulted his former favourite Crispus, the husband of his only daughter Dometia, who had vainly endeavoured to produce a change in the conduct of the emperor. Crispus, a sensible and well-disposed man, looked out for assistance, and fully aware of the chances which any conspiracy run that was carried on in the corrupted capital, he sought it at the farthest extremity of the empire, in Mauritania. Heraclius, exarch of Africa, was the person upon whom his choice fell. Confident in his strength and the love of the Africans, Heraclius entered into the plans of Crispus, and began to show his sentiments by prohibiting the exportation of corn from the ports of Africa and Egypt, from whence Constantinople used to draw its principal supplies. The consequence was, as was expected, discontent in the capital. Although urged by Crispus to declare himself openly, Heraclius wisely continued his policy during two years. Meanwhile, the name of Phocas was execrated throughout the whole empire; and owing to a mad order which he gave for the baptism of all the Jews in his dominions, a terrible riot broke out in Alexandria. Shortly before this, the Persians, having routed Domenitius near Edessa, inundated all Asia Minor, appeared at Chaldedon, opposite Constantinople, and laden with booty retired at the approach of the winter (609—610). This led to riots in Constantinople, and a bloody strife between the Blues and the Greens. Phocas was insulted by the populace, and the means he chose to restore quiet were only calculated to increase the troubles; for by a formal decree he incapacitated every adherent of the green faction from holding any office, either civil or military. Now, at the proper moment, Heraclius, the eldest son of the exarch Heraclius, left the shores of Africa with a fleet, and his cousin Nicetas set out at the head of an army for Constantinople, where Crispus was ready to receive and assist them without waiting for hav- ing the slightest presentiment of the approaching storm. Their success is related in the life of Heraclius. On the third of October, 610, Constantinople was in the hands of Heraclius, after a sharp contest with the mercenaries of Phocas, who spent the ensuing night in a fortified palace, which was defended by a strong body. Theguard fled during the night. Early in the morning the senator Photius approached it with a small band, and finding the place unguarded, entered and seized upon Phocas, whom they put into a boat and paraded through the fleet. He was then brought before Heraclius on board the imperial galley. Heraclius, forgetting his dignity, felled the captive monster to the ground, trampled upon him with his feet, and charged him with his abominable government. "Wilt thou govern better," was the insolent answer of the fallen tyrant. After being taken by Dometia, Heraclius had his head struck off. His body was dragged through the streets, and afterwards burned, together with that of Dometiolus, who had fallen in the battle. Phocas, the most blood-thirsty tyrant that ever disgraced the throne of Constantinople, was as ugly in body as monstrous in mind. He was short, beardless, with red hair, shaggy eyebrows; and a great scar disfigured his face all the more, as it became black when his passions were roused. Heraclius was crowned immediately after the death of his rival. (Theoph. p. 244, &c.; Cedren. p. 399, &c.; Chron. Pasch. p. 379—383; Zonar, vol. ii. p. 77, &c. in the Paris ed.; Simocatta, vii. c. 7, &c.)

PHOCAS, grammian. [Foca.]

PHOCAS, JOANNES. [Jouannes, No. 100.]

PHOCAS (ΦΟΚΑΣ), the name of an engraver of gems, which appears on a stone described by Caylus (Reueil. vii. pl. xxvii.). [P. S.]

PHO'CION (Φώκις), the Athenian general and statesman, son of Phocas, was a man of humble origin, and appears to have been born in A. c. 402 (see Clint. F. H. sub amis 376, 317). According to Plutarch he studied under Plato and Xenocrates, and if we may believe the statement in Suidas (s. v. Φιλάντος Αγωγιστής), Diogenes also numbered him among his disciples. He distin- guished himself for the first time under his friend Chabrias, in a. c. 376, at the battle of Naxos, in which he commanded the left wing of the Athenian fleet, and contributed in a great measure to the victory [Chabrias]. After the battle Chabrias sent him to the islands to demand their contribu- tions (χωρίδρας), and offered him a squadron of twenty ships for the service; but Phocion refused them, with the remark that they were too few to act against an enemy, and too many to deal with friends; and sailing to the several allies with only one gallea, he obtained a large supply by his frank and conciliatory bearing. Plutarch tells us that his skill and gallantry at the battle of Naxos caused his countrymen thenceforth to regard him as one likely to do them good service as a general. Yet for many years, during which Chabrias, Iphi- crates, and Timotheus chiefly filled the public eye, we do not find Phocion mentioned as occupied prominently in any capacity. But we cannot suppose that he held himself aloof all this time from active business, though we know that he was never anxious to be employed by the state, and may well believe that he had imbibed from Plato principles and was from his early social polity, which must in a measure have indisposed him for public life, though they did not actually keep him from it. In a. c. 351 he undertook, together with Evagoras, the command of the forces which had been collected by Idrieus, prince of Caria, for the purpose of re- ducing Cyprus into submission to Artaxerxes III. (Oechs), and they succeeded in conquering the whole island, with the exception of Salamis, where Pythagoras held out against them until he found means of reconciling himself to the Persian king. [Evagoras, No. 2.] To the next year (i.e. 350) Phocion's expedition to Euboae and the battle of Tamynae are referred by Clinton, whom we have followed above in Vol. I. p. 568, a; but his groun- for this date are not at all satisfactory, and the events in question should probably be referred to
n. c. 354. The vote for the expedition was passed against the advice of Demosthenes, and in consequence of an application from Plutarchus, tyrant of Eretria, for assistance against Callias. The Athenians, however, appear to have over-rated the strength of their party in the island, and neglected therefore to provide a sufficient force. The little army of Phocion was still further thinned by desertions, which he made no effort to check, remarking that those who fled were not good soldiers enough to be of use to the enemy, and that for his part he thought himself well rid of them, since the consciousness of their own misconduct would stop their mouths at home, and silence their slanderers against him. In the course of the campaign he was drawn into a position at Tamynae, where defeat would have been fatal, and his danger was moreover increased by the rashness or treachery of his ally Plutarchus: but he gained the day by his skill and coolness after an obstinate engagement, and, dealing thenceforth with Plutarchus as an enemy, drove him from Eretria, and occupied a fortress named Zaretia, conveniently situated between the eastern and western seas, in the narrowest part of the island. All the Greek prisoners who fell into his hands here, he released, lest the Athenians should wreak their vengeance on them; and on his departure, his loss was much felt by the allies of Athens, whose cause declined grievously under his successor, Molossus.

It was perhaps in n. c. 343 that, a conspiracy having been formed by Phocedorus and some of the other chief citizens of Megara to betray the town to Philip (Plut. Phoc. 15; comp. Dem. de Cor. pp. 242, 324, de Fals. Leg. pp. 435, 436), the Megarians applied to Athens for aid, and Phocion was sent thither in command of a force with which he fortified the port Nisaen, and joined it by two long walls to the city. The expedition, if it is to be referred to this occasion, was successful, and the design of the conspirators was baffled. In n. c. 341 Phocion commanded the troops which were despatched to Eubeon, on the motion of Demosthenes, to act against the party of Philip, and succeeded in expelling Clearchus and Philistides from Eretria and Orenes respectively, and establishing the Athenian ascendancy in the island. [Callias; Clearchus.] In n. c. 340, when the Athenians, ignorant at the refusal of the Byzantians to receive Chares, who had been sent to their aid against Philip, were disposed to interfere no further in the war, Phocion reminded them that their anger should be directed, not against their allies for their distrust, but against their own generals, whose conduct had excited it. The people recognised the justice of this, and passed a vote for a fresh force, to the command of which Phocion himself was elected. On his arrival at Byzantium, he did not attempt to enter the city, but encamped outside the walls. Cleon, however, a Byzantian, who had been his friend and fellow-pupil in the Academy, pledged himself to his countrymen for his integrity, and the Athenians were admitted into the town. Here they gained the good opinion of all by their orderly and irreproachable conduct, and exhibited the greatest courage and zeal against the besiegers. The result was that Philip was compelled to abandon his attempts on Perinthus and Byzantium, and to evacuate the Chersonesus, while Phocion took several of his ships, recovered some of the cities which were garrisoned with Macedonian troops, and made descents on many parts of the coast, over-running and ravaging the enemy’s territory. In the course of these operations, however, he received some severe wounds, and was obliged to sail away. According to Plutarch, Phocion, after this success of the Athenian arms, strongly recommended peace with Philip. His opinion we know was over-ruled, and the counsels of Demosthenes prevailed; and the last desperate struggle, which ended in 336 so fatally for Greece at Chaeronea, was probably regarded by Phocion with little of the confidence which Athens exhibited. When Philip had summoned all the Greek states to a general congress at Corinth, and Demades proposed that Athens should send deputies thither, Phocion advised his countrymen to pause until it should be ascertained what Philip would demand of the confederates. His counsel was again rejected, but the Athenians afterwards repented that they had not followed it, when they found contributions of ships and cavalry imposed on them by the congress. On the murder of Philip in 336 becoming known at Athens, Demosthenes proposed a public sacrifice of thanksgiving for the tides, and the establishment of religious honours to the memory of the assassin Pausanias; but Phocion resisted the proposal on the two-fold ground, that such signs of joy betokened a mean spirit, and that, after all, the army which had conquered at Chaeronea was diminished only by one man. The second reason he could hardly expect to pass current, so transparent is its fallacy; but it seems that, on the whole, his representations succeeded in checking the unseemly exultation of the people. When, in n. c. 335, Alexander was marching towards Thbes, Phocion rebuked Demosthenes for his invectives against the king, and complained that he was recklessly endangering Athens, and after the destruction of Thbes, he advised the Athenians to comply with Alexander’s demand for the surrender of Demosthenes and other chief orators of the anti-Macedonian party, urging at the same time on these objects of the conqueror’s anger the propriety of devoting themselves for the public good, like those ancient heroines, the daughters of Leos and the Hycanithides. This proposal, however, the latter portion of which sounds like sarcastic irony, was clamorously and indignantly rejected by the people, and an embassy was sent to Alexander, which succeeded in depressing his resentment [Demades]. According to Plutarch, there were two embassies, the first of which Alexander refused to receive, but to the second he gave a gracious audience, and granted its prayer, chiefly from regard to Phocion, who was at the head of it. (See Plut. Phoc. 17, Dem. 23; Arr. Anab. i. 10; Diod. xvii. 15.) From the same author we learn that Alexander ever continued to treat Phocion with the utmost consideration, and to cultivate his friendship, influenced no doubt, in great measure, by respect for his character, but not without an eye at the same time to his political sentiments, which were favourable to Macedonian ascendancy. Thus he addressed letters to him with a mode of salutation (xαδρε), which he adopted to no one else except Antipater. He also pressed upon him valuable presents and letters. Clearchus, whom he sent home with the veterans in n. c. 324, to give him his choice of four Asiatic cities. Phocion, however, persisted in refusing all such offers, leg-gring the king to leave him no less honest than he found him, and only so far availed himself of the royal favour as to request the liberty of certain prisoners at Sardis, which was immediately granted to him. In n. c. 325, when Harpalus fled to Athens for refuge, he endeavoured, but of course in vain, to buy the good offices of Phocion, who more- over refused to support or countenance his own son-in-law, Charicles, when the latter was afterwards brought to trial for having taken bribes from the fugitive. When, however, Antipater and Pho- lozenus required of the Athenians the surrender of Harpalus, Phocion joined Demosthenes in ad- vising them to resist the demand; but their efforts were unsuccessful, and the rebel was thrown into prison till Alexander's pleasure should be known [Harpalus]. After the death of Harpalus, ac- cording to Plutarch, a daughter of his by his mistress Pythionice was taken care of and brought up by Charicles and Phocion.

When the tidings of Alexander's death reached Athens, in n. c. 323, Phocion fruitlessly attempted to moderate the impatient joy of the people; and the proposal which soon followed for war with An- tipater, he opposed vehemently, and with all the caustic bitterness which characterised him. Thus, to Hypereides, who asked him tauntingly when he would advise the Athenians to go to war, he an- swered, "When I see the young willing to keep their ranks, the rich to contribute of their wealth, and the orators to abstain from pilfering the public money;" and he rebuked the confidence of the newly-elected general, Leosthenes, with the remark, "Young man, your words are like cypress trees; stately and high they are, but they bear no fruit." In the same spirit he received the news of the first successes of the confederate Greeks, exclaiming sarcastically, "When shall we have done conquering?" It is no wonder then that, on the death of Leosthenes before Lamia, the Athenians shrank from appointing Phocion to conduct the war, and elected Antiphilus in preference. Shortly after this he restrained his countrymen, with difficulty and at the peril of his life, from a rash expedition they were anxious to make against the Boeotian towns, which sided with Macedonia; and in the same year (322), he defended Micon, a Macedo- nian officer, who had made a descent on the coast of Attica, and who was slain in the battle. In n. c. 322, the victory gained over the Greeks at Cranon in Thessaly, by the Macedonian forces, placed Athens at the mercy of Antipater; and Phocion, as the most influential man of the anti-national party, was sent, with Demades and others, to the conqueror, then encamped in the Cadmeia, to obtain the best terms they could. Among these there was one, viz. the admission of a Macedonian garrison into Munychia, which Phocion strove, but to no purpose, to induce Antipater to dispense with. The garrison, however, was commanded by Me- nyllus, a good and moderate man, and a friend of Phocion's; and the latter, by his influence with the new conqueror, brought the offices of several respects her hard lot of servitude. Thus he prevailed on Antipater to recall many who had gone into exile, and to grant the Athenians a longer time for the payment of the expenses of the war, to which the terms of the capitulation bound them. At the same time he preserved, as he had always done, his own personal integrity unshaken. He refused all the presents offered him by Me-hemlock which had been prepared was found insufficient for all the condemned, and the jailer would not furnish more until he was paid for it, "Give the man his money," said Phocion to one of his friends, "since at Athens one cannot even die for nothing." He perished in n. c. 317, at the age of 85. In accordance with the law against traitors, his body was cast out on the confines of Attica and Megara (see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Prodosia), and his friends were obliged to hire a man, who was in the habit of undertaking such services, to burn it. His bones were reverently gathered up and buried by a woman of Megara; and afterwards, when the people repented of their conduct, were brought back to Athens, and interred at the public expense. A brazen statue was then raised to his memory, Agonides was condemned to death, and two more of his accusers, Epicurus and Demophilus, having fled from the city, were overthrown and slain by Phocion.

Phocion was twice married, and his second wife appears to have been as simple and frugal in her habits as himself; but he was less fortunate in his son Phocus, who, in spite of his father's lessons and example, was a thorough profligate. As for Phocion himself, our commendations of him must be almost wholly confined to his private qualities. He is said to have been the last eminent Athenian who united the two characters of general and statesman; but he does not appear to advantage in the latter capacity. Contrasting, it may be, the Platonic ideal of a commonwealth with the actual corruption of his countrymen, he neither retired, like his master, into his own thoughts, nor did he throw himself, with the noble energy of Demosthenes, into a practical struggle with the evil before him. His fellow-citizens may have been degenerate, but he made no effort to elevate them. He could do nothing better than despair and rail. We may therefore well believe that his patriotism was not very profound; we may be quite sure that it was not very wise. As a matter of fact, he mainly contributed to destroy the independence of Athens; and he serves to prove to us that private worth and purity, though essential conditions indeed of public virtue, are no infallible guarantee for it. PHOCUS (Φωκος). 1. A son of Ornyion of Corinth, or according to others of Poseidon, is said to have been the leader of a colony from Corinth into the territory of Tithorea and Mount Parthenus, which derived from him the name of Phocus. (Paus. ii. 4. § 3, 29. § 2, x. 1. § 1.) He is said to have cured Antiope of her madness, and to have made her his wife (ix. 17. § 4).

2. A son of Acesus by the Nereid Psmathe, and husband of Asteria or Asterodia, by whom he became the father of Panopenos and Crissus. (Hes. Theog. 1094; Pind. Nem. v. 23; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 53, 939; Schol. ad Erinp. Or. 33.) As Phocus surpassed his step-brothers Telamon and Peleus in warlike games and exercises, they were being stirred up by their mother Endeus, resolved to destroy him, and Telamon, or, according to others, Peleus killed him with a discus (some say with a spear during the chase). The brothers carefully concealed the deed, but it was nevertheless found out, and they were obliged to emigrate from Aegina. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 6; Paus. ii. 20. § 7; Plut. Parall. Min. 25.) Psamathes afterwards took vengeance for the murder of her son, by sending a wolf among the flocks of Peleus, but she was prevailed upon by Thetis to change the animal into a stone. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 901; Anton. Lib. 38.) The tomb of Phocus was shown in Aegina. (Paus. ii. 29. § 7.) Phocus is said shortly before his death to have emigrated to Phocis, but to have soon returned to Aegina; but the country of Phocis, part of which was already called by his name, is said to have been extended by him. While in Phocis he concluded an intimate friendship with Iasacus, which was confirmed by the present of a seal-ring; and this scene was represented in the Lesche at Delphi. (Paus. ii. 29. § 2, &c., x. 1. § 1, 30. § 2.) Panopolus and Crissus, the sons of Phocus, are likewise said to have emigrated to Phocis (ii. 29. § 2). [L. S.]

PHOCYLIDES (Φωκυλίδης), of Miletus, an Ionian poet, contemporary with Theognis, both having been born, according to Suidas (s. v.) in the 55th Olympiad, n. c. 560, which agrees with Eusebius, who places Phocylides at Ol. 60 (n. c. 540) as a contemporary of the lyric poet Simonides. According to Suidas, he wrote epic poems and elegies; among which were Παραμένεις or Γνώμαι which were also called Κεφάλαια. This gnomic poetry shows the reason why Suidas calls him a philosopher. Most of the few fragments we possess are of this character; and they display that contempt for birth and station, and that love for substantial enjoyment, which always marked the Ionian character. One of his gnomic precepts, on the virtue of moderation, is quoted with praise by Aristotle (Politt. iv. 8):—

Πολλά μέσαν θραστά: μέσος θέλω ευτέλες έναν.

The didactic character of his poetry is shown by the frequent occurrence of verses beginning, Καλ τόδε Φωκυλίδεως. These words no doubt formed the heading of each of those sections (κεφάλαια), in which, as we have seen from Suidas, the poems of Phocylides were arranged.

We possess only about eighteen short fragments of his poems, of which only two are in elegiac metre, and the rest in hexameters. The editions of them are too numerous to mention; the titles of these editions, and of the versions into Latin, German, French, Italian, English, and Spanish, fill seven columns of Hoffmann's Lexicon Bibliographicum (s. v.). They have, in fact, been included in all the chief collections of the lyric and gnomic poets, from that of Constantine Lascaris, Venet. 1494, 1495, 4to, down to those of Gaisford, Boissoneade, Schroedwin, and Bergk. Some of these collections, however, contain a didactic poem, in 217 hexameters, entitled ποίημα νουτετικόν, which is undoubtedly a forgery, made since the Christian era; but the fact of the name of Phocylides being attached to such a composition is a proof of the estimation in which he was held as a didactic poet. So also, when Suidas states that some of his verses were stolen from the Sibylline Oracles, the meaning is either that some genuine verses of Phocylides had been preserved in that apocryphal collection, or that both the Oracles and the ποίημα νουτετικόν...

contained some of the same old verses, the true authors of which was unknown. (Fabric. Bibl.
Dicht. vol. ii. pp. 432—454 ; Boile, Gesch. Lyr.
Dicht. vol. i. pp. 243, &c.; Bernhardt, Gesch. d.
Griech. Lit. vol. ii. pp. 350—361.)

PHOEBUS DUS, bishop of Agen, in Southwestern Gaul, about the middle of the fourth century, was an eager champion of orthodoxy, but at the council of Ariminum, in A.D. 359, was entrapped, along with Servatius, a Belgian bishop, by the artifices of the prefect Taurus, into signing an Arian confession of faith, which, upon discovering the fraud, he openly and indignantly abjured. He then subsequently took an active part in the council of Valence, held in A.D. 374, and, as we learn from Jerome, lived to a great age.

One work unquestionably composed by Phoebodius has descended to us, entitled Contra Arianos Liber, a tract written about A.D. 358, in a clear, animated, and impressive style for the purpose of exposing the errors contained in a document well known in ecclesiastical history as the Second Sirmian Cred, that is, the Arian Confession of Faith, drawn up by Potamius and Hosias, and adopted by the third council of Sirmium, in 357, in which the word Consubstantial is altogether rejected, and it is maintained that the Father is greater than the Son, and that the Son had a beginning. This essay was discovered by Peter Pithou, and first published at Geneva in 1570, by Beza, in an octavo volume, containing also some pieces by Athanasius, Basil, and Cyril ; it was subsequently printed by Pithou himself, in his Veterum aliquot Galliae Theologorum Scripta, 4to 1586, and is contained in almost all the large collections of Fathers. It was edited in a separate form by Barth, 8vo. Franc.
1623, and appears under its best form in the Biblio-1763.

In addition to the above, a Liber de Fide Orthodoxa and a Libellus Fidelis, both found among the works of Gregory of Nazianzus (Orat. xli. 4), the former among the works of Ambrose also (Append.
vol. ii. p. 315, ed. Bonet.) have, with considerable probability, been ascribed to Phoeboadius. These, as well as the Liber contra Arianos, are included in the volume of Galland referred to above. See also his Prolegomena, cap. xv. p. xxiv. (Hieron.
de Viris Ill. 103 ; Schönenmann, Bibl. Patrum Lat.
vol. i. cap. iii. § 11 ; Bähr, Geschicht. der Röm.
Literatur, suppl. Band. 2te Abthell. § 63.) [W. R.]

PHOEBE (Φοίβη). 1. A daughter of Uramus and Ge, became by Coeus the mother of Asteria and Leto. (Hes. Theog. 136, 404, &c.; Apollod. i.
§ 3, § 2, § 3) According to Aeschylus (Eum.
6) she was in possession of the Delphic oracle after Themis, and prior to Apollo.

2. A daughter of Tyndareus and Leda, and a sister of Clytemnestra. (Europ. Iph. Aul. 50 ; Orv.
Heroid. viii. 77.)

3. A nymph married to Daunus. (Apollod. ii.
§ 5.)

4. A daughter of Leucippus, and sister of Hileaera, a priestess of Athena, was carried off with her sister by the Dioscuri, and became by Polydenes the mother of Mnesileos. (Apollod. iii. 10.
§ 3 ; Paus. ii. 22. § 6 ; comp. Diodorus.)

5. An Amazon who was slain by Heracles. (Diod. iv. 16.)

6. A surname of Artemis in her capacity as the goddess of the moon (Luna), the moon being regarded as the female Phoebe or sun. (Virg.
Georg. i. 431, Aen. x. 215 ; Orv. Heroid. xx.
229.) [L. S.]

PHOEBE, a freedwoman of Julia, the daughter of Augustus, having been privy to the adulteries of her mistress, hung herself when the crimes of the latter were detected; whereas Augustus declared that he would rather have been the father of Phoebe than of his own daughter. (Suet. Aug. 65 ; Dion Cass. iv. 10.)

PHOEBIDAS (Φοίβιδας), a Lacedaemonian, who, in B.C. 382, at the breaking out of the Olymthonian war, was appointed to the command of the troops destined to reinforce his brother Eumelides, who had been sent against Olynthus. On his way Phoebidas halted at Thebes, and, with the aid of Leonidae and his party, treacherously made himself master of the Cadmea. According to Diodorus he had received secret orders from the Spartan goternment to do so, if occasion should offer ; while Xenophon merely tells us that, being a man of more gallantry than prudence, and loving a dazzling action better than his life, he listened readily to the persuasions of Leonidae. Be that as it may, Aegialus (Barr.) was stationed to guard his position, on the sole ground that they were expedient for the state, and the Spartans resolved to keep the advantage they had gained ; but, as they could thereby save their credit in Greece, they fined Phoebidas 100,000 drachmas, and sent Lysanoridas to supersede him in the command. When Aegialus retired from Boeotia after his campaign there in B.C. 378, Phoebidas was left behind by him as harmost, at Thespiae, and ammoyed the Thebans greatly by his continued invasions of their territory. To make reprisals, therefore, they marched with their whole army into the Thespian country, where, how ever, Phoebidas effectually checked their ravages with his light-armed troops, and at length forced them to a retreat, during which he pressed on their rear with good hopes of utterly routing them. But finding their progress stopped by a thick wood, they took heart of necessity and wheeled round on their pursuers, charging them with their cavalry, and putting them to flight. Phoebidas himself, with two or three others, kept his post, and was slain, fighting bravely. This is the account of Xenophon. Diodorus, on the other hand, tells us that he fell in a sally from Thespiae, which the Thebans had attacked, (Xen. Hell. v. 2, §§ 24, &c. 4. §§ 41—46 ; Diod. xx. 20, 33; Plut. Ages.

23, 24, Polyap. 5, 6, de Gen. Soc. 1; Polyb. iv. 27; Polycem. ii. 5.)

PHOEBUS (Φόβος), i.e. the shining, pure or bright, occurs both as an epithet and a name of Apollo, in his capacity of god of the sun. (Hom.
Il. i. 43, 443 ; Virg. Aen. iii. 251 ; Horat. Carm.
iii. 21, 24 ; Macrobi. Sat. i. 17; comp. Apollo, Hrion.) Some ancient derived the name from Apollo's grandmother Phoebe. (Aeschyl. Eum.
6.) [L. S.]

PHOEBUS, a freedman of the emperor Nero, treated Vespasian during the reign of the latter with marked insult, but received no further punishment than the same treatment on the accession of Vespasian to the throne. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 6 ; Dion Cass. 1xvi. 11 ; Suet. Vesp. 14.)

PHOENICIDIES (Φωινίκηδες), of Megara, a comic poet of the New Comedy, who must have flourished between Ol. 125 and 130, n. c. 260 and 260, as he ridiculed the league of Antigonus and Prynhus in one of his comedies (Illycria, c. 369at Eumenes, Meineke, therefore, fixes the time at which he exhibited comedy at Athens about OL 127, n. 272. The following titles of his dramas are preserved: — Αἰδηροτέσσευσι, Μαρκούσσευσι Μακρό-PHOENIX (Φόιγξ). 1. According to Homer the father of Europa (Hom. Il. xiv. 321); but actording to others he was a son of Agenor by Agriope or Telephassa, and therefore a brother of Europa. Being sent out by his father in search of his sister, who was carried off by Zeus, he went to Africa, and there gave his name to a people who were called after him Phoenixes. (Apollod. iii. 1.
§ 1; Eustath. ad Dionys. Perig. 905; Hygin. Fab.
178.) According to some traditions he became, by Perimeche, the daughter of Oeuneus, the father of Astypalaea and Europa (Paus. vii. 4. § 2), by Teleph the father of Peirus, Astypalaia, Europa, and Phoenixes (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 5), and by Athena, the father of Adonis. (Apollod. iii.
14. § 4.)
2. A son of Amyntor by Cleobule or Hippodaema, was king of the Dolopes, and took part not only in the Calydonian hunt (Tzetz. ad Lycolph.
421; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 762; Hygin. Fab. 175; Ov. Met. viii. 307), but being a friend of Peleus, he accompanied Achilles on his expedition against Troy. (Hygin. Fab. 257; Ov. Heroid. iii. 27; Apollod. iii. 13. § 8.) His father Amyntor neglected his legitimate wife, and attached himself to a mistress, but the former desired her to dishonour her rival. Phoenix yielded to the request of his mother, and Amyntor, who discovered it, cursed him, and prayed that he might never be blessed with an offspring. Phoenix now desired to quit his father's house, but his relations compelled him to remain. At last, however, he fled to Peleus, who received him kindly, made him the ruler of the country of the Dolopes, on the frontiers of Phrygia, and married him to the son of Achilles, whom he was to educate. (Hom. Il. ix. 417; &c.)
According to another tradition, Phoenix did not dishonour his father's mistress (Pithia or Clytia), but she merely accused him of having made improper overtures to her, in consequence of which his father put out his eyes. But Peleus took him to Cheiron, who restored to him his sight. (Apollod.
iii. 13. § 8.) Phoenix moreover is said to have called the son of Achilles Neoptolomus, after Lycomedes had called him Prynhus. (Paus. x. 26, § 1.) Neoptolomus was believed to have buried Phoenix at Eion in Macedonia or at Trachis in Thessaly. (Tzetz. ad Lyce. 417; Strab. ix. p. 428.)
It must further be observed, that Phoenix is one of the mythical beings to whom the ancients ascribed the invention of the alphabet. (Tzetz. Chid. xii.
68.)
3. We must notice here the fabulous bird
Phoenix, who, according to a belief which Herodot.
u 73 and Plutarch held, was burnt in Egypt, and then place once in every five hundred years, on his father's death, and buried him in the sanctuary of Helios. For this purpose Phoenix was believed to come from Arabia, and to make an egg of myrrh
as large as possible; this egg he then hollowed out and put into his father, closing it up carefully, and the egg was believed then to be of exactly the same weight as before. This bird was represented resembling an eagle, with feathers partly red and partly golden. (Comp. Achil. Tat. iii. 25.) Of this bird it is further related, that when his life drew to a close, he built a nest for himself in Arabia, to which he imparted the power of generation, so that after his death a new phoenix rose out of it. As soon as the latter was grown up, he, like his predecessor, proceeded to Heliopolis in Egypt, and burned and buried his father in the temple of Helios. (Tac. Ann. vi. 28.) According to a story which has gained more currency in mo-temperate, Phoenix, when he arrived at a very old age (some say 500 and others 1461 years), committed himself to the flames. (Lucian, De Mort. Per. 27; Philostr. Vit. Apollon. iii. 49.) Others, again, state that only one Phoenix lived at a time, and that when he died a worm crept forth from his body, and was developed into a new Phoenix by the heat of the sun. His death, fur-ter, took place in Egypt after a life of 7006 years.
(Tzetz. Chid. v. 397, &c.; Plin. H. N. x. 2; Ov.
Met. vi. 292.) Another modification of the same story relates, that when Phoenix arrived at the age of 500 years, he built for himself a funeral pile, consisting of spices, settled upon it, and died. Out of the decomposing body he then rose again, and having grown up, he wrapped the remains of his old body up in myrrh, carried them to Heliopolis, and burnt them there. (Pompon. Mela, iii.
8, in fin.; Stat. Silv. ii. 4. 36.) Similar stories of marvellous birds occur in many parts of the East, as in Persia, the legend of the bird Simorg, and in India of the bird Semendar. (Comp. Bochart, Herzoz. iii. p. 809.)
PHOENIX (Φοίγξ), historical. 1. A Thelaus, who was one of the leaders in the insurrection against Alexander, on which account the king, when he appeared before the city, sent to demand his surrender, together with Protythus. The Thelians treated the request with derision, and demanded in return that Alexander should give up to them Philotas and Antigater. (Plut. Aec. 11.)
2. A nephew of Thelaus, who held a high rank in the army of Eumenes, b. c. 321. In the great battle fought by the latter against Cretan and Neoptolemus, the command of the left wing, which was opposed to Cretanus, was entrusted to Phoenix and Pharnabazus, and composed principally of Asiatic troops; Eumenes being apprehensive of opposing any Macedonians to a general so popular with his countrymen. As soon as they came in sight of the enemy the two commanders charged the army of Cretanus, which was unable to withstand the shock, and the aged general himself perished in the confusion (Plut. Eum. 7). Shortly after we find Phoenix despaitched by Eumenes with a select force against his revolted general Perdiccas, whom he surprised by a rapid night march, and took him prisoner almost without opposition (Diod. xviii. 40). After the fall of Eumenes Phoenix appears to have entered the service of Antigonus, but in b. c. 310 he was persuaded by Ptolemy the nephew and general of the king of Asia, to whom he was attached by the closest friendship, to join the latter in his defection from Antigonus.
Phoenix at this time held the important command of the Hellespontine Phrygia, on which account Antigonus hastened to send an army against him under the command of his younger son Philippus (Id. xx. 19). The result of the operations is not mentioned; but Phoenix seems to have been not only pardoned by Antigonos, but received again into favour: and in the campaign which preceded the battle of Issus (u. c. 302), we find him holding the command of Sardis, which he was, however, induced to surrender to Ptolemaus, the general of Lysimachus (I. d. xx. 107). This is the last time his name is mentioned.

3. The youngest son of Antigonos, king of Asia, is called by Diodorus in one passage (x x. 73). Phoenix, but it seems that this is a mistake, and that his true name was Philip. (Comp. Diod. xx. 19; and see Droysen, Hellemism. vol. i. p. 465.)

PHILIPPUS, No. 17.)

PHOENIX (Φοίνιξ), of Colophon, a choric poet. of unknown time, of whose poems Athenaeus preserves some fragments, the chief of which is in ridicule of the arts of certain beggars, who demanded alms in the name of a raven which they carried about on their hands, (Bode, Gesch. d. Lyr. Dichtk. vol. l. p. 337; Meineke, Choliamb. Poet. Græce. pp. 140—145.)

PHOENIX (Φοίνιξ), a statuary, of unknown country, was the pupil of Lysippus, and therefore flourished about Ol. 120, B. C. 300. He made a celebrated statue of the Olympic victor boxing, Epitherses. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19; 29; Paus. vi. 15, § 3.)

PHOLUS (Φόλος), a Centaur, of a son of Seleneus and the nymph Melia, from whom Mount Pholoe, between Arcadia and Elis, was believed to have derived its name. (Apollod. ii. 5, § 4; Theocrit. vi. 149.)

PHORBOΣ (Φορβός). 1. A son of Lapithes and Orsinoe, and a brother of Peribas. The Rhodians, in pursuance of an oracle, are said to have invited him into their island to deliver it from snakes, and afterwards to have honoured him with heroic worship. (Diod. v. 58.) From this circumstance he was called Ophiuchus, and is said by some to have been placed among the stars. (Hygin. Poet. A. ii. 14, who calls him a son of Triops and Hiscilla; comp. Paus. vii. 26. § 5.) According to another tradition, Phorbas went from Thessaly to Olenos, where Alcict, king of Elis, made use of his assistance against Pelops, and shared his kingdom with him. Phorbas then gave his daughter Diogena in marriage to Alcict, and he himself married Hyrmine, a sister of Alcict, by whom he became the father of Augeas and Alcict. (Diod. iv. 69; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 303; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 172; Paus. v. 1. § 6; Apollod. ii. 5. § 5.) He is also described as a bold boxer, and to have plundered the temple of Delphi along with the Phlegyes, but to have been defeated by Apollo. (Schol. ad Hom. H. ii. xxii. 660; Ov. Met. xi. 414, xii. 322.)

2. A son of Argos or Criasus, was a brother of Peirias, and married to Euboea, by whom he became the father of Triops, whence he seems to have been a grandson of No. 1. (Paus. ii. 16. § 1, iv. 1. § 2; Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 920.)

3. A son of Criasus and Melanthia, a brother of Euthalion and Cleoebia, is described as the father of Areostor. (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoenix. 1116, Or. 920.)

4. A Lesbian, and father of Diomed, whom Achilles carried off. (Hom. II. ix. 663; Dict. Cret. s. v. 16.)

5. An Acharnian, who, together with Eumolpus, went to Eleusis. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1156; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoenix. 354.)
2. A peripatetic philosopher of Ephesus, of whom is told the story that he discoursed for several hours before Hannibal on the military art and the duties of a general. When his admiring auditory asked Hannibal what he thought of him, the latter replied, that of all the old blockheads whom he had seen, none could match Phormion. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 18.)

PHORMUS or PHORMUS (Φόρμος, Aristot. Pausan. ; Φόρμους, Athn. Suid.) Bentley is of opinion that the former is the correct mode of spelling (Dissert. upo Phalaris, vol. i. p. 232, ed. 1838).

In Themistius he is called "Αμορφος. He came originally from Maenalus in Arcadia, and having removed to Sicily, became intimate with Gelon, whose son he assisted in the service of king Hieron his brother, who succeeded, b. c. 478. In gratitude for his martial successes, he dedicated gifts to Zeus at Olympia, and to Apollo at Delphi. Pausanias (v. 27) gives a description of the former of these — two horses and charioteers; and he describes a statue of Phormis engaged in fight, dedicated by Lycortas, a Syracuseus. Though the matter has been called in question, there seems to be little or no doubt that this is the same person who is associated by Aristotle with Epicharmus, as one of the originators of comedy, or of a particular form of it. We have the names of eight comedies written by him, in Suidas (s. v.), who also states that he was the first to introduce actors with robes reaching to the ankles, and to ornament the stage with skins dyed purple — as drapery it may be presumed. From the titles of the plays, we may safely infer that he selected the same mythological subject as Epicharmus. They are, "Αθριςκός, Αλέκος, Αλέκνος, Θ'λων Ποιήθως, Ιπτως, Κηρύξος, Κεφάλαια, Περαγός, Άταλάντη. (Aristot. Poetica. c. 5 ; Paus., Suidas. ii. cc.; Athen. xiv. p. 652, a; Fabric. Bibl. Gracc. vol. iii. p. 315.)

PHORONEUS (Φόρωνεις), a son of Inachus and the Oceanid Melia or Archia, was a brother of Aegeus and the ruler of Peloponnese. He was married to the nymph Laodice, by whom he became the father of Niobe, Aips, and Cat. (Hygin. Fab. 143; Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 920; Apollod. ii. 1. § 1; Paus. i. 39. § 4.) Pausanias (ii. 21. § 1) calls his wife Cerdo, and the Scholiast on Euripides calls his first wife Peitho, and her children Aegeus and Aips, and the second Europa, who was the mother of Niobe. According to Hellenius (op. Eustath. ad Hom. p. 383) he had three sons, Pelasgus, Iasus, and Agenor, who, after their father's death, distributed the kingdom of Argos among themselves. Phoroneus is said to have been the first who offered sacrifices to Hera at Argos, and to have united the people, who until then had lived in scattered habitations, into a city which was called after him Ναϊος Φόρωνειος. (Paus. ii. 15, in fin.; Hygin. Fab. 274.) He is further said to have discovered the use of fire (Paus. ii. 19. § 5); his tomb was shown at Argos, where funeral sacrifices were offered to him (ii. 20. § 3). The patronymic Phoroneides is sometimes used for Argives in general, but especially to designate Amphiaras and Adrastus (Paus. vii. 17. § 3; Theocrit. xxv. 200.)

PHORONIS (Φωρόνης), a surname of Io, being according to some a descendant, and according to others a sister of Phoroneus. (Ov. Met. i. 668; Hygin. Fab. 145.) [L. S.]

PHOSPHORUS (Φωςφόρος), or as the poets call him ἰωσφόρος or Ψαυσφόρος (Lat. Lucifer), that is, the bringer of light or of Eos, is the name of the planet Venus, when seen in the morning before sunrise (Hom. Il. xxiii. 226; Virg. Georg. i. 286; Ov. Met. ii. 115, Trist. i. 3. 72.) The same planet was called Hersperus (Vesperus, Vesper, Noctifer or Nocturnus) when it appeared in the heavens after sunset. (Hom. Il. xxiii. 318; Plin. H. N. ii. 8; Cic. De Nat. Deor. ii. 20; Castrull, 62, 64; Horat. Carm. ii. 9. 10.) Phosphorus as a personification is called a son of Astraeus and Eos (Hes, Theog. 381), of Cephalus and Eos (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 42), or of Atlas (Tzetza, ad Lyc. 879). By Philonis he is said to have been the father of Ceyx (Hygin. Fab. 65; Ov. Met. xi. 271), and he is also called the father of Daedallos (Ov. Met. xi. 295), of the Hesperides (Serv. ad Aen. iv. 484), or of Hesperis, who became by his brother Atlas the mother of the Hesperides. (Diod. iv. 27; Serv. ad Aen. i. 530.)

Phosphorus also occurs as a surname of several goddesses of light, as Artemis (Diana Lucifera, Paus. iv. 31. 8; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 116) Eos (Eurip. Her. ii. 116), and Hecate. (Curt. 4. 569.) [L. S.]

PHOTIUS (Φωτιός). 1. Of Constantinople (1). In the Acta Sanctorum, Junii, vol. i. p. 274, &c., is given an account of the martyrdom of St. Lucullianus, and several others who are said to have suffered at Byzantium, in the persecution under Aurelian. The account bears this title:—Φωτίου τοῦ μακαριστῶτα σπευδόμακα τῶν Ἀγίων Ἀποστόλων καὶ λογοθέτου ἑγγάμων εἰς τῶν ἀγίων ἑραμομά- των Νοουλίκλαον. Sancti Martyris Luculliani Enconium, actore beatusissimo Photio, Sanctorum Apostolorum Sociothecae ac Logotheta. Of the writer Photius, nothing further appears to be known than is contained in the title, namely, that he was keeper of the sacred vessels in the great Church of the Apostles at Constantinople, which was second in importance only to that of St. Sophia; and that he must be placed after the time of Constantine, by whom the church was built. The Encomium is given in the Acta Sanctorum in the original Greek, with a Commentarium praeceps, a Latin version, and notes by Conradus Janningus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. pp. 271, 678.)

2. Of Constantinople (2). Photius, a presbyter of the church at Constantinople, was one of the most decided and active supporters of the unfortunate heresiarh, Nestorius [NESTORIUS], in the fifth century. When Antonius and Jacobus were sent, some time before the council of Ephesus, A. d. 431, to convert, by persecution, the Quartodecimans and Novatians of Asia Minor, they presented to some of their converts at Philadelphia, not the Nicene Creed, but one that contained a passage doomed heretical on the incarnation, which excited against them Chasirius, who was a deacon of the church at Philadelphia. In these proceedings Antonius and Jacobus were supported by Photius, who not only gave them letters at the commencement of their mission, attesting their orthodoxy, but procured the deposition of their opponent Chasirius, who thereupon presented a complaint to the council of Ephesus (Concilii, vol. iii. col. 673, &c. ed. Labbe). Tillemont is disposed to ascribe to Photius the answer which was drawn up to the Epistola ad Solitarios of Cyril of Alexandria. A Photius, a supporter of Nestorius, was banished to Petra, about A. D. 436 (Lupus, Ap Ephesius Concil. va- rior. PP. Epistolae, cap. cixxviii.), whom, not-withstanding the objections of Lupus (not in loc.) we agree with Tillemont in identifying with the presbyter of Constantinople. (Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. xiv. pp. 300, 332, 494, 607, 787.)

3. Of Constantinople (3). Of the eminent men whose names occur in the long series of the Byzantine annals, there is hardly one who combines so many claims upon our attention as Photius. The varied information, much of it not to be found elsewhere, contained in his works, and the sound critical judgment displayed by him, raise him to the very highest rank among the Byzantine writers: his position, as one of the great promoters of the schism between the Eastern and Western Churches, give him an almost equal eminence in ecclesiastical history; and his position, striking vicissitudes of fortune, and connection with the leading political characters of his day, make him a personage of importance in the domestic history of the Byzantine empire.

The year and place of his birth, and the name of his father: Photius; and the origin of his name was Irene: her brother married one of the sisters of Theodora, wife of the emperor Theophilus (Theoph. Contin. lib. iv. 22); so that Photius was connected by affinity with the imperial family. We have the testimony of Nicetas David, the Paphlagonian, that his lineage was illustrious. He had at least four brothers (Mountagou, Not. ad Epist. Photii, 139), Tarasins, Constantine, Theodore, and Sergius, of whom the first enjoyed the dignity of patrician. Photius himself, in speaking of his father and mother, celebrates their crown of martyrdom, and the patient spirit by which they were adorned; but the rhetorical style of the letter in which the notice occurs (Epist. 294, Tarasio Patricio fratri) prevents our drawing any very distinct inference from his words; though they may perhaps indicate that his parents suffered some severities or privations during the reign of Theophilus or some other of the Iconoclast emperors. This is the more likely, as Photius elsewhere (Epist. 2. Encyl. § 42, and Epist. ad Nicol. Papam) claims Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople, who was one of the great champions of image worship, as his relative, which shows the side taken by his family in the controversy. What the relation between himself and Tarasius was is not clear. Photius (ll. cc.) calls him πατρόβιος, which probably means great-uncle. But the ability of Photius would have adorned any lineage, and his capacious mind was cultivated, as both the testimony even of his opponents and his extant works show, with great diligence.

"He was accounted," says Nicetas David, the biographer and panegyrist of Nicetas, "to be of all men most eminent for his secular acquisitions and his understanding of political affairs. For so superior were his attainments in grammar and poetry, in rhetoric and philosophy, yea, even in medicine and in almost all the branches of knowledge beyond the limits of theology, that he not only appeared to excel all the men of his own day, but even to bear comparison with the ancients. For all things combined in his favour: natural adaptation, diligence, wealth, which enabled him to form an all-comprehensive library; and more than all these, the love of glory, which induced him to pass whole nights without sleep, that he might have time for reading. And when the time came (which ought never to have arrived) for him to stride himself into the church, he became a most diligent reader of theoretical works." (Nicet. Vita Ignatii apud Concil. vol. viii. ed. Labbe.)

It must not, however, be supposed that Photius had wholly neglected the study of theology before his entrance on an ecclesiastical life: so far was this from being the case, that he had read and carefully analysed, as his Bibliotheca attests, the chief works of the Greek ecclesiastical writers of all ages, so that his attainments in sacred literature might have shamed many a professional divine. There is not sufficient evidence to support the statement of Baronius, that Photius was an eunuch.

Thus highly connected, and with a mind so richly endowed and highly cultivated, Photius obtained high advancement at the Byzantine court. He held the dignity of a Proto-a-Secretis or chief justice (Codin. De Officis C. p. 387, ed. Bonn.); and was, in the latter part of Nicetas David (l.c.), of Protostatharis, a name originally denoting the chief sword-bearer or captain of the guards, but which became, in later times, a merely nominal office. (Codin. ibid. p. 33.) To these dignities may be added, on the authority of Anastasius Bibliothecarius (Concil. Octavi Hist. apud Concil. vol. viii. col. 962, ed. Labbe), that of senator; but this is perhaps only another title for the office of "Proto-a-Secretis." (Gretser, et Gears. Not. in Codin. p. 242.)

Though his official duties would chiefly confine him to the capital, it is probable that he was occasionally employed elsewhere. It was during an embassy "to the Assyrians" (a vague and unsuitable term, denoting apparently the court of the Caliphs or of some of the other powers of Upper Asia) that he read the works enumerated in his Bibliotheca, and wrote the critical notices of them which were treated of a moment in Nicetas David (l.c.), the energy and diligence with which he continued to cultivate literature in the midst of his secular duties. Of the date of this embassy, while engaged in which he must have resided several years at the Assyrian court, as well of the other incidents of his life, before his elevation to the patriarchate of Constantinople, we have no means of judging. He could hardly have been a young man at the time he became patriarch.

The patriarchal throne of Constantinople was occupied in the middle of the ninth century by Ignatius [Ignatius, No. 3], who had the misfortune to incur the enmity of some few bishops and monks, of whom the principal was Gregory Asbestos, an intriguing bishop, whom he had deseased from the see of Syracuse in Sicily [Gregorius, No. 93], and also of Bardas, who was all-powerful at the court of his nephew Michael, then a minor. [Michael III.] Ignatius had excommunicated Bardas, on a rumour of his being guilty of incest, and Bardas, in retaliation, threatened the patriarch with deposition. It was important from the high character of Ignatius, that whoever was proposed as his successor should be able to compete with him in reputation, and the choice of Bardas fell upon Photius, who had already given countenance to Gregory and the other opponents of the patriarch. Ignatius was deposed, and Photius elected in his place. The latter was a layman, and, according to some statements, was under excommunication for supporting Gregory; but not less than a week served, according to Nicetas David (ibid.), for his rapid passage through all the needful subordinate gradations: the first day witnessed his conversion from a layman to a monk; the second day he was made reader; the third day, sub-deacon; the fourth, deacon; the fifth, presbyter; and the sixth, Christmas-day A.D. 858, beheld his promotion to the patriarchate, the highest ecclesiastical dignity in the empire. Nicetas (ibid.) states that his office was irregularly committed to him by secular hands. Photius himself, however, in his apologetic epistle to Pope Nicholas I. (apud Baron. Annal. ad ann. 859, §1x. &c.), states that the patriarchate was pressed upon his acceptance by a numerous assembly of the metropolitans, and of the other clergy of his patriarchate: nor is it likely that the Byzantine court would fail to secure a sufficient number of subsermbent bishops, to give to the appointment every possible appearance of regularity.

A consideration that the whole transaction was violent and indefensible, whatever care might be taken to give it the appearance of regularity, made it desirable for the victorious party to obtain from the deposed patriarch a resignation of his office; but Ignatius was a man of too lofty a spirit to consent to his own degradation, and his pertinacious refusal entailed severe persecution both on himself and his friends. [Ignatius, No. 3.] Photius, however, retained his high dignity; the secular power was on his side; the clergy of the patriarchate, in successive councils, confirmed his appointment, though we are told by Nicetas David (ibid.) that the metropolitans exacted from him a written engagement that he would treat his deposed rival with filial reverence, and follow his advice; and even the legates of the Holy See were induced to side with him, a subserviency for which they were afterwards deposed by the Pope Nicholas I. The prejudice to the cause of Ignatius, with kindness was not kept; in such a struggle its observance could hardly be expected; but how far the severity inflicted on him are to be ascribed to Photius cannot now be determined. The critical position of the latter would be likely to aggravate any disposition which he might feel to treat his rival harshly; for Nicholas, in a council at Rome, embraced the side of Ignatius, and mathematicized Photius and his adherents; various enemies rose up against him among the civil officers as well as the clergy of the empire; and the minds of many, including, if we may trust Nicetas (ibid.), the kindred and friends of Photius himself, were shocked by the treatment of the unhappy Ignatius. To add to his troubles, the Caesar Bardas appears to have had disputes with him, either influenced by the natural jealousy between the secular and ecclesiastical powers, or, perhaps, disappointed at not finding in Photius the subserviency he had anticipated. The letters of Photius addressed to Bardas (Epistolae. 3, 6, 8) contain abundant complaints of the diminution of his authority, of the ill-treatment of those for whom he was interested, and of the inefficacy of his own intercessions and complaints. However, the opposition among his own clergy was gradually weakened, until only five bishops remained who supported the cause of Ignatius.
PHOTIUS.

The quarrel between Nicolaus and Photius of course separated the Eastern and Western Churches for the time. Photius wrote to Nicolaus to endeavour to conciliate his favour, but without effect. Photius was anathematized, and deposed by Nicolaus (A.D. 863); and a counter anathema and sentence of deposition was pronounced against Nicolaus by a council assembled at Constantinople by Photius. The schism, as neither party had power to carry its sentence into effect, continued until the actual deposition of Photius.

The conduct of Photius as patriarch, in matters not connected with the struggle to maintain his position, is not easy to judge. That he aided Bardas, who was elevated to the dignity of Caesar, in his efforts for the revival of learning, perhaps suggested those efforts to him, is highly probable from his indisputable love of literature. (Theoph. Contin. De Mich. Theophili Filio, c. 26.) That he possessed many kindly dispositions is indicated by his letters. The charges of the forgery of letters, and of cruelty in his struggles with the party of Ignatius, are, there is reason to believe, too true; but as almost all the original sources of information respecting his character and conduct are from parties hostile to his claims, we cannot confidently receive their charges as true in all their extent.

The murder of Caesar Bardas (A.D. 866 or 867), by the emperor's order [Michael III.], was speedily followed by the assassination of Michael himself (A.D. 867) and the accession of his colleague and murderer Basil I. (the Macedonian) [BASILIUS I. MACEDON]. Photius had consecrated Basil as the successor to Michael. When Bardas, murder of the latter he refused to admit him to the communion, reproaching him as a robber and a murderer, and unworthy to partake of the sacred elements. Photius was immediately banished to a monastery, and Ignatius restored: various papers which the servants of Photius were about to conceal in a neighbouring reed-bed were seized, and afterwards produced against Photius, first in the senate of Constantinople, and afterward at the council held against him. This hasty change in the occupants of the patriarchate had been too obviously the result of the change of the imperial dynasty to be sufficient of itself. But the imperial power had now the same interest as the Western Church in the deposition of Photius. A council (recognised by the Romish Church as the eighth oecumenical or fourth Constantinopolitan) was therefore summoned A.D. 869, at which the deposition of Photius and the restoration of Ignatius were confirmed. The cause was in fact prejudged by the circumstance that Ignatius took his place as patriarch at the commencement of the council. Photius, who appeared before the council, and his partisans were anathematized and stigmatized with the most opprobrious epithets. He subsequently acquired the favour of Basil, but by what means is uncertain; for we can hardly give credence to the strange tale related by Nicetas (ibid.), who ascribes it to the forgery and interpretation by Photius of a certain genealogical document containing a prophecy of Basil's exaltation. It is certain, however, not only that he gained the favour of the emperor, but that he soon acquired a complete ascendancy over him; he was appointed tutor to the sons of Basil, had apartments in the palace assigned to him; and, on the death of Ignatius, about A.D. 877 [IGNATIUS, NO. 3], was immediately restored to the patriarchal throne. With writers of the Ignatian party and of the Romish Church, this restoration is, of course, nothing less than a new irruption of the wolf into the sheepfold. According to Nicetas he commenced his patriarchate by beating, banishing, and in various ways afflicting the servants and household of his defunct rival, and by using ten thousand arts against those who objected to his restoration as uncanonical and irregular. Some he bribed by gifts and honours and by translation to wealthier or more eligible sees than those they occupied; others he terrified by reproaches and accusations, which, on their embracing his party, were speedily and altogether dropped. That, in the corrupt state of the Byzantine empire and church, something of this must have happened at such a crisis, there can be little doubt; though there can be as little doubt that these statements are much exaggerated.

It is probable that one great purpose of Basil in restoring Photius to the patriarchate was to do away with divisions in the church, for it is not to be supposed that Photius was without his partisans. But to effect this purpose he had to gain over the Western Church. Nicolaus had been succeeded by Hadrian II., and he by John VIII. (some reckon him to be John IX.), who now occupied the papal chair. John was more plant than Nicolaus, and Basil a more energetic prince than the dissolute Michael; the pope therefore yielded to the urgent entreaties of a prince whom it would have been dangerous to disoblige; recognised Photius as lawful patriarch, and excommunicated those who refused to hold communion with him. But the recognition was on condition that he should resign his claim to the ecclesiastical superiority of the Bulgarians, whose archbishops and bishops were claimed as subordinates by both Rome and Constantinople; and is said to have been accompanied by strong assertions of the superiority of the Roman see. The copy of the letter in which John's consent was given, is a re-translation from the Greek, and is asserted by Romish writers to have been falsified by Photius and his party. It is obvious, however, that this charge remains to be proved; and that we have no more security that the truth lies on the side of Rome than on that of Constantinople. The ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Bulgaria was now new cause of division; it had been asserted as strongly by the pious Ignatius as by his successor. (Comp. Joan. VIII. Papae Epistol. 78, apud Council, p. 63, &c.) Letters from the pope to the clergy of Constantinople and to Photius himself were also sent, but the extant copies of these are said to have been equally corrupted by Photius. Letters were sent by the pope, and even the copies of their Commissorium, or letter of instruction, are also said to be falsified; but these charges need to be carefully sifted. Among the asserted additions is one in which the legates are instructed to declare the council of A.D. 869 (reputed by the Romish Church to be the eighth oecumenical or fourth Constantinopolitan), at which Photius had been deposed, to be null and void. Another addition was the which the Greeks assert to be the eighth oecumenical one, but which the Romanists reject, was held at Constantinople A.D. 879. The papal legates were present, but Photius presided, and had everything his own way. The restoration of Photius and the nullity of the council of A.D. 869 were affirmed: the words "filioque," which formed one of the standing subjects of contention between the two churches, were ordered to be omitted from the creed, and the jurisdiction of the Bulgarian Church was referred to the emperor as a question affecting the boundaries of the empire. The pope refused to recognize the acts of the council, with the exception of the restoration of Photius, though they had been assented to by his legates, whom on their return he condemned, and he anathematized Photius afores. (Baron. Annual. Eccles. ad ann. 880. xi. xiii.) The schism and rivalry of the churches became greater than ever, and has never since been really healed.

Photius, according to Nicetas (ibid.), had been assisted in regaining the favour of Basil by the monk Theodore or Santakaren; but other writers reverse the process, and ascribe to Photius the introduction of Santakaren to Basil. Photius certainly made him archbishop of Euchaïta in Pontus; and he enjoyed, during Photius' patriarchate, considerable influence with Basil. By an accusation, true or false, and the intimidation of Leo, the emperor's eldest surviving son and destined successor, of conspiring his father's death, Basil had been excited to imprison his son. So far, however, was Photius from joining in the designs of Santakaren, that it was chiefly by his urgent entreaties the emperor spared the eyes of Leo, which he had intended to put out. Basil died A.D. 886, and Leo [Leo VI.] succeeded to the throne. He immediately set about the ruin of Santakaren; and, forgetful of Photius' intercession, scourged not to involve the patriarch in his fall. Andrew and Stephen, two officers of the court, whom Santakaren had formerly accused of some offence, now charged Photius and Santakaren with conspiring to depose the emperor, and to place a kinsman of Photius on the throne. The charge appears to have been utterly unfounded, but it answered the purpose. An officer of the court was sent to the church of St. Sophia, who ascended the ambo or pulpit, and read to the assembled people articles of accusation against the patriarch. Photius was immediately led into confinement, first in a monastery, afterwards in the palace of Pegae; and Santakaren was brought in custody from Euchaïta and confronted with him: the two accusers, with three other persons, were appointed to conduct the examination, a circumstance sufficient to show the nature and spirit of the whole transaction. The firmness of the prisoners, and the impossibility of proving the charge against them, provoked the emperor's rage. Santakaren was cruelly beaten, deprived of his eyes, and banished; but was afterwards recalled, and survived till the reign of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, the successor of Leo. Photius was banished to the monastery of Bordi in Armenia (or rather in the Thema Armenianum), where he seems to have remained till his death. He was buried in the church of a nunnery at Merdasgares. The year in which his death occurred is not ascertained. Pagi, Fabricius, and Mosheim, fix it in A.D. 891; but the evidence on which their statement rests is not conclusive. He must have been an aged man when he died, for he must have been in middle age when first chosen patriarch, and he survived that event thirty years, and probably more. He was succeeded in the patriarchate by the emperor's brother Stephen, first his pupil, then his syneculus, and one of his clergy. (Theoph. Contin. lib. v. c. 109, lib. vi. 1—5; Symeon Magister, De Basil. Maced. c. 21, De Leone Basil. fil. c. 1; Georg. Monach. De Basil. c. 24, De Leone, c. 1—7.)

The character of Photius is by no means worthy of much respect. He was an able man of the world, but not influenced by the high principles which befitted his sacred office. Yet he was probably not below the average of the statesmen and prelates of his day; and certainly was not the monster that the historians and other writers of the Romish church, whose representations have been too readily adopted by some moderns, would make him. A writer in the Edinburgh Review, vol. xvi. p. 329, says, "He seems to have been very learned and very wicked—a great scholar and a consummate hypocrite—not only neglecting occasions of doing good, but perverting the finest talents to the worst purposes." This is unjust: he lived in a corrupt age, and was placed in a trying position; and, without hiding or extenuating his crimes, it must be remembered that his private character remains unimpeached; the very story of his being an exarch shows that he was not open to the charge of licentiousness; his firmness is attested by his repulse of Basil from the communion of the church, and his mercilessly by his intercession for the ungrateful Leo. It must be borne in mind also that his history has come down to us chiefly in the representations of his enemies. The principal ancient authorities have been referred to in the course of this narrative, though we have by no means cited all the places. We may add, Leo Grammaticus, Chronographia, pp. 463—476, ed. Paris; Zonar. xvi. 4, 8, 11, 12; Cedren. Comp. ed. 551, 569, 573, 593, ed. Paris, vol. ii. p. 172, 205, 213, 214, ed. Bonn; Glysaeus, Annual. pars iv. pp. 293, 294, 297, &c., ed. Various notices and documents relating to his history generally, but especially to his conduct in reference to the schism of the churches, may be found in the Conclii, vols. viii. ed. Labbe, vols. v. vi. ed. Hardouin, vols. xv. xvi. ed. Mansi. Of modern writers, Baronius (Annual. Eccles. A.D. 836—896) is probably the fullest, but at the same time one of the most unjust. Hankius (De Byzantin. Rerum Scriptorum, pars i. c. 18) has a very ample memoir of Photius, which may be advantageously compared with that of Baronius, as its bias is in the opposite direction. See also Dupin, Nouvelle Bibliothèque des Auteurs Ecclesiastiques, xi. x. p. 270, 270 ed. 1698. An essay by Francesco Fontani, De Photo Novae Romae Episcopo ejusque Scriptis Decoratissis, prefixed to the first volume of his Novae Eruditorum Delitiae, 12mo, Florence, 1783, is far more candid than most of the other works by members of the Romish Church; and is in this respect far beyond the Mémorial sur le Patriarche Photius, by M. Wegelein, in the Mémoires de l'Académie Royale (de Prusse) des Sciences et Belles-Lettres, Anné MDCCCLXXVIII. 4to. Berlin, 1779, p. 440, &c. Shorter accounts may be found in Mosheim (Eccles.
Hist. by Murdock, book iii. cent. ix. pt. ii. c. iii. § 27—32), and in the works cited at the close of this article. Fabricius has given a list of the councils held to determine questions arising out of the struggle of Ignatius and Photius for the patriarchate or out of the contests of the Eastern and Western Churches with regard to Photius. He has also given a list of writers respecting Photius, divided into, 1. Those hostile to Photius; and 2. Those more favourable to him. Of the historians of the lower empire, Le Beau (Des Empires, liv. lxx. 38, &c., lxxxl. lxxii. 1—3) is outrageously partial, inflaming the crimes of Photius, and rejecting as untrue, or passing over without notice, the record of those incidents which are honourable to him. Gibbon (Decline and Fall, c. 53, 60), more favourable, has two separate, but brief and unsatisfactory, notices of the patriarch.

The published works of Photius are the following:—1. Μητρομηθαίον τῆς Βυζαντίου, Μυριοβιβλιον και Βιβλιοθήκη. This is the most important and valuable of the works of Photius. It may be described as an extensive review of ancient Greek literature by a scholar of immense erudition and sound judgment. It is an extraordinary monument of literary energy, for it was written while the author was engaged in his embassy to Assyria, at the request of Photius' brother Tarasius, who was much grieved at the separation, and desired an account of the books which Photius had read in his absence. It thus conveys a pleasing impression, not only of the literary acquirements and extraordinary industry, but of the fraternal affection of the writer. It opens with a preface addressed to Tarasius, recapitulating the circumstances in which it was composed, and stating that it contained a new edition of the first and seventy-nine volumes. The extant copies contain a notice of two hundred and eighty: the discrepancy, which is of little moment, may have originated either in the mistake of Photius himself, or in some alteration of the divisions by some transcriber. It has been doubted whether we have the work entire. An extant analysis, by Photius, of the Historia Ecclesiastica of Philostorgius [Philostorgius], by which alone some knowledge of the contents of that important work has been preserved to us, is so much fuller than the brief analysis of that work contained in the present text of the Bibliotheca, as to lead to the supposition that the latter is imperfect. "It is to be lamented," said Valesius (De Critica, l. 29), "that many such abridgments and collections of extracts are now lost. If these were extant in the state in which they were completed by Photius, we should have many more extensive collections of extracts from many ancient writers." But Leich has shown (Dissert in Phot. Biblioth.) that we have no just reason for suspecting that the Bibliotheca is imperfect; and that the fuller analysis of Philostorgius probably never formed part of it; but was made at a later period. A hasty and superlative writer in the Edinburgh Review (vol. xxi. p. 329, &c.), whose harsh and unjust censure of Photius we have already noticed, affirms on the other hand that the work has been swelled out to its present size by spurious additions. "Our younger readers, however, who take the Myriobiblon in hand, are not to suppose that the book which at present goes under that name, is really the production of Photius; we believe that not more than half of it can be safely attributed to that learned and turbulent bishop; and we think it would not be very difficult to discriminate between the genuine and supposititious parts of that voluminous production." As the reviewer has not attempted to support his assertion by evidence, and as it is contradicted by the express testimony of Photius himself, who has mentioned the number of volumes examined, his judgment is entitled to but little weight. The two hundred and eighty divisions of the Bibliotheca must be understood to express the number of volumes (codices) or manuscripts, and not of writers or of works: the works of some writers, e.g. of Philon Judaicus (codd. 108—105), occupy several divisions; and on the other hand, one division (e.g. cod. 125, Istanti Martyris Scripta Varia), sometimes comprehends a notice of several different works written in one codex. The writers examined are of all classes: the greater number, however, are theologians, writers of ecclesiastical history, and of the biography of eminent churchmen; but several are secular historians, philosophers, and orators, heathen or Christian, of remote or recent times, lexicographers, and medical writers; only one or two are poets, and those on religious subjects, and there are also one or two writers of romances or love tales. There is no formal classification of these various writers; though a series of writers or writings of the same class frequently occurs, e.g. the Acta of various councils (codd. 15—20); the writers on the Resurrection (codd. 21—23); and the secular historians of the Byzantine empire (codd. 62—67). In fact the works appear to be arranged in the order in which they were read. The notices of the writers vary much in length: those in the earlier part are very briefly noticed, the later ones much more fully; their recent perusal apparently enabling the author to give his attention to them; so that this circumstance confirms our observation as to the arrangement of the work. Several valuable works, now lost, are known to us chiefly by the analyses or extracts which Photius has given of them; among them are the Persica and Indica of Ctesias [Ctesias] in cod. 72; the De Rebus post Alexandrimum Magnus gestis, and the Parthica and the Bithynica of Arrian [Arrianus, No. 4], in codd. 58, 92, and 93; the Historiae of Olympiodorus [Olympiodorus, No. 3], in cod. 80; the Narrationes of Conon [Conon, No. 1], in cod. 186; the Nova Historia of Polyemus [Ptolemaeus], in cod. 199; the De Heracleae Pontiae Rebus of Memnon [Memnon], in cod. 224; the Vita Isidori [Isidorus, No. 5, of Gaza] by Damascius [Damascius], in cod. 242; the lost Declamationes of Himerius [Himerius, No. 1], in cod. 243; the lost books of the Bibliotheca of Diodorus Siculus [Diodorus, No. 12], in cod. 241; the De Ergythraeo (s. Rubro) Mori of Agatharchides [Agatharchides], in cod. 250; the anonymous Vita Pauli C Politian and Vita Althaniasi, in cod. 257 and 258; the lost Orations, genuine or spurious, of Antiphon [Antiphon, No. 1], Isocrates [Isocrates, No. 1], Lysias [Lysias], Isaeus [Isaeus, No. 1], Demosthenes [Demosthenes], Hyperides [Hyperides], Deinarthus [Deinarthus, No. 1], and Lycurgus [Lycurgus, p. 638], in cod. 259—269; and of the Chrestomathiea of Helladius of Antinoopolis [Helladius, No. 2] in cod. 279; besides several theological and ecclesiastical and some medical works. The above enumeration will suffice to give the inestimable value of the Bibliotheca of Photius, especially when we reflect:—

how much the value of his notices is enhanced by the soundness of his judgment. The first edition of the Bibliotheca was published by David Hoeschelius, under the title of Βιβλιοθήκη τοῦ Φωτίου, Librorum quoque legiti Photii Patriarcha Excerpta et Conspectus, fol. Augsburg, 1601. Some of the Epistolæ of Photius were subjoined. The text of the Bibliotheca was formed on a collation of four MSS., and was accompanied with notes by the editor; but there was no Latin version. A Latin version and scholia, by Andreas Schottus of Antwerp, were published, fol. Augsburg, 1606; but the version is inaccurate, and has been severely criticized. It was however reprinted, with the Greek text, under the title of Φωτίου Μυροβιδίων Ἡ Βιβλιοθήκη, Phoii Myriobiblon sine Bibliotheca, fol. Geneva, 1612, and fol. Rouen, 1653. This last edition is a very splendid one, but inconvenient from its size. An edition, with a revised text, formed on a collation of four MSS. (whether any of them were the same as those employed by Hoeschelius is not mentioned) was published by Immanuel Dekker, 2 thin vols. 4to. Berlin, 1624—1625: it is convenient from its size and the completeness of its index, but has neither version nor notes.

2. Επιστολὴ τῶν ἐκκλησιαστικῶν ιστορίων Φιλοστοργίῳ ἀπὸ φωτίου πατράγχου, Compendium Historiae Ecclesiasticae Philostorgis quod dictavit Photios patriarcha. Cave regards this as a fragment of another work similar to the Bibliotheca; but his conjecture rests on no solid foundation. The Compendium is of great importance as preserving to us, though very imperfectly, an Arian statement of the ecclesiastical transactions of the busy period of the Arian controversy in the fourth century. It was first published, with a Latin version and copious notes, by Jacobus Gothofredus (Godefroi), 4to, Geneva, 1643; and was reprinted with the other ancient Greek ecclesiastical historians by Henricus Valesius (Henri Vaëls), folio, Paris, 1673, and by Reading, fol. Cambridge, 1728.

3. Νομοκαίνων οὐ Νομακάνων, Nomocanon, s. Νομοκαίνων, s. Νομακάνων, s. Canones Ecclesiasticorum et Legum Imperialium de Ecclesiastica Disciplina Consilii s. Harmonia. This work, which bears ample testimony to the extraordinary legal attainments of its author, is arranged under fourteen τίτλαι, Tituli, and was prefixed to a Συναγωγα τῶν κανόνων, Canones Synagwoga, or collection of the Canones of the Apostles and of the ecclesiastical councils recognised by the Greek Church, compiled by Photius; from which circumstance it is sometimes called Προκάνων, Prokanon. It has been repeatedly published, with the commentaries of Theodore Balaswony, who strongly recommended it, in preference to similar works of an earlier date: it appeared in the Latin version of Gentianus Hervetus, fol. Paris, 1561, and in another Latin version of Henricus Aglaus, fol. Basel, 1561, and in the original Greek text with the version of Aglaus, edited by Christophorus Justellus, 4to. Paris, 1615. It was reprinted, with the version of Aglaus, in the Bibliotheca Variae Canonici, published by Guilielmus Vaellicus and Henricus Justellus, vol. ii. p. 783, &c. fol. Paris, 1661. The Nomocanon of Photius was epitomized in the kind of verses called politici [see PHILIPPUS, No. 27, note] by Michael Psellus, whose work was published, with one or two other of his pieces, by Franciscus Boegeutus, 8vo. Paris, 1632.

PHOTIUS.

4. Περὶ τῶν ζητομένων συνόρων, De Syn- tem Conciliorum Occamienicis. This piece subjoined, with a Latin version, to the Nomocanon in the Paris editions of 1615 and 1661, and often published elsewhere, is really part of one of the Epistolæ of Photius, and is noticed in our account of them.

5. Επιστολὴ, Epistolae. There are extant a considerable number of the letters of Photius. The MSS. containing them are enumerated by Fabricius, Bibli. Graec. vol. xi. p. 11. It is much to be regretted that no complete collection of them has been published. David Hoeschelius subjoined to his edition of the Bibliotheca (fol. Augsburg, 1601) mentioned above, thirty-five letters selected from a MS. collection which had belonged to Maximus Marganicius, bishop of Cergio, who lived about the end of the sixteenth century. One consolatory letter to the nun Eusebia on her sister's death, was published by Conrad Rittershausius, with a Latin version, with some other pieces, 8vo. Nürnberg, 1601. But the largest collection is that prepared with a Latin version and notes by Richard Mountagu (Latinized Montacutius), bishop of Norwich, and published after his death, fol. London, 1651. The Greek text was from a MS. in the Bodleian library. The collection comprehends two hundred and forty-eight letters translated by the bishop, and a supplement of five letters brought from the East by Christianus Ravius, of which also a Latin version by another person is given. The first letter in Mountagu's collection is addressed to Michael, prince of the Bulgarians, on the question Τί ἔστιν ἔργον ἀρχωτος, De Officio Principis: it is very long, and contains the account of the seven general councils already mentioned (No. 4), as subjoined to the printed editions of the Nomocanon. This letter to Prince Michael was translated into French verse by Bernard, a Theatin monk, dedicated to Louis XV. and published, 4to. Paris, 1718. The second letter, also of considerable length, is an encyclical letter on various disputed topics, especially on that of the procession of the Holy Spirit, the leading theological question in dispute between the Eastern and Western Churches. Mountagu's version has been severely criticized by Combés. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. i. p. 701 note f f l.) Several important letters are not included in the collection, especially two to Pope Nicolaus I., and one to the archbishop or patriarch of Aquileia, on the procession of the Holy Spirit, of all which Baronius had given a Latin version in his Annales Ecclesiastici (ad ann. 859, lxi. &c., 861, xxiv. &c., and 883, v. &c.). Fragments of the Greek text of the letters to Pope Nicolaus were cited by Allatus in different parts of his works; the original of the letter to the archbishop of Aquileia was published in the Acta Crucis of Combés, pars i. p. 527, &c. (fol. Paris, 1673), with a new Latin version and notes by the editor; and the original of all the three letters, together with a previously unpublished letter, Ad Oecumenum Ecclesiae Antiochenae, and the encyclical letter on the procession of the Holy Spirit (included in Mountagu's collection), the Acta of the eighth ecumenical council (that held in 879, at which the second appointment of Photius to the patriarchate was ratified), and some other pieces, with notes by Dositheus, patriarch of Jerusalem, were published by Anthimus "Episcopus Remnicius," i.e. bishop of Rimnik, in Wahlahin, in

7. Αμφολόχος, Ampholochia. This work, which Alatius, not a friendly censor, declared to be "a work filled with vast and varied learning, and very needful for theologians and expositors of Scripture," is in the form of answers to certain questions, and is addressed to Ampholochus, archbishop of Cyprus.

The title is thus given in full by Montfaucon Αμφολόχος η λόγων ιερών καὶ θρητισμῶν ιερολογίαν πρὸς Άμφολοχίν τῶν οἰκετῶν ἀιρετολογικῶν Κυπρίων ἐν τῷ καρφῷ τῶν περιαγμάτων, ἤθετισμᾶτις διαφόρων εἰς θρητισμῶν συστη-νότων ἐπικύρους ἀτιολογίας, Ampholochia s. Ser-mones et Quaestiones Sacrae ad Ampholochium Metropolitum Cyzicum in Tempore Tentationum; Quaestiones Varriae sunt Numero trecentae.
The answers are said in one MS. (apud Fabric. Bibl.
Guac. vol. xi. p. 20) to be two hundred and ninety-seven in number; but Montfaucon (l. c.) published an index of three hundred and eight, and a Vatican MS., according to Mai (Script. Vet. Nova Collecta, vol. i. proleg. p. xxi.), contains three hundred and thirteen. Further additions were made by Combeux, in his SS. Patrum Ampholochi, &c.
Opera, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1644 (by a strange error he ascribed the work not to Photius, but to Am-pholochus of Iconium, a much older writer, from whose works he supposed Photius had made a selection), and in his Novum Auctarium, 2 vols.
fol. Paris, 1648; by Montfaucon, in his Bibliotheca Coisliniana, fol. Paris, 1715; and by Jo. Justus Spier, in Wittenbergischen Anmerkungen über theo-logische, philosophische, historische, philologische, und kritische Materien, part i. 8vo. Wittenberg, 1738 (Harles, Introdr. in Historiam Linguae Graec. Sup-plem. vol. ii. p. 47). But the principal addition was made by Jo. Chr. Wolff, of forty-six Questiones, published, with a Latin version, in his Carne Philologiæ, vol. v. ad fin. 4to. Hamb. 1733: these were reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. xiii. fol. Venice, 1779. A further portion of eighteen Quaestiones, under the title "Eccl. Τών Άμφολοχίου των, Ex I-thoIi Ampholochis quaedam," was published, with a Latin version, by Angelus Antonius Schottus, 4to. Naples, 1817; and some further portions, one of twenty Quaestiones, with a Latin version by Mai, in his Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collecta, vol. i. pp. 193, &c., and another of a hundred and thirty Quaestiones, in vol. ix. p. 1, &c. As many of the Quaestiones were mere extracts from the Epitrophe and other published works of

Vol. III. of PHI.OTIUS.
Photius, Mai considers that with these and with the portions published by him, the whole of the Amphilochia has now been published. He thinks (Scrip-tor. Vet. Nova Collect. vol. i. proleg. p. xl.) that the patriarch, toward the close of his life, compiled the work from his own letters, homilies, commentaries, &c., and addressed it to his friend Amphilochius, as a mark of respect, and not because the questions which were solved had actually been proposed to him by that prelate; and he thus accounts for the identity of many passages with those in the author's other works.

Anecdota Manichaica s. Paulicianum Edri Quodvuc. No Greek title of the whole work occurs, but the four books are respectively thus described: 1. Δηληγερσ πελ της Μανιχαυ εναληλαθησεως, Narratio de Manichaicis recentibus repellulantibus. 2. Ασπολο καλ ιχεις των Μανιχαυν, Dubia et Solutiones Manichaearum. 3. Του Φατηου λογος Γ, Photii Sermo III. 4. Κατα της των Μανιχαυν αρτιους πληηης, Αριστειν της αγοιατης μναχης προστοτης και ηγουμενου των ιερων, Contra repellulantam Manichaearum Errorum ad Arsenium Monachum Sanctissimum Presbyterum et Praefectum Sacrorum. The title of the second book is considered by Wolff to apply to the second, third, and fourth books, which formed the argumentative part of the work, and to which the first book formed an historical introduction. The second book is intended to show that the same God who created spiritual intelligences, also created the bodies with which they are united, and the material world generally; the third vindicates the divine original of the Old Testament; and the fourth reiterates some points of the second and third books, and answers the objections of the Paulicians. The first book has several points in common with the historical work of Petrus Siculus [PETRUS, No. 7] on the same subject, so as to make it probable that one writer used the work of the other, and it is most likely Photius availed himself of that of Petrus. This important work of Photius was designed for publication by several scholars (vid. Wolff, Praefat. in Anec-dota Graec., vol. i. and Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. vii. p. 329, vol. xii. p. 18), but they were prevented by death from fulfilling their purpose. Montfaucon published the first book, with a Latin version, in his Bibliotheca Coddiniana, p. 349, &c.; and the whole work was given by Jo. Christoph. Wolff, with a Latin version and notes, in his Anec-

tended that the work of Metaphrones of Smyrna, on the Manichaens and on the Holy Spirit, was identical with this work of Photius; but this opinion, which is countenanced in a foregoing article [METAPHRONES], is erroneous.

9. Κατα των της παλαιας Ραγίνης δύη ηκ πατρός μονον εκτοπειται τη Πρεμιατη της αληθειας ναός αληθεια και ηκ του θεου, Adversus Latinos de Procesione Spi-runt sancti. This work is incorporated in the Greek text of the Panoplia of Euthymius Zigabenus (fol. Tergovist. 1710, fol. 112, 113), of which it constitutes the thirteenth Thirios or section. It is omitted in the Latin versions of Euthymius. The work of Photius contains several syllogistic propositions, which are quoted and answered severally, in the De Unione Ecclesiastae Oratio I. of Joannes Veccus [VCCUS], published in the Graecia Orthodoxa of Allatius, vol. i. p. 154, &c. 4to. Rome, 1652. It is apparently the work entitled by Cave Disputatio Compendiaria de Procesione Spiritus Sancti a solo Patre.

10. Omihtae, Homiliae. Several of these have been published:—1. Excerpta της εν των Βασιlioun πας χειλεσια της υπεραγιας θεοτοκου των Βασιλεων του Μακαδονοι αιδοκοθεσιας, Descriptio Novae Sanctissimae Dei Genitricis Ecclesiae, in Pulato a Basilio Macedone extracta; a discourse delivered on the day of the dedication of the church of the Most Holy Mother of God, which was printed by Lambecius, in his notes to the work of Georgius Cudinus, De Originibus P̄oloianis, p. 187, fol. Paris, 1655, and is contained, with a Latin version, in the Bonn republish of Cudinus, 8vo. 1839. It is also contained in the Originum O Polianarum Manipuli of Combēsia, 4to. Paris, 1664, p. 296, with a Latin version and notes; and in the Imperium Oriental of Banturnarum Domini, a fragment, probably from this, is given by Mai (Scriptor. Vet. Nova Collect. pro-leg. in vol. i. xii.). 4. Περς του μον δη παρ τη εν τη διω λαπηνα επιστρεφηται, Quod non socratit visus, Homilia. This piece, which is perhaps not a homily, but the fragment of a letter, was published in the Ecclesiastec Graecae Monumenta of Cotelerius, and has been already noticed in speaking of the Epitola of Photius.

11. Εσωμετα δεκα υς ους πας αποκρι-σει, Interrogationes decem cum totoleum Responsionibus, s. Συναγογα και αποδειξεις ακριβεις συνε-λεγματα εκ των συνδυασι και ιστορικων γραφων περι επισκοπων και αυτοταλων και λοιπων ετε-ων αναγκαιων στηματων, Collectio accurate-que Demonstrations de Episcopis et Metropolitis et reliquis aliis necessariss Quaestionibus ex Synodica

t et Historica Monumentis exceperta. This piece was published, with a Latin version and notes, by Francesco Fontani, in the first volume of his Nova Eruolitorum Delictis, 12mo. Florence, 1785. The notes were such as to give considerable offence to the stricter Romanists. (Mai, Scriptor. Veter. Nova Collect. perint ad vol. Mixiv). 12. Ες του λαθος επισκοπην, in Lucem Ex-positiones. Some brief Scholia on the gospel of Luke from MSS. Catenaes, are given, with a Latin version, in vol. i. of the Scripturam Veterum Nova Collectio of Mai, p. 189, &c., but from which of Photius's works they are taken does not appear.

13. Canonicae Responsor, addressed to Leo, archbishop of Calabria; also published, with a Latin version, by Mai (ibid. p. 362), from a Palimpsest in the Vatican library.

Many works of this great writer still remain in MS. 1. Commentarius in D. Pauli Epistolas, a mutilated copy of which is (or was, according to Cave) in the public library at Cambridge. It is largely cited by Oecumenius. 2. Catena in Psalmm., formerly in the Coislinian library, of which, according to Montfaucon (Bibl. Cod. pp. 58, 59), Photius appears to have been the compiler. But the Conmentary on the Prophets, Prophetaet Liber, ascribed to him by Cave, Fabricius, and others, appears to have a real existence, as Waldau's misapprehension of its existence was founded on the misapprehension of a passage in Possennio's Apparatus Sacror. (Mai, Proleg. ut sup. p. 1.) 3. Homiliae XIV, extant in MS. at Moscow, of the subjects of which a list is given in the Audarium Novissinm (ad calc. vol. i.) of Cambises, in the De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis of Oudin (coll. 210, &c.), and in the Bibliotheca Graeca (vol. xi. p. 30, &c.) of Fabricius. To these may be added two other homilies, De Ascensione, and In Posto Epiphaniae, and an Eccezium Proto-Martyris Theodae (Fabric. ibid.). 4. Odeae. Nine are or were extant in a MS. formerly belonging to the college of Clermont, at Paris ; and three in an ancient Barberini MS. at Rome. The latter are described by Mai (Proleg. p. xliii.) as of moderate length, and written in pleasing verse. Some Epigrammata of Photius are said to be extant (Montfaucon, Bibli. Coisin. p. 520) ; but the Syntax, in Methodio Cope, said to be given in the Acta Sanctorum, Juni, ii. p. 969, is not to be found there. 5. Epiitome των πρακτικων των εττα οιδακημενων συνων, Epitome Actorum Conciliorum septem Generalium. This is described by Cave and Fabricius as a different work from the published piece [No. 4, above]. Some critics have doubted whether it is different from the similar work ascribed to Photius of Tyre [No. 3] : but this prelate lived in the time of the third or fourth councils, he could not have epitomised the Acta of the fifth, sixth, and seventh. So that the Epitome cannot be by Photius of Tyre, whatever doubt may be as to its being the work of our Photius. 6. The Synagoma Canonum has been already mentioned in speaking of the third canon. 7. Περὶ τῆς τός γάλων Πενθαμάτων πως- υγωγιας, De Spiritus Sancti Disciplina Ancyrae. 8. Περὶ τῆς τός γάλων και θαυμων και προσκυνην υπερπτωκος, Liber de Spiritu Sancto, addressed to a bishop Bedas, and different from the published work, No. 9. It is described by Mai, who has given some extracts (Proleg. p. xlv.), as "liber luculentus, varius, atque prolixus." It is ascribed in one MS., but by an obvious error, to Metrophanes of Smyrna. 8. Τα παρα τῆς εκκλησι- ας των Αγίων αι γεωργα μερικά, Adversus Latini- torum Ecclesiam Criminationes Particulares. 9. Contra Francos et Latinos (Mai, Proleg. p. xlviii.), a very short piece. Various other pieces are mentioned by Cave, Lambecius, Fabricius, and Mai, as extant in MS.; but some of these are only fragments of the published writings (Mai, Proleg. p. 1.) enumerated by mistake, as separate works. 2. The work In Categories Aristotelis, now or formerly extant in Vienna and Paris, is apparently a part of the Anthologia (Mai, Proleg. p. xxxvi.). The works De Episcopia et Metropolitii, and the Annato- tatio de Patriarchia sede sua injusta pulvis, mentioned by Cave and Fabricius, appear to be either the Inter- rogationes decem published by Fontani, or a part of that work. (See No. 11 of the published works.) The Symbolum Fidelis mentioned by Lambecius, Cave, and Harles (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. xi. p. 30), is part of one of the letters to Pope Nico- laus ; and the Liber de Psalmone Ignati ac Restitutio- is of the same author, published by Montfaucon (Bibli. Bibliothecarum, p. 123), is part of one of the letters of Pope Nicolaus ; and the fragment De decem Orationibus, mentioned by Vossius and others, and extant in MS. in the King's Library at Paris, is probably from the Bibliotheca (Mai, Proleg. p. 1.). Some works have disappeared, owing to the heroic Leontius of Antioch, mentioned by Seidias, c. e. vol. iv. Photius wrote also against the emperor Julian (Phot. Epist. 187, &c. Montac.), and in defence of the use of images. Some writings, or fragments of writings of his on this subject (Adversus Iconomachos et Paulucii, et De Differ. inter sacr. Imagines atque Idol. are extant in the Imperial Library at Vienna, but whether in distinct works, or under what title, does not appear to be known.

In the Syntropic Bishop Beveridge (vol. ii. ad fin. part. i.) a short piece is given, of which the running title is "Balsam in Photii Interrogationes quorundam Monarchorum ;" but the insertion of the name of Photius is altogether incorrect ; the work belongs to the time of the emperor Alexius I. Comnenus. The Epexegetis, or Commentary of Elias Cretensis (Elias, No. 5) on the Scutul Paradisi of Joannes Climacus, is, in a MS. of the Coislinian library (Montfaucon, Bibli. Coisin. p. 141), improperly ascribed to Photius.

Two learned Romanists, Joannes Andreasius and Jacobus Morelli, have in recent times contemplated the publication of a complete edition of the works of Photius ; the latter proceeded so far as to draw up a "Consecration of his proposed edition (Mai, Proleg. p. xlv.) ; but unfortunately the design has never been completed ; and the works of the greatest genius of his age have yet to be sought in the various volumes and collections, older or more recent, in which they have appeared. 3. Of Tyre. On the deposition of Irenaeus, bishop of Tyre, in A. D. 448, Photius was appointed his successor. Evagrius (H. E. i. 10) makes the deposition of Irenaeus one of the events of the notabilissim Epena held in A. D. 449, and known as the "Concilium Lateranae." But Tillemont more correctly considers that the council only confirmed the previous deposition. (Mémoires, vol. xv. p. 268.) Photius of Tyre was one of the judges appointed by the emperor Theodosius II., in conjunction with Eustathius, bishop of Berytus and Uranius, bishop of Ilium in Othoehne, to hear the charges against Ibas, bishop of Edessa. Photius, Eustathius, and Uranius, met at Berytus, and Photius and Eustathius again met at Tyre, in the year 449 or 449, heard the charges, acquitted Ibas, and brought about a reconciliation between him and his accuser, who here presided at the services of his own church at Edessa. Coislin. i. col. 627, &c. ed. Labbe, vol. ii. col. 503, &c. ed. (Hardouin.) There is a considerable difficulty as to the chronology of these meetings, which is discussed by Tillemont in two of his careful notes. (Mém. vol. xvi. p. 897, &c.) Photius was present at the Council of Ephesus, known as the "Concilium latrocinale," where he joined in acquiring the archimandrite Euthyches, and restoring him to his ecclesiastical rank from which he had been deposed. (Concil. iv. col. 260, ed. Labbe, vol. ii. col. 220, ed. Hardouin.) About the same time Photius had a contest with Eustathius, bishop of Berytus, who had obtained an edict of the emperor Theodosius I., erecting Berytus into a metropolitancity, and enjoining on its metropolitan titular, the decisions of the Council. Tillemont judges that the dignity accorded to the see of Berytus, was designed to be merely titular, and that the struggle was occasioned by the attempt of Eustathius to assume metropolitan jurisdiction over some bishops previously under the jurisdiction of Tyre. In this attempt, being supported by the patriarchs, Anatolius of Constantinople, and Maximus of Antioch, he effected his purpose: and Photius, after a struggle, was constrained, not so much by an excommunication which was speedily recalled, as by a threat of deposition, to submit. The jurisdiction of the dioceses abstracted was, however, restored to Photius by the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Concil. iv. col. 539, ed. Labbe, vol. ii. col. 435, &c., ed. Hardouin.) Photius was among those who at the same council voted that Theodoret was orthodox, and should be restored to his see. (Concil. col. 419, ed. Labbe, col. 495, ed. Hardouin.) He also took part in some of the other transactions of the assembly. Nothing further is known of him. There is extant one piece of Photius, entitled Δεσποινικός, Preces s. Supplex Libellus, addressed to the emperors Valentinian III. and Marcian, respecting the dispute with Eustathius of Berytus. It is given in the Actio Quartus of the Council of Chalcedon. (Concilia, iv. col. 542, &c., ed. Labbe, vol. ii. col. 436, &c., ed. Hardouin.)

A Synopsis de Concilii, extant in MS., is ascribed to Photius of Tyre: this cannot be, as some have supposed, the same work as the Epitome Actorum Conciliorum, also extant in MS., and ascribed to the more celebrated Photius, patriarch of Constantinople. (Tillemont, Mém. ii. ec.; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 451, vol. i. p. 443; Fabric. Biblijoth. Graec. vol. x. p. 670, vol. xii. p. 535.)

PHOXIDAS (Φωκίδας), a leader of Greek mercenaries in the service of Ptolemy Philopator. He is called by Polybius, in one passage, an Achaeus, in another a Melitean, by which is probably meant a native of Melitene, in Phthiotis (Schweigh. ad Polyb. v. 63). Having had much experience in war under Demetrius II., and Antigonus Doson, he was one of the officers selected by Agathocles and Sosibius, the ministers of the Egyptian king, to levy and discipline an army with which to oppose the progress of Antiochus III. He appears to have ably discharged the duties entrusted to him, and when the army was at length able to take the field, held the command of a body of 8000 Greek mercenaries, with which he rendered important services at the great battle of Raphia (B.C. 217), and contributed essentially to the victory of the Egyptian monarch on that occasion. (Polyb. v. 63. 65, 83.)

PHIRAATES. 1. A son of Phraates IV., was made king of Parthia by Tiberius, in opposition to Artaeus III. (Arsaces XIX.), but was carried off by a disease soon after his arrival in Syria, in consequence of his discontinuing the Roman habit of living, to which he had been accustomed for so many years, and adopting that of the Parthians. (Tac. Ann. vi. 31, 32; Dion Cass. xiii. 26.) (Arsaces XIX.)

PHIRAATES (Φίρατος), or Argeu, a satrapary, whom Pliny places, as the contemporary of Polyceiades, Myron, Pythagoras, Scopas, and Perelius, at 90, B.C. 420 (IIt. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19, according to the reading of the Bamberg MS.; the common text places all these artists at Ol. 67). He was one of those distinguished artists who entered into the celebrated competition mentioned by Pliny (i. e.), each making an Amazon for the temple of Artemis at Ephesus: the fifth place was assigned to the work of Phradmon, who seems to have been younger than either of the four who were preferred to him. Pausania mentions his statue of the Olympic victor Amertas (vi. § 1); and there is an epigram by Theodoridas, in the Greek Anthology, on a group of twelve bronze cows, made by Phradmon, and dedicated to Athena Ionia, that is, Athena, whom was worshipped at Iton in Thessaly (Anth. Pal. ix. 743; comp. Steph. Byz. s. v. "Iton"). Phradmon is also mentioned by Columella (R. R. x. 30). Respecting the true form of the name, which is sometimes corrupted into Phryagon and Phradon, and also respecting the reading of the passage in Pliny, see Silius. (Cat. Art. s. v., and Var. Lctt. ad Plin. v. p. 75.) (P.S.)

PHIRANZA or PHRANZES (Φίρανζης or Φρανζης), the last and one of the most important Byzantine historians, was born in A.D. 1401, and was appointed chamberlain to the emperor Manuel II. Palaeologus in 1418, at the youthful age of sixteen years and six months, according to his own statement (i. 38). From this circumstance, from his subsequently rapid promotion, and from the superior skill he evinced in his public life, we may conclude both that he was of high birth, and must be possessed of eminent talents. In 1423 he accompanied Lucas Notaras and Melisseus Manuel on an embassy from the dowager empress Eudoxia to the Sultan, wife of Murad II. Manuel recommended him, when dying, to his son John VII.; but Phiranza attached himself especially to the new emperor's brother Constantine, afterwards the last emperor of Constantinople, and then prince of the Morea. In his service Phiranza distinguished himself as a diplomatist, a warrior, and a loyal subject. At the siege of Patras he saved his master from imminent death or captivity, and not being able to effect his purpose without sacrificing his own person, he nobly preferred the latter, and thus fell into the hands of the enemy. During forty days he suffered most cruel privations in a deep dungeon, and when he was at last ransomed, he was so emaciated that Constantine shed tears at his sight (1429). Some time afterwards he was sent, together with Marcus Palaeologus, as ambassador to Sultan Murad II.; and it is a characteristic feature of the time, that at a banquet given by him and his colleague to some Turkish minis-PHRANZA.

In the following year prince Constantine despatched him to take possession of Athens and Thebes, but he was anticipated by the Turks, who seized those cities for themselves. In 1438 he married; his daughter Damar, whose name will appear hereafter, was born in 1441; and in 1444 his wife was delivered of a son, whose ignoble and lamentable fate made afterwards such a deep impression upon the mind of the unhappy father. In the following years we find him entrusted with important negotiations at the sultan's court, and he also held the governorship of Selymbria, and afterwards Sparta. In 1446 he went as ambassador to the court of Trebizond, and after the accession of Constantine to the imperial throne, in 1448, he was appointed Protonotarius. At the capture of Constantinople, in 1453, Phranza escaped death, but became a slave, with his wife and children, to the first equerry of the sultan. However, he found means of escaping with his wife, and fled to Sparta, leaving his daughter and son in the hands of the Turks. Damar died a few years afterwards, a slave in the sultan's harem, and his son was kept in the same place for still more abominable purposes. He preferred death to shame, and the enraged sultan pierced his heart with a dagger.

From Sparta Phranza fled to Corfu, and thence went as ambassador of the despot Thomas, prince of Achaia, to Francesco Foscari, doge of Venice, by whom he was treated with great distinction. After his return to Corfu he entered the convent of St. Elias, and his wife also took the veil, both broken-hearted and resolved to devote the rest of their days to a holy life. In the monastery of Tarchaniotes, whither he subsequently retired, Phranza wrote his Chronicle, for which his name is justly celebrated in the annals of Byzantine literature; and since that work finishes with the year 1477, we must conclude that he died in that year or shortly afterwards.

This Chronicle extends from 1259 till 1477, and is the most valuable authority for the history of the author's time, especially for the capture of Constantinople. Phranza has many of the defects of his time; his style is bombastic, and he indulges in digressions respecting matters not connected with the main subject of his work; but the importance of the events which he describes makes us forget the former, and one cannot blame him for his digressions, because, though treating on strange matter, they are still interesting. In all contemporary events, he is a trustworthy, well-informed, and impartial authority; and as the greater portion of his work treats on the history of his own time, the importance of his work becomes evident. The Chronicle is divided into four books. The first gives a short account of the first six emperors of the name of Palaeologus; the second contains the reign of John Palaeologus, the son of Manuel; the third the capture of Constantinople, and the death of the last Constantine; and the fourth gives an account of the divisions of the imperial family, and the final downfall of Greek power in Europe and Asia. The first edition is a bad Latin translation of an extract of the work, divided into three books, by Jacob Pontanus (ad calcem Theophyl. Symmoccatus), Ingolstadt, 1604, 4to, and this bad edition Gibbon was compelled to peruse when he wrote the last volume of his 'Decline and Fall.' He complains bitterly of it. "While," says he (vol. xii. p. 68, ed. 1613, 8vo), "so many MSS. of the Greek original are extant in the libraries of Rome, Milan, the Escurial, &c." (he might have added of Munich, which is the best), "it is a matter of cannot be induced to the Latin version or abstract of J. Pontanus, so deficient in accuracy and elegance." While Gibbon thus complained, professor Alter of Vienna was preparing his edition of the Greek text, which he published at Vienna, 1796, fol. This is the standard edition. Immanuel Bekker published another in 1836, 8vo, which is a revised reprint of Alter's text, with a good Latin version by Edward Brockhof, and revised by the editor; this edition belongs to the Bonn Collection of the Byzantines. Hammer has written an excellent commentary to Phranza, which is dispersed in his numerous notes to the first and second volumes of his Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches. Phranza wrote also Expositio Symboli, a religious treatise printed in Alter's edition of the "Chronicon." (Alter's Proeemium to the Chronicon; Fabric, Biblioth. Graec. vol. viii. p. 74, vol. xii. p. 192; Hankius, Script. Byzant.)

PHRATORES (Φρατορεῖς) was, according to Herodotus, the second king of Media, and the son of Deioces, whom he succeeded. He reigned twenty-two years (B.C. 656—634). He first conquered the Persians, and then subdued the greater part of Asia, but was at length defeated and killed while laying siege to Ninus (Nineveh), the capital of the Assyrian empire. He was succeeded by his son Cyaxares. (Herod. i. 73, 102.) This Phrortes is said to be the same as the Tratenon of the Zendavesta, and to be called Feridun in the Shah-Nameh. (Hammer in Wien. Jahrb. vol. ix. p. 13. &c.)

PHRASORTES (Φρασόρτης), son of Rheomithares, a Persian, who was appointed by Alexander the Great satrap of the province of Persia Proper, B.C. 331. He died during the expedition of the king to India. (Arr. Anab. iii. 18, vi. 29. [E. H. B.])

PHRASIUS (Φρασίος), a Cyprian soothsayer, who advised Busiris to sacrifice the strangers that came to his dominions for the purpose of averting a scarcity; but Phraxis himself fell a victim to his own advice. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 11; Arcadian, x. 92.)

PHRATAGU'NE (Φραταγούνη), a wife of Dareius L, king of Persia, whose two children by this monarch fell at the battle of Thermopylae. (Herod. vii. 224.) [Ariocomes.]

PHRATAPIERHINES (Φραταπιερήνης). 1. A Persian who held the government of Parthia and Hyrcania, under Dareius Codomannus, and joined that monarch with the contingents from the provinces subject to his rule, shortly before the battle of Arbela, B.C. 331. He afterwards accompanied the king on his flight into Hyrcania, but, after the death of Dareius, surrendered voluntarily to Alexander, by whom he was kindly received, and appears to have been shortly after reinstated in his satrapy. At least he is termed by Arrian satrap 1 A 3

Of Parthis, during the advance of Alexander against Bessus, when he was detached by the king, together with Eриγyas and Curomus to crush the revolt of Sattanara, in Asia. He rejoined the king at Zariaspa, the following year. The next winter (n. c. 323–327), during the stay of Alexander at Nautaca, we find Phrathermes again despatched to reduce the disobedient satrap of the Mardi and Tapuri, Autophrades, a service which he successfully performed, and brought the rebel a captive to the king, by whom he was subsequently put to death. He rejoined Alexander in India, shortly after the defeat of Porus; but seems to have again returned to his satrapy, from whence we find him sending his son Phrarsmanes with a large train of camels and beasts of burden, laden with provisions for the supply of the army during the toilsome march through Gedrosia (Arr. Anc. iii. 25, 26, iv. 7, 16, v. 20, vi. 27; Curt. vi. 4, § 23, viii. 3, § 17, ix. 10, § 17). From this time we hear no more of him until after the death of Alexander.

In the first division of the provinces consequent on that event, he retained his government (Diod. xviii. 3); but it is probable that he died previously to the second partition at Triparadeisus (n. c. 321), as on that occasion we find the satrapy of Parthis bestowed on Philip, who had been previously governor of Sogdiana. (Droysen, Hellenism, vol. i. pp. 49, 151.)

2. The king of the Chorsamians who is called Phrarsmanes by Arrian [Phrarsmanes, No. 1], bears in Curtius (viii. 1. § 8) the name of Phrathermes. [E. H. B.]

Phrixus (Φρίξος), a son of Athissas and Nephelpe or of Athamis and Themistos (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1144), and brother of Helles, and a grandson of Acolus (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1141). In consequence of the intrigues of his stepmother, Ino (other states that he offered himself), he was to be sacrificed to Zeus; but Nephelpe removed him and Helle, and the two then rode away on the ram with the golden fleece, the gift of Hermes, through the air. According to Hyginus (Fab. 3), Phrixus and Helle were thrown by Dionysus into a state of madness, and while wandering about in a forest, they were removed by Nephelpe. Between Sigeum and the Chersonesus, Helle fell into the sea which was afterwards called after her the Hellepepton; but Phrixus arrived in Colchis, in the kingdom of Aetes, who gave him his daughter Chalciope in marriage (comp. Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1123, 1149). Phrixus sacrificed the ram which had carried him, to Zeus Phrixus or Labysthis (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 633; Paus. i. 24. § 2), and gave its skin to Aetes, who fastened it to an oak tree in the grove of Ares.

By Chalciope Phrixus became the father of Argus, Melas, Phrontis, Cythirous, and Preshon (Apollod. i. 9. § 1; Hygin. Fab. 14; Paus. ix. 34. § 5; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1123; Tzetz. ad Lyce. 22; Diod. iv. 47). Phrixus died in old age in the kingdom of Aetes, or, according to others, he was killed by Aetes in consequence of an oracle (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1151; Hygin. Fab. 3), or he returned to Orthocmeus, in the country of the Minyans. (Paus. ix. 34. § 5; comp. Athamis; Jason.) [L. S.]

Phrontis (Φρόντις), 1. A son of Phrixus and Chalciope. (Apollod. i. 9. § 1; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1157; Hygin. Fab. 14.)
PHRYNICHUS. (Φρύνιχος), one of the most celebrated Athenian hetairae, was the daughter of Epicles, and a native of Thebes in Boeotia. She was of very humble origin, and originally gained her livelihood by gathering capers; but her beauty procured for her afterwards so much wealth that she is said to have offered to rebuild the walls of Thebes, after they had been destroyed by Alexander, if she might be allowed to put up this inscription on the walls:—

"Alexander destroyed them, but Phryne, the hetaira, rebuilt them." She had among her admirers many of the most celebrated men of the age of Philip and Alexander, and the beauty of her form gave rise to some of the greatest works of art. The erator Hyperides was one of her lovers, and he defended her when she was accused by Euthius in one occasion of some capital charge; but when the eloquence of her advocate failed to move the judges, he bade her uncover her breast, and thus ensured her acquittal.

The most celebrated picture of Apelles, his "Venus Anadyomene" [Apelles, p. 222, b.], is said to have been a representation of Phryne, who, at a public festival at Eleusis, entered the sea with dishevelled hair. The celebrated Cnidian Venus of Praxiteles, who was one of her lovers, was taken from her [Praxiteles], and he expressed his love for her in an epigram which he inscribed on the base of a statue of Cupid, which he gave to her, and which she dedicated at Thespiae. Such admiration did she excite, that her neighbours dedicated at Delphi a statue of her, made of gold, and resting on a base of Pentelic marble. According to Apollodorus (Ap. Athen. xiii. p. 591, e.) there were two hetairae of the name of Phryne, one of whom was surnamed Clausiægos and the other Saperidion; and according to Herodianus (Bid.) there were also two, one the Theopian, and the other the surnamed Sestus. The Theopian Phryne, however, is the only one of whom we have any account. (Athen. xiii. pp. 590, 591, 558, c. 567, c. 583, b. 585, e. c.; Adian, V. II. ix. 32; Alciphron, Ep. i. 31; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 10; Propert. ii. 5; Jacobs, Att. Mus. vol. iii. pp. 18, &c. 36, &c.)

PHRYNICUS (Φρυνίχος), an Athenian general, the son of Stratonides (Schol. ad Aristoph. Lys. 313). In b. c. 412 he was sent out with two others in command of a fleet of 40 ships to the coast of Asia Minor. The troops encamped in the territory of Miletus. A battle ensued in which the Athenians were victorious. A Peloponnesian fleet having arrived soon after, the colleagues of Phrynichus were for taking and engagement, from which Phrynichus (wisely, as Thucydides thinks) dissuaded them (Thuc. viii. 25, 27, &c.). In 411, when proposals were made to the Athenians at Samos on the part of Alcibiades, who offered to secure for them Persian aid if an oligarchy were established instead of a democracy, Phrynichus again offered some sanguine advice, pointing out the dangers into which such a course would plunge them, and expressing his belief that Alcibiades was not at heart more friendly to an oligarchy than to a democracy, and his doubts as to his power of executing his promises. Peisander and the other members of the oligarchical faction, however, adjourned his advice, and sent a deputation to Athens. Phrynichus, fearing that in case Alcibiades should be restored, sent a letter to Astyochus, informing him of the machinations of Alcibiades. Astyochus betrayed the communica-

of tragedy, the chief place after Thespis is assigned to Phrynichus. The external and mechanical improvements in the drama are indeed ascribed to each of the great tragedians who lived at the end of the sixth and beginning of the fifth centuries B.C., namely, Choerilus, Phrynichus, Pratinas, and Aeschylus; and there might well be doubts on such matters, as every formal improvement made by either of these poets must, of necessity, have been adopted by the others; so that the tragedy which Phrynichus exhibited in B.C. 476, after the introduction of those improvements which are usually ascribed to Aeschylus, must have been altogether a different kind of drama from that with which he gained his first prize in B.C. 511. Of such inventions, the one ascribed to Phrynichus is the introduction of masks representing female persons in the drama. But those improvements which are ascribed specially to Phrynichus affect the internal poetical character of the drama, and entitle him to be considered as the real inventor of tragedy, an honour which the ancients were in doubt whether to assign to him or to Thespis (Plato, Minos, p. 321). For the light, tedious, Bacchalian stories of the latter, he substituted regular and serious subjects, taken either from the heroic age, or the heroic deeds which illustrated the history of his own time. In these he aimed, not so much to amuse the audience as to move their passions; and so powerful was the effect of his tragedy on the capture of Miletus, that the audience burst into tears, and fined the poet a thousand drachmas, because he had exhibited the sufferings of a kindred people, and even passed a law that no one should ever again make use of that drama (Herod. vi. 21). It has been supposed by some that the subjects chosen by Phrynichus, and his mode of treating them, may have been influenced by the recent publication, under the care of Peisistratus, of the collected poems of Homer; which poems, in fact, Aristotle regards as the source of the first idea of tragedy. Aeschylus, the great successor of Phrynichus, used to acknowledge his obligations to Homer, by saying that his tragedies were only τεμαχυ των ὄμορη μεγάλων δειπνίων. (Ath. viii. p. 348.)

In the poetry of the drama, also, Phrynichus made very great improvements. To the light mimic chorus of Thespis he added the sublime music of the dithyrambic choruses; and the effect of this alteration must have been to expel from the chorus much of the former element, and to cause a better arrangement of the parts which were assigned respectively to the chorus and the actor. We have several allusions to the sublime grandeur, and the sweet harmony of his choral songs. Aristophanes more than once contrasts those ancient and beautiful styles and the involved refinement of later poets (Ar. 748, Eup. 219, 230, Ran. 911, 1294, Thesm. 164; comp. Schol. ad loc. and ad Ran. 941); some writers ascribe to Phrynichus the ancient hymn to Pallas which Aristophanes refers to as a model of the old poetry (Nub. 964; comp. Lamprocles); and his were among the poems which it was customary to sing at the close of banquets and of sacrifices (Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen, Dixiptuas, vol. ii. pt. 1, p. 70).

Phrynichus appears moreover to have paid particular attention to the dances of the chorus; and there is an epigram ascribed to him, celebrating his skill in the invention of figures (Plut. Sympos. iii. 9). Suidas also says that he composed pyrrhic dances (e.v.).

In the drama of Phrynichus, however, the chorus still retained its principal place, and it was reserved for Aeschylus and Sophocles to bring the dialogue and action into their due position. Thus Aristophanes, while attacking Aeschylus for this very fault, intimates that it was a remnant of the drama of Phrynichus (Ran. 906, &c.) and one of the problems of Aristotle is, "Why were the poets of the age of Phrynichus more lyric than the later tragedians?" to which his answer is that the lyric parts were much more extensive than the narrative in their tragedies. (Prob. xix. 31.)

Of the several plays of Phrynichus we have very little information. Suidas, who (as in other instances) has two articles upon him, derived, no doubt, from different sources, gives the following titles—Priameia (or Plééos, Paus. x. 31. § 2), Αγιαπτις, Ἀκτίας, Ἀλκητης, Ἀρταδας Ἰλλυς, Δικαιος ή Πέρας ή Σκιμων, Δανιατες, Ανδρομεδα, Ἱρηνοῦς, and Ἁλουσια Μηλησια (or Μηλησια Ἀλουσια). The last of these plays, which has already been referred to, must have been acted after B.C. 494, the year in which Miletus was taken by the Persians. Suidas omits one of his most celebrated, and apparently one of his best plays, namely, the Προμνισου, which had for its subject the defeat of the Persian invaders, and to which Aeschylus is said by an ancient writer to have been greatly indebted in his Persae (Argum. in Aeschin. Pers.). The conjecture of Bentley seems very probable, that this was the play with which Phrynichus gained his last recorded victory, with Themistocles for his chorus. Phrynichus had a son, Polyphradas, who was also a tragic poet. (Fabric. Biblia Græca. vol. ii. p. 316; Bentley, Answer to Boyle; Welcker, Die Grieck. Trag. pp. 18, 127; Müller; Bode; Bernhardy.)

2. A tragic actor, son of Choricius, whom Suidas confounds with the great tragic poet, but who is distinguished from him by a scholar on Aristophanes (Av. 750), who mentions four Phrynichii, the tragic poet, the tragic actor, the comic poet, and a general. This actor is no doubt the person whose dancing is ridiculed by Aristophanes, in which case Bentley erroneously referred to the tragic poet (Vesp. 1481, 1515). He is also mentioned by Andocides as Φρύνοις ἡ ρηχαγαμικος (De Myol. p. 24); and an attack in the Clouds of Aristophanes (1092), on the tragic actors of the day is explained by the scholar as referring to Phrynichus. (See Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Græc. pp. 148, 149.)

3. A comic poet of the Old Comedy (των ἐπειδω-τερων των τριάδιων κυμαδιών), was, according to the most probable statement, the son of Eunomides (Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 14). He first exhibited, according to Suidas, in Ol. 86, n. c. 435, where, however, we should perhaps read Ol. 87, for the anonymous writer on Comedy (p. 29) places him, with Eupolis, at Ol. 87. 3, n. c. 429 (Clinton, F. H. sub ann.). Nothing more is known of the life of Phrynichus, for the statement of the anonymous writer, that he died in Sicily, refers, in all probability, to the tragic poet (see above), and the story of a scholar (ad Aristoph. Ran. 700) about his being elected a general, is an error which has been sufficiently exposed by Bentley and Meineke.

Phrynichus was ranked by the grammarians among the most distinguished poets of the Old PHYRRYNIS.

Comedy (Anon. de Com. p. 23), and the elegance and vigour of his extant fragments sustain this judgment. Aristophanes, indeed, attacks him, together with the comic poets, for the use of low and obsolete bonyness (Ioua. 14), but the scholiast on the passage asserts that there was nothing of the sort in his extant plays. He was also charged with corrupting both language and metre, and with plagiarism; the last of these charges was brought against him by the comic poet Hermippos, in his Φοιμοδώρα (Schol. ad Aristoph. l. c., and Av. 750). These accusations are probably to be regarded rather as indications of the height to which the rivalry of the comic poets was carried, than as the statement of actual truths. We find Eupolis also charged by Aristophanes with plagiarisms from Phrynychus (Nub. 553). On the subject of metre, we are informed that Phrynychus invented the Ιοικη α μι more παραλεκτικός verse, which was named after him (Marius Victor, p. 2542, Putsch; Hephaest. p. 67, Gaias); about another metre, the Φρύνατικον, there is some doubt (see Meineke, pp. 150, 151). His language is generally terse and elegant, but he sometimes uses words of peculiar formation (Meineke, p. 151). The celebrated grammarian, Didymus of Alexandria, wrote commentaries on Phrynychus, one of which, on the Κρόνος, is quoted by Athenaeus (ix. p. 371, f.).

The number of his comedies is stated by the anonymous writer on comedy (p. 34) at ten; and Suidas gives the same number of titles, namely, 'Ερφάτης, Κάλνος, Κρόνος, Καμαστί, Σατύροι, Τραγῳδή Α' Ἀρτεμίδερον, Μονογρόφορος, Μονήσια, Μονήσιον, Βράσατρον, the subjects of which are fully discussed by Meineke. The Μονογρόφορος was acted, with the Βίδρος of Aristophanes and the Κοσμάδες of Ameipsias, in Ol. 91.2, b. c. 414, and obtained the third prize; and the Μονήσιον was acted, with the Φρύγοι of Aristophanes and the Κλεοθίον of Plato, in Ol. 93. 3, b. c. 405, and obtained the second prize. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 483, 484; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 146—160, ii. pp. 580—608; Bergk, Reliq. Com. Att. Ant. pp. 366, &c.)

[PHRYYNIS. [PHRYNNUS,]

PHIRYNUS, PHRYNISCUS (φρυνισκός), an Achaean, who was engaged in the expedition of Cyrus the Younger. When the Cyprians had been deceived by the adventurier Coeratadas at Byzantium, n. c. 400, Phry\n nicus was one of those who advised that they should enter the service of the Achaeans, the Odrysian prince, who wanted their aid for the recovery of his dominions. We find Phrynicus afterwards, together with Marinus and Cleomen, joining cordially with Xenophon in his expedition, and obtained from the Achaeans the pay that was due, and set about founding the city of Hermolcles of Maroneia to divide the Greek generals (Xen. Anab. vii. 2. §§ 1, 2, 5. §§ 4, 10). (Heracleides, No 16.) [E. E.

PHRYNNIS (φρύνης), or PHRYNIS (φρύ\n νες), a celebrated dithyrambic poet, of the time of the Peloponnesian war, was a native of Mytilene, and flourished at Athens. His father's name seems to have been Camon, or Cambon, but the true form is very doubtful. Respecting his own name, also, there is a doubt, but the form Phrynnis is the genuine Aeolic form. He belonged to the Lesbian school of citharoeid music, having been instructed by Aristoclesius, a musician of the time of the Persian wars, who claimed a lineal descent from Terpander. Before receiving the instructions of this musician, Phrynnis had been a flute-player, which may partly account for the liberties he took with the music of the cithar. His innovations, effeminacies, and frigidity are repeatedly attacked by the comic poets, especially Pherecrates (ap. Plat. de Mus. p. 1146; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. ii. p. 326, &c.) and Aristophanes (Nub. 971, comp. Schol.). Among the innovations which he is said to have made, was the addition of two strings to the heptachord; and Plutarch relates that, when he went to Sparta, the Ephors cut off two of his nine strings, only leaving him the choice, whether he would sacrifice the two lowest or the two highest. The whole story, however, is doubtful; for it is not improbable that the number of strings had been increased at an earlier period. (For a fuller discussion of his musical innovations, see Schmidt, Diligm., pp. 89—95.)

Phrynnis was the first who gained the victory in the musical contests established by Pericles, in connection with the Panathenaeic festival (Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. l. c.), probably in n. c. 445 (Miller, Gesch. d. Griech. Litt. vol. ii. p. 286). He was one of the instructors of Timotheus, who, however, defeated him on one occasion. (Miller, l. c.) [P. S.]

PHYRRON. [ALCAEUS,]

PHYRRON, a statuary, whom Phily mentions as the disciple of Polycleitus, and who must, therefore, have lived about n. c. 408. His country is not mentioned. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19; respecting the true reading see Thiersch, Epochen, p. 276.)

[PHRYNUS, artists.

1. A Greek statuary, whose name is only known by an inscription in ancient characters, on a small bronze figure found at Locri. (Visconti, Mus. Fio-Clem. vol. iv. pl. xix. p. 66.)

2. A maker of vases, whose name occurs on a vase of an ancient style, found at Vulci, and now in the collection of M. Durand. The inscription is as follows:

ΦΥΡΝΟΣΕΠΟΙΕΙΣΕΝΑΙΠΕΝΕΝ.

PHITHIA (φίθια). 1. A daughter of Amphion and Niobe. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 6.)

2. The beloved of Apollo, by whom she became the mother of Dorus, Laodocus, and Polyperetes. (Apollod. i. 7. § 6; comp. Aetolus.)

3. The name in some traditions given to the mistress of Amyntor. (Xen. ad Lyc. 421; comp. Phoenix, No. 2.)

PHITHIA (φίθια). 1. A daughter of Menon of Pharsalia, the Thessalian bishop (Menon, No. 4), and wife of Ancides, king of Epeirus, by whom she became the mother of the celebrated Pyrrhus, as well as of two daughters: Deidameia, the wife of Demetrius Poliorcetes and Trophonius, of whom nothing more is known (Plut. Pyrrh. 1). Her portrait is found on some of the coins of her son Pyrrhus. (Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 170.)

2. A daughter of Alexander II., king of Epeirus, who was married to Demetrius II., king of Macedon. The match was arranged by her mother Olympias, who was desirous of thus securing the powerful assistance of the Macedonian king to support herself on the throne of Epeirus after the death of Alexander. (Justin, xxviii. 1.) [E. H. B.]

PHYLARCHUS (Φυλάρχος). 1. A son of Poseidon by Larissa, from whom Phthis in Thessaly was said to have derived its name. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 320; Dionys. i. 17.)

2. One of the sons of Lycaon. (Apollo, iii. 8. § 1.) [L. S.]

PHURNUTUS (Φυρνύτος), is no other than L. Annaeus Cornutus (Cornutus, p. 859), whose mythological treatise was first published under this name, by Aldus, Venice, 1505, with the alias, however, of Cornutus. He is also called Πολύδεικτος Φυρνύτος, and Gesner says that a treatise under this name, treating of the labours of Hercules, was extant in his time in one of the Venetian libraries (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 550). We transcribe the title of the last edition of this work, from Engelmann's Bibliotheca: "Phurnutus (s. Cornutus) L. Annaeus, De Natura Deorum ex schedis J. Bapt. d'Ausse de Villolson recens. commentariis inae. Frid. Ossannus, Adjecta est J. de Villolson de Theologia Physica Stoicorum commentat. Gottingae," 1844. [W. M. G.]

PHYA. (Πυθίστρατος, p. 170, a.)

PHYLACUS (Φυλακός). 1. A son of Deian and Diomeida, was married to Pericylome or Clymene, the daughter of Minyas, by whom he became the father of Iphicles and Alcime (Hom. II. ii. 705; Apollod. i. 9. §§ 4, 12). He was believed to be the founder of the town of Phylace, in Thessaly (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 323). The patronymic Phylaceis is applied to his daughter Alcime (Apollon. Rhod. i. 47), and his descendants, Phylaceus, Iphicles, and Protesilaus are called Phylicides. (Hom. II. ii. 705; Propert. i. 19; comp. Hom. Od. xi. 231.)

2. A son of Iphicles, and grandson of No. 1. (Eustath. ad Hom. l. c.)

3. A Delphian hero, to whom a sanctuary was dedicated at Delphi. (Paus. x. 23. §§ 3, 6. § 4; Herod. viii. 39.)

4. A Trojan, who was slain by Leitus. (Hom. II. xvi. 181.) [L. S.]

PHYLARCHUS (Φυλάρχος). 1. A native of Centuriapa in Sicily, plundered by Verres. (Cic. Verr. iv. 12, 23.)

2. Of Halus, taken by the pirates off the coast of Sicily. (Cic. Verr. v. 34, 46.)

PHYLARCHUS (Φυλάρχος), a Greek historical writer, was a contemporary of Aratus. The name is sometimes written Philarchus, but there is no reason to adopt the supposition of Wyttenbach (ad Plut. de Is. et Oscr. p. 211), that there were two different writers, one named Phylarchus and the other Philarchus. His birthplace is doubtful. We learn from Suidas (s. c.) that three different cities are mentioned as his native place, Athens, Naucratis in Egypt, and Sicyon; but as Athenaeus calls him (ii. p. 58, c) an Athenian or Naucratian, we may leave the claims of Sicyon out of the question. We may therefore conclude that he was born either at Athens or Naucratis; and it is probable that the latter was his native town, and that he afterwards removed to Athens, where he spent the greater part of his life. Respecting the date of Phylarchus there is less uncertainty. We learn from Polybius (ii. 56) that Phylarchus was a contemporary of Aratus, and gave an account of the same events as the latter did in his history. Aratus died B. C. 213, and his work ended at B. C. 220; we may therefore place Phylarchus at about B. C. 215.

The credit of Phylarchus as an historian is vehemently attacked by Polybius (ii. 56, &c.), who charges him with falsifying history through his partiality to Cleomenes, and his hatred against Aratus and the Achaean. The accusation is probably not unfounded, but it might be retorted with equal justice upon Polybius, who has fallen into the opposite error of exaggerating the merits of Aratus and his party, and depreciating Cleomenes, whom he has certainly both misrepresented and misunderstood. (Comp. Niebuhr, Kleine Schriften, vol. i. p. 270, note.)

The accusation of Polybius is repeated by Plutarch (Arat. 39), but it comes with rather a bad grace from the latter writer, since there can be little doubt, as Luchi has shown, that his lives of Agis and Cleomenes are taken almost entirely from Phylarchus, to whom he is likewise indebted for the latter part of his life of Pyrrhus. The vivid and graphic style of Phylarchus, of which we shall say a few words below, was well suited to Plutarch's purpose. It has likewise been remarked by Heeren (Comment. Soc. Gotting. vol. xxv. pp. 185, &c.), that Trogus Pompeius took from Phylarchus that portion of his work which treated of the same times as were contained in the history of Phylarchus. That Plutarch and Trogus borrowed almost the very words of Phylarchus, appears from a comparison of Justin, xxviii. 4, with Plutarch, Cleom. 29.

The style of Phylarchus is also strongly censured by Polybius (l. c.), who blames him for writing history for the purpose of effect, and for seeking to harrow up the feelings of his readers by the narrative of deeds of violence and horror. This kind of writing is to some extent supported by the fragments of his work which have come down to us; but whether he deserves all the reprehension which Polybius has bestowed upon him may well be questioned, since the unpoetical character of this great historian's mind would not enable him to feel much sympathy with a writer like Phylarchus, who seems to have possessed no small share of imagination and fancy. It would appear that the style of Phylarchus was too ambitious; it was oratorical, and perhaps declamatory; but at the same time it was lively and attractive, and brought the events of the history vividly before the reader's mind. He was, however, very negligent in the arrangement of his words, as Dionysius has remarked. (Dionys. De Compos. Verb. c. 4.)

1. Ιστορία, in 28 books, of which we have already spoken, and which were by far the most important of his writings. This work is thus described by Suidas:— "The expedition of Pyrrhus the Epeirost against Polopomus in 28 books; and it comes down to Ptolemaeus, who was called Euergetes, and to the end of Berenice, and as far as Cleomenes the Lacedaemonian, against whom Antigonus made war." When Suidas entitles it "the expedition of Pyrrhus, &c." he merely describes the first event in the work. The expedition of Pyrrhus into Peloponnesus was in B. C. 272; the death of Cleomenes in B. C. 220: the work therefore embraced a period of fifty-two years. From some of the fragments of the work which have been preserved (e. g. Athen. viii. p. 334, a, xii. p. 539, b), it has been conjectured by some modern writers that Phylarchus commenced at an earlier period, perhaps as early as the death of Alexander the Great; but since digressions on earlier events might easily have been introduced by Phylarchus, we are not warranted in rejecting the express testimony of Suidas. As far as we can judge from the fragments, the work gave the history not only of Greece and Macedonia, but likewise of Egypt, Cyrene, and the other states of the time; and in narrating the history of Greece, Phylarchus paid special attention to that of Cleomenes and the Lacedaemonians. The fragments are given in the works of Lucht, Brücker, and Müller cited below.

2. Τὰ κατὰ τῶν Ἀντίκορῶν καὶ τῶν Περσαγμῶν Ἑλένης, was probably a portion of the preceding work, since the war between Eumenes I. and Antiochus Soter was hardly of sufficient importance to give rise to a separate history, and that between Eumenes II. and Antiochus the Great was subsequent to the time of Phylarchus.

3. 4. Ἐπίσημη μυθιστὴ περὶ τῆς τοῦ Δίως ἐπιφανείας, was one work, although cited by Suidas as two: the general title was Ἐπίσημη μυθιστή, and that of the first part Περὶ τῆς τοῦ Δίως ἐπιφανείας.

5. Τὴν εὐρήματον, on which subject Epiphras and Philochorus also wrote.

6. Παρεμβαΐκων βαθύτατα, θ', which is corrupt, since the word παρεμβαίνω is unknown.

7. Άγραφα, not mentioned by Suidas, and only by the Scholiast on Aelius Aristides (p. 103, ed. Frommel), was probably a work on the more abstruse points of mythology, of which no written account had ever been given.

PHYLAS, (Φυλάς), 1. A king of the Dryopes, was attacked and slain by Heracles, because he had violated the sanctuary of Delphi. By his daughter Midea, Heracles became the father of Antiochus. (Paus. i. 5. § 2, iv. 34. § 6, x. 10. § 1; Diod. iv. 37.)

2. A son of Antiochus, and grandson of Heracles and Midea, was married to Deiphile, by whom he had two sons, Hippotas and Thero. (Paus. ii. 4. § 3, ix. 40. § 3; Apollod. ii. 8. § 3.)

3. A king of Ephyra in Thesprotia, and the father of Polyneke and Astyoche, by the latter of whom Heracles was the father of Teleomenus. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 6; Hom. l. xvi. 180; comp. Diod. iv. 36.)

PHYLIS (Φυλίς), of Halicarnassus, the son of Polygnotus, was a stauroty, whose name has been recently discovered by means of the inscriptions on the bases which originally supported two of his works. One of these is at Astypalea, and belonged originally to a statue of bronze, which the people of that place erected in honour of their fellow-citizen, Polyaeus, the son of Meleippus; the other was found at Delos, and was the base of a statue erected in honour of a citizen of Rhodes. (Böckh, Corp. Insér. vol. ii. pp. 1039, 1098; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 886.) [ P. S.]

PHYLEUS (Φυλέας), a son of Aegeiros, was expelled by his father from Ephyra, because he gave his evidence in favour of Heracles. He then emigrated to Dulichium (Hom. ii. 629, xv. 530, xxii. 637.) By Citene or Timandra Phyleus became the father of Meges, who is hence called Phyleides. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 305; Paus. v. 3. § 4; Apollod. ii. 5. § 5; Strab. x. p. 453.)

PHYLIDAS, or more properly PHYLIDAS (Φυλίδας, Φυλίδας), an Aetolian, was sent by Dorimachus, in the winter of B. C. 219, or rather perhaps early in the following year, to aid the Eleans against Philip V. of Macedon, in Triphylia. The king, however, made himself master successively of Alpheira, Typanae, Hypana, and Phigalea, and Phylidas, quite unable to check his progress, threw himself into Lepreum. But the inhabitants were hostile to him, and, on Philip's approach, he was obliged to evacuate the town. Philip pursued him with his light troops and captured all his baggage, but Phylidas himself, with his forces, effected his escape to Samicum. Philip, however, began to invest the place, and the besieged army capitulated on condition of being allowed to march out with their arms. (Polyb. iv. 77—80.) [ E. E.]

PHYLIDAS (Φυλίδας), a Theban, was secretary to the polemarchs who held office under Spartan protection, after the seizure of the Cadmeis by Phoebidae, in B. C. 382. He was, however, a secret enemy of the new government, and appears to have made interest for the office which he occupied with the view of aiding the cause of freedom. Having been sent by his masters on some business to Athens, where the exiles had taken refuge, he arranged with them the particulars of their intended enterprise against the tyrants, and afterwards most effectually aided its execution in B. C. 379. Thus, having especially ingratiated himself with Archias and Philippus, of whose pleasures he pretended to be the ready minister, he introduced, in the disguise of women, the conspirators who despatched them; he gained admittance, according to Xenophon, for Pelopidas and his two companions to the house of Leonidas; and, before what had happened could be publicly known, he effected, with two others, his entrance into the prison, under pretence of an order from the polemarchs, and, having slain the jailor, released those who were confined there as enemies to the government. (Xen. Hell. v. 4. §§ 2—8; Plut. Pelop. 7, &c., de Gen. Soc. 4, 24, 26, 29, 32; Diod. xv. 25.)

PHYLILUS (Φυλίλος), a daughter of king Sithon, in Thrace, fell in love with Demophon on his return from Troy to Greece. Demophon promised her, by a certain day, to come back from Athens and PHYSSIAS (Φωσίας), an Elean citizen of distinction who was taken prisoner by the Achaeans under Lycus of Pharnae, when the latter defeated the allied forces of the Eleans and Aetoli ans under EURIPIDAS, B.C. 217. (Polyb. v. 94.) [E.H.B.]

PHYTALIDAE (Φυτάλιδαι), a three-edged sword used by the Phytalidae tribe, which is mentioned in ancient sources.

PHYTON (Φυτών), a citizen of Rhegium, who was chosen by his countrymen to be their general, when the city was besieged by the elder Dionysius, B.C. 386. He animated the Rhegi ans to the most vigorous defence, and displayed all the qualities and resources of an able general, as well as a brave warrior; and it was in great measure owing to him that the siege was protracted for a space of more than eleven months. At length, however, the besieged were compelled by famine to surrender, and the heroic Phyt on fell into the hands of the tyrant, who, after treating him with the most cruel indignities, put him to death, together with his son and all his other relations (Diod. xiv. 108, 111, 112). Diodorus tells us that the virtues and unhappy fate of Phyt on were a favourite subject of lamentation with the Greek poets, but none of these passages have come down to us. The only other author now extant who mentions the name of Phyt on is Philostratus (Vit. Apoll. i. 35, vii. 2), who appears to have followed a version of his story wholly different from that of Diodorus. According to this, Phyt on was an exile from Rhegium, who had taken refuge at the court of Dionysius, and enjoyed high favour with the tyrant, but on discovering his designs against Rhegium gave information of them to his countrymen, and was put to death by Dionysius in consequence. [E. H. B.]

PHYXUS (Φύξος), i.e., the god who protects fugitives, occurs as a surname of Zeus in Thessaly (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1147, iv. 699; Paus. ii. 21. § 3, iii. 17. § 8), and of Apollo. (Philos. Her. x. 4.)

PICTOR, the name of a family of the Fabian gens, which was given to them from the eminence which their ancestor obtained as a painter. [See below.

1. C. FABIUS PICTOR, painted the temple of Salus (aedem Salutis pinnit), which the dictator C. Junius Brutus Bubbleus contracted for in his censorship, B.C. 307, and dedicated in his dictatorship, B.C. 302. This painting, which must have been on the walls of the temple, was probably a representation of the battle which Bubbleus had gained against the Samnites [Bubulus, No. 1]. This is the earliest Roman painting of which we have any record. It was preserved till the reign of Claudius, when the temple was destroyed by fire. Dionysius, in a passage to which Niebuhr calls attention, praises the great correctness of the drawing in this picture, the graceful ness of the colouring and the absence of all mannerism and affectation. (Plin. H.N. xxxv. 4. s. 7; Val. Max. viii. 14. § 6; Dionys. xvi. 6, in Mai's Ed.; C. Tusc. i. 2. § 4; comp. Liv. x. 1; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 536.)

2. C. FABIUS PICTOR, son of No. 1, was consul B.C. 269, with Q. Ogulnius Gallus. The events of his consulship are related under GALLUS, p. 228.

3. N. (i.e. Numerius) FABIUS PICTOR, also son of No. 1, was consul B.C. 266 with D. Junius Pern, and triumphed twice in this year, like his colleague, the first time over the Sassinates, and the second time over the Sallentina and Messapii (Fasti). It appears to have been this Fabius Pictor, and not his brother, who was one of the three ambassadors sent by the senate to Ptolemy Philadelphus, in B.C. 276 (Val. Max. iv. 3. § 9, with the Commentators). For an account of this embassy see OGNUIUS.

Cicero says that N. Fabius Pictor related the dream of Aeneas in his Greek Annals (Cic. Div. i. 21). This is the only passage in which mention is made of this annalist. Vossius (de Hist. Latin. i. 14) and Krause (Vitae et Fregam. Hist. Roman. p. 83) suppose him to be a son of the consul of B.C. 266, but Quellen (Onom. Taur. p. 246) and others consider him to be the same as the consul. One is almost tempted to suspect that there is a mistake in the phenomenon, and that it ought to be Quintus.

4. Q. FABIUS PICTOR, the son of No. 2, and the grandson of No. 1, was the most ancient writer of Roman history in prose, and is therefore usually placed at the head of the Roman annalists. Thus he is called by Livy scriptorwm antiquissimus (i. 44) and longe antiquissimus auctor (ii. 44). He served in the Gallic war, B.C. 225 (Eutrop. iii. 5; Oros. iv. 13; comp. Plin. H. N. x. 24, s. 34), and also in the second Punic war; and that he enjoyed considerable reputation among his contemporaries is evident from the circumstance of his being sent to Delphi, after the disastrous battle of Cannae in B.C. 216, to consult the oracle by what means the Romans could propagate the gods (Liv. xxii. 57, xxxiii. 11; Appian, Annib. 27). We learn from...
Polybius (iii. 9, § 4) that he had a seat in the senate, and consequently he must have filled the office of quaestor; but we possess no other particulars respecting his life. The year of his death is uncertain; for the C. Fabius Pictor whose death Livy speaks of (xlv. 44) in b.c. 167, is a different person from the historian (see No. 5). One might conjecture, from his not obtaining any of the higher dignities of the state, that he died soon after his return from Delphi; but, as Polybius (iii. 9) speaks of him as one of the historians of the second Punic war, he can hardly have died so soon; and it is probable that his literary habits rendered him disinclined to engage in the active services required of the Roman magistrates at that time.

The history of Fabius Pictor probably began with the arrival of Aeneas in Italy, and came down to his own time. The earlier events were related with brevity; but that portion of the history of which he was a contemporary, was given with much greater minuteness (Dionys. i. 6). We do not know the number of books into which the work was divided, nor how far it came down. It contained an account of the battle of the lake Trasimene (Liv. xxxii. 7) and Polybius, as we have already remarked, speaks of him as one of the historians of the second Punic War. We have the express testimony of Dionysius (l. c.) that the work of Fabius was written in Greek; but it has been supposed from Cicero (de Orat. ii. 12, de Leg. i. 2), Gellius (v. 4, x. 15), Quintilian (i. 6 § 12), and Nonius (a. v. Punicus), that it must have been written in Latin also. This, however, is very improbable; and as we know there were two Latin writers of the name of Fabius, namely, Ser. Fabius Pictor, and Q. Fabius Maximus Servilianus, it is more likely that the passages above quoted refer to one of these, and not to Quintus. [See below, No. 6.]

The work of Q. Fabius Pictor was one of great value, and is frequently referred to by Livy, Polybius, and Dionysius. Polybius (i. 14, iii. 9), indeed, enlarges Fabius with great partiality towards the Romans; and as he wrote for the Greeks, he was probably anxious to make his countrymen appear in the best light. The work seems to have contained a very accurate account of the constitutional changes at Rome; Niebuhr attributes the excellence of Dion Cassius in this department of his history to his having closely followed the statements of Fabius (Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. note 367). In his account of the early Roman legends Fabius is said to have adopted the views of Diocles of Paphanethus [Diocles, literary, No. 5]. (Muller, De Q. Fabio Pictore, Altorf, 1690; Whiste, De Fabio Pictore Antonini funeris testis, Hafniae, 1632; Vessius, De Hist. Lat. p. 12; Krause, Vite et Figuram. Hist. Rom., p. 59, &c.; Niebuhr, Lectures on Roman History, vol. i. p. 27, ed. Schmitz.)

5. Q. FABII PICTOR, probably son of No. 4, was praetor b.c. 189. The lot gave him Sardinia as his province, but as he had been consecrated flamen Quirinalis in the preceding year, the pontifex maximus, P. Licinius, compelled him to remain in Rome. Fabius was so enraged at losing his province that he attempted to abduct, but the senate compelled him to retain his office, and assigned to him the jurisdiction inter peregrinos. He died b.c. 167. (Liv. xxxvii. 47, 50, 51, xlv. 44.)

6. SER. FABII PICTOR, probably a son of No. 6, was a contemporary of A. Postumius Albinus, who was consul b.c. 151, and is said by Cicero to have been well skilled in law, literature, and antiquity (Brut. 21). He appears to be the same as the Fabius Pictor who wrote a work De Jure Pontificii, in several books, which is quoted by Nonius (a. v. Punicus and Pothus). We also have quotations from this work in Gellius (i. 12, x. 15) and Macrobius (Sat. iii. 2). This Ser. Fabius probably wrote Annals likewise in the Latin language, since Cicero (de Orat. ii. 12) speaks of a Latin annalist, Pictor, whom he places after Cato, but before Piso; which corresponds with the time at which Ser. Pictor lived, but could not be applicable to Q. Pictor, who lived in the time of the second Punic War. Now as we know that Q. Pictor wrote his history in Greek, it is probable, as has been already remarked under No. 4, that the passages referring to a Latin history of Fabius Pictor relate to this Ser. Pictor. (Krause, Ibid. p. 152, &c.)

The annexed coin was struck by some member of this family, but it cannot be assigned with certainty to any of the persons above mentioned. It bears on the obverse a head of Pallas, and on the reverse a figure of Rome, girded with the legend of N. Fabii Pictori. On the shield we find quirina, which probably indicates that the person who struck it was Flamin Quirinalis.

PICUMNUS and PILUMNUS, were regarded as two brothers, and as the beneficent gods of maternity in the rustic religion of the ancient Romans. A grove was prepared for them in the house in which there was a newly-born child. Pilumnus was believed to ward off all the sufferings from childhood to the infant with his pilum, with which he taught to pound the grain; and Pilumnus, who, under the name of Sterquiliniius, was believed to have discovered the use of manure for the fields, conferred upon the infant strength and prosperity, whence both were also looked upon as the gods of good deeds, and were identified with Castor and Pollux. (Serv. ad Aen. ix. 4, x. 76; August. De Civ. Del. vi. 9, xviii. 15; Ov. Met. xiv. 321, &c.; Virg. Aen. vii. 169). When Danae landed in Italy, Pilumnus is said to have built with her the town of Ardea, and to have become by her the father of Daunus. [L. S.]

PICUS (Florus), a Latin prophetic divinity, is described as a son of Saturnus or Stercus, as the husband of Canena, and the father of Faunus (Ov. Met. xiv. 320, 335, Fast. iii. 291; Virg. Aen. vii. 48, Serv. ad Aen. x. 76). In some traditions he was called the first king of Italy (Taezt, ad Lyc. 1232). He was a famous soothsayer and augur, and, as he made use in these things of a picus (a wood-pecker), he himself also was called Picus. He was represented in a rude and primitive manner as a wooden pillar with a wood-pecker on the top of it, but afterwards as a young man with a wood-pecker on his head (Dionys. i, 14; Ov. Met. xiv. 314; Virg. Aen. vii. 167). The whole legend of Pius is founded on the notion that the wood-pecker is a prophetic bird, sacred to Mars. Pomona, it is said, was beloved by him, and when Cicero’s love for him was not required, she changed him into a wood-pecker, who, however, retained the prophetic powers which he had formerly possessed as a man. (Virg. Aen. vii. 190; Ov. Met. xvi. 346; Plut. Q. Sext. Rom. 21; Ov. Fast. iii. 37.)

PIERIDES (Πηετίδες), and sometimes also in the singular, Picius, a surname of the Muses, which they derived from Mount Olympus, where they were first worshipped among the Thracians (Hes. Theog. 53; Horat. Carm. iv. 3. 13; Pind. Pyth. vi. 49). Some derived the name from an ancient king Piers, who is said to have emigrated from Thrace into Boeotia, and established their worship at Thespiae. (Paus. i. 29. § 2; Eurip. Med. 831; Pind. Ol. xi. 100; Ov. Trist. v. 3. 10; Cic. De Nat. Deor. ii. 21.) [L. S.]

PIERUS (Πίερος). 1. A son of Magnes of Thrace, father of Hyacinthus, by the Muse Clo. (Apollod. i. 3. § 8.)

2. An autochthon, king of Emathia (Macedonia), begot by Euippe or Antiope nine daughters, to whom he gave the names of the nine Muses. They afterwards entered into a contest with the Muses, and being conquered, they were metamorphosed into birds called Colombus, Iynx, Cenchrus, Cissa, Chloris, Acanthias, Nessa, Pipa, and Dracantilus. (Anton. Lib. i. 9; Paus. i. 29. § 2; Ov. Met. v. 295.) [L. S.]

PIETAS, a personification of faithful attachment, love, and veneration among the Romans, where at first she had a small sanctuary, but in b. c. 191 a larger one was built (Plin. H. N. vii. 36; Val. Max. v. 4. § 7; Liv. xii. 34). She is seen represented on Roman coins, as a matron throwing incense upon an altar, and her attributes are a stork and children. Pietas was sometimes represented as a female figure offering her breast to an aged parent. (Val. Max. l. c.; Zumpt, in the Class. Mus. vol. iii. p. 542.) [L. S.]

PIETAS, a surname of L. Antonius, consul b. c. 41. [ANTONIUS, No. 14.]

PIGRES (Πίγρης), historical. 1. A Carian, the son of Seldomus, the commander of a detachment of ships in the armament of Xerxes. (Herod. vi. 100.)

2. A Phocean, who, with his brother Mantyas and his sister, came to Sardes, where Darius was at the time, hoping that by the favour of Darius, he and his brother might be established as tyrants over the Paeonians. Darius, however, was so pleased with the exhibition of industry and dexterity which he saw in their sister, that he sent orders to Megabazus to transport the whole race into Asia. (Herod. v. 12, &c.)

3. An interpreter in the service of Cyrus the Younger, mentioned on several occasions by Xenophon (Anab. i. 2. § 17, &c.). [C. P. M.]

PIGRES (Πίγρης), literary. A native of Haliacarnassus, either the brother or the son of the celebrated Artemisia, queen of Caria. He is spoken of by Suidas (ε. v. where, however, he makes the mistake of calling Artemisia the wife of Musolus) as the author of the Margites, and the Batracho-myrmexi. The latter poem is also attributed to him by Plutarch (de Herol. maligm. 43. p. 673, f.), and was probably his work. One of his performances was a very singular one, namely, uttering a pentameter line after each hexameter in the Iliad, thus:

Μήνιν ἄδεια Σδά Πνημάδαις 'Αχήροις.
Μοίσαι γὰρ ἐν πάσσοις πείρατ᾽ ἔχεις σοφίς.

Bode (Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtkunst, i. p. 279) believes that the Margites, though not composed by Pigres, suffered some alterations at his hands, and in that altered shape passed down to posterity. Some suppose that the lambique lines, which alternated with the hexameters in the Margites, were inserted by Pigres. He was the first poet, apparently, who introduced the iambic trimeter. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. i. p. 519, &c.) [C. P. M.]

PIILIA, the wife of T. Pomponius Atticus, the friend of Cicero. We know nothing of her origin, and scarcely anything of her relations. The M. Pilius, who is said to have sold an estate to C. Albinus, about b. c. 45 (Cic. ad Att. xii. 31.), is supposed by some to have been her father, but this is quite uncertain. The Q. Pilius, who went to Caesar in Gaul in b. c. 54 (ad Att. iv. 17.), was undoubtedly her brother; and he must be the same as the Pilius who accused M. Servilius of repetundae in b. c. 51 (Cael. ad Fam. viii. 8.). His full name was Q. Pilius Celer; for the Q. Celer, whose speech against M. Servilius Cicero asks Atticus to send him in b. c. 50 (Cic. ad Att. vi. 3. § 10), must have been the same person as the one already mentioned, as Drummans has observed, and not Q. Metellus Celer, as the commentators have stated, since the latter had died as early as b. c. 59. With the exception, however, of the M. Pilius and Q. Pilius, whom we have spoken of, no other person of this name occurs.

Pilia was married to Atticus on the 12th of February, b. c. 56 (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 3. § 7), and in the summer of the following year, she bore her husband a daughter (ad Att. v. 19, vi. 1. § 22) who subsequently married Vipsanius Agrippa. This appears to have been the only child that she had. Cicero, in his letters to Atticus, frequently speaks of Pilia; and from the terms in which he mentions her, it is evident that the marriage was a happy one, and that Atticus was sincerely attached to her. From her frequent indisposition, to which Cicero alludes, it appears that her health was not good. She is not mentioned by Cornelius Nepos, who tells us of his life of Atticus. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16, 46, v. 11, viii. 7, xvi. 7; Drummans’ Rom. vol. v. pp. 87, 88.)

PIILITUS, OTACILIUS. [OTACILIUS, p. 64. b.]

PIILITUS. [PIILIA.]

PILUMNUS [PIGMUS.]

PIMPLEIS (Πιμπλέης), or Pimplea, a surname of the Muses, derived from Mount Pimplyia in Peria, which was sacred to them. Some place this mountain in Boeotia, and call Mount Helicon Παιαλεια κοινή. (Strab. x. p. 471; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 25; Lycoph. 275; Horat. Carm. i. 26. 9; Anthol. Palmt. v. 206.) [L. S.]

PINAIRA. 1. The daughter of Publius, a Vestal virgin in the reign of Tarquinus Priscus, was put to death for violating her vow of chastity. (Dionys. iii. 67.)

2. The first wife of the celebrated tribune P. Clodius. That Clodius married a wife of this name has been shown under NATAL, No. 2.

PINA’RIA GENS, one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome, traced its origin to a time long previous to the foundation of the city. The legend related that when Hercules came into Italy he was hospitably received on the spot, where Rome was afterwards built, by the Potitii and the Pinarii, two of the most distinguished families in the country. The hero, in return, taught them the way in which he was to be worshipped; but as the Pinarii were not at hand when the sacrificial banquet was ready, and did not come till the entrails of the victim were eaten, Hercules, in anger, determined that the Pinarii should in all future time be excluded from partaking of the entrails of the victims, and that in all matters relating to his worship they should be inferior to the Potitii. These two families continued to be the hereditary priests of Hercules till the consorship of App. Claudius (B. c. 312), who purchased from the Potitii the knowledge of the sacred rites, and entrusted them to public slaves, as is related elsewhere. [POTITIA GEN.] The Pinarii did not share in the guilt of communicating the sacred knowledge, and therefore did not receive the same punishment as the Potitii, but continued in existence to the latest times. (Dionyss. i. 40; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. viii. 208; Festus, p. 237, ed. Müller; Macrobi. Saturn. iii. 6; Liv. i. 7; Hurtung, Die Religion der Römer, vol. ii. p. 30.) It has been remarked, with justice, that the worship of Hercules by the Potitii and Pinarii was a sacrum Hercules, belonging to these gentes, and that in the time of App. Claudius these sacra privata were made sacra publica. (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 83; Göttling, Gesch. der Röm. Staatsverf. p. 178.)

The Pinarii are mentioned in the kingly period [PINARIA, No. 1; PINARIUS, No. 1], and were elevated to the consulship soon after the commencement of the republic. The first member of the gens, who obtained this dignity, was P. Pinarius Manercenus Rufus in B. c. 489. At this early time, MANERCIUS is the name of the only family that is mentioned: at a subsequent period, we find families of the name of NACHTA, POSCA, RUSCA, and SCARPS, but no members of them obtained the consulship. On coins, NADIA and SACYUS are the only cognomina that occur. The few Pinarii, who occur without a surname, are given below.

[PLAIN TEXT END]
in Thebes. It was sprung from the ancient race of the Aegida, who claimed descent from the Cad-mids, who settled at Thebes and Sparta, whence part emigrated to Thera and Cyrene at the command of Apollo. (Pind. Pyth. v. 72, &c.) We also learn from the biography by Eustathius, that Pindar wrote the δαφνηρωτικάς δόμα for his son Daiphantus, when he was elected daphnephorus to conduct the festival of the daphneporia; a fact which proves the dignity of the family, since only youths of the most distinguished families at Thebes were eligible to this office. (Paus. ix. 10. § 4.)

The family seems to have been celebrated for its skill in music; though there is no authority for saying, as Böckh and Müller have done, that they were hereditary flute-players, and exercised their profession regularly at certain great religious festivals. The ancient biographies relate that the father or uncle of Pindar was a flute-player, and we are told that Pindar at an early age received instruction in the art from the flute-player Scope-linus. But the youth soon gave indications of a genius for poetry, which induced his father to send him to Athens to receive more perfect instruction in the art; for it must be recollected that lyric poetry among the Greeks was so intimately connected with music, dancing, and the whole training of the chorus that the lyric poet required

no small amount of education to fit him for the exercise of his profession. Later writers tell us that his future glory as a poet was miraculously foreshadowed by a swarm of bees which rested upon his lips while he was asleep; and that this miracle first led him to compose poetry. (Comp.

Paus. ix. 23. § 2; Aelian, V. H. xii. 45.) At Athens Pindar became the pupil of Lasus of Hermione, the founder of the Athenian school of dithyrambic poetry, and who was at that time residing at Athens under the patronage of Hipparchus.

Lasus was well skilled in the different kinds of music, and from him Pindar probably gained considerable knowledge in the theory of his art.

Pindar also received instruction at Athens from Agathocles and Apollodorus, and one of them allowed him to instruct the cyclic choruses, though he was still a mere youth. He returned to Thebes before he had completed his twentieth year, and is said to have received instruction there from Myrta and Corinna of Tanagra, two poetsesses, who then enjoyed great celebrity in Boeotia. Corinna appears to have exercised considerable influence upon the youthful poet, and he was not a little indebted to her example and precepts. It is related by Plutarch (De Glor. Athen. 14.), that she recommended Pindar to introduce mythical narrations into his poems, and that when in accordance with her advice he composed a hymn (part of which is still extant), in which he interwove almost all the Theban mythology, she smiled and said, "We ought to sow with the hand, and not with the whole sock" (τ’ χειρ’ δεῖν πακέκαι, ἀλλὰ μη δέντο τ’ ἔμακνην). With both these poetesses

Pindar contended for the prize in the musical contests at Thebes. Although Corinna found fault with Myrta for entering into the contest with Pindar, saying, "I blame the clear-toned Myrta, that she, a woman born, should enter the lists with Pindar,"

still she herself is said to have contended with him

five times, and on each occasion to have gained the prize. Pausanias indeed does not speak (ix. 22.

§ 3) of more than one victory, and mentions a picture which he saw at Tanagra, in which Cori-na was represented binding her hair with a fillet in token of her victory, which he attributes

as much to her beauty and to the circumstance that she wrote in the Aecolic dialect as to her poetical talents.

Pindar commenced his professional career as a poet at an early age, and acquired so great a reputation, that he was soon employed by different states and princes in all parts of the Hellenic world to compose for them choral songs for special occasions. He received money and presents for his works; but he never degenerated into a common mercenary poet, and he continued to preserve to his latest days the respect of all parties of Greece.

His earliest poem which has come down to us (the 10th Pythian) he composed at the age of twenty.

It is an Epinician ode in honour of Hippocles, a Thessalian youth belonging to the powerful Alouad family, who had gained the prize at the Pythian games. Supposing Pindar to have been born in b.c. 522, this ode was composed in b.c. 502. The next ode of Pindar in point of time is the 6th

Pythian, which he wrote in his twenty-seventh year, b.c. 494, in honour of Xenocrates of Agri-gentum, who had gained the prize at the chariotrace at the Pythian games, by means of his son

Thrasybulus. It would be tedious to relate at length the different occasions on which he composed his other odes. It may suffice to mention that he composed poems for Hieron, tyrant of Syracuse,

Alexander, son of Amyntas, king of Macedonia,

Theron, tyrant of Agrigentum, Arcesilas, king of Cyrene, as well as for many other free states and private persons. He was courted especially by Alexander, king of Macedonia, and Hieron, tyrant of Syracuse; and the praises which he bestowed upon the former are said to have been the chief reason which led his descendant, Alexander, the son of Philip, to spare the house of the poet, when he destroyed the rest of Thebes (Dion Chrysost. Orat. de Regno, ii. 25). About b.c. 473, Pindar visited the court of Hieron, in consequence of the pressing invitation of the monarch; but it appears that he did not remain more than four years at Syracuse, as he loved an independent life, and did not care to cultivate the courtly arts which rendered his contemporary,

Simonides, a more welcome guest at the table of their patron. But the estimation in which Pindar was held by his contemporaries is still more strikingly shown by the honours conferred upon him by the free states of Greece. Although a Theban, he was always a great favourite with the Athenians, whom he frequently praised in his poems, and whose city he often visited. In one of his dithyrums (Dill. fr. 4) he called it "the support

(ἐρεύμα) of Greece, glorious Athens, the divine city." The Athenians testified their gratitude by making him their public guest (προεσθοὺς), and giving to him ten thousand drachmas (I Soc.

τριάντα, p. 304, ed. Dind.); and at a later period they erected a statue to his honour (Paus. i. 8. § 4), but this was not done in his lifetime, as the pseudo-Aeschines states (Epist. 4). The inhabitants of Ceos employed Pindar to compose for them

a προεσθοὺς or processional song, although they had two celebrated poets of their own, Bucylides and

PINDARUS.
PINDARUS.

Simonides. The Rhodians had his seventh Olympian ode written in letters of gold in the temple of the Lindian Athena.

Pindar's stated residence was at Thebes (πας ἑταιρεσκὸς πίσθι, Ol. vi. 35), though he frequently left home in order to witness the great public games, and to visit the states and distinguished men who courted his friendship and employed his services. In the public events of the time he appears to have taken no share. Polybius (iv. 31. § 5) quotes some lines of Pindar to prove that the poet recommended his countrymen to remain quiet and abstain from uniting with the other Greeks in opposition to the Persians; but there can be little doubt that Pindar in these lines exhorts his fellow-citizens to maintain peace and concord, and to abstain from the internal dissensions which threatened to ruin the city. It is true that he did not make the unavailing effort to win over his fellow-citizens to the cause of Greek independence; but his heart was with the free party, and after the conclusion of the war he openly expressed his admiration for the victors. Indeed the praises which he bestowed upon Athens, the ancient rival of Thebes, displeased his fellow-citizens, who are said even to have fined him in consequence. It is further stated that the Athenians paid the fine (Eustath. Vit. Pind.; Pseudo-Aeschin. Ep. 4); but the tale does not deserve much credit.

The poems of Pindar show that he was penetrated with a strong religious feeling. He had not imbibed any of the scepticism which began to take root at Athens after the close of the Persian war. The old myths were for the most part realitites to him, and he accepted them with implicit credence, except when they exhibited the gods in a point of view which was repugnant to his moral feelings. For, in consequence of the strong ethical sense which Pindar possessed, he was unwilling to believe the myths which represented the gods and heroes as guilty of immoral acts; and he accordingly frequently rejects some tales and changes others, because they are inconsistent with his conceptions of the gods (comp. Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. i. p. 507, &c.). Pindar was a strict observer of the worship of the gods. He dedicated a shrine to the mother of the gods near his own house at Thebes (Paus. ix. 25, § 3; Philostr. Sen. Imag. ii. 12; comp. Pind. Pyth. iii. 77). He also dedicated to Zeus Ammon, in Libya, a statue made by Calamus (Paus. ix. 16. § 1), and likewise a statue in Thebes to Hermes of the Agora (Paus. ix. 17. § 1). He was in the habit of frequently visiting Delphi; and there he sat on an iron chair, which was reserved for him, he used to sing hymns in honour of Apollo. (Paus. x. 24. § 4.)

The only poems of Pindar which have come down to us entirely are his Epinikia, or triumphal odes. But these were only a small portion of his works. Besides his triumphal odes he wrote hymns to the gods, poems, dithyrambs, odes for processions (προοδόσια), songs of maidens (παθένεια), mimic dancing songs (σορῳχία), drinking-songs (οσκο-λαί), dirges (δίρηι), and encomia (γυναίκα), or panegyrics on princes. Of these we have numerous fragments. Most of them are mentioned in the well-known lines of Honece (Curn. iv. 2):

("Seu per anucdes nova dithyrambos Verba devolit numerique fertur"

Lege solutis:

VOL. III.

PINDARUS. 369

Seu deos (hymnus et paean) regesve (encomia) canit, deorum

Sanguienem:

Sive quos Elen domum reducit

Palma caelestes (the Epinikia):

Plebii sponae juveneave raptum

Plorat (the dīroges).

In all of these varieties Pindar equally excelled, as we see from the numerous quotations made from them by the ancient writers, though they are generally too fragmentary a kind to allow us to form a judgment respecting them. Our estimate of Pindar as a poet must be formed almost exclusively from his Epinikia, which were all composed in commemoration of some victory in the public games, with the exception of the eleventh Nemean, which was written for the installation of Aristagoras in the office of Prytanes at Tenedos. The Epinikia are divided into four books, celebrating respectively the victories gained in the Olympian, Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian games. In order to understand them properly we must bear in mind the nature of the occasion for which they were composed, and the object which the poet had in view. A victory gained in one of the four great national festivals conferred honour not only upon the conqueror and his family, but also upon the city to which he belonged. It was accordingly celebrated with great pomp and ceremony. Such a celebration began with a procession to a temple, where a sacrifice was offered, and it ended with a banquet and the joyous revelry, called by the Greeks πανεία. For this celebration a poem was expressly composed, which was sung by a chorus, trained for the purpose, either by the poet himself, or some one acting on his behalf. The poems were sung either during the procession to the temple or at the comus at the close of the banquet. Those of Pindar's Epinician odes which consist of strophes without epodes were sung during the procession, but the majority of them appear to have been sung at the comus. For this reason they partake to some extent of the joyous nature of the occasion, and accordingly contain at times jocularities which are hardly in accordance with the modern notions of lyric poetry. In these odes Pindar rarely describes the victory itself, as the scene was familiar to all the spectators, but he dwells upon the glory of the victor, and celebrates chiefly either his wealth (ἄληθος) or his skill (δήρη)—his wealth, if he had gained the victory in the chariot-race, since it was only the wealthy that could contend for the prize in this contest; his skill, if he had been exposed to peril in the contest. He frequently celebrates also the piety and goodness of the victor; for with the deep religious feeling, which pre-eminently characterizes Pindar, he believed that the moral and religious character of the conqueror conciliated the favour of the gods, and gained for him their support and assistance in the contest. For the same reason he dwells at great length upon the mythical origin of the person whose victory he extols, and connects his exploits with the similar exploits of the heroic ancestors of the race or nation to which he belongs. These mythical narratives occupy a very prominent feature in almost all of Pindar's odes; they are not introduced for the sake of ornament, but have a close and intimate connection with the whole object and purpose of each poem, as is clearly pointed out by PINDARUS, in his admirable essay, "De Ratione Poetica Carminum Pindaricorum, &c." prefixed to his edition of Pindar, an essay which deserves, and will well repay the attentive perusal of the student. The metres of Pindar are too extensive and difficult a subject to admit of explanation in the present work. No two odes possess the same metrical structure. The Doric rhythm chiefly prevails, but he also makes frequent use of the Aeolian and choric stanzas.

The Edito Prinicipis of Pindar was printed at the Aldine press at Venice in 1513, 8vo., without the Scholia, but the same volume contained likewise the poems of Callimachus, Dionysius, and Lyco- phon of Pindar. The second edition was published at Rome by Zacharias Calligari, with the Scholia, in 1515, 4to. These two editions, which were taken from different families of manuscripts, are still of consideralde value for the formation of the text. The other editions of Pindar published in the course of the sixteenth century were little more than reprints of the two above-named, and therefore require no further notice here. The first edition, containing a new recension of the text, with explanatory notes, a Latin version, &c. was that published by Erasmus Schmidius, Vitemberga, 1616, 4to. Next appeared the edition of Joannes Benedictus, Salmuri, 1630, 4to., and then the one published at Oxford, 1607, fol. From this time Pindar appeared to have been generally esteemed, till Heinie published his celebrated edition of the poet at Gottingen in 1773, 4to. A second and much improved edition was published at Gottingen in 1798–1799, 3 vols. 8vo., containing a valuable treatise on the metres of Pindar by Godofred Hermann. Heinie’s third edition was published after his death by G. H. Schäfer, Leipzig, 1817, 3 vols. 8vo. But the best edition of Pindar is that by A. Böckh, Leipzig, 1811–1821, 2 vols. 4to., which contains a most valuable commentary and dissertations, and is indispensable to the student who wishes to obtain a thorough insight into the musical system of the Greeks, and the artistic construction of their lyric poetry. The commentary on the Nemean and Isthmian odes in this edition was written by Dissen. Dissen also published in the Bibliotheca Graeca a smaller edition of the poet, Gotha, 1830, 2 vols. 8vo., taken from the text of Böckh, with a most valuable explanatory commentary. This edition is the most useful to the student from its size, though it does not supersede that of Böckh. A second edition of Dissen’s is now in course of publication under the care of Schneidevin: the first volume has already appeared, Gotha, 1843. There is also a valuable edition of Pindar by Fr. Thielsch, Leipzig, 1820, 2 vols. 8vo., with a German translation, and an important introduction. The text of the poet is given with great accuracy by Th. Bergk in his Poetae Lyrici Graeci, Leipzig, 1843. The translations of Pindar into English are not numerous. The most recent is by the Rev. H. F. Cary, London, 1853, which is superior to the older translations by West and Moore. (The histories of Greek literature by Müller, Bernhardy, Bode, and Ulrici; J. G. Schneider, Versuch über Pindar’s Leben und Schriften, Strasburg, 1777, 4vo; Mommsen, Pindaros. Zur Geschichte des Dichters, &c., Kiel, 1845, 8vo; Schneidevin’s Life of Pindar, prefixed to the second edition of Dissen’s Pindar.)

PINDARUS, the freedman of C. Cassius Longinus, put an end to his master’s life at the request of the latter after the loss of the battle of Philippi. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 46; Appian, B. C. iv. 113; Plut. Anti. 22, Brut. 43; Val. Max. vi. 8, § 4.)

PINNA, CAECILIUS, one of the Roman commanders in the Social or Marsic war, is said to have defeated the Marsi in several battles, in conjunction with L. Murena (L. Univ. 70). As this Caecilius Pinned is not mentioned elsewhere, and he was not a tribune, we sought to read Caecilius Pinnus, since we know that Caecilius Metellus Pinnus played a distinguished part in this war.

PINNES, PINNEUS, or PINEUS, was the son of Agron, king of Illyria, by his first wife, Tryteuta. At the death of Agron (B. c. 231), Pinned, who was then a child, was left in the guardianship of his step-mother Teuta, whom Agron had married after divorcing Tryteuta. When Teuta was defeated by the Romans, the care of Pinnus devolved upon Demetrius of Pharos, who had received from the Romans a great part of the dominions of Teuta, and had likewise married Tryteuta, the mother of Pinned. Demetrius was in his turn tempted to try his fortune against Rome, but was quickly crushed by the consul, L. Aemilius Paulus, B. c. 219, and was obliged to fly for refuge to Philip, king of Macedonia. The Romans placed Pinned upon the throne, but imposed a tribute, which we read a cooper’s widow for in B. c. 216. (Dion Cass. xxxiv. 46, 151; Appian, Illyr. 7, 8; Flor. ii. 5; Liv. xxii. 33.) [Agron; Demetrius of Pharos; Teuta.]

PINNES or PINNETES, one of the principal Pannonian chiefs in the reign of Augustus, was betrayed to the Romans by the Breucian Bato. (Dion Cass. iv. 34; Vell. Pat. ii. 114.)

PINNIUS, the name of two unimportant persons, Q. Pinnius, a friend of Varro (R. R. iii. 1), and T. Pinnius, a friend of Cicero (ad Fam. xii. 61).

PINTHIA, M. LUTATUS, a Roman eques, lived about a century before the downfal of the republic. (Cic. de Off. iii. 19.)

PINUS, CORNELIUS, a Roman painter, who, with Attius Priscus, decorated with paintings the walls of the temple of Honos and Virtus, when it was restored by Vespasian. He therefore lived about A. D. 70. (Plin. H. N. xx. 20, s. 37.)

PINTYTIUS (Πίντυτιος), an epigrammatic poet, the author of an epitaph on Sappho, consisting of a single distich, in the Greek Anthology. (Bruneck, Ana1. vol. ii. p. 269; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 264.) Nothing more is known of him, unless he be the grammarians of Bithynia in Bithynia, who was the freedman of Nero’s favourite, Epaphroditus, and who taught grammar at Rome. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Bithynia; Reim. add. Dion. Cass. lxvii. 14, p. 1113.)

PITONIS (Πιθώς), a descendant of Hercules, from whom the town of Pithia in Mysia was believed to have derived its name. (Strab. xiii. p. 610; Paua. ix. 18, § 3.) [L. S.]

PIPA, the wife of Aeacius of Syracuse, was the mistress of Verres in Sicily (Cic. Verr. iii. 35, v. 31).

PIPA, or PIPAROA, daughter of Attalus, king of the Marcomanni, was passionately beloved by Gallienus. Trobelius Pollio confounds her with Saloniana, the lawful wife of that prince, and Gibbou seems to have fallen into the same mistake. (Trebell. Pol. Gallien. dua, c. 3; Aurel. Vict. de Caes. xxxiii., Epit. xxxiii.; Tillement, Histoire des Empereurs, not. vi.; Zonar. xii. 5.) [W. R.]

PIRITHOUS [Pierithous.]

PISANDER. [Pisander.]

PIiasi or PEisias (Hesodas), an Athenian sculptor, apparently of the Daedalian period, who made the wooden statue of Zeus Bouleus, and the statue of Apollo, which stood in the senate house of the Five Hundred at Athens. (Paus. i. 3. § 4. s. 5.)

PISISTRATUS. [Pisistratus.]

PISO, the name of the most distinguished family of the plebeian Calpurnia gens. This name, like many other Roman cognomens, is connected with agriculture, the noblest and most honourable pursuit of the ancient Romans: it comes from the verb pisere or pinserere, and refers to the pounding or grinding of corn. Thus the author of the poem addressed to Piso, ascribed by Wernsdorff to Sulpicius Bassus [Bassus], says (16, 17):—

"Clarque Pisonia tulerit cognomina prima, Humida callosa cum pinseret horrea dextra."

(Comp. Plin. H. N. xviii. 3.) Many of the Pisones bore this cognomen alone, but others were distinguished by the surnames of Caeziotnus and Frugi respectively. The family first rose from obscurity during the second Punic war, and from that time it became one of the most distinguished families in the Roman state. It preserved its celebrity under the empire, and during the first century of the Christian era was second to the imperial family alone. The following stemma contains a list of all the Pisones mentioned in history, and will serve as an index to the following account. Of most of them it is impossible to ascertain the descent.

1. CALPURNIUS PISOS, was taken prisoner at the battle of Cannae, b. c. 216, and is said to have been sent with two others to Rome to negotiate the release of the prisoners, which proposition the senate refused to entertain. He was praetor urbanius in b. c. 211, and on the expiration of his year of office was sent as pro-praetor into Etruria b. c. 210. From thence he was commanded by the dictator, Q. Fulvia Flaccus, to take the command of the army at Capua; but next year (b. c. 209) the senate again entrusted Etruria to him. (Liv. xxii. 61, xxv. 41, xxvi. 10, 15, 21, 28, xxvii. 6, 7, 21.) Piso in his praetorship proposed to the senate, that the Ludi Apollinares, which had been exhibited for the first time in the preceding year (b. c. 212), should be repeated, and should be celebrated in future annually. The senate passed a decree to this effect. (Liv. xxvi. 23; Macrobi. Sat. i. 19; 371

Festus, p. 326, ed. Müller, where he is erroneously called Marcus instead of Caicus. The establishment of these games by their ancestor was commemorated on coins by the Pisones in later times. Of these coins, of which a vast number is extant, a specimen is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Apollo, the reverse a horseman riding at full speed, in allusion to the equestrian games, which formed part of the festival. Who the L. Piso Frugi was that caused them to be struck, cannot be determined. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 158.)

2. C. CALPURNIUS C. F. C. N. PISO CARSENDINUS, son of No. 1, was praetor b. c. 186, and received Further Spain as his province. He continued in his province as procurator in b. c. 165, and on his return to Rome in 194 obtained a triumph for a victory he had gained over the Lusitani and Celtiberi. In b. c. 181 he was one of the three commissioners for founding the colony of Gravisca in Etruria, and in b. c. 180 he was consul with A. Postumius Albinus. Piso died during his consulship; he was no doubt carried off by the pestilence which was then raging at Rome, but the people suspected that he had been poisoned by his wife Quarta Hostilia, because her son by a former marriage, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, succeeded Piso as consul suffectus. (Livy. xxxix. 6, 8, 21, 30, 31, 42, xl. 29, 35, 37.)

3. L. CALPURNIUS (Piso), probably a younger son of No. 1, was sent as ambassador to the Achaenae at Sicyon. (Livy. xxxvi. 19.)

4. L. CALPURNIUS C. F. C. N. PISO CAESIGNUS. His last name shows that he originally belonged to the Caesonia gens, and was adopted by one of the Pisones, probably by No. 3, as he is indicated in the Fasti, as Gaius CL. Piso, before his adoption. He was a man of marked ability, and it is evident that he, like other Pisones, was a man of dishonour on his family by his want of ability and of energy in war. He was praetor in b. c. 154, and obtained the province of Further Spain, but was defeated by the Lusitani. He was consul in b. c. 148 with Sp. Postumius Albinus, and was sent to conduct the war against Carthage, which he carried on with such little activity that the people became greatly discontented with his conduct, and he was superseded in the following year by Scipio. (Appian, Hisp. 56, Panionic. 110—112.)

5. L. CALPURNIUS L. F. C. N. PISO CAESIGNUS, son of No. 4, was consul b. c. 112 with M. Livius Drusus. In b. c. 107 he served as legatus to the consul, L. Cassius Longinus, who was sent into Gaul to oppose the Ciciri and their allies, and he fell together with the consul in the battle, in which the Roman army was utterly defeated by the Tigurini in the territory of the Allobroges. [Longinus, No. 5.] This Piso was the grandfather of Caesar's father-in-law, a circumstance to which Caesar himself alludes in recording his own victory over the Tigurini at a later time. (Caes, B. G. i. 7, 12; Oros. v. 15.)

6. L. CALPURNIUS PISO CAESIGNUS, son of No. 5, never rose to any of the offices of state, and is only known from the account given of him by Cicero in his violent invective against his son [No. 7]. He had the charge of the manufacture of arms at Rome during the Marius war. He married the daughter of Calventius, a native of Cialpine Gaul, who came from Placentia and settled at Rome; and hence Cicero calls his son in contempt a semi-Placentian. (Cic. in Pis. 36, 28, 26, 27.) [Calventius.]

7. L. CALPURNIUS C. F. L. N. PISO CARSENDINUS, the son of No. 6, and father-in-law of the dictator Caesar. Asconius says (in Cic. Pis. p. 3, ed. Orelli) that this Piso belonged to the family of the Frugi; but this is a mistake, as Drummian has shown (Gesch. Roms, vol. ii. p. 62). Our principal information respecting Piso is derived from several of the orations of Cicero, who paints him in the blackest colours; but as Piso was both a politician and a personal enemy of the orator, we must make great deductions from his description, which is evidently exaggerated. Still, after making every deduction, we know enough of his life to convince us that he was an unprincipled debauchee and a cruel and corrupt magistrate, a fair sample of his noble contemporaries, neither better nor worse than the majority of them. He is first mentioned in b. c. 59, when he was brought to trial by P. Clodius for plundering a province, of which he had the administration after his praetorship, and he was only acquitted by throwing himself at the feet of the judges (Val. Max. viii. 1. § 6). In the same year Caesar married his daughter Calpurnia. Through his influence Piso obtained the consulship for the following year b. c. 58, having for his colleague A. Gabinius, who was indebted for the honour to Pompey. The new consuls were the mere instruments of the triumvirs, and took care that the senate should do nothing in opposition to the wishes of their patrons. When the triumvirs had resolved to sacrifice Cicero, the consuls of course threw no obstacle in their way; but Clodius, to make sure of their support, promised Piso the province of Macedonia, and Gabinius that of Syria, and brought a bill before the people to that effect, although the senate was the constitutional body to which such a measure should have been referred. The business of Cicero soon followed. Piso took an active part in the measures of Clodius, and joined him in celebrating their victory. Cicero accuses him of transferring to his own house the spoils of Cicero's dwellings. The conduct of Piso in support of Clodius produced that extreme resentment in the mind of Cicero, which he displayed against Piso on many subsequent occasions. At the expiration of his consulship Piso went to his province of Macedonia, where he remained during two years, b. c. 57 and 56, plundering the province in the most shameless manner. In the latter of these years the senate resolved that a successor should be appointed, and accordingly, to his great mortification and rage, he had to resign the government in b. c. 55 to Q. Anarchius. In the debate in the senate, which led to his recall and likewise to that of Gabinius, Cicero had an opportunity of giving vent to the wrath which had long been raging within him, and accordingly in the speech which he delivered on the occasion, and which has come down to us (De Provinciis Consularibus), he poured forth a torrent of invective against Piso, accusing him of every possible crime in the government of his province. Piso on his return, b. c. 55, complained in the senate of the attack of Cicero, and justified the administration of his province, whereupon Cicero reiterated his charges in a speech (In Pisonem), in which he portrays the whole public and private life of his enemy with the choicest words of virulence and abuse that the Latin language could supply. Cicero, however, did not venture to bring to trial the father-in-law of Caesar. In b. c. 50 Piso was censor with Ap. Claudius Pulcher, and undertook this office at the request of PISO.
Caesar. At the beginning of the following year, B.C. 49, Piso, who had not yet laid down his censorship, offered to go to Caesar to act as mediator; but the aristocratic party would not hear of any accommodation, and hostilities accordingly commenced. Piso accompanied Pompey in his flight from the city; and although he did not go with him across the sea, he still kept aloof from Caesar. Cicero accordingly praises him, and actually writes to Atticus, "I love Piso" (Cic. ad Att. vili. 13, a. ad Fam. xiv. 14). Piso subsequently returned to Rome, and though he took no part in the civil war, was notwithstanding treated with respect by Caesar. On the murder of the latter, in B.C. 44, Piso exerted himself to obtain the preservation of the laws and institutions of his father-in-law, and was almost the only person that dared to oppose the arbitrary conduct of Antony. Afterwards, however, he appeared as one of the most zealous adherents of Antony; and when the latter went to Cisalpine Gaul, at the end of the year, to prosecute the war against Decimus Brutus, Piso remained at Rome, to defend his cause and promote his views. At the beginning of the following year, B.C. 43, he was one of the ambassadors sent to Antony at Mutina. After this time his name does not occur. (Orelli, Onom. Tull. vol. ii. p. 125, &c.; Caes. B. C. i. 23. Dion Cass. xiii. 63, xii. 16; Appian, B. C. ii. 14, 135, 143, iii. 50, 54, &c.)

8. L. CALPURNIUS PISO FRUGI, consul B.C. 133. His descent is quite uncertain, since neither the Fasti nor coins mention the name of his father. From his integrity and conscientiousness he received the surname of Frugi, which is perhaps nearly equivalent to our "man of honour," but the exact force of which is explained at length by Cicero (Tusc. iii. 18). Piso was tribune of the plebs, B.C. 149, in which year he proposed the first law for the punishment of extortion in the provinces (Lex Calpurnia de Repetundis, Cic. Brut. 27, Tusc. iii. 34, iv. 25, de Off. ii. 21). In B.C. 133 he was consul with P. Mucius Scaevola, and was sent into Italy against the slaves. He gained a victory over them, but did not subdue them, and was succeeded in the command by the consul P. Rupilius (Oros. v. 9; Val. Max. ii. 7 § 9). Piso was a staunch supporter of the aristocratic party; and though he would not look over their crimes, as his law against extortion shows, still he was as little disposed to tolerate any invasion of their rights and privileges. He therefore offered a strong opposition to the measures of C. Gracchus, and is especially mentioned as a vehement opponent of the lex frumentaria of the latter (Cic. pro Font. 13, Tusc. iii. 29). He is called Censorius by several ancient writers; and though the date of his censorship is uncertain, it may perhaps be referred to B.C. 120. Piso left behind him orations, which had disappeared in Cicero's time, and Annals, which contained the history of Rome from the earliest period to the age in which Piso himself lived. This work, which, according to Cicero's judgment (Brut. 27), was written in a meagre style, is frequently referred to by ancient writers. Piso was, in Niebuhr's opinion, the first Roman writer who introduced the practice of giving a rationalistic interpretation to the myths and legends in early Roman history. (Comp. Niebuhr, History of Rome, vol. i. pp. 235, 237, vol. ii. p. 9; Lachmann, De Fontibus T. Livii, p. 32; Krause, Vitae et Fragmenta Historica, p. 139; Liesoldt, De L. Pisoni Annalium Scriptore, Naumburg, 1836.)

10. L. CALPURNIUS PISO FRUGI, the son of No. 9, and a worthy inheritor of his surname, served with distinction under his father in Sicily, in B.C. 133, and died in Spain about B.C. 111, whither he had gone as propraetor. (Cic. Ferr. iv. 25; Val. Max. iv. 3. § 10; Appian, Hisp. 99.)

11. L. CALPURNIUS PISO FRUGI, the son of No. 10, was, like his father and grandfather, a man of honour and integrity. He was a colleague of Verres in the praetorship, B.C. 74, when he thwarted many of the unrighteous schemes of the latter. (Cic. Tusc. iv. 40.)

12. C. CALPURNIUS PISO FRUGI, a son of No. 11, married Tullia, the daughter of Cicero, in B.C. 63, but was betrothed to her as early as B.C. 67 (Cic. ad Att. i. 3). In Caesar's consulahty, B.C. 59, Piso was accused by L. Vettius as one of the conspirators in the pretended plot against Pompey's life. He was quaestor in the following year, B.C. 58, when he used every exertion to obtain the recal of his father-in-law from banishment, and for that reason would not go into the provinces of Pontus and Bithynia, which had been allotted him. He did not, however, live to see the return of Cicero, who arrived at Rome on the 4th of September, B.C. 57. He probably died in the summer of the same year. He is frequently mentioned by Cicero in terms of gratitude on account of the zeal which he had manifested in his behalf during his banishment. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 24, in Vatini. 11, pro Sest. 24, 31, ad Q. Fr. i. 4, ad Fam. xiv. 1, 2, post Red. in Sen. 15, post Red. ad Quir. 3.)

13. Cn. CALPURNIUS PISO, of whom we know nothing, except that he was consul B.C. 139, with M. Popillius Laenas. (Val. Max. i. 3 § 2.)

14. Q. CALPURNIUS PISO, consul B.C. 135, with Ser. Fulvius Flaccus, was sent against Numantia. He did not, however, attack the city, but contented himself with making a plundering excursion into the territory of Pallantia. (Appian. Hisp. 63; Oros. 6), 1. Obseq. 65.)

15. CALPURNIUS PISO, of unknown descent, praetor about B.C. 135, was defeated by the slaves in Sicily. (Flor. iii. 19.)

16. CALPURNIUS PISO, of whom we know nothing, except that he fought with success against the Thracians, about B.C. 104. (Flor. iii. 4. § 6, iv. 12. § 17.)

17. C. CALPURNIUS PISO, was consul B.C. 67, with M. Acilius Glabrio. He belonged to the highest aristocratic party, and, as consul, led the opposition to the proposed law of the tribune Gabinius, by which Pompey was to be entrusted with extraordinary powers for the purpose of conducting the war against the pirates. Piso even went so far as to threaten Pompey's life, telling him, "that if he emulated Romulus, he would not escape the end of Romulus," for which imprudent speech he was nearly torn to pieces by the people. The law, however, was carried, notwithstanding all the opposition of Piso and his party; and when shortly afterwards the orders which Pompey had issued, were not carried into execution in Narbonese Gaul, in consequence, as it was supposed, of the intrigues of Piso, Gabinius proposed to deprive the latter of his consularship, an extreme measure which Pompey's prudence would not allow to be brought forward. Piso had not an easy life in this consularship. In the same year the tribune, C. Cornelius, proposed several laws, which were directed against the shameless abuses of the aristocracy. [Cornelius, Vol. i. p. 657.] All these Piso resisted with the utmost vehemence, and none more strongly than a stringent enactment to put down bribery at elections. But as the senate could not with any decency refuse to lend their aid in suppressing this corrupt practice, they pretended that the law of Cornelius was so severe, that no accusers would come forward, and no judge would condenm a criminal; and they therefore made the consuls bring forward a less stringent law (Lex Acilia Calpurnia), imposing a fine on the offender, with exclusion from the senate and all public offices. It was with no desire to diminish corruption at elections that Piso joined his colleague in proposing the law, for an accusation had been brought against him in the preceding year of obtaining by bribery his own election to the consularship.

In B.C. 66 and 65, Piso administered the province of Narbonese Gaul as proconsul, and while there suppressed an insurrection of the Allobroges. Like the other Roman nobles, he plundered his province, and was defended by Cicero in B.C. 63, when he was accused of robbing the Allobroges and of executing unjustly a Transpadane Gaul. The latter charge was brought against him at the instigation of Caesar; and Piso, in revenge, implored Cicero, but without success, to accuse Caesar as one of the conspirators of Catiline. Piso must have died before the breaking out of the civil war, but in what year is uncertain. Cicero ascribes (Brut. 63) to him considerable oratorical abilities. (Plut. Pomp. 25, 27; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 7, 20—22; Ascon. in Cic. Cornel. pp. 68, 75, ed. Orelli; Cic. ad Att. i. 13, pro Flacc. 39; Sall. Cat. 49.)

He may be the same as the L. Piso, who was in the case of Q. Roscius, B.C. 67 (Cic. pro Rose. Com. 3, 6), and as the L. Piso, who defended Aulus Cornelius against the accusation of B. (Cic. pro Cael. 12.)

18. M. PUPIUS PISO, consul B.C. 61, belonged originally to the Calpurnian gens, but was adopted by M. Pupius, when the latter was an old man (Cic. pro Dom. 13). He retained, however, his family-name Piso, just as Scipio, after his adoption by Metellus, was called Metellus Scipio. [Mittellus, No. 22.] There was, however, no occasion for the addition of Calpurnianus to his name, as that of Piso showed sufficiently his original family. Piso had attained some importance as early as the first civil war. On the death of L. Cinna, in B.C. 64, he married his wife Annia, and in the following year, 63, was appointed quaestor to the consul L. Scipio; but he quietly deserted this party, and went over to Sulla, who compelled him to divorce his wife on account of her previous connection with Cinna (Cic. Verr. i. 14; Vell. Pat. ii. 41). He failed in obtaining the aedileship (Cic. pro Flacc. 5, 21), and the year of his praetorship is uncertain. After his praetorship he resided 75 (Cic. pro Cael. 12.)}

Piso served in the Mithridatic war as a legatus of Pompey, who sent him to Rome in B.C. 62, to become a candidate for the consulsip, as he was anxious to obtain the ratification of his acts in Asia, and therefore wished to have one of his friends at the head of the state. Piso was accordingly elected consul for the following year, B.C. 61, with M. Valerius Messalla Niger. In his consularship he gave great offence to Cicero, by not asking him first in the senate for his opinion, and still further increased the anger of the orator by taking P. Clodius under his protection after his violation of the mysteries of the Bona Dea. Cicero revolvered himself on Piso, by preventing him from obtaining the province of Syria, which was given to him. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 44; Cic. ad Att. i. 12—18.) Piso must have died, in all probability, before the breaking out of the second civil war, for in B.C. 47 Antony inhabited his house at Rome. (Cic. Phil. ii. 25.) Piso, in his younger days, had so high a reputation as an orator, that Cicero was taken to him by his father, in order to receive instruction from him. He possessed some natural ability, but was chiefly indebted for his excellence to study, especially of Greek literature, in the knowledge of which he surpassed all previous orators. He did not, however, prosecute oratory long, partly on account of ill-health, and partly because his irritable temper would not submit to the rude encounters of the forum. He belonged to the Peripatetic school in philosophy, in which he received instructions from Staseas. (Cic. Brut. 67, 90, de Or. i. 22, de Nat. Deor. i. 7; Ascon. l. c.)

19. M. Piso, perhaps the son of No. 18, was praetor, b. c. 44, when he was praised by Cicero on account of his opposition to Antony. (Phil. ill. 10.)

20. CN. CALPURNIUS PISO, was a young noble who had dissipated his fortune by his extravagance and profligacy, and being a man of a most daring and unscrupulous character, attempted to improve his circumstances by a revolution in the state. He therefore formed with Catiline, in b. c. 66, a conspiracy to murder the new consuls when they entered upon their office on the 1st of January in the following year. The history of this conspiracy, and the manner in which it failed, are related elsewhere. [CATILINA, p. 629, b.] Although no doubt was entertained of the existence of the conspiracy, still there were not sufficient proofs to convict the parties, and they were not therefore brought to trial. It had been arranged by the conspirators, that after the murder of the consuls, Piso was to be despatched, with an army, to seize the Spanis; and the senate, in order to get rid of this dangerous agitator, now sent him into Nearer Spain as quaestor, but with the rank and title of propraetor. By his removal the senate hoped to weaken his faction at Rome, and they gave him an opportunity of acquiring, by the plunder of the province, the money of which he was so much in need. His exactions, however, in the province soon made him so hateful to the inhabitants, that he was murdered by them. Some persons, however, supposed that he was murdered at the instigation of Pompey, who had possessed great influence in the country ever since the conquest of Sertorius. Crassus had been in favour of sending Piso to Spain, that he might, by Piso’s means, persecute the friends of his great enemy and rival, Pompey; and it was therefore thought that the latter had revenged himself, by making away with the new governor. (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 27; Sall. Cat. 18, 19; Cic. pro Sull. 24, pro Mar. 30; Ascon. in Cornel. p. 66, in Tog. Cand. pp. 63, 84.)

21. CN. CALPURNIUS PISO, legatus and proconsul of Pompey in the war against the pirates, commanded a division of the fleet at the Hellespont, b. c. 67. He afterwards followed Pompey in the Mithridatic war, and was present at the surrender of Jerusalem in 63. (Appian, Mithr. 95, who erroneously calls him Publius; Joseph. Ant. xiv. 4. § 2.) The following coin commemorates the connection of Piso with the war against the pirates. The obverse contains the legend CN. PISO. PRO. Q., with the head of Numa (on which we find the letters SVM.), because the Calpurni gens claimed descent from Calpul, the son of Numa [CALPURNIA GENIS]; the reverse represents the prow of a ship with the legend MAGN. (P).RO. COS., i.e. (Pompeius) Magnus proconsul. (Eckehl, vol. v. p. 160.)

22. CN. CALPURNIUS CN. F. CN. N. PISO, consul b. c. 23, was, in all probability, the son of No. 21. He belonged to the high aristocratic party, and was naturally of a proud and imperious temper. He fought against Caesar in Africa, in b. c. 46, and after the death of the dictator, joined Brutus and Cassius. He was subsequently pardoned, and returned to Rome; but he disdained to ask Augustus for any of the honours of the state, and was, without solicitation, raised to the consulship in b. c. 23. (Tac. Ann. ii. 43, Bell. Afr. 18.) This Cn. Piso appears to be the same as the Cn. Piso spoken of by Valerius Maximus (vi. 2. § 4).

23. CN. CALPURNIUS CN. F. CN. N. PISO, son of No. 22, inherited all the pride and haughtiness of his father. He was consul b. c. 7, with Tiberius, the future emperor, and was sent by Augustus as legate into Spain, where he made himself hated by his cruelty and avarice. Tiberius after his accession was chiefly jealous of Germanicus, his brother’s son, whom he had adopted, and who was idolized both by the soldiery and the people. Accordingly, when the eastern provinces were assigned to Germanicus in A. D. 18, Tiberius chose Piso as a fit instrument to thwart the plans and check the power of Germanicus, and therefore conferred upon him the command of Syria. It was believed that the emperor had given him secret instructions to that effect; and his wife Plancina, who was as proud and haughty as her husband, was urged on by Livia, the mother of the emperor, to vie with and annoy Agrippina. Piso and Plancina fulfilled their mission most completely; the former opposed all the wishes and measures of Germanicus, and the latter heaped every kind of insult upon Agrippina. Germanicus, on his return from Egypt, in A. D. 19, found that all his orders had been neglected or disobeyed. Hence arose vehement altercations between him and Piso; and when the former fell ill in the autumn of this year, he believed that he had been poisoned by Piso and Plancina. Before his death he had ordered Piso to quit Syria, and had appointed Cn. Sentius his successor. Piso now made an attempt to recover his province, but the Roman soldiers refused to obey him, and Sentius drove him out of the country. Relying on the protection of Tiberius Piso now went to Rome (A. D. 20); but he was received by the people with marks of the utmost dislike and horror. Whether Piso had poisoned Germanicus cannot now be determined; Tacitus candidly admits that there were no proofs of his having done so; but the popular belief in his guilt was so strong that Tiberius could not refuse an investigation into the matter, which was conducted by the senate. As it proceeded the emperor seemed to have made up his mind to sacrifice his tool to the general indignation; but before the investigation came to an end, Piso was found one morning in his room with his throat cut, and his sword by his side. It was generally supposed that, despairing of the emperor’s protection, he had put an end to his own life; but others believed that Tiberius dreaded his revealing his secrets, and had accordingly caused him to be put to death. The powerful influence of Livia secured the acquittal of Plancina for the present. [PLANCINA.] His two sons Cneius and Marcus, the latter of whom had been with him in Syria, were involved in the accusation of their father, but were pardoned by Tiberius, who mitigated the sentence which the senate pronounced after the death of Piso. (Tac. Ann. ii. 43, 55, 57, 69, 74, 75, 80, iii. 10—18; Sene. de Ira, i. 16; Dion Cass. lxi. 18; Suet. Tib. 15, 52, Cal. 2.)

24. L. CALPURNIUS PISO, probably the eldest son of No. 23. In the judgment which the senate pronounced upon the sons of Cn. Piso [see above, No. 29], it was decreed that the eldest Cneius should change his praenomen (Tac. Ann. iii. 17); and it would appear that he assumed a cognomen of Lucius, since Dion Cassius (lix. 20) speaks of a Lucius (not Cneius) Piso, the son of Cn. Piso and Plancina, who was governor of Africa in the reign of Caligula. This supposition is confirmed by the fact that Tacitus speaks of only two sons, Cneius and Marcus. We may therefore conclude that he is the same as the L. Piso, who was consul in a.d. 27, with M. Licinius Crassus Frugi. (Tac. Ann. iv. 62.)

25. M. CALPURNIUS PISO, the younger son of No. 23, accompanied his father into Syria, and was accused along with him in a.d. 20. [See above, No. 29.]

26. L. CALPURNIUS PISO, the son of No. 24, was consul in a.d. 57 with the emperor Nero, and in a.d. 66 the charge of the public finances entrusted to him, together with two other consuls. He was afterwards appointed proconsul of Africa, and was slain there in a.d. 70, because it was reported that he was forming a conspiracy against Vespasian, who had just obtained the empire. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 28, 31, xv. 18, Hist. iv. 38, 48—50; Plin. Ep. iii. 7.)

28. L. CALPURNIUS PISO, was characterised by the same haughtiness and independence as the rest of his family under the empire. He is first mentioned in a.d. 16, as complaining of the corruption of the law-courts, and threatening to leave the city and spend the rest of his life in some distant retreat in the country; and he was a person of so much importance that the emperor thought it advisable to endeavour to soothe his anger and to induce his friends to prevail upon him to remain at Rome. In the same year he gave another instance of the little respect which he entertained for the imperial family. Urgula, the favourite of the emperor, was accused in Piso a certain sum of money; and when she refused to obey the summons to appear before the praetor, Piso followed her to the palace of Livia, and insisted upon being paid. Although Tiberius, at the commencement of his reign, had not thought it advisable to resent the conduct of Piso, yet he was not of a temper to forgive it, and only waited for a favourable opportunity to revenge himself upon his haughty subject. Accordingly, when he considered his power sufficiently established, Q. Granius appeared in a.d. 24, as the accuser of Piso, charging him with entertaining designs against the emperor's life; but Piso died just before the trial came on (Tac. Ann. ii. 34, iv. 21). He is probably the same as the L. Piso, who came for ward to defend Cn. Piso [No. 23] in a.d. 20, when so many shrank from the unpopular office. (Tac. Ann. iii. 11.)

29. L. CALPURNIUS PISO, praetor in Nearer Spain in a.d. 25, was murdered in the province while travelling. (Tac. Ann. iv. 45.)

30. C. CALPURNIUS PISO, the leader of the well-known conspiracy against Nero in a.d. 65. He is first mentioned in a.d. 37, when Caligula was invited to his nuptial banquet on the day of his marriage with Livia Orestilla; but the emperor took a fancy to the bride, whom he married, and shortly afterwards banished the husband. He was recalled by Claudius, and raised to the consulship, but in what year is uncertain, as his name does not occur in the Fasti. When the crimes and follies of Nero had as the leader of the conspiracy against Nero. The poem is printed in the fourth volume of Wernsdorfs Poëtae Latini Minores, where it is attributed to Saebeus Bas- sus. [BASSUS, p. 473.] Piso left a son, whom Tacitus calls Calpurnius Galerianus, and who would appear from his surname to have been adopted by Piso. The ambition of the father caused the death of the son; for Mucianus, the prefect of Vespasian, fearing lest Galerianus might follow in his father's steps, put him to death, when he obtained possession of the city in a.d. 70. (Tac. Hist. iv. 11.)

31. L. CALPURNIUS PISO LICINIANUS, was the son of M. Licinius Crassus Frugi, who was consul with L. Piso in a.d. 27, and of Scribonia, a grand-daughter of Sex. Pompeius. His brothers were Cn. Pompeius Magnus, who was killed by Claudius, M. Licinius Crassus, slain by Nero, and Licinius Crassus Scribonianus, who was offered the consulship of a.d. 46, but refused to accept it. By which of the two Licinius was adopted, is uncertain. On the accession of the aged Galba to the throne on the death of Nero, he adopted as his son and successor Piso Licinianus; but the latter only enjoyed the distinction four days, for Otho, who had hoped to receive this honour, induced the praetorians to rise against the emperor. Piso fled for refuge into the temple of Vesta, but was dragged out by the soldiers, and despatched at the threshold of the temple, a.d. 69. His head was cut off and carried to Otho, who feasted his eyes with the sight, but afterwards surrendered it for a large sum of money to Verania, the wife of Piso, who buried it with his body.
PISTIUS.

Piso was thirty-one at the time of his death, and enjoyed a reputation for the strictest integrity, uprightness, and morality. (Tac. Hist. i. 14, 15, 34, 43, 48; Dion Cass. ixiv. 5, 6; Suet. Galb. 17; Plut. Galb. 23, 28; Plin. Ep. ii. 29.)

33. Piso, one of the Thirty Tyrants, who assumed the imperial purple after the capture of Valerian, a. d. 260. He traced his descent from the ancient family of the same name, and was a man of unblemished character. After the capture of Valerian, he was sent by Macrianius with orders for the death of Valens, proconsul of Achaia; but upon learning that the latter in anticipation of the danger had assumed the purple, he withdrew into Thessaly, and was there himself saluted emperor by a small body of supporters, who bestowed on him the title of Thessalicus. His career was soon, however, brought to a close by Valens, who, in giving orders for his death, did not scruple to pay a tribute to his conspicuous merit. The proceedings in the senate, when intelligence arrived of the death of both Piso and Valens, as chronicled by Pollio, are scarce credible, although he professes to give the very words of the first speaker. (Trebell. Pollio, Triq. Tyr. 20.)

The two following coins of the republican period cannot be referred with certainty to any of the Pisones that have been mentioned above. The former bears on the obverse the head of Terminus, and on the reverse a patera, with the legend ΠΙΣΟ M. (P.) ΦΡΟΣΙΟΣ: the latter has on the obverse a bearded head with the legend ΠΙΣΟ ΚΑΡΠΙΟ Κ.Ε., and on the reverse two men seated, with an ear of corn on each side of them, and the legend ΑΝΩΝ ΚΥΡΙΟΝ ΚΟΥΝΟΝ ΕΝ ΣΕΝΟΝΤΣΟΣΟΝ. (Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 159, 160.)

COIN OF M. PISO.

COIN OF PISO AND CARPIO, QAUESSTORS.

PISON (Πίσων), a statuary of Callaureia, in the territory of Troezen, was the pupil of Amphion. He made one of the statues in the great group which the Athenians dedicated at Delphi in memory of the battle of Aegeopatami, namely, the statue of the seer Albas, who predicted the victory to Lyons. He therefore flourished at the end of the fifth century B. C. (Paus. vi. 3. § 2, x. 9. § 2.)

PISTIUS (Πίστιος), i.e. the god of faith and fidelity, occurs as a surname of Zeus, and, according to some, answers to the Latin Fidius or Mecius Fidius. (Dionys. ii. 49; Eurip. Med. 170.) [L. S.]

PISTON, a statuary, who added the figure of a woman to the biga made by Tisicrates. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 32.)

PITANATIUS (Πιτανατίος), a surname of Artemis, derived from the little town of Pitana in Laconia, where she had a temple. (Callim. Hygn. in Dion. 172; Paus. iii. 16. § 9; Eurip. Troad. 1101.)

PITANE (Πιτάνη), a daughter of the river god Eutres, became by Poseidon the mother of Evadne. From her the town of Pitana had its name. (Pind. Ol. vi. 48.)

PITHOLAUS, or PEITHOLAUS, or PYTHOLAUS (Πιθώλαος, Πιθώλαος), was one of the three brothers-in-law and murderers of Alexander of Phenae. In n. c. 352 Peitholus and his brother Lyconphorus were expelled from Phenae by Philip of Macedon [LYCOPHRON, No. 5]; but Peitholus re-established himself in the tyranny, and was again driven out by Philip in n. c. 349 (Diod. vi. 52.). He was honoured at one time with the Athenian franchise, but was afterwards deprived of it on the ground that he had obtained by false pretences. (Despin. Neur. p. 1376.) For Peitholus, see also Arist. Rhet. iii. 9. § 8. 10. § 77; Plut. Anebat. 23. [E. E.]

PITHOLIUS, or OTACILIUS. [OTACILIUS, p. 64, b.]

PITHON (Πίθων). Great confusion exists in the MSS. editions of various authors between the different forms, Πίθων, Πίθων, and Πίθων, and it is frequently impossible to say which is the more correct form. (See Ellendt ad Arr. Anebat. vi. 7. § 4.)

1. Son of Agenor, a Macedonian officer in the service of Alexander the Great. It is not easy to distinguish the services rendered by him from those of his namesake, the son of Crates; but it is remarkable that no mention occurs of him during the campaigns in India, though they then appear as holding important commands, and playing a prominent part. It is apparently the son of Agenor who is mentioned as commanding one division of the πεταλογραφοὶ, or foot-guards, in the campaign against the Malli, n. c. 327 (Arr. Anebat. vi. 6. § 1, 7, 8), and it was certainly to him that Alexander shortly after confided the government of part of the PITHON.

In the following campaigns of Antigonus against Eumenes, Piton rendered the most important services to the former general, who appears to have reposed the utmost confidence in his military abilities, and assigned him on all important occasions the second place in the command. Thus we find him commanding the whole left wing of the army of Antigonus in both the decisive actions;
PITTACUS.

and at another time charged with the main body
while Antigonus himself advanced with the cavalry in pursuit of the enemy. Even more valuable perhaps were his services in raising fresh levies of troops, and collecting supplies of provisions and other necessaries, when the scene of war had been transferred to his own government of Media. It is probable that these circumstances called forth anew an overwhelming confidence in his own merits and abilities, and thus led Pitton after the fall of Eumenes to engage once more in intrigues for his own aggrandizement, which, if not directly treason-able, were sufficient to arouse the suspicions of Antigonus. The latter affected to disbelieve the rumours which had reached him on the subject, but he sent for Pitton to join him in his winter-quarters at Ecbatana, under pretence of wishing to consult him concerning the future conduct of the war. Pitton obeyed the summons without suspicion, but as soon as he arrived he was arrested, brought to trial before a council of the friends of Antigonus, and immediately put to death, n. c. 316.
(Diod. xix. 19, 20, 26, 29, 30, 38, 40, 43, 46; Polyaena, iv. 6. § 14.)

3. Son of Sosicles. [Pethon.]

4. Son of Antigones, an officer mentioned during the campaigns of Alexander in India. [Art. Ind.
16.] [E. H. B.]

PITTO, a surname of the Sempronius gens, mentioned only on coins, a specimen of which is an-nexed. The obverse represents a winged head of Pallas, with the legend pitto, the reverse the Dioscuri, with the legend l. semp. and roma.

PITTACUS (Pir' tacous), one of those early cultivators of letters, who were designated as “the Seven Wise Men of Greece,” was a native of Mytilene in Lesbos. His father was named Hyr-rhadus, or Cucius, and, according to Duris, was a Thracian, but his mother was a Lesbian. (Diog.
Laer. i. 74; Suid. s. r.) According to Diogenes Laërtius (i. 80) he flourished at Ol. 42, n. c. 612.
He was born, according to Suidas, about Ol. 32, and c. 652. He was highly celebrated as a warrior, a statesman, a philosopher, and a poet. He is first mentioned, in public life, as an opponent of the tyrants, who in succession usurped the chief power in Mytilene. In conjunction with the brothers of Alceaus, who were at the head of the aristocratic party, he overthrew and killed the tyrant Melanchrus. This revolution took place, according to Suidas, in Ol. 42, n. c. 612. About the same time, or, according to the more precise date of Eusebius, in n. c. 606, we find him commanding
the Mytileneans, in their war with the Athenians for the possession of Sigeum, on the coast of the Troad. In this conflict the Mytileneans were defeated, and Alceaus incurred the disgrace of leaving his shield on the field of battle; but Pittacus signalized himself by killing in single combat Phrynon, the commander of the Athenians, an Olympic victor celebrated for his strength and courage; this feat Pittacus performed by entangling his adversary in a net, and then despatching him with a trident and a dagger, exactly after the fashion in which the gladiators called retiairii long afterwards fought at Rome. For this achievement he received from the Mytileneans high honours and substantial rewards; but of the latter he would accept only as much land as he could cast his spear over; and this land he dedicated to sacred uses, and it was known in later ages as “the Pittacian land.” (Diog. Laer. i. 75; Herod. v. 94, 95; Euseb.
Chron. s. a. 1410; Strabo, xiii. p. 600.)

5. Pittacus, son of Pittius. [Pitt. Mon. p. 636, a; b; Festus, s. r. Retiarius; Alcæus.] This war was terminated by the mediation of Periander, who assigned the disputed territory to the Athenians (Hierod. Diog. ll. oc.); but the internal troubles of Mytilene still continued. The supreme power was ferociously disputed between a succession of tyrants, such as Myrsilus, Megalagyrus, and the Cleone-tids, and the aristocratic party, headed by Alceaus and his brother Antimenidas; and the latter were driven into exile. (Strabo, xiii. p. 617.) It would seem that the city enjoyed some years of comparative tranquillity, until the exiles tried to effect their return by force of arms. To resist this attempt the popular party chose Pittacus as their ruler, with absolute power, under the title of admı-ρηγής, a position which differed from that of a τήρωμος, inasmuch as it depended on popular election, and was restricted in its prerogatives, and sometimes in a time for which it was held, though sometimes it was for life; in short, it was a true tyranny, δι' ἐπαύξειν ἀληθῆ τυραννίδος.
(Aristot. Polit. iii. 9. s. 14.) Pittacus held this office for ten years, n. c. 569 to 579, and then voluntarily resigned it, having by his administration restored order to the state, and prepared it for the safe enjoyment of a republican form of government.
The oligarchical party, however, represented him as an ordinary tyrant, and Alceaus poured out in-vectives against him in the poems which he compiled in his exile, calling him τὸν κακοπάρτα Pittακον, deriding the zeal and unanimity with which the people chose him for their tyrant, and even ridiculing his personal peculiarities (Pr. 37, 38, ed. Bergk; Aristot. I. c.; Diog. Laer. i. 81):
there is, however, some reason to suppose that Alceaus was afterwards reconciled to Pittacus.
[Alceaus.] He lived in great honour at Mytilene for ten years after the resignation of his government; and died in n. c. 569, at a very advanced age, upwards of 70 years according to Laertius (i. 79), upwards of 80 according to Suidas, and 100 according to Lucian. (Macrob. 18.)

There are other traditions respecting Pittacus, some of which are of very doubtful authority.
Diogenes Laërtius mentions various communications between him and Croesus, and preserves a short letter, which was said to have been written by Pittacus, declining an invitation to Sardis to see the treasures of the Lydian king (i. 75, 77, 81);
and Herodotus mentions a piece of sage advice which was given to Croesus, as some said, by Dias, or, according to others, by Pittacus (i. 27): but all these accounts are of doubtful by the fact that Croesus was only 25 years old at the death of Pittacus. Other anecdotes of his eloquence, wisdom, and contempt of riches, are related by Diogenes Laërtius, Pittarch, Aelian, and other writers.
Of the proverbial maxims of practical wisdom, which were current under the names of the seven wise men of Greece, two were ascribed to Pixodarus, namely, XaleOv 6v&6v 6v6evas, and Kavrov 6v6a6i. The former furnishes the subject of an ode of Simonides, of which Plato has a very ingenious, though sophistical discussion, in his Protogoras (p. 338, e.; Bergk, Poët. Lyr. Græc. p. 747). Others of his celebrated sayings are recorded by Diogenes (i. 77, 78).

Pixodarus was very celebrated as an elegiac poet. According to Diogenes (i. 79), he composed as many as six hundred elegiac verses, forming a collection of didactic statements concerning the laws, addressed to his fellow-citizens. The only extant fragment of his poetry is the few lines preserved by Diogenes (i. 78), who says that they were the most celebrated of his verses:

"Εχώνα δεί τόξων (οτ' θάλα) καὶ ἰδίωνος φαρέτρας οτέχειν ἐπὶ φώτα κακον—πιάτν' γὰρ οὐδὲν γλάσσω διὰ στόματος λαλεὶ διδάξοντον ἓχουσα καρδίν νόημα.

PITTHERUS (Πυτηρεύς), a son of Pelops and Dia, was king of Troezen, father of Aethra, and grandfather and instructor of Theseus. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. i. 144, Eurip. Hipp. i, Med. 694, Paus. ii. 30, § 8, i. 27, § 8; Apollod. iii. 15, § 7; Strab. viii. p. 374.) When Theseus married Phaedra, Pittethus took Hippolytus into his house. (Paus. i. 22, § 2.) His tomb and the chair on which he had sat in judgment were shown at Troezen down to a late time. (Paus. ii. 31, § 8.) He is said to have taught the art of speaking, and even to have written a book on it. (ii. 31, § 4; comp. Theseus.) Aethra as his daughter is called Pittethe. (Ov. Heroid. x. 31.)

PITYREUS (Πυτηρεύς), a descendant of Ion and father of Procles, was the last king in Peloponnesus before the invasion of the Dorians. (Paus. ii. 26, § 2, vii. 4, § 3.)

PITYS (Πυτης), a nymph beloved by Pan, was changed into a fire tree. (Lucian, Dial. Deor. 22, § 4; Virg. Elog. vii. 24, with Voas's note.)

PIUS, a surname of several Romans.

1. Of the emperor Antoninus [Antoninus].
2. Of a senator Aurelius, who lived at the commencement of the reign of Tiberius (Tac. Ann. i. 75).
3. Of L. Cestius [Cestius].
4. Of Q. Metellus, consul B.C. 80, by whom it was handed down to his adopted son Metellus Scipio. (Metellus, Nos. 19, 22.)

PIXODARUS (Πυξωδαρος). 1. Son of Mausolus, a Carian of the city of Cindys, who was married to the daughter of Syennesis, king of Cilicia. Having taken part in the great revolt of his countrymen and the Ionians against the Persian king (B.C. 490), he advised the Carions boldly to cross the Maeander, and engage the Persian general Darius with that in their rear: but this counsel, though regarded by Herodotus as the best that could be given, was not followed, and the Carians were defeated in two successive battles. (Herod. v. 110.)

2. Prince or king of Caria, was the youngest of the three sons of Hectormannus, all of whom successively held the sovereignty of their native country. Pixodarus obtained possession of the throne by the expulsion of his sister Ada, the widow and successor of her brother Idries, and held it without opposition for a period of five years, B.C. 340 —335. He cultivated the friendship of Persia, gave his daughter in marriage to a Persian named Orontobates, whom he even seems to have admitted to some share in the sovereign power during his own lifetime. But he did not neglect to court the alliance of other powers also, and endeavoured to secure the powerful friendship of Philip king of Macedonia, by offering the hand of his eldest daughter in marriage to Arrhidæus, the bastard son of the Macedonian monarch. The discontent of the young Alexander at this period led him to offer himself as a suitor for the Carian princess instead of his natural brother — an overture which was eagerly embraced by Pixodarus, but the insignificant interference of Philip put an end to the whole scheme. Pixodarus died — apparently a natural death — some time before the landing of Alexander in Asia, B.C. 334: and was succeeded by his son-in-law Orontobates. (Diod. xi. 74; Arr. Ancib. i. 23, § 10; Strab. xiv. pp. 666, 657; Plin. Al. 10.)

The name is very variously written in the MSS., and editions of Arrian and Plutarch: the latter, for the most part, have Πυξωδαρος (Sintenis, ad Plut. l.c.; Eldend, ad Arr. l.c.), but the correctness of the form Πυξωδαρος is attested both by his coins, which resemble those of his predecessors Mausolus and Idries in their type and general design, and by a fragment of the contemporary comic poet Epigenes (op. Athen. xi. p. 472 f.), from which we learn that the penultima is short. It would appear from this fragment, that Pixodarus had been sent on an embassy to Athens during the lifetime of his father Hectormannus. (E.H.B.)

PLACIDIA, GALLA. [Galla, No. 3.]

PLACITUS VALENTINIANUS. [Valentinianus.]

PLACIDUS, JULIUS, the tribune of a cohort of Vespasian's army, who dragged Vettius out of the lurking-place in which he had concealed himself. (Tac. Hist. iii. 85; comp. Dion Cass. Liv. 20; Suet. Vett. 16.)

PLACITUS, SEX., the author of a short Latin work, entitled "De Medicina (or Medicamenta) ex Animalibus," consisting of thirty-four chapters, each of which treats of some animal whose body was supposed to possess certain medical properties. As might be expected, it contains numerous absurdities, and is of little or no value or interest. The author has been sometimes confounded with other persons of the name of Scatus (see Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 614.

COIN OF PIXODARUS.

ed. vet.), and is generally distinguished from them by the additional name of Papryrinus or Paprenius. He appears from various parts of his work (e.g. c. 27) to have been a physician, but nothing else is known of his personal history. His date is uncertain, but he is supposed to have lived in the fourth century after Christ. He is said to have borrowed much from Pliny's Natural History, and to have been copied in turn by Constantinus Africanus. The work has several times been published, both separately, and in different medical collections. It first appeared in 1538, 4to. Norimberg., ed. Fr. Emericus; and again in the same year, 8vo. Basil. ed. Alb. Torinus. It is inserted (after Oribasius) in the first volume of H. Stephani "Medicine Artis Principes," Paris, fol. 1567; in the thirteenth volume of the old edition of Fabricii Bibl. Graecae; in Ackermann's "Parabiblum Medicamentorum Scriptores Antiqui," Norimb. 1788, 8vo.; and elsewhere. (Choulant's Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin.)

PLAETORIA GENS, plebeian, did not produce any men of distinction, and none of its members obtained the consulship. On coins we find the surname Cestianus; see below.

PLAETORIUS. 1. C. PLAETORIUS, one of the three commissioners for founding a colony at Creton in southern Italy, b.c. 194. (Liv. xxxiv. 45.)

2. C. PLAETORIUS, perhaps the same as the preceding, a member of the embassy sent to Genus, king of the Ilyrians, b.c. 172. (Liv. xliii. 26.)

3. M. PLAETORIUS, slain by Sulla. (Val. Max. ix. 2. § 1.)

4. L. PLAETORIUS, a senator mentioned by Cicero in his oration for Cluentius (c. 46).

5. M. PLAETORIUS, was the accuser, in b.c. 69, of M. Fonteius, whom Cicero defended (Fonteius, No. 5). About the same time he was curule aedile with C. Flaminius, and it was before these aediles that Cicero defended D. Matrianus. In b.c. 67 he was praetor with the same colleague as he had in his aedilship. In b.c. 51 he was condemned (incendio Plaetorio, i.e. damnatione, Cic. ad Att. v. 20. § 8), but we do not know for what offence. We find him a neighbour of Atticus in b.c. 44, and this is the last that we hear of him (Cic. pro Font. 12, pro Cluent. 45, 53, ad Att. xv. 17). The following coins, struck by M. Plaetorius, a curule aedile, probably refer to the above-mentioned Plaetorius, as we know of no other Plaetorius who held this office. From these we learn that he was the son of Marcus, and that he bore the cognomen Cestianus. The first coin bears on the obverse a woman's head covered with a helmet, with the legend CESTIANVS S.C., and on the reverse an eagle standing on a thunderbolt, with the legend M. PLAETORIVS IMP. AED. CVR. The second coin represents on the obverse the head of Cybele, covered with a turreted coronet, with the legend CESTIANVS, and on the reverse a sela curulis, with the legend M. PLAETORIVS AED. CVR. EX S. C. The third coin has on the obverse the head of a youthful female, and on the reverse the bust of the goddess Sars, with the legend M. PLAETORIVS EST. S.C.; but as it bears no reference to the aedilship of Plaetorius, it may belong to a different person. The eagle and the head of Cybele on the first and second coins have reference to the games sacred to Jupiter and to Cybele, the exhibition of which belonged to the aediles.

COINS OF M. PLAETORIUS.

6. C. PLAETORIUS, served as quaestor in Asia in b.c. 47, under Domitius Calvinus, and belonged to Caesar's party. (Hirt. B. Alex. 34.)

7. PLAETORIUS RUSTIANUS, a Pompeian, perished, along with Metellus Scipio, when their little fleet was overpowered by P. Sittius at Hippo Regius, b.c. 46. (B. Afric. 96.)

8. L. PLAETORIUS L. F., is mentioned only on coins, from which we learn that he was quaestor. The obverse represents the head of Moneta, the reverse a man running, with the legend L. PLAETORIVS L. F. Q. S. C.

COIN OF L. PLAETORIUS.

9. PLAETORIUS NEPOS, a senator and a friend of Hadrian, whom this emperor thought at one time of appointing as his successor. (Spartian. Hadr. 4, 23.)

PLAGULEIUS, one of the partizans of the triumvir Clodius. (Cic. pro Dom. 33, comp. ad Att. x. 8.)

PLANCIIUS, CN. 1. Defended by Cicero in an oration still extant, was descended from a respectable equestrian family at Atina, a praefectura not far from Arpinum in Latium. His father was a Roman eques, and one of the most important and influential farmers of the public revenue (publicani); he served under M. Crassus, who was consul b.c. 97, and he subsequently earned the hatred of the aristocracy by the energy with which he pressed for a reduction of the sum which the publicani had agreed to pay for the takes in Asia, and by the support which he gave in B.C. 59 to Julius Caesar, who granted the demands of the equites. The younger Plancius, the subject of this notice, first served in Africa under the proconsul A. Torquatus, subsequently in B.C. 69 under the proconul Q. Metellus in Crete, and next in B.C. 62 as military tribune in the army of C. Antonius in Macedonia. In B.C. 58 he was quaestor in the last-mentioned province under the proconsul L. Appuleius, and here he showed great kindness and attention to Cicero, when the latter came to Macedonia during his banishment in the course of this year. Plancius was tribune of the plebs in B.C. 56. In B.C. 55, in the second consulship of Pompey and Crassus, he became a candidate for the curule aedileship with A. Plautius, Q. Pedius, and M. Juventius Laterensis. The elections were put off this year; but in the following year, B.C. 54, Plancius and Plautus were elected, and had consequently to serve as aediles for the remainder of the year. But before they entered upon their office Juventius Laterensis, in conjunction with L. Cassius Longinus, accused Plancius of the crime of sodalitium, or the bribery of the tribes by means of illegal associations, in accordance with the Lex Licinia, which had been proposed by the consul Licinius Crassus in the preceding year. By this law the accuser had not only the power of choosing the president (quaesitor) of the court that was to try the case, but also of selecting four tribes, from which the judices were to be taken, and one of which alone the accused had the privilege of rejecting. The prae tor C. AiIius Flavus was the quaesitor selected by Laterensis. Cicero defended Plancius, and obtained his acquittal. He subsequently espoused the Pompeian party in the civil wars, and after Caesar had gained the supremacy lived in exile at Corecyra. While he was living there Cicero wrote to him two letters of condolence which have come down to us. (Cic. pro Planc. passim, ad Q. Fr. ii. 1 § 3, ad Att. iii. 14, 22, ad Fam. xiv. 1, ad Q. Fr. iii. 1 § 4, ad Fam. iv. 14, 15, vi. 20, xvi. 9.)

2. Mentioned as curule aedile on the following coin, must of course be different from the preceding Cn. Plancius, since we have seen that he failed in obtaining the curule aedileship. The obverse represents a female head, probably that of Diana, with the legend CN. PLANCIVS AED. CYR. s. c., and the reverse a she-goat, a bow and a quiver. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 275.)

PLANCUS.

The name of the most distinguished family of the plebeian Munatia gens, is said to have signified a person having flat splay feet without any bend in them. (Plin. H. N. xi. 45. s. 105; Festus, s. v. Plancus.) Instead of Plancus we frequently find Plancius both in manuscripts and editions of the ancient writers.

For a detailed account of the persons mentioned below, see Drummian's Rom. vol. iv. p. 205, &c.

1. CN. MUNATTUS PLANCUS, was accused by M. Brutus, and defended by the orator L. Crassus, about B.C. 106 (Cic. de Or. ii. 54, pro Cluent. 51; Quintil. vi. 3. § 44.)

2. L. MUNATTUS L. F. L. N. PLANCUS, was a friend of Julius Caesar, and served under him both in the Gallic and the civil wars. He was made, as one of Caesar's legati in Gaul in the winter of B.C. 54 and 53; and he was in conjunction with C. Fabius, the commander of Caesar's troops near Hierda in Spain at the beginning of B.C. 49. He accompanied Caesar in his African campaign in B.C. 46, and attempted, but without success, to induce C. Considius, the Pompeian commander, to surrender to him the town of Aedrumetum. At the end of this year he was appointed one of the praefects of the city, to whom the charge of Rome was entrusted during Caesar's absence in Spain next year. He received a still further proof of Caesar's confidence in being nominated to the government of Transalpine Gaul for B.C. 44, with the exception of the Narbonese and Belgic portions of the province, and also to the consulship for B.C. 42, with D. Brutus as his colleague. On the death of Caesar in B.C. 44 the political life of Plancus may be said to commence. After declaring himself in favour of an amnesty he hastened into Gaul to take possession of his province as speedily as possible. While here he carried on an active correspondence with Cicero, who pressed him with the greatest eagerness to join the senatorial party, and to cross the Alps to the relief of D. Brutus, who was now besieged by Antony in Mutina. After some hesitation and delay Plancus, at length in the month of April B.C. 43, commenced his march southwards, but he had not crossed the Alps when he received intelligence of the defeat of Antony and the relief of Mutina by Octavian and the consuls Hirtius and Pansa. Thereupon he halted in the territory of the Allobrogges, and being joined by D. Brutus and his army, prepared to carry on the war against Antony. But when shortly afterwards Lepidus joined Antony, and their united forces threatened to overwhelm Plancus, the latter, despairing of any assistance from the senate, was easily persuaded by Asinius Pollio to follow his example, and unite with Antony and Lepidus. He therefore abandoned D. Brutus to his fate, and the latter was shortly afterwards slain in the Alps. Plancus during his government of Gaul founded the colonies of Lugdunum and Raurica (Orelli, Inscrip. No. 590; Dion Cass. xlv. 50; Sen. Ep. 91; Strab. iv. pp. 186, 192.)

In the autumn of the same year, B.C. 43, the triumvirate was formed, and Plancus agreed to the proscription of his own brother L. Plautius. [See Plautius.] He returned to Rome at the end of the year, and on the 29th of December he celebrated a triumph for some victory gained in Gaul. In the inscription given below it is said to have been ex Raced; and the victory was probably only an insignificant advantage gained over some Alpine tribes, in consequence of which he had assumed the title of imperator even before the battle of Mutina, as we see from his correspondence with Cicero (ad Fam. x. 8, 24).

In B.C. 42 Plancus was consul according to the arrangement made by the dictator Caesar, and had as his colleague M. Lepidus in place of D. Brutus. The Perusinian war in the following year, B.C. 41, placed Plancus in great difficulty. He had the command of Antony's troops in Italy; and accordingly when L. Antonius, the brother, and Fulvia, the wife of the triumvir, declared war against Octavian, they naturally expected assistance from Plancus; but as he did not know the views of his superior, he kept aloof from the contest as far as possible. On the fall of Perusia in B.C. 40, he fled with Fulvia to Athens, leaving his army to shift for itself as it best could. He returned to Italy with Antony, and again accompanied him when he went back to the East. Antony then gave him the government of the province of Asia, which he abandoned on the invasion of the Parthians under T. Labienus, and took refuge in the islands. He subsequently obtained the consulsip in a second time (Plin. H. N. xiii. 3. 5), but the year is not mentioned: he may have been one of the consuls subject in B.C. 36. In B.C. 35 he governed the province of Syria for Antony, and was thought by many to have been the cause of the murder of Sex. Pompeius. On his return to Alexandria he was coolly received by Antony on account of the shameless manner in which he had plundered the province. He remained at Alexandria some time longer, taking part in the orgies of the court, and even descending on one occasion to play the part of a mime, and represent in a ballet the story of Glaucus. But foreseeing the fall of his patron he resolved to secure himself, and therefore repaired secretly to Rome in B.C. 32, taking with him his nephew Titius. From Plancus Antony received some important information respecting Antony, especially in relation to his will, which he employed in exasperating the Romans against his rival. Plancus himself, like other renegades, endeavoured to purchase the favour of his new master by vilifying his old one; and on one occasion brought in the senate such abominable charges against Antony, from whom he had received innumerable favours, that Copus...

In the drawing above the position of the obverse and the reverse has been accidentally transposed by the artist.

3. T. MUNATIUS PLANCVS BURSA, brother of No. 2, was tribune of the plebs b.c. 52, when in connection with his colleagues C. Sallustius and Q. Pompeius Rufus, he supported the views of Pompeius Magnus. The latter had set his heart upon the dictatorship, and, in order to obtain this honour, he was anxious that the state of anarchy and confusion in which Rome was plunged, should be continued, since all parties would thus be ready to submit to his supremacy as the only way of restoring peace and order. Planus therefore did every thing in his power to increase the anarchy: on the death of Clodius, he roused the passions of the mob by exposing to public view the corpse of their favourite, and he was thus the chief promoter of the riot which ensued at the funeral, and in which the Curia Hostilia was burnt to the ground. His attacks upon Milo were most vehement, and he dragged him before the popular assembly to give an account of his murder of Clodius. By means of these riots Pompey attained, to a great extent, his end; for although he failed in being appointed dictator, he was made consul without a colleague. The law De Vi, which he proposed in his consulship, and which was intended to deliver him from Milo and his other enemies, was strongly supported by Planus and Sallustius, who also attempted by threats to deter Cicero from defending Milo. But when Pompey had attained his object, he willingly sacrificed his instruments. At the close of the year, as soon as his tribunate had expired, Planus was accused of the part he had taken in burning the Curia Hostilia, under the very law De Vi, in the enactment of which he had taken so active a part. The accusation was conducted by Cicero, and as Planus received only lukewarm support from Pompey, he was condemned. Cicero was delighted with his victory, and wrote to his friend M. Marius (ad Fam. vii. 2) in extravagant spirits, stating that the condemnation of Planus had given him greater pleasure than the death of Clodius. It would appear from this letter that Cicero had on some previous occasion defended Planus. After his condemnation Planus repaired to Ravenna in Cisalpine Gaul, where he was kindly received by Caesar. Soon after the beginning of the civil war he was restored to his civic rights by Caesar; and from that time he continued to reside at Rome, taking no part apparently in the civil war; and the only thing by which he showed his gratitude to the dictator was fighting as a gladiator, together with several other citizens, on the occasion of Caesar's triumph after his return from Spain, b.c. 45. After Caesar's death Planus fought on Antony's side in the campaign of Mutina, but he was unsuccessful; he was driven out of Pollentia by Pontius Aquila, the legate of D. Brutus, and in his flight broke his leg. (Dion Cass. xl. 49, 55, xlv. 38; Plut. Pomp. 55, Cat. 45; Ascon. in Cic. Mnl. p. 32, &c., ed. Orelli; Cic. ad Att. vi. 1 § 10, ad Fam. xii. 18, Phil. vi. 4, x. 10, xi. 6, xii. 8, xii. 12.)

4. CN. MUNATIUS PLANCVS, brother of the two preceding, praetor elect b.c. 44, was charged by Caesar in that year with the assignment to his soldiers of lands at Bathroutum in Epeirus. As Atticus possessed property in the neighbourhood, Cicero commended to Planus with much earnestness the interests of his friend. In the following year, b.c. 43, Planus was praetor, and was allowed by the senate to join his brother Lucius in Transalpine Gaul, where he negotiated on his brother's behalf with Lepidus, and distinguished himself by his activity in the command of the cavalry of his brother's army. His exertions brought on a fever: for this reason, and also because the two consuls had perished, he was sent back to Rome by Lucius. (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 16, ad Fam. x. 6. 11, 13, 17, 21.)

5. L. PLAUTIUS PLANCVS, brother of the three preceding, was adopted by a L. Plautius, and therefore took his prænomen as well as nomen, but retained his original cognomen, as was the case with Metellus Scipio (MATHIL. No. 22), and Pupius Piso. (Piso, No. 18.) Before his adoption his prænomen was Caius, and hence he is called by Valerius Maximus C. Plautius Planus. He was included in the proscription of the triumvirs, b.c. 43, with the consent of his brother Lucius [No. 2]. He concealed himself in the neighbourhood of Salernum; but the perfumes which he used and his refined mode of living betrayed his lurking-place to his pursuers, and to save his slaves, who were being tortured to death because they would not betray him, he voluntarily surrendered himself to his executioners. (Plin. H. N. xiii. 3. s. 5; Val. Max. vi. 8 § 5; Appian, B. C. iv. 12; Vell. Pat. ii. 67.) The following coin, which bears the legends L. PLAVTVS PLANCVS, must have been struck by this Planus, as no other Plautius is mentioned with this cognomen. This coin, representing on the obverse a mask, and on the reverse Aurora leading four horses, refers to a circumstance which happened in the censorship of C. Plautius Venox, who filled this office with Ap. Claudius Caeccus in b.c. 312. It is related that the tibicines having quarrelled with the censor Ap. Claudius left Rome and went to Tibur; but as the people felt the loss of them, the other censor, Plautius, had them placed in waggons one night when they were drunk, and conveyed to Rome, where they arrived early next morning; and, that they might not be recognised by the magistrates, he caused their faces to be covered with masks. The tale is related at length by Ovid (Fast. vi. 651), and the following lines in particular throw light upon the subject of the coin:—

"Jamque per Esquiliis Romanam intraverat urbem, el manc in medio plaustra fuere foro."

Ann. i. 39.) PLANTA, POMPEIUS, prefect of Egypt in the reign of Trajan. (Plin. Ep. x. 7 or 5.) PLANUDES (Πλαγούς), surnamed MAXI- mus, was one of the most learned Constantinopolitan monks of the last age of the Greek empire, and was greatly distinguished as a theologian, grammarian, and rhetorician; but his name is now chiefly interesting as that of the compiler of the latest of those collections of minor Greek poems, which were known by the names of Garlands or Anthologies (Στέφανοι, Ανθολογία). Planudes flourished at Constantinople in the first half of the fourteenth century, under the emperors Andronicus II. and III. Palaeologus. In A. D. 1327 he was sent by Andronicus II. as ambassador to Venice. Nothing more is known of his life with any certainty, except that he was somewhat disposed to the tenets of the Roman Church, which, however, a short imprisonment seems to have induced him to renounce. (See Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. xi. p. 682, and the authorities quoted in Harle's note.) His works, of which several only exist in MS., are not of sufficient importance to be enumerated individually. They consist of orations and homilies; translations from Latin into Greek of Cicero's Scaenaea Scipionis, Caesar del Bello Gallico, Ovid's Metaphorae, Cato's Dis- ticha Moralia, Boethius de Consolatione, St. Augustin de Trinitate et de Civitate Dei, and Donatus's Grammatica Parva; two grammatical works; a collection of Aesop's Fables, with a worthless Life of Aesop; some arithmetical works, especially Schoilia, of no great value, on the first two books of the Arithmetik of Diophantus; a few works on natural history; Commentaries on the Rhetoric of Hermogenes, and on other Greek writers; a poem in forty-seven hexameters, on Claudius Palæmonaeus, and a few other poems; and his Anthology. (See Fabric. i. c. pp. 662—693, vol. i. p. 641, vol. vi. p. 348; Hoffmann, Lexicon Bibliographicum Script. Graec. s. v.) As the Anthology of Planudes was not only the latest compiled, but was also that which was recognised as The Greek Anthology, until the discovery of the Anthology of Constantinus Cephalas, this is chosen as the fittest place for an account of the LITERARY HISTORY OF THE GREEK ANTHOLOGY.

1. Materials. The various collections, to which their compilers gave the name of Garlands and Anthologies, were made up of short poems, chiefly of an epigrammatic character, and in the elegiac metre. The earliest examples of such poetry were, doubtless, furnished by the inscriptions on monuments, such as those erected to commemorate heroic deeds, the statues of distinguished men, especially victors in the public games, sepulchral monuments, and dedicatory offerings in temples (ἀναθῆμα); to which may be added odes and proverbial sayings. At an early period in the history of Greek literature, poets of the highest fame cultivated this species of composition, which received its most perfect development from the hand of Simonides. Henceforth, as a set form of poetry, it became a fit vehicle for the brief expression of thoughts and sentiments on any subject; until at last the form came to be cultivated for its own sake, and the literal of Alexandria and Byzantium deemed the ability to make epigrams an essential part of the character of a scholar. Hence the mere trifling, the stupid jokes, and the wretched personalities, which form so large a part of the epigrammatic poetry contained in the Greek Anthology.

The monumental inscriptions, to which reference has already been made, are often quoted by the ancient writers as historical authorities, as, for example, by Herodotus and Thucydides; and by later writers, such as Diodorus and Plutarch, partly as authorities, partly to embellish their works. This use of inscriptions would naturally suggest the idea of collecting them. The earliest known collection was made by the geographer Polemon (B. C. 200), in a work περὶ τῶν κατὰ πόλιν ἐπιγραμμάτων (Ath. x. p. 436, d., p. 412, e.). He also wrote other works, on votive offerings, which are likely to have contained the epigrammatic inscriptions on them. [POLEMON.] Similar collections were made by Alectas, περὶ τῶν ἐν Δέλφοις ἀναθήματων (Ath. xiii. p. 591, c.), by Menestor, ἐν τῇ περὶ ἀναθήματων (Ath. xiiii. p. 594, d.), and perhaps by Apellas Ponticus. These persons collected chiefly the inscriptions on offerings (ἀναθήματα): epigrams of other kinds were also collected, as the Theban Epigrams, by Aristodemus (Sol. in Apoll. Rhod. ii. 906), the Attic by Philochorus (Suid. s. v.), the reading is, however, somewhat doubtful, and others by Neoptolemus Paros (Ath. x. p. 454, L.) and Fa-hermones (Lactant. Instr. Div. i. 9; C. de Nat. Doct. i. 42).

2. The Garland of Meleager. The above compilers chiefly collected epigrams of particular classes, and with reference to their use as historical authorities. The first person who made such a collection solely for its own sake, and to preserve epigrams of all kinds, was MELEAGER, a cynic philosopher of Gadara, in Palestine, about B. C. 60. His collection contained epigrams by no less than forty-six poets, of all ages of Greek poetry, up to the most ancient lyric period. He entitled it The Garland (Στέφανος), with reference, of course, to the common comparison of small beautiful poems to flowers; and in the introduction to his work, he attaches the names of various flowers, shrubs, and herbs, as emblems, to the names of the several poets. The same idea is kept up in the word Anthology (ἀνθολογία), which was adopted for the next compiler as the title of his work. The Gar- land of Meleager was arranged in alphabetical order, according to the initial letters of the first line of each epigram.

S. The Anthology of Philip of Thessalonica. — In the time of Trajan, as it seems, PHILIP OF THESSALONICA compiled his Anthology (Ἀνθολογία), avowedly in imitation of the Garland of Meleager, and chiefly with the view of adding to that collection the epigrams of more recent writers. The arrangement of the work was the same as that of Meleager. It was also entitled στέφανος, as well as ἀνθολογία. Another title by which it is quoted is συλλογή νῦν ἐπιγραμμάτων.
4. Diogenianus, Stratton, and Diogenes Laërtius.

—Shortly after Philip, in the reign of Hadrian, the learned grammarian, Diogenianus of Heraclea, compiled an Anthology, which is entirely lost. It might perhaps have been well if the same fate had befallen the very polluted, though often beautiful collection of his contemporary, Straton of Sardis, the nature of which is sufficiently indicated by its title, Μοίσεα πανδακι. About the same time Diogenes Laërtius collected the epigrams which are interspersed in his works, into a separate book, under the title of Ἑπημερίων. [Diogenes Laërtius.] This collection, however, as containing only the poems of Diogenes himself, must rather be viewed as among the materials of the later Anthologies than as an Anthology in itself.

5. Agathias Scholasticus. —During the long period from the decline of original literature to the era when the imitative compositions of the Constantinopolitan grammarians had reached their height, we find no more Anthologies. The next was the Κόλοσσ έπιγραμμάτων of Agathias Scholasticus, who lived in the time of Justinian. It was divided into seven books, according to subjects, the first book containing dedicatory poems; the second, descriptions of places, statues, pictures, and other works of art; the third, epitaphs; the fourth, poems on the various events of human life; the fifth, satiric epigrams; the sixth, amatory; the seventh, exhortations to the enjoyment of life. This was the earliest Anthology which was arranged according to subjects. The poems included in it were those of recent writers, and chiefly those of Agathias himself and of his contemporaries, such as Paulus Silentarius and Man-cius. But the MS. of the MS. now stands, its actual contents do not agree with this index. (The exact amount of the discrepancies is stated by Jacobs, who prints the index in his Prolegomena, p. lxv.) The inference drawn from these variations is that the present MS. is copied from an older one, the contents of which are represented by the index, but that the copyists have exercised their own judgment in the arrangement of the epigrams, and in the addition of some which were not in the older leaves. It may further be pretty safely assumed that the older MS. was the Anthology as compiled by Constantinus Cephalas, the contents of which the index represents. But even in the index itself there are discrepancies; for it consists of two parts, the first of which professes to give the contents of the book, and the second their arrangement; but these parts disagree with one another, as well as with the contents of the MS. itself. The order given in the index is as follows (we give the titles in an abbreviated form):

a. τὰ τῶν Χριστιανῶν;
b. τὰ Χριστοδούλου τοῦ ᾿Εθελοῦ;
γ. τὰ έρωτικά ἐπιγραμμάτα.
δ. τὰ ανάδηματικά.

The actual contents, however, are as follows:

Pauli Silentiarii Ecphrasis, to p. 40; S. Gregorii Eclogae, to p. 49; Epigrammata Christiana, to p. 63; Christodori Ecphrasis, to p. 76; Epigrammata Cistonea, to p. 81; Proemium Meleagri, Philippi, Agathina, to p. 87; Amatoria, to p. 140;
In this respect, as well as in the number of books, the actual arrangement is the same as that of the index given above; but the titles of the books are not the same throughout, as will be seen by the following table, which represents the contents of the fifteen books of the Palatine Anthology, and the number of epigrams in each of them, and the pages of the MS., as printed in Jacobs's edition:

I. Χριστιανικά Ἐπιγράμματα. 123, pp. 49—63.
II. Χριστιανικός ἕκφρασματα. 416 lines, pp. 64—74.
III. Εὔπραξίματα ἐν Κυβέρν. 19, pp. 76—81.
IV. Τὰ προϊσία τῶν διαφόρων ἀνθολογίων. 4, pp. 81—87.
V. Ἐπιγράμματα ἐρωτικά. 309, pp. 87—140.
VI. Αναθημάτων. 336, pp. 141—207.
VII. Εὐπρόμματα. 748, pp. 207—326.
VIII. Ἐκ Εργογράφων τοῦ Θεοδότου. 234, pp. 326—357.
IX. Ἐπιτελικά. 827, pp. 358—489.
X. Προστράτα. 1261, pp. 489—507.
XI. Χαριτωμάτων καὶ χαριτωτικά. 442, pp. 507—568.
XII. Σπάνιων μούσα παλική. 238, pp. 569—607.
XIII. Εὔπραξίματα διαφόρων μέτρων. 31, pp. 608—614.
XIV. Προβλημάτων ἀφιστικά, αἰνίγματα, χρησιμότητα. 150, pp. 615—643.
XV. Σύνταξις τύχα. 51, pp. 665—710.

Jacobs supposes that the chapter containing the μούσα παλική of Strat onas was the last in the Anthology of Cephalas, and that the remaining parts were added by copyists, excepting perhaps the section which contains the epigrams in various metres. His reason is, that these latter portions of the work are without prefaces.

Of the compiler, Constantine, and his labours, the only mention made is in the MS. itself. In one passage (p. 81) a marginal scholiast states that Constantine arranged the Garland of Meleager, dividing it into different chapters; namely, amatory, dedicatory, monumental, and epideictic. The work itself, however, shows that this is not all that Constantine did, and that the mention of Meleager and of the titles of each section are only given by way of example. There are also prefaces to each book or section, in which the copyist quotes Constantine (sometimes by name, sometimes not) as explaining the character and design of the work (pp. 141, 207, ibid., 358, 489, 507, 517). In one of these passages he is called ὁ μακάριος καὶ διάμνιστος καὶ ἀνευτός ἀνέφωτος. There are also three passages, in which an unknown person of the name of Gregory is mentioned (if the meaning is rightly interpreted) as having copied inscriptions which Cephalas received from him and included in his work (pp. 254, 255). Another mention of Gregory furnishes an indication of the age of Cephalas. It is this: — p. 273, τοῦτο τὸ Ἐπίγραμμα ὁ Κεφάλας προβεβλέπτω ἐν τῇ σκολῇ τῆς Νέας Ἐκκλησίας ἔτε τοῦ μακαρίου Τιγγανίου τῶν Μαγιστρῶν. Now, this New Church was built by the emperor Basilius I. Macedo, who reigned from 867 to 886 a. D. It could not, therefore, have been till towards the end of the 9th century that Cephalas frequented this school. Now, at the beginning of the 10th century, literature suddenly revived under Constantinus Porphyrogenetus, who devoted especial attention to the making of abridgements and extracts and compilations from the ancient authors. This, therefore, seems the most probable time, to which the Anthology of Cephalas can be referred. The conjecture of Reiske, that Cephalas was the same person as his contemporary Constantinus Rhodius, has really no evidence for or against it, when we remember how common the name of Constantine was at this period.

The Anthology of Cephalas seems to have been compiled from the old Anthologies, as a basis, with the addition of other epigrams. He appears to have extracted in turn from Meleager, Philip, Agathias, &c., those epigrams which suited his purpose, and his work often exhibits traces of the alphabetical order of the Garland of Meleager. With respect to arrangement, he seems to have taken the Κόλοσσος of Agathias as a foundation, for both works are alike in the division of their subjects, and in the titles prefixed to the epigrams. The order of the books, however, is different, and one book of Agathias, namely, the descriptions of works of art, is altogether omitted by Constantine. It is also to be observed that the Palatine Anthology contains ancient epigrams, which had not appeared in any of the preceding Anthologies, but had been preserved in some other way. For example, Diogenes Laëritius, as above mentioned, composed a book full of epigrams, and the same thing is supposed of Palladas and Lucilius. These extracts were later than Philip, but yet not old to be included among the "recent poetry" of Agathias. Their epigrams are generally found together in the Vatican Codex.

There remains to be mentioned an interesting point in the history of the Vatican Codex. We learn from the Codex itself (pp. 273, 274) that a certain Michael Maximus had made a copy of the book of Cephalas, and that this copy was followed in some parts by the transcriber of the Vatican Codex.

All other important details respecting the Vatican Codex, with a careful estimate of its merits, and a proof of its great excellence, will be found in Jacob's Prolegomena, and in the preface to his edition of the Palatine Anthology.

2. The Anthology of PLANUDES is arranged in seven books, each of which, except the fifth and seventh, is divided into chapters according to subjects, and these chapters are arranged in alphabetical order. The chapters of the first book, for example, run thus: — 1. Ἐις Ἀγίωνας. 2. Ἐις Ἀμφελείαν. 3. Ἐις Ἀνάθεμα, and so on to 91. Ἐις ἅπας. The contents of the books are as follows: —

1. Chiefly ἐπιγραμματικά, that is, displays of skill in but, in places, Anthology (epigrams, &c.) have sometimes been confounded. The opinion of Reiske, that Planudes collected chiefly those ancient epigrams which had been overlooked by Cephalas, is at once contradicted by a comparison of the two Anthologies, and can only have arisen from the circumstance that Reiske mistook the Leipzig copy of the Palatine Anthology for the complete work, whereas that copy only contains the epigrams which are not found in the Planudenn Anthology. The true theory seems to be that of Brunck and Jacobs, namely, that Planudes did little more than abridge and re-arrange the Anthology of Constantinus Cephalas. Only a few epigrams are found in the Planudenn Anthology, which are not in the Palatine. With respect to the fourth book of the Planudenn, on works of art, &c., which is altogether wanting in the Palatine, it is supposed by Jacobs that the difference arises solely from the fact of our having an imperfect copy of the work of Cephalas. Jacobs has instituted a careful comparison between the contents of the two Anthologies (Proleg. pp. lxxiii. — lxxxvii.), which places Brunck's theory beyond all doubt.

From the time of its first publication, at the end of the 15th century, down to the discovery of the Palatine Anthology in the 17th, the Planudenn Anthology was esteemed one of the greatest treasures of antiquity, and was known under the name of The Greek Anthology. Planudes, however, was but ill qualified for the duties of the editor of such a work. Devoid of true poetical taste, he brought to his task the conceit and rashness of a mere literatus. The discovery of the Palatine Anthology soon taught scholars how much they had over-estimated the worth of the Anthology of Planudes. On comparing the two collections, it is manifest that Planudes was not only guilty of the necessary carelessness of a mere compiler, but also of the wilful faults of a conceived monk, tampering with words, “ex purgating” whole couplets and epigrams, and interpolating his own frigid verses. He reapred the reward which often crowns the labours of bad editors who undertake great works. The pretensions of his compilation ensured its general acceptance, and prevented, not only the execution of a better work, which in that age could scarcely be hoped for, but, what was far more important, the multiplication of copies of the more ancient Anthologies; and thus modern scholars are reduced to one MS. of the Anthology of Cephalas, which, excellent as it is, leaves many hopeless difficulties for the critic.

a. The Anthology of Maximus Planudes.

1. There are several codices of the Planudenn Anthology (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 430 — 437). The first printed edition was published about 150 years after the compilation of the work by Planudes, under the following title: — Ανθολογία διαφόρων ἐπιγραμμάτων, ἄφαισις συνετειμένων σοφίως, ἐπὶ διαφόρους υπόθεσεν, ἐμπροσθήν ἔχοντων ἐπιθέμην καὶ παραγμάτων ἡ γενειῶν, ἡ ὧν γενειῶν ἕφησις. Διαμεμένη δὲ εἰς ἑτὰ τριματα τοῦ βεβλ. καὶ τούτων εἰς κεφάλαια κατὰ στοιχείου διευκτειμένων, τάδε περιέχει τω πρώτων Εἰς ἄγους, — then follow the epigrams: it was edited by Janus Lascaris, and printed at Florence, 1494, 4to.; it is printed in capital letters. This Edicio Princeps is by far the best of the early editions; the errors of the press are much fewer than in the Aldine and Wechelian editions; and the text is a faithful representation of the MS. from which it is printed. At the end of the work is a Greek poem by Lascaris, and a Latin letter by him to Pietro di Medici, occupying seven pages, which are wanting in several of the still existing copies of this rare work: these seven pages were reprinted by Mainardi, in his Anal. Typ. vol. i. pp. 275 — 283.

2. The first and best of the Aldine editions was printed at Venice, 1503, 8vo., under the title: Florilegium diversorum Epigrammatum in Secundum Libros — Ανθολογία διαφόρων ἐπιγραμμάτων, and so on, nearly as in the title of Lascaris. The text is a reprint of the edition of Lascaris, but less accurate. It contains nineteen additional epigrams; but its great value consists in an appendix of various readings from MS. codices. Reprints of this edition in 1517 and 1519 are mentioned by some bibliographers, but it is very probable that the dates are erroneously given, and that the edition of 1503 is the one meant to be described.

3. The next edition was the Janitane, 1519, under the title: Florilegium diversorum Epigrammatum, &c., as in the Aldine; and at the end, Impressum Florenciae per heroes Philippi Janu Florentini. Anno a Virginis nuptio diria. supra nullc. It is a mere reprint of the Aldine, with some differences of arrangement, and with more misprints.

4. Two years later, Aldus himself published a second edition: Florilegium, &c. Soderti super repurgatum cura. Mdxxi. 8vo. The title-page goes on to state that the errors of the former edition were corrected in this: but the fact is that this is a still more inaccurate reprint of the former edition, with a few variations, especially the reception into the text of some very bad various readings from the Appendix to the first edition.

5. The edition of Budius or the Ascension, Paris, 1531, 8vo., is an inaccurate reprint of the second Aldine. It is very scarce.

6. A few years later, the first attempt at a commentary on the Anthology was made by Vincentius Opacopoulos, in his work entitled: In Graecorum Epigrammatum Libros quatuor Annotationes. In the second volume of this edition, Vincentio Opacopus Auctore. Cuius Indice. Basili. 1549, 4to. Its value is very small.

PLANEDES.

1550, 8vo. It is extremely rare: Jacobs even states in his Prolegomena that he had not seen it: Bruck, however, used a copy of it.

9. About the same time the third Aldine edition was printed by the sons of Aldus, Venet. 1550—1551, 8vo. It is the fullest, and the most sought after of the Aldine editions, but not the best. Though some of the errors of the second Aldine edition are corrected, those of the first are generally retained, and a new source of the worst sort of errors is supplied by numerous conjectural emendations. The additions are very trifling. Stephanus calls the edition rich in nothing but faults, of which, he says, there are many thousands.

10. The next and the best known of the old editions is that of H. Stephanus, 1566: Αναλογία διαφόρων ἐπηγραμμάτων παλαιών εἰς ἑκτά βιβλία διήγησίς. Florilegium diversorum epigrammatum veterum, in septem libros divisum, magno epigrammatum numero et duobus indicibus auctum. Ann. M.D.L.XVI. Exseudebat Henricus Stephanus, 4to. The diastich which Stephanus inscribed on his title-page,

"Pristinus a mendis fuerat lepor ante fugatus: Nune profuge mendae, nune lepor ille redit," gives a higher estimate of the value of his labours than modern critics have been able to assign to them. Its excellencies consist in the addition of a large number of epigrams, not contained in any of the former editions, of the Scholia of Maximus Planudes, and of a commentary by Stephanus himself. Its chief faults are the arbitrary alterations in the arrangement of the epigrams, many rash conjectural emendations of the text, and the imperfections of the notes, which, though confessed by Stephanus himself to be brief, contain, on the other hand, much irrelevant matter. This work stands at the head of what may be called the third family of editions of the Anthology; the first comprising that of Lescar, the first Aldine, and the Juntine; and the second, the second Aldine and the Ascension.

11. The Wchelion edition (Francoforti apud Claudium Mariannum et Jo. Aurubriam, 1600, fol.) is, in the text, a mere reprint of that of Stephanus, with few of its errors corrected, and many new ones introduced. It is, however, of considerable value, as it contains, besides some new Scholia, and the notes of Opopoeus and Stephanus, the whole of the excellent commentary of Brodaeus. In spite of its faults, it remained for nearly two centuries, until the publication of Bruck's Analecta, the standard edition of the Greek Anthology.

12. The Commenzation edition, 1604, 4to. (reprinted at Cologne, 1614), only deserves mention on account of the literal Latin version, by Eilhard Lubinus.

13. The last and most perfect of the editions of the Planudean Anthology is that which was commenced by Hieronymus de Bosch, and finished, after his death, by Jacobus Van Lennep, in 5 vols. 4to. Ultraj. 1795, 1797, 1798, 1810, 1822. This splendid edition (at least as to its outward form) is not only useful for those who wish to read the Greek Anthology in the form in which it was compiled by Planudes, but it is valuable on account of the large mass of illustrative matter which it contains, including the notes of Huet, Syllburg, and other scholars; but above all for the metrical Latin versions of Hugo Grotius, which are esteemed by far the best of his productions in that department of scholarship, and which have never been printed except in this edition. The Greek text, however, is only a reprint of the Wechelion edition, with many of its worst errors uncorrected.

It is now necessary to go back to the period when the discovery of the Palatine Codex placed the Greek Anthology in an entirely new light.

b. Editions of the Palatine Anthology.

It is a curious fact that, for more than two hundred years from the discovery of the Palatine Anthology by Salmusius, every project for publishing a complete edition of it was left unfinished, and this important service to literature was only performed about thirty years ago, by the late Frederick Jacobs.

1. Salmusius, as might naturally be expected from the discoveries of such a treasure, continued to devote the utmost attention to the Anthology; so that, his biographer tells us, he scarcely spent a day without reading and making notes upon it. By other avocations, however, and by quarrels with the Leyden printers, who refused to publish the Greek text without a Latin version, and with Valesius, who would not assist in the labour except on the condition of having his own name prefixed to the work, Salmusius was prevented from completing his intended edition. He left behind him, however, a large mass of notes and of unedited epigrams, which were only discovered by Bruck in the year 1777, after he had published his Analecta. We believe they have never been published; but they were used by Jacobs in his Notes.

2. After the repeated delay of the promised edition of Salmusius, Lucas Langermannus undertook, at the instance of Isaac Vossius, a journey to Rome, for the purpose of making a new collation of the Vatican MS. with the Planudean Anthology; and Fabricius states (Bild. Graec. vol. iv. p. 440) that he saw at Hamburg the copy of the Anthology which contained the MS. notes of Langermannus. The whole scheme, however, which seems to have been formed by Vossius in a spirit of rivalry to Salmusius, was abandoned on the death of the latter in 1653.

3. Meanwhile several MS. Copies of the Vatican Codex were made, all of which were founded on the collations of Salmusius, Syllburg, and Langemann, and all of which were superseded by the transcript made by the Abbate Joseph Spalletti, in 1776. This precious MS., the excellence of which is so great that it almost deserves to be called a facsimile rather than a copy, was purchased from the heirs of Spalletti by Ernest II. Duke of Gotha and Altenburg, for the library at Gotha, and formed the basis of Jacob's edition of the Palatine Anthology. Referring the reader to the Prolegomena of Jacobs for an account of the labours of D'Orville, Jensius, Leich, Reiske, Klotz, and Schneider, we proceed to mention those works which have superseded all former ones.

c. The Editions of Bruck and Jacobs.

1. In the years 1772—1776, appeared the Analecta Veterum Poetarum Graecorum. Editore Ric. Fr. Ph. Bruck, Argentorati, 3 vols. 8vo., which contains the whole of the Greek Anthology, besides some poems which are not properly included under that title. The epigrams of the Anthology were edited by Bruck, from a careful comparison of the Planudean Antiquity, and he re-editing the codex the Latin Anthology, to which he added a new arrangement, which certainly has its defects, but yet is invaluable for the student of the history of Greek literature; discarding altogether the books and chapters of Prolegomena, he compiled a new Anthology, placing together all the epigrams of each poet, and arranged the poets themselves in chronological order, placing those epigrams, the authors of which were unknown, under the separate head of ἀναδεύτων. Important as Brunck's edition was when it was published, it is now unnecessary to give any further account of it, as it has been entirely superseded by the edition of Jacobs, who, in his Prolegomena, an elaborate criticism on the labours of his predecessor, and of the few contributions which were made by other scholars to the emendation or explanation of the Anthology between the publication of Brunck's edition and of his own. The Lectiores of Brunck are an indispensable supplement to the Analecta.

2. The original plan of Jacobs was only to form a complete commentary on Brunck's Analecta, but the scarcity of copies of that work induced him to reprint it, omitting those parts which do not properly belong to the Greek Anthology, and carefully re-editing the whole. The result of his labours was a work which ranks most deservedly as the standard edition of the Greek Anthology. It is in 13 vols. 8vo, namely, 4 vols. of the Text, one of Indices, and three of Commentaries, divided into eight parts. The titles and contents are as follows:—Vols. 1—4. Anthologia Graeca, sive Poetarum Graecorum Laus. Ex Recensione Bruncki. Indices et Commentarium adjicit F. Jacobs, Lips. 1794, 4 vols. 8vo.; Vol. 5. Indices in Epigrammata quae in Analectis Veterum Poetarum a Brunckii editione repeririuntur, Ascendit F. Jacobs, Lips. 1795, containing (1) an alphabetical index of the first lines of the epigrams in Brunck's Analecta, in the Planudean Anthology, in the Miscellanea Lipsiensi, and in the Anthology of Reiske; (2) Index to the Planudean Anthology, with references to the pages of Stephanus, Wechel, and Brunck; (3) An Index to Kloz's Edition of the Musa Puerilis of Straton, with references to the pages of Brunck; (4) a similar Index to the Anthologies of Reiske and Jensius; (5) Geographical Index to the Analecta; (6) Index of Proper Names; (7) Arguments of the Epigrams, Vols. 6—13. F. Jacobs Anviadversiones in Epigrammata Anthologiae Graecae secundum ordinem Analectorum Bruncki, vol. i, parts i. ii. Lips. 1798, containing the Preface, Prolegomena in gythas Historia Anthologiae Graecae narratur, and the Notes to the Epigrams in vol. i. of the Analecta; vol. ii, parts i. ii. iii. Lips. 1799—1801, containing the Notes on vol. ii. of the Analecta; vol. iii. parts i. ii. Lips. 1802—3, containing the Notes on vol. iii of the Analecta, p. iii. Lips. 1814, completing the Addenda et Emendanda, and containing the following Indices: (1) Graecitatis; (2) Poetarum et capitum in Anthologia; (3) Verborum quae in Animali, explicandae; (4) Verborum in Animad. illustr.; (5) Scriptorum in Animad. illustr.; with the following most important Appendices: (1) Paraphrasonem ex Codice Palatinico, or Mantissa Epigrammatum Vaticani Codicis, quae in Bruncki Analectis desiderantur; (2) Epigrammata ex Libris editis et Marmoribus collecta; (3) Catalogus Poetarum qui Epigrammata scripserunt, which contains, not a mere list of names, but a full account of each of the writers.

3. In editing his Anthologia Graeca, Jacobs had the full benefit of the Palatine Anthology. Not content with the almost perfect copy of Spalletti (the Apographa Gallica), he availed himself of the services of Udelen, then Prussian ambassador at Rome, who collated the copy once more with the original codex in the Vatican. The important results are to be found in Jacobs's emendations of Brunck's text, in his corrections of many of Brunck's errors in the assignment of epigrams to wrong authors, and in his Appendix of 213 epigrams from the Vatican MS, which are wanting in the Analecta. In the mean time he formed the design of rendering to scholarship the great service of printing an exact and complete edition of this celebrated Codex. In the preface to his Anthologia Palatina, he gives a most interesting account of his labours, and of the principles on which he proceeded. It is enough here to state that he followed the rule (always a good one, but absolutely essential where there is only one MS.), to represent exactly the reading of the MS, even if it gave no sense, and by this necessary correction was clear beyond all doubt, placing all doubtful and conjectural emendations in the margin. After the printing of the text was completed, the unlooked-for restoration of the MS. to the University Library at Heidelberg afforded an opportunity for a new collation, which was made by A. J. Paulssen, who has given the results of it in an Appendix to the third volume of Jacobs's Anthologia Palatina. This work may therefore be considered an all but perfect copy of the Palatine Codex, and is therefore invaluable for the critical study of the Anthology. The following is its title:—Anthologia Graeca, ad Fidei Codicis Palatinae, anno Parisinio, ex Apographo Gallicano edita. Curvit, Epigrammata in Codice Palatino desiderata et Annotationem Criticam adjicit, F. Jacobs. Lips. 1813—1817, 8vo.; in 3 vols. of which the first two contain the text of the Palatine Anthology, with an Appendix of Epigrams which are not found in it, including the whole of the fourth and parts of the other books of the Planudean Anthology.

* This is the edition of the Anthology to which the references in the Dictionary are generally made; but the references are for the most part to the pages of Brunck, which are given in the margin, and which are those always referred to by Jacobs himself in his Notes and Indices. The practice of writers is diverse on this point, some quoting the Analecta, and some the books and numbers of the Palatine Anthology. The latter practice has its advantages, especially as Tauchnitz's cheap reprint of Jacobs's Anthologia Palatina is probably the form in which most persons possess the Anthology; but the Anthologia Graeca of Jacobs is so much the most valuable edition for the scholar, that this consideration is enough to determine the mode of reference. It is to be most earnestly hoped that, in any future edition of the Anthology, the arrangement of Brunck will still be preserved, and his pages be given in the margin, and that a great defect of Jacobs's edition will be supplied, namely, a comparative index of the pages of Brunck and the chapters and numbers of the Palatine Anthology.

and Epigrams in the works of ancient authors and inscriptions; the third volume contains the notes, which are only critical and not explanatory, the indices, and the corrections of Paulsen, under the following title:— Apomphori Gotthani, quendamodum id expressam habebimus in Editionis hujus tam Texta quam Comm. usque ad sectionem decimam quartam cum ipsa Codice Palatino diligenter nunc internum collati accuratissimo correcto. Edidit, adjectis positis observationibus suis palaeographice criticius, Ant. Jac. Paulsen, D. This appendix is preceded by a Proemium, containing a more exact account of the Palatine Codex than had previously appeared.

The series of Greek and Latin authors, printed by Tauchnitz, contains a very inaccurate reprint of the work of Jacobs; Lips. 1829. 3 vols. 18mo.

d. The Anthology since the Works of Jacobs.

Immense as were Jacobs’s services for the Greek Anthology, much has still been left for his successors to accomplish, in the further correction of the text, the investigation of the sources and forms of the earlier Anthologies, the more accurate assignment of many epigrams to their right authors, and the collection of additional epigrams, especially from recently-discovered inscriptions. The great scholars of the day, such as Hermann, Welcker, Meineke, and others, have not neglected this task.

Of the innumerable chrestomathies and delectuses, the most useful for students is that of Jacobs, in the Bibliotheca Graeca, Delectus Epigraphorum Graecorum, quem novo ordine concinnavit et comment. in us. scholar. instruxit F. Jacobs, Gothe, 1826, 8vo.

Of the numerous translations into the modern European languages, those best worth mentioning are the German translations of Herder, in his Zentr. Blätter, and of Jacobs, in his Tempel und Leben und Kunst der Alter (Jacobs, Prologym. ad

PLATO.

[Ps. S.]

PLATAEA (Πλάτεα), a daughter of Aepopus, who had a sanctuary at Plataea (Paus. ix. 1, § 2, § 5), which according to some derived its name from her, but according to others from the πάταγος των κατων. (Strab. ix. p. 406; comp. p. 409, &c.)

[Li. S.]

PLATO (Πλάτων), one of the chief Athenian comic poets of the Old Comedy, was contemporary with Aristophanes, Phrynichus, Eupolis, and Pherecrates. (Suid. s. v.) He is erroneously placed by Eusebius (Chron.) and Syncellus (p. 247, d.) as contemporary with Catinus, at Ol. 81. 3, n. c. 454; whereas, his first exhibition was in Ol. 88, n. c. 427, as we learn from Cicr. (adu. Julian, i. p. 13, b.), whose testimony is confirmed by the above statement of Suidas, and by the fact that the comedies of Plato evidently partook somewhat of the character of the Middle Comedy, to which, in fact, some of the grammarians assign him. He is mentioned by Marcellinus (Vit. Thuc. p. xi. Bekker) as contemporary with Thucydides, who died in Ol. 97. 2, n. c. 391; but Plato must have lived a few years longer, as Plutarch quotes from him a passage which evidently refers to the appointment of the demagogue Agyrtius as general of the army of Lesbo in Ol. 97. 3. (Plut. de Reub. gerend, p. 301, b.) The period, therefore, during which Plato flourished was from n. c. 428 to at least n. c. 389.

Of the personal history of Plato nothing more is known, except that Suidas tells a story of his being so poor that he was obliged to write comedies for other persons (s. v. Ἀρκαδάς μιμούμενος). Suidas founds this statement on a passage of the Peisander of Plato, in which the poet alludes to his labouring for others: but the story of his poverty is plainly nothing more than an arbitrary conjecture, made to explain the passage, the true meaning of which, no doubt, is that Plato, like Aristophanes, exhibited some of his plays in the names of other persons, but was naturally anxious to claim the merit of them for himself when they had succeeded, and that he did so in the Parabasis of the Peisander, as Aristophanes does in the Parabasis of the Clouds. (See the full discussion of this subject under Φιλόνιδες.) The form in which the article Ἀρκαδας μιμούμενος is given by Arsenius (Violet. ed. Walz, p. 76), completely confirms this interpretation.

Plato ranked among the very best poets of the Old Comedy. From the expressions of the grammarians, and from the large number of fragments which are preserved, it is evident that his plays were only second in popularity to those of Aristophanes.

Suidas and other grammarians rank him as ἀποκρίς τῶν χαρακτηρίας. Purity of language, refined sharpness of wit, and a combination of the vigour of the Old Comedy with the greater elegance of the Middle and the New, were his chief characteristics. Though many of his plays had no political reference at all, yet it is evident that he kept up to the spirit of the Old Comedy in his attacks on the corruptions and corrupt persons of his age; for he is charged by Dio Chrysostom with vituperation (Orat. xxxiii. p. 4, Reiske), a curious charge truly to bring against a professed satirist! Among the chief objects of his attacks were the demagogues Cleon, Hyperbolus, Cleophon, and Agrypnes, the dihy- ratic poet Cinesias, the general Leagrus, and the orators Cephalus and Archinus; for, like Aristophanes, he esteemed the art of rhetoric one of the worst sources of mischief to the common- wealth.

The mutual attacks of Plato and Aristophanes must be taken as a proof of the real respect which they felt for each other's talents. As an example of one of these attacks, Plato, like Eu- polis, cast great ridicule upon Aristophanes's colossal image of Peace. (Schol. Plat. p. 331, Bekker.)

Plato seems to have been one of the most diligent of the old comic poets. The number of his dramas is stated at 28 by the anonymous writer on Comedy (p. xxxiv.), and by Suidas, who, however, proceeds to enumerate 30 titles. Of these, the Alexander 1297 b.c. are among the only editions of the same play, which reduces the number to 28. There is, however, one to be added, which is not mentioned by Suidas, the Αμφιφώς. The following is the list of Suidas, as corrected by Meineke:

'Αδωνίς, Αί δ' ίερών, Αμφιφώς (Schol. ad Aristoph. Plut. 174), Τρίγος, Διάδατος, Ἐλέάζος ἡ Νήσου, Ευριπίς, Ευρώτης, Ζεύς καυκών, Ἰάος, Κλεοφάνης, Αίδος, Λάκωνος ἡ Πονταία (second edition, Μαμώκιδος), Μένελαος, Μένικος, Μόρημες (of this there are no fragments), Νίκας, Νόνοι κακά, Σάντρας ἡ Ἐρυκάτης, Πατροάρης, Πει- σαρνος, Περικλής, Πολύτης, Πρήσατης, Σκεαλή, Σοφιτα, Σωμαξία, Σώφρος, Τερέσδος, Φανώ.

The following dates of his plays are known: the Cephaleon gained the third prize in Ol. 93. 4, n. c. 405, when Aristophanes was first with the Frogs, and Phrynicus second with the Muse; the Plaon was exhibited in Ol. 97. 2, n. c. 391 (Schol. in Aristoph. Plut. 170); the Peisander about Ol. 99. 6, n. c. 389; the Eubouleus was performed before the Plахεναβολ about Ol. 91, n. c. 413; the Peisicles about Ol. 97, n. c. 392. The Latin seems to have been one of the latest of his plays.

It has been already stated that some grammarians assign Plato to the Middle Comedy; and it is evident that several of the above titles belong to that species. Some even mention Plato as a poet of the New Comedy. (Athen. iii. p. 103, c., v. p. 279, a.) Hence a few modern scholars have supposed a second Plato, a poet of the New Comedy, who lived after Epicurus. But Diogenes Laêritius only mentions one comic poet of the name, and there is no good evidence that there was any other. The ancient grammarians also frequently make a confusion, in their references, between Plato, the comic poet, and Plato the philo-osopher. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Græc. vol. i. pp. 160—196, vol. ii. pp. 513—527; Editio Mi- niatur. 1847. 1 vol. in 2 pt. 3vo., pp. 357—401; Bergk, Comment. de Reip. Com. Adv. Ant. lib. ii. c. 6, pp. 381, &c.; C. G. Cobet, Observationes Criticoae in Platonis Comici Reliquiae, Amst. 1840, 3vo.)

Several other literary persons of this same name are mentioned by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 57, note), but none of them are of sufficient importance to require mention here. [P. S.]

PLATO.

PLATO (Πλάτων), the philosopher.

I. LIFE OF PLATO.

The spirit of Plato is expressed in his works in a manner the more lively and personal in proportion to the intimacy with which art and science are blended in them. And yet of the history of his life and education we have only very unsatisfactory accounts. He mentions his own name only twice (Phaedon, p. 59, b., Apol. p. 58, b.), and then it is for the purpose of indicating the close relation in which he stood to Socrates; and, in passing, he speaks of his brothers, Adeimantus and Glaucon, as sons of Ariston (de Rep. i. p. 327, comp. Xenoph. Mem. iii. 6; Diog. Laërt. iii. 4). The writer of the dialogues retires completely behind Socrates, who conducts the investigations in them. Moreover Plato's friends and disciples, as Speusippus in his eulogium (Diog. Laërt. iii. 2, with the note of Menage; Plut. Quaest. Synops. viii. 2, &c.), appear to have communicated only some few biographical particulars respecting their great teacher; and Alexandrian scholars seem to have filled up these inquiries with conjectures which are yet more untrustworthy. Even Aristoxenus, the disciple of Aristotle, must have proceeded in a very careless manner in his notices respecting Plato, when he made him take part in the battles at Tanagra, n. c. 426, and Delium, n. c. 424. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 8; comp. Aelian, V. H. ii. 30.)

Plato is said to have been the son of Ariston and Perictione or Potone, and to have been born at Athens on the 7th day of the month Thargelion (21st May), Ol. 87. 2, n. c. 430; or, according to the statement of Apollodorus, which we find confirmed in various ways, in Ol. 88. 1, n. c. 428, that is, in the (Olympic) year in which Pericles died; according to others, he was born in the neighbouring island of Aegina. (Diog. Laërt. i. 3; comp. v. 9, iii. 2, 3; Corsini, Fast. Attici, iii. 230; Clinton, Fasti Hell. sub anno 429, &c.) His paternal family boasted of being descended from Codrus; his maternal ancestors are a relationship of Solon (Diog. Laërt. iii. 4); from Plato descend the relationship of Critias, his maternal uncle, with Solon. (Charm. n. c. 155, 150. Comp. Tim. 20.) Originally, we are told, he was named after his grandfather Aristocles, but in consequence of the fluency of his speech, or, as others have it, the breadth of his chest, he acquired that name under which alone we know him. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 4; Vita Platonis, p. 6, b; Tychsen, Bibliothek der alten Literatur und Kunst, v.) According to one story, of which Speusippus (see above) had already made mention, he was the son of Apollo; another related that bees settled upon the lips of the sleeping child. (Cic. de Divin. i. 36.) He is also said to have contended, when a youth, in the Isthmian and other games, as well as to have made attempts in epic, lyric, and dithyrambic poetry, and not to have devoted himself to philo- sophy till later, probably after Socrates had drawn him within the magic circle of his influence. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 4. 5; Aelian, V. H. ii. 3.; Plut. Epicur. vi.) His love for Polymnia had brightened into love for the muse Urania (Plat. Symp. 187). Plato was instructed in grammar, music, and gymnastics by the most distinguished teachers of that time. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 4; comp. Hermann, Geschichte und System des Platonischen Systems, p. 98, note 48, p. 99, note 49.) At an early age (ἐκ νεόν) he had become acquainted, through Cratylus, with the doctrines of Heraclitus (Arist. Metaph. i. 6; comp. Appuleus, de Doctr. Plat. p. 47. Elm.), through other instructors, or by means of writings, with the philosophical dogmas of the Eleatics and of Anaxagoras* (Diog. Laërt. l. c.; Vita Anon. ap. Tychsen, p. 13); and what is related in the Phaedo and Parmenides of the philosophical studies of the young Socrates, may in part be referable to Plato. In his 30th year he is said to have betaken himself to Socrates, and from that time onwards to have devoted himself to philosophy. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 6; Suidas s. v. makes this into an intercourse of twenty years' duration with Socrates.) The intimacy of this relation is attested, better than by hearsay accounts and insufficient testimoniens (Diog. Laërt. iii. 5; Paus. i. 30. § 3, &c.; Xen. Mem. iii. 6. § 1), by the enthusiastic love with which Plato not only exhibits Socrates as he lived and died—in the Banquet and the Phaedo,—but also glorifies him by making him the leader of the investigations in the greater part of his dialogues; not as though he had thought himself secure of the assent of Socrates to all the conclusions and developments which he had himself drawn from the few though pregnant principles of his teacher, but in order to express his conviction that he had organically developed the results involved in his master's doctrine. It is therefore probable enough that, as Plutarch relates (Marius, 46; comp. Laëctant. Disp. Inst. iii. 19, § 17), at the close of his life he praised that dispassion which had made him a contemporary of Socrates. After the death of the latter he betook himself, with others of the Socratics, as Hermogenes had related, in order to avoid threatened persecutions (Diog. Laërt. ii. 106, iii. 6), to Eleusis and at Megara, who of all his contemporaries had the nearest mental affinity with him. That Plato during his residence in Megara composed several of his dialogues, especially those of a dialectical character, is probable enough, though there is no direct evidence on the subject (Ast, vom Leben und den Schriften des Plato, p. 51; Van Heusde, Int. Plat. doc. i. p. 72; Hermann, ibid. pp. 46, 490). The communication of the Socratic conversation recorded in the Theaetetus is referred to Eleusides, and the controvercal examination, contained in the Sophistes (p. 246) and apparently directed against Eleucides and his school, of the tenets of the friends of certain incorporeal forms (ideas) cognizable by the intellect, testifies esteem for him. Friendship for the mathematician Theodorus (though this indeed does not manifest itself in the way in which the latter is introduced in the Theaetetus) is said to have led Plato next to Cyrene (Diog. Laërt. iii. 6; Appol. l. c.). Through his eagerness for knowledge he is said to have been induced to visit Egypt, Sicily, and the Greek cities in Lower Italy (Cic. de Rep. l. 10, deFin.

v. 29; Val. Max. viii. 7, § 3; Vita Anon. l. c.). Others, in inverted order, make him travel first to Sicily and then to Egypt (Quintil. i. 12, § 15; Diog. Laërt. iii. 6), or from Sicily to Cyrene and Egypt, and then again to Sicily (Appuleus, l. c. p. 47; comp. Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 366). As his companion we find mentioned Eudoxus (Strab. xxvii. 29, in opposition to Diog. Laërt. viii. 67), or Simmias (Plut. de Doen. Socr. 7), or even Euphides, who died Ol. 83. 2 (Diog. Laërt. iii. 6). More distant journeys of Plato into the interior of Asia, to the Hebrews, Babyloniens, and Assyrians, to the Magi and Persians, are mentioned only by Simmias, who from no reliance can be placed (Clem. Alex. ado. Gent. p. 46; Val. Max. p. 14; comp. Diog. Laërt. iii. 7; Laëctant. Instlt. iv. 29; comp. Cic. Tusc. Disp. iv. 19). Even the fruits of his better authenticated journeys cannot be traced in the works of Plato with any definiteness. He may have enlarged his mathematical and astronomical knowledge, have received some impulses and incitements through personal intercourse with Archytas and other celebrated Pythagoreans of his age (Clem. Alex. Cic. Val. Max. &c. l. c.), have made himself acquainted with Egyptian modes of life and Egyptian wisdom (Plat. de Leg. ii. p. 656, vii. pp. 799, 819, Phaedo, p. 274, Philol. p. 18, Tim. 21; comp. Epipomy. p. 966); but on the fundamental assumptions of his system, and its development and exposition, these journeys can hardly have exercised any important influence; of any effect produced upon it by the pretended Egyptian wisdom, as is assumed by Plessing (Menonograph. p. 483, &c., 594, &c.; Verzehn zur Aufkiirzung der Philosophie, ii. 2, p. 879, &c.) and others, no traces are to be found (comp. Hermann, l. c. i. 55, &c.). That Plato during his residence in Sicily, through the intervention of Dion, became acquainted with the elder Dionysius, but very soon fell out with the tyrant, is asserted by credible witnesses (especially by Hegesander ap. Athen. xi. 507, b; Diod. xv. 7; Plut. Dion, 4, 5; Diog. Laërt. iii. 18, 19. The Platonie epistle vii. pp. 324, 326, 327, mentions only the acquaintance with Dion, not with that elder Dionysius). More doubt attaches to the story, according to which he was given up by the tyrant to the Spartan ambassador Polias, by him sold into Aegina, and set at liberty by the Cyrenian Ammocrates. This story is told in very different forms. On the other hand, we find the statement that Plato came to Sicily when about forty years old, so that he would have returned to Athens at the close of the 97th Olympiad (c. 339 or 338), about twelve years after the death of Socrates; and perhaps for that reason Ol. 97, 4, was set down by the chroniclers whom Eusebius follows as the period when he flourished. After his return he began to teach, partly in the gymnasia of the Academy and its shady avenues, near the city, between the exterior Ceramicus and the hill Colonus Hippius, partly in his garden, which was situated at Colonus (Timon ap. Diog. Laërt. iii. 7, comp. 5; Plut. de Exitio, c. 10, &c.). Respecting the acquisition of this garden again, and the circumstances of Plato as regards property generally, we have conflicting accounts (Plat. Diog. Laërt. lv. l. c. Anon. l. c. 5; Anon. l. c. ii. 7, comp. Hermann, l. c. p. 77, &c.). Plato laureatus gratuitously (Diog. Laërt. iv. 2; Olympiad, et Anon.), and agreeably to his maxims (Philol. p.
PLATO.

275, Protag. pp. 329, 334, Gorg. p. 449, comp. Hipp. Min. p. 373), without doubt mainly in the form of lively dialogue; yet on the more difficult parts of his doctrinal system he probably also delivered connected lectures; at least in the accounts of his lectures, noted down by Aristotle and other disciples, on the Good (see below) there appears no trace of the form of dialogue. Theismius also (Orat. xx. p. 245, d) represents him as delivering a lecture on the Good in the Peiraeus before an audience which gradually dwindled away. The more narrow circle of his disciples (the number of them, which can scarcely have remained uniform, is stated at 28) assembled themselves in his garden at common, simple meals (Athen. i. 7, xii. 69, x. 14, comp. Aelian, V. H. ii. 18, iii. 35; Diog. Laërt. ii. 6), and it was probably to them alone that the inscription said to have been set up over the vestibule of the house, "let no one enter who is unacquainted with geometry," had reference (Tzetzes, Chalcid. viii. 972). For they were the companions of Xenocrates of Chalcedon, Aristotle, Heracleides Ponticus, Hes-tiaeus of Perinthus, Philippos the Opuntian, and others, men from the most different parts of Greece. To the wider circle of those who, without attaching themselves to the more narrow community of the school, sought instruction and incitement from him, distinguished men of the age, such as Chabrias, Iphicrates (Aristid. ii. p. 325), Timotheus (Athen. x. 14, comp. Aelian, V. H. ii. 18; Plat. de Sanit. tuenda, p. 127, 6), Phocion, Hyperides, Lycurgus, Isocrates (Diog. Laërt. iii. 46), are said to have belonged. Whether Demosthenes was of the number is doubtful (Dem. Epist. v.; Cic. de Orat. i. 20, Brut. 52, Orat. 5, de Offici. i. 1, &c.; on the other hand see Niebuhr, Kleine historische Schriften, p. 402; Bake, Biblioth. Crit. Nova, v. 1. 194, &c.). Even women are said to have attached themselves to him as his disciples (Diog. Laërt. t. c., comp. Olympiod.). Plato's occupation as an instructor was twofold — lectures and journeys undertaken to Sicily; first when Dion, probably soon after the death of the elder Dionysius (Ol. 103. i, n. c. 368), determined him to make the attempt to win the younger Dionysius to philosophy (Plat. Epist. viii. p. 327, iii. p. 316, c; Plat. Dion, c. 11, &c. 16, &c., Philosop. esse cum Principi. c. 4; Corn. Nep. x. 3; Diog. Laërt. iii. 21); the second time, a few years later (about n. c. 361), when the wish of his Pythagorean friends, and the invitation of Dionysius to reconcile the disputes which had broken out shortly after Plato's departure between him and his step-uncle Dion, brought him back to Syracuse. His efforts were both times unsuccessful, and he owed his own safety to nothing but the earnest intercession of Archytus (Plat. Epist. vii. pp. 339, 345, iii. p. 318; Plat. Dion, c. 20; Diog. Laërt. iii. 25). Immediately after his return, Dion, whom he found at the Olympic games (Ol. 105. i, n. c. 360), proposed for the contest, attacked Syracuse, and, supported by Spesippus and other friends of Plato, though not by Plato himself, drove out the tyrant, but was then himself assassinated; upon which Dionysius again made himself master of the government (Plat. Ep.; Plat. lll. c.; Diog. Laërt. iii. 25). That Plato cherished the hope of realising through the conversion of Dionysius his idea of a state in the rising city of Syracuse, was a belief pretty generally spread in antiquity (Plat. Phileos. e. prince. c. 1; Themist. Orat. xvii. p. 215, b; Diog. Laërt. iii. 21), and which finds some confirmation in expressions of the philosopher himself, and of the seventh letter, which though apocryphus is written with the most evident acquaintance with the matters treated of (p. 327, c; comp. Hermann, l. c. p. 66, &c.). If however Plato had suffered himself to be deceived by such a hope, and if, as we are told, he withdrew himself from all participation in the public affairs of Athens, from despair with regard to the destinies of his native city, noble even in her decline, he would indeed have exhibited a blind partiality for a theory which was too far removed from existing institutions, and have at the same time displayed a want of statesmanlike feeling and perception. He did not comply with the invitations of Cyrene and Megalopolis, which had been newly founded by the Arcadians and Thebans, to arrange their constitution and laws (Plut. de princ. inerud. c. 1; Diog. Laërt. iii. 23; Aelian, V. H. ii. 42). And in truth the vocation assigned him was more that of founding the science of politics by means of monographs and fragments, of practising it in the struggle with existing relations. From the time when he opened the school in the Academy (it was only during his second and third journeys to Sicily that one of his more intimate companions — Heracleides Ponticus is named — had to supply his place, Suid. s. v. Heracleid.) we find him occupied solely in giving instruction and in the composition of his works. He is said to have died while writing in the 81st, or according to others the 84th year of his age, in Ol. 108. i, n. c. 347 (Cic. de Senect. 5; Senec. Epist. Iviii.; Neanthus in Diog. Laërt. iii. 3; Diog. Laërt. v. 9; Athen. v. p. 57, &c.). According to Hermippus he died at a marriage feast (Diog. Laërt. iii. 3; August. de Civ. Del, viii. 2). Thence probably arose the title of the ełogi of Spesippus — Παράθυρος ὡς κυρίων. According to his last will his garden remained the property of the school (Diog. Laërt. iii. 18) and passed, considerably increased by later additions, into the hands of the Neo-Platonists, who kept as a festival his birth-day as well as that of Socrates (Damasc. ap. Phot. Cod. ccxiii.; Porphy. ap. Euseb. Prœp. Evang. x. 3, p. 468), Athenians and strangers honoured his memory by monuments (Diog. Laërt. iii. 43; Phavorin. lb. 25). Yet he had no lack of enemies and enviers, and the attacks which were made upon him with scoffs and ridicule, partly by contemporary comic poets, as Theopompus, Alexia, Critoins the younger, and others (Diog. Laërt. iii. 26, &c.; Athen. xi. p. 509, ii. p. 59, partly by one-sided Socrates, as Antithenes, Diogenes, and the later Megaraic (Diog. Laërt. iii. 35, vi. 7, 26, ii. 119, comp. Schleiermacher's Platon. ii. 1, pp. 19, 163, 404, 406; ii. 2, pp. 17, 29), found a loud echo among Epicureans, Stoics, certain Peripatetics, and later writers eager for destruction. Thus even Antithenes and Arioxenus (Diog. Laërt. iii. 53; Athen. v. p. 434, xi. p. 507; Mahne, de Aristophane, pp. 73, 91) charged him with sensuality, avarice, and sycophancy (Diog. Laërt. iii. 29; Athen. xi. p. 509, c. xiii. p. 589, &c.) and others with vanity, ambition, and envy towards other Socrates (Athen. xi. p. 507, d; Diog. Laërt. vi. 3, 7, 24, 26, 34; comp. A. Böckh, Commentat. Acad. de Simulat. quæ Platonis eum Xenophonte interescesserit fortæ, Berol. 1811). Others again accused him of having borrowed the form and substance of his doctrine from earlier philosophers, as Aristippus, Antithenes (Theo-
II. The Writings of Plato.

These writings, by a happy destiny, have come down to us complete, so far as appears, in texts comparatively well preserved, and have always been admired as a model of the union of artistic perfection with philosophical acuteness and depth. Plato was by no means the first to attempt the form of dialogue. Zeno the Eleatic had already written in the form of question and answer (Diog. Laërt. iii. 48; comp. Arist. Elench. Supp. 10). Alexander the Teian and Sophron in the mimes had treated ethical subjects in the form of dialogue (Diog. Laërt. l. c.; Athen. xi. p. 503, b; Olympiod. p. 78; comp. Hermann on Arist. Poet. p. 83, &c.); Xenophon, Aeschines, Antisthenes, Eucleides, and other Socratics also had made use of the dialectical form (Diog. Laërt. passim); but Plato has handled this form not only with greater mastery than any one who preceded him and, one may add, than any one who has come after him, but, in all probability, with the distinct intention of keeping by this very means true to the admonition of Socrates, not to communicate instruction, but to lead to the spontaneous discovery of it. The dialogue with him is not merely a favourite method of clothing ideas, handed down from others, as has recently been maintained (Hermann, l. c. i. p. 354), but the mimetic-dramatic form of it is intended, while it excites and enchains the attention of the reader, at the same time to give him the opportunity and enable him to place himself in the peculiar situations of the different interlocutors, and, not without success, with them to seek and find. But with all the admiration which from the first has been felt for the distinctness and liveliness of the representation, and the richness and depth of the thoughts, it is impossible not to feel the difficulty of rendering to oneself a distinct account of what is designed and accomplished in any particular dialogue, and of its connection with others. And yet again it can hardly be denied that each of the dialogues forms an artistically self-contained whole, and at the same time a link in a chain. That the dialogues of Plato were from first to last not intended to set before any one distinct assertions, but to place the objects in their opposite points of view (Cic. Acad. i. 12), could appear credible only to partisans of the more modern sceptical Academy. Men who took a deeper view endeavoured, by separating the different kinds and classes of the dialogues, or by arranging together those which had a more immediate reference to each other, to arrive at a more correct understanding of them. With reference to the first, some distinguished dramatic, narrative, and mixed dialogues (Diog. Laërt. iii. 50); others investigating and instructing dialogues, and again such as investigated gymnastically (nominally or periphetically) and agonistically (endecythically or anatreptically); as also dialogues which communicated instruction theoretically (physically or logically), and practically (ethically or politically), (Diog. Laërt. ii. 49; Albin. Isag. 128.) With regard to the second point, attention was especially directed to the dramatic character of the dialogues, and, according to it, the Alexandrian grammarians Aristophanes of Byzantium arranged a part of them together in trilogies (Sophistes, Politicus, Cratylus — Theaetetus, Euthyphron, Apology — Politicus, Timaeus, Critias — the Laws, Minos, Epinomis, Crilon, Phaedon, Letters), the rest arraigning him on the grounds he was led to do so it is not easy to discover.

Thrasylus, in the age of Tiberius, with reference to the above-named division into investigating and instructing dialogues, divided the whole number into tetralogies, probably because Plato had given intimation of his intention to add as a conclusion to the dialogues Theaetetus, Sophistes, and Politicus, one called Philosophus, and to the trilogy of the Politieus, Timaeus, and Critias, the Hermocrates (Plat. Polit. p. 257, a. Critias, p. 108, a. c.). In place of the unwritten, if intended, Philosophus, Thrasylus adds to the first of the two trilogies, and as the first member of it, the Cratylus; to the second, in place of the Hermocrates, and again as the first member, the Clitophon. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 56; comp. Albin. Isag. &c. p. 120). Although this division appears to have been already usual in Varro's time (de Ling. lat. vi. 19, Bisp.), and has been adopted in many manuscripts, as well as in the older editions, it is not more satisfactory than the others which have been mentioned, partly because it combines genuine and spurious dialogues, partly because, neglecting internal references, it not unfrequently unites according to merely external considerations.

Nor have the more recent attempts of Samuel Pettius (Miscell. iii. 2), Sydenham (Synopsis, or General View of the Works of Plato, p. 9), and Serranus, which connect themselves more or less with those earlier attempts, led to any satisfactory arrangement. Yet at the basis of all these different attempts there lies the correct assumption, that the insight into the purport and construction of the separate Platonic dialogues depends upon our ascertaining the internal references by which they are united with each other. As Schleiermacher, for the purpose of carrying out this supposition, endeavoured to point out in Plato himself the leading ideas which have been the foundation of many and by means of them to penetrate to the understanding of each of the dialogues and of its connection with the rest, he has become the originator of a new era in this branch of investigation, and might with good reason be termed by I. Bekker, who has done so much for the critical restoration of the text, Platonis restitutor. Schleiermacher starts with Plato's declaration of the insufficiency of written communication. If he regarded this as the lifeless image of living colloquy, because, not being able to unfold its meaning, presenting itself to those who do understand as to those who do not, it produces the futile belief of being possessed of knowledge in those who do not know; being only adapted to remind the reader of convictions that have been produced and seized in a lively manner (Plat. Phaedr. p. 275), and nevertheless spent a considerable part of his long life in the composition of written works, he must doubtless have conevinced himself that he was able to meet that deficiency up to a certain point, to communicate to the souls of the readers with science discourses which, being capable of representing their own meaning and of standing in the place of the person who thus implanted them, should show themselves fruitful (ib. p. 276, &c.; comp. Protag. p. 329, a. 347, c.). The understanding of many of the dialogues of Plato, however, is rendered difficult by this circumstance, that a single dialogue often contains different investigations, side by side, which appear to be only loosely connected, and are even obscured by one another; and these investigations, moreover, often seem to lead to no conclusion, or even to issue in contradictions. We cannot possibly look upon this peculiarity as destitute of purpose, or the result of want of skill. If, however, it was intended, the only purpose which can have been at the bottom of it must have been to compel the reader, through his spontaneous participation in the investigations proposed, to discover their central point, to supply intermediate members that are wanting, and in that way himself to discover the intended solution of the apparent contradictions. If the reader did not succeed in quite understanding the individual dialogue by itself, it was intended that he should seek the further carrying out of the investigations in other dialogues, and notice how what appeared the end of one is at the same time to be regarded as the beginning and foundation of another. Nevertheless, according to the differences in the investigation and in the susceptibility and maturity for it to be presupposed in the reader, the mode of conducting it and the composition of the dialogue devoted to it would require to be different. Schleiermacher distinguishes three series and classes of dialogues. In the first he considers that the germs of dialectic and of the doctrine of ideas begin to unfold themselves in all the freshness of the first youthful inspiration, with the fulness of an imaginative, dramatically mimetic representation; in the second these germs develop themselves further by means of dialectic investigations respecting the difference between common and philosophical acquaintance with things, respecting notion and knowledge (δόξα and ἐπιστήμη); in the third they receive their completion by means of an objectively scientific working out, with the separation of ethics and physics (Schleiermacher's Plato, i. 1, Einleitung, p. 45, &c.; comp. ii. 2, p. 142).

To suppose that Plato, when he composed the first of his dialogues, already had clearly before his eyes in distinct outlines the whole series of the rest, with all their internal references and connecting links; and farther, that from the beginning to the end he never varied, but needed only to keep on spinning the thread he had once begun, without any where taking it up afresh,—such a supposition would indeed be preposterous, as Hermann remarks against Schleiermacher (l.c. p. 354. 56). But the assumption above referred to respecting the composition and succession of the dialogues of Plato by no means depends upon any such supposition. It is enough to believe that the fundamental germs of his system early made their appearance in the mind of Plato in a definite form, and attained to their development in a natural manner through the power that resided in them. We need suppose in the case of Plato only what may be demonstrated in the case of other great thinkers of more modern times, as Des Cartes, Spinoza, Fichte, Schelling. Nay, we are not even compelled to assume (what indeed is very improbable) that the succession of the dialogues according to their internal references must coincide with the chronological order in which they were composed. Why should not Plato, while he had already commenced works of the third class, have found occasion now and then to return to the completion of the dialogues of the second, or even of the first class? As regards, however, the arrangements in detail, we will not deny that Schleiermacher, in the endeavour to assign its place to every dialogue according to the presupposed connection with all the rest running through the series, has now and then suffered himself to be misled by insecure traces, and has been induced partly to regard some leading dialogues from an incorrect or doubtful point of view, partly to supply conjectures by means of artificial combinations. On the other hand, we believe, after a careful examination of the objections against it that have been made good, that we may adopt the principle of the arrangement and the most important points of it.

The first series embraces, according to Schleiermacher, the larger dialogues, Phaedrus, Protagoras, and Parmenides, to which the smaller ones, Lysis, Laches, Charmides, and Euthyphron are to be added as supplements. When others, on the contrary, declare themselves for a much later composition of the Phaedrus, and Hermann in particular (l.c. pp. 356, 373, &c.) regards it as the entrance-prog- ramm (p. 544) written by Plato for the opening of his school, we will indeed admit that the account which makes that dialogue Plato's first youthful composition (Diog. L. lili. 38; Olympiod. Vita Plat. p. 70) can pass for nothing more than a conclusion come to by learned philosophers or grammarians (though not without the judgements of Porphyry, Panetius, and Diocrius brought forward in favour of the opinion deserve regard); but that the compass of knowledge said to be found in the dialogue, and the fulness and maturity of the thoughts, its similarity to the Symposium and Menexenus, the acquaintance with Egyptian mythology and Pythagorean philosophy, bear indubitable testimony to a later composition, we cannot admit; but we must rather appeal to the fact that the youthful Plato, even before he had visited Egypt and Magna Graecia, might easily have acquired such an amount of knowledge in Athens, the centre of all the philosophical life of that age; and further, that what is brought forward as evidence of the compass and maturity of the thoughts is rather the youthful, lively expression of the first conception of great ideas (comp. Van Heusde, Initia Doctr. Plat. i. p. 137). With the Phaedrus the Lysis stands connected as a dialetic essay upon. But as the Phaedrus contains the outlines of the peculiar leading doctrines of Plato partly still as forebodings expressed in a mythical form, so the Protagoras is distinctly to be regarded as the Socratic method in opposition to the sophist, in discussions which we might term the Propylaen of the doctrine of morals. The early composition of this dialogue is assumed even by the antagonists of Schleiermacher, they only dispute on insufficient grounds either the genuineness of the smaller dialogues Charmides, Laches and Euthyphron (see on this point Hermann, p. 443, &c.), or their connection with the Protagoras, which manifests itself in this, that the former had demonstrated the insufficiency of the usual moral definitions in reference to the ideas of virtue as connected with temperance (σωφορια), bravery, and holiness, to which the latter had called attention generally. The profound dialogue Parmenides, on the other hand, we cannot with Schleiermacher regard either as a mere dialectic exercise, or as one of the earlier works of Plato (comp. Ed. Zeller's Platonische Studien, p. 194, &c.), but rather see ourselves compelled to assign it a place in the second series of the dialogues of Plato. The foundation of this series is formed by the dialogues Theaetetus, Sophistes, and Politicus, which have clearly a mutual connection. Before the Theaetetus Schleiermacher places the Gorgias, and the connection of the two is indubitable, in so far as they both exhibit the constant and essential in opposition to the changeable and contingent, the former in the domain of cognizance, the latter in that of moral action; and as the Theaetetus is to be placed before the Sophistes, Cratylus and other dialogues, so is the Gorgias to be placed at the head of the Politicus, Philebus and the Politian. Less certain is the position assigned by Schleiermacher to the Menon, Euthydemus and Cratylius, between the Theaetetus and Sophistes. The Menon seems rather expressly designed to form a connecting link between the investigations of the Gorgias and those of the Theaetetus, and on the one hand to bring into view the distinction discussed in the latter between correct notion and true apprehension, in its application to the idea of virtue; on the other hand, by means of this distinction to bring nearer to its final decision the question respecting the essence of the good, as of virtue and the possibility of teaching it. It might be more difficult to assign to the Euthydemus its definite place. Although with the ridicule of the empty polemical artifices of sophists which is contained in it, there are connected intimations respecting wisdom as the art of those who are in a condition at the same time to produce and to use what they produce, the dialogue nevertheless should probably be regarded as an occasional piece. The Cratylus opposes to the scoffing art of the sophist, dealing in grammatical niceties, the image of dialectic art which recognises and fashions language as a necessary production of the human mind. It should, however, find its appropriate place not before the Sophistes (where Schleiermacher places it), but after it, as the application of dialectic to language could hardly become a matter of inquiry until the nature of dialectic had been discussed, as is done in the Sophistes. The Elatic stranger, when questioned by Socrates respecting the nature and difference of the sophist, the statesman and the philosopher (Soph. p. 217), answers only the first two of these questions, in the dialogues that bear those names, and if Plato had intended a third and similar investigation respecting the nature of the philosopher, he has not undertaken the immediate fulliment of his design. Schleiermacher therefore assumes that in the Phaedrus and Phaedon, taken together the model of the philosopher is exhibited in the person of Socrates, in the former as he lived, glorified by the panegyric of Alcibiades, and marked by the function, so especially peculiar to him, of love generating in the beautiful (p. 206); in the latter as he appears in death, longing to become pure spirit. (Schleiermacher's Plato, ii. 2. p. 356, &c.) The contents of the two dialogues, however, and their organization as regarded from the point of view of this assumption, is not altogether intelligible. (Comp. Hermann, p. 525. 27.) But as little should we, with Ed. Zeller (l. c. p. 194, &c.), look for the missing member of the trilogy, of which we have part in the Sophistes and Politicus, in the exclusively dialectical Parmenides. (Comp. Hermann, p. 671; note 533.) But Plato might the sooner have given up the separate exhibition of the philosopher, partly inasmuch as the description of him is already mixed up with the representation of the sophist and the politician, partly as the picture is rendered complete by means of the Symposium and the Phaedon, as well as by the books on the state. Meantime the place which Schleiermacher assigns to these two dialogues between the Sophistes and Philebus may be regarded as amply justified, as even Hermann admits in opposition to Ast and Socher (pp. 398, 469, 526). Only we must reserve room at this same place for the Parmenides. In this most difficult of the Platonic dialogues, which has been treated of at length by Ed. Zeller (l. c.), Stallbaum (Platonis Parmenides, cum IV. libri Prolegomenorum, Lips. 1839), Brandis (Geschichte der Griech. Röm. Philosophie, ii. 1, p. 294, &c., comp. p. 169, note), and others, we find on the one hand the outlines of the doctrine of ideas and the difficulties which oppose themselves to it briefly discussed; on the other hand a considerably more extended attempt made to point out in connection with the conceptions considered in themselves, and in particular with the most universal of them, the One and Existence, the contradictions in which the isolated, abstract contemplation of those conceptions involves us; manifestly in order to pave the way for the solution of those difficulties. In this the Parmenides is closely connected with the Sophistes, and might be placed immediately after the Cratylus, before the Symposium and Phaedon. But that the Philebus is to be regarded as the immediate transition from the second, dialectical, series of dialogues to the third, Schleiermacher has incontrovertibly shown; and the smaller dialogues, which as regards their contents and form are related to those of the second series, in so far as they are not diminished as spurious into the appendix, should be ranked with them as occasional treatises. In the third series the order for the books on the state (Politiea), the Timaeus and the Critias, has been expressly marked by Plato himself, and with the books on the state those on the laws connect themselves as a supplement.

Ast, though throughout polemically opposed to Schleiermacher, sees himself compelled in the main to recognise the threefold division made by the latter, as he distinguishes Socratic dialogues, in which the poetic and dramatic prevail (Protagoras, Phaedrus, Gorgias and Philebus), dialectic dialogues (Theaetetus, Sophistes, Politicus and Cratylius), and purely scientific, or Socratic-Platonic dialogues (Philebus, Symposium, Politiea, Timaeus and Critias). (Cf. Schleiermacher, Meine Werke, Leipzig, 1816.) But through this new conception and designation of the first series, and by adding, in the separation of the second and third series, an external ground of division to the internal one, he has been brought to unsteady and arbitrary assumptions which leave out of consideration the internal references. Socher's attempt to establish in place of such arrangements depending upon internal con-connection a purely chronological arrangement, depending on the time of their composition (Ueber Platos Schriften, Munchen, 1820), has been followed by no results that can in any degree be depended on, as the date of the composition can be approximately determined by means of the anachronisms (offences against the time in which they are supposed to take place) contained in them in but a few dialogues as compared with the greatly preponderating number of those in which he has assigned it from mere opinion. K. F. Hermann's undertaking, in the absence of definite external statements, to restore a chronological arrangement of the dialogues according to traces and marks founded in facts, with historical circumspection and criticism, and in doing so at the same time to solve a faithful problem of the progress of the mental life and development of the writer of them, is considerably more worth notice. (Geschichte und System der Platonischen Philosophie. Ister Theil, Heidelberg, 1839, p. 368, &c.) In the first period, according to him, Plato's Socrates betrays no other view of life, or scientific conception, than such as we become acquainted with in the historical Socrates out of Xenophon and other unsuspicious witnesses (Hippias, Ion, Alcibiades I., Charmides, Lysis, Laches, Protagoras, and Euthydemus). Then, immediately after the death of Socrates, the Apology, Crilon, Gorgias, Euthyphron, Menon, and Hippias Major belong to a transition step. In the second, or Megareic period of development dialectic makes its appearance as the true technic of philosophy, and the ideas as its proper objects (Cratylus, Theaetetus, Sophists, Politicus, Parmenides). Lastly in the third period the system itself is exhibited (Phaedrus, Menexenus, Symposium, Philebus, Politics, Timaeus, Cratius, and the Laws). But although Hermann has laboured to establish his assumptions with a great expenditure of acuteness and learning, he has not attained to results that can in any degree stand the test of examination. For the assumptions that Plato in the first period confined himself to an analytic treatment of ideas, in a strictly Socratic manner, and did not attain to a scientific independence till he did so through his removal to Megara, nor to an acquaintance with the Pythagorean philosophy, and so to the complete development of his dialectic and doctrine of ideas, till he did so through his travels,—for these assumptions all that can be made out is, that in a number of the dialogues the peculiar features of the Platonic dialectic and doctrine of ideas do not as yet make their appearance in a decided form. But on the one hand Hermann ranks in that class dialogues such as the Euthydemus, Menon, and Gorgias, in which references to dialectic and the doctrine of ideas can scarcely fall to the recognition; on the other it is not clear why Plato even after he had laid down in his own mind the outlines of his dialectic and doctrine of ideas, should not now and then, according to the separate requirements of the subject in hand, as in the Protagoras and the smaller dialogues which connect themselves with it, have looked away from them, and transported himself back again completely to the Socratic point of view. Then again, in Herm-mann's mode of treating the subject, dialogues which stand in the closest relation to each other, as the Gorgias and Theaetetus, the Euthydemus and Theaetetus, are severed from each other, and assigned to different periods; while the Phaedon, any evidence (comp. Hermann, i. pp. 544, 744, note 755), the verbal lectures of Plato certainly did contain an extension and partial alteration of the doctrines discussed in the dialogues, with an approach to the number-theory of the Pythagoreans; for to this we should probably refer the "unwritten assumptions" (δύο όντα δύναμιν), and perhaps also the divisions (Waiprēteor), which Aristotle mentions (Phys. iv. 2, ib. Simpl. f. 127, de Generat. et Corrupt. ii. 3; ib. Joh. Philop. f. 50; Diog. Laërt. iii. 80). His lectures on the doctrine of the good, Aristotle, Hermaceles Ponticus, and Hestenians, had noted down, and from the notes of Aristotle some valuable fragments have come down to us (Arist. de Anima, i. 2; ib. Simpl. et Joh. Philop.; Aristox. Harmonica, ii. p. 30; comp. Brandis, de Perditis Aristotelis Libris, p. 3, &c.; and Trendelenburg, Platonis de Ideis et Numeris Doctrina). The Aristotelician monography on ideas was also in last part drawn from lectures of Plato, or conversations with him. (Aristot. Metaph. f. 9. p. 990, b. 11, &c.; ib. Alex. Aphrod. in Schol. in Arist. p. 564, b. 14, &c.; Brandis, l. c. p. 14, &c.)

III. THE PHILOSOPHY OF PLATO.

The attempt to combine poetry and philosophy (the two fundamental tendencies of the Greek mind), gives to the Platonic dialogues a charm, which irresistibly attracts us, though we may have but a deficient comprehension of their subject-matter. Even the greatest of the Grecian poets are censured by Plato, not without some degree of passion and partiality, for their want of clear ideas, and of true insight (de Rep. iii. p. 387, a., ii. p. 377, x. pp. 597, c., 603, a., 608, a. v. p. 476, b. 479, 472, d., vi. p. 507, a., de Leg. iv. p. 719, c., Gorg. p. 501, b.). Art is to be regarded as the capacity of creating a whole that is inspired by an invisible order (Phileb. pp. 64, 67, Phaedr. p. 264, d.); its aim, to guide the human soul (Phaedr. pp. 261, a. 277, c. 278, a. de Rep. x. p. 608, c.). The living, conscious-life, the impulse of the poet, when purified by science, should, on its part, bring this to a full development. Carrying the Socratic dialogue to greater perfection, Plato endeavours to draw his hearers, by means of a dramatic intuition, into the circle of the investigation; to bring them, by the spur of irony, to a consciousness either of knowledge or of ignorance; by means of myths, partly to wake up the spirit of scientific inquiry, partly to express hopes and anticipations which science is not yet able to confirm. (See Alb. Jahn, Dissertatio Platonica qua tum de Causa et Natura Mythorum Platoniconum disputatur, tum Mythas de Anoros Orta Sorte et Indole explicantur, Bernae, 1839.)

Plato, like Socrates, was penetrated with the idea that wisdom is the attribute of the Godhead, that philosophy, springing from the impulse to know, is the necessity of the intellectual man, and the greatest of the goods in which he participates (Phaedr. p. 278, d, Lysis, p. 218, a., Apol. p. 23, Theaet. p. 155, d., Sympos. p. 204, a., Tim. p. 47, a.). When once we strive after Wisdom with the intensity of a lover, she becomes the true consecration and purification of the soul (Phaedr. p. 60, c., Sympos. p. 218, b.), adapted to lead us from the night-like to the true day (de Rep. vii. p. 521, d. vi. p. 485, b.). An approach to wisdom, however, presupposes an original communion with Being, truly so called; and this communion again presupposes the divine nature or immortality of the soul, and the impulse to become like the Eternal. This impulse is the love which generates in Truth, and the development of it is termed Dialectics. The hints respecting the constitution of the soul, as independent of the body; respecting its higher and lower nature; respecting the supposed apprehension of the former, and its objects, the eternal and the self-existent; respecting its corporisation, and its long lying by purification to raise itself again to its higher existence: these hints, clothed in the form of myths (Phaedr. p. 245, c.), are followed up in the Phaedrus by panegyrics on the love of beauty, and discussions on dialectics (pp. 251—255), here understood more immediately as the art of discoursing (pp. 265, d. 266, b. 269, c.).

Out of the philosophical impulse which is developed by Dialectics not only correct knowledge, but also correct action springs forth. Socrates’ doctrine respecting the unity of virtue, and that it consists in true, vigorous, and practical knowledge; that this knowledge, however, lying beyond sensuous perception and experience, is rooted in self-consciousness and has perfect happiness (as the inward harmony of its inevitable constancy), this doctrine is intended to be set forth in a preliminary manner in the Protagoras and the smaller dialogues attached to it. They are designed, therefore, to introduce a foundation for ethics, by the refutation of the common views that were entertained of mords and of virtue. For although not even the words ethics and physics occur in Plato (to say nothing of any independent delineation of the one or the other of these sciences), and even dialectics are not treated of as a distinct and separate province, yet he must rightly be regarded as the originator of the threefold division of philosophy (Aristocles, ap. Euseb. Praep. Ev. vi. 32; comp. Aristot. Top. i. 14, Anal. Post. i. 35), inasmuch as he had before him the decided object to develop the Socratic method into a scientific system of dialectics, that should supply the grounds of our knowledge as well as of our moral action (physics and ethics), and therefore separates the general investigations on knowledge and understanding, at least relatively, from those which refer to physics and ethics. Accordingly, the Theaetetus, Sophistes, Parmenides, and Cratylus, are principally dialectical; the Protagoras, Gorgias, Politics, Philebus, and the Politics, principally ethical; while the Timaeus is exclusively physical. Plato’s dialectics and ethics, however, have been more successful than his physics.

The question, “What is knowledge?” had been brought forward more and more definitely, in proportion as the development of philosophy generally advanced. Each of the three main branches of the ancient philosophy, when at their culminating point, had made a trial at the solution of that question, and considered themselves bound to penetrate beneath the phenomenal surface of the affections and perceptions. Heraclitus, for example, in order to gain a sufficient ground for the common (ἔξω) or, as we should say, for the universally admitted, though in contradiction to his fundamental principle of an eternal generation, postulates a world-consciousness; Parmenides believed that he had discovered knowledge in the identity of simple, unchangeable Being, and thought; Philolaus, and with him the flower of the Pythagoreans generally, in the consciousness we have of the unchangeable relations of number and measure. When, however, of the conflict of these principles, each of them untenable in its own one-sidedness, had called forth the sophists, and these, either by knew knowledge altogether, or resolved it into the mere opinion of momentary affection, Socrates was obliged above all things to show, that there was a knowledge independent of the changes of our sensuous affections, and that this knowledge is actually found in our inalienable consciousness respecting moral requirements, and respecting the divinity, in conscientious self-intellection. To develop this by induction from particular manifestations of the moral and religious sense, and to establish it, by means of definition, in a comprehensive form,—that is, in its generality,— such was the point to which his attention had mainly to be directed. Plato, on the contrary, was constrained to view the question relating to the essence and the material of our knowledge, as well of that which develops itself for its own sake, as of that which breaks out into action,—of the theoretical as well as of the practical, more generally, and to direct her efforts, therefore, to the investigation of its various forms. In so doing he became the originator of the science of knowledge,—of dialectics.
No one before him had gained an equally clear perception of the subjective and objective elements of our knowledge; no one of the theoretical and the practical side of it; and no one before him had attempted to discover its forms and its laws.
The doctrine of Heracleitus, if we set aside the pos-tulate of a universal world-consciousness, had been weakened down to the idea that knowledge is confined to the consciousness of the momentary affection which proceeds from the meeting of the motion of the subject with that of the object; that each of these affections is equally true, but that each, on account of the incessant change of the motions, must be a different one. With this idea that of the atomistic theory coincided, inasmuch as it was only by means of arbitrary hypotheses that the latter could get over the consciousness of ever-changing sensuous affections. In order to refute this idea from its very foundation, once for all, Plato's Theaetetus sets forth with great acuteness the doctrine of eternal generation, and the results which Protagoras had drawn from it (p. 153, &c.); he renounces the apparent, but by no means decisive grounds, which lie against it (p. 157, e. &c.); but then demonstrates that Protagoras must regard his own assertion as at once true and false; that he must renounce and give up all determinations respecting futurity, and consequently respecting uti-ity; that continuity of motion being presupposed, no perception whatever could be attained; and that the comparison and combination of the emotions or perceptions presupposes a thinking faculty pecculiar to the soul (reflection), distinct from mere feeling (pp. 171, &c. 179, 182-184). The man who acknowledges this, if he still will not renounce sensualism, yet will be inclined from his sense-perceptions to deduce recollection; from it, conception; from conception, when it acquires firmness, knowledge (Phaedo, p. 96, c.); and to designate the latter as correct conception; although he will not be in a condition to render any account of the rise of incorrect conceptions, or of the difference between those and correct ones, unless he presupposes a knowledge that lies, not merely beyond conception generally, but even beyond correct conception, and that carries with it its own evidence (Theaet. p. 187). He will also be obliged to give up the assertion, that knowledge consists in right conception, united with discourse or explanation;
for then this becomes the rule or criterion of the explanation, whatever may be its more accurate definition (p. 200, c. &c.). Although, therefore, Plato concludes the dialogue with the declaration that he has not succeeded in bringing the idea of knowledge into perfect clearness (p. 210, a.,) but that it must be something which excludes all changeableness, something which is its own guarantee, simple, uniform, indivisible (p. 205, c., comp. 292,
d.,) and not to be reached in the science of num-ers (p. 195, d.); of this the reader, as he spontaneously reproduces the investigation, was intended to convince himself (comp. Charmid. p. 166, c. 169, c., Sophist. p. 220, c.). That knowledge, however, grounded on and sustained by logical inference 431, c.), should verify itself through the medium of true ideas (Tis. p. 81, c. de Rep. iv. p. 54, d.), can only be understood as the correct perfect determiation of the conclusion to which he had come in the Theaetetus.

But before Plato could pass on to his investigations respecting the modes of development and the forms of knowledge, he was obliged to undertake to determine the objects of knowledge, and to grasp that knowledge in its objective phase. To accomplish this was the purpose of the Sophists, which immediately attaches itself to the Theaetetus, and obviously presupposes its conclusions. In the latter dialogue it had already been intimated that knowledge can only take place in reference to real existence (Theaet. p. 206, e. and 201, a.). This was also the doctrine of the Eleatics, who neverthee had deduced the unconditional unity and unchangeableness of the existent, from the inconceivableness of the non-existent. If, however, non-existence is absolutely inconceivable, then also must error, false conception, be so likewise. First of all, therefore, the non-existent was to be discarded, and shown to have, in some sort, an existence, while to this end existence itself had to be defined.

In the primal substance, perpetually undergoing a process of transformation, which was assumed by the Ionian physiologists, the existent, whether understood as duality, trinity, or plurality, cannot find place (p. 242, d.); but as little can it (with the Eleatics) be even so much as conceived in thought as something absolutely single and one, without any multiplicity (p. 244, b. &c.). Such a thing would rather again coincide with Non-existence. For a multiplicity even in appearance only to be admitted, a multiformity of the existent must be acknowledged (p. 245, d.). Manifold existence, however, cannot be a bare multiformity of the tangible and corporeal (p. 246, a. f), nor yet a plurality of intelligible incorporeal Essences (ideas), which have no share either in Action or in Passion, as Eucld and his school probably taught;
since so conceived they would be destitute of any influence on the world of the changeable, and would indeed themselves entirely elude our cognizance
(p. 248, a. f.).

But as in the Theaetetus, the inconceivableness of an eternal generation, without anything stable, had been the result arrived at (comp. Sophist. p. 249, b.), so in the Sophistes the opposite idea is disposed of, namely, that the absolutely unchangeable existence alone really is, and that all change is mere

appearance. Plato was obliged, therefore, to undertake this task,—to find a Being instead of a becoming, and vice versa, and then to show how the manifold existences stand in relation to each other, and to the changeable, i.e. to phenomena. Existents, Plato concludes, is of itself consist neither in Rest nor in Motion, yet still can share in both, and stand in reciprocal community (p. 250, a. &c.). But certain ideas absolutely exclude one another, as Rest, for example, excludes motion, and sameness difference. What ideas, then, are capable of being united with each other, and what are not so, it is the part of science (dialectics) to decide (p. 253, c.). By the discussion of the relation which the ideas of rest and motion, of sameness and difference, hold to each other, it is explained how motion can be the same, and not the same, how it can be thought of as being and yet not being; consequently, how the non-existent denotes only the variations of existence, not the bare negation of it (p. 256, d. &c.). That existence is not at variance with becoming and that the latter is not conceivable apart from the former, Plato shows in the case of the two principal parts of speech, and their reciprocal relation (p. 256, c., &c. 262). From this it becomes evident in what sense dialectics can be characterised at once as the science of understanding, and as the science of the self-existent, as the science of sciences. In the Phaedrus (p. 261; comp. pp. 266, b. 270, d.), it is presented to us in the first instance as the art of discoursing, and thereafter of the true education of the soul and of intellection. In the Sophistes (p. 261, e. &c.) it appears as the science of the true connection of ideas; in the Philebus (p. 16, c) as the highest gift of the gods, as the true Prometheus fire; while in the Books on the Republic (vi. p. 511, b.) pure ideas, freed from all form and presupposition, are shown to be grasped and developed by it.

In the Theaetetus simple ideas, reached only by the spontaneous activity of thought, had presented themselves as the necessary conditions of knowledge; in the Sophistes, the objects of knowledge come before us as a manifold existence, containing in itself the principles of all changes. The existence of things, cognisable only by means of conception, is their true essence, their ideas. Hence the assertion (Parmen. p. 135, b.) that to deny the reality of ideas is to destroy all scientific research. Plato, it is true, departed from the original meaning of the word idea (namely, that of form or figure) in which it had been employed by Anaxagoras, Diogenes of Apollonia, and probably also by Democritus; inasmuch as he understood by it the unities (ειδή, ποιοσείς) which lie at the basis of the visible, the changeable, and which can only be reached by pure thinking ( eğkπάνθης θεών) (*Phaedr. p. 247, de Reg. 31, p. 330, ix. p. 563, b. vi. p. 507, b., Philol. p. 15, Tim. p. 51, b.); but he retained the characteristic of the intuitive and real, in opposition to the mere abstractness of ideas which belong simply to the thinking which interposes itself. He included under the expression idea every thing stable amidst the changes of mere phenomena, all really existing and unchangeable definitudes, by which the changes of things and our knowledge of them are conditioned, such as the ideas of genus and species, the laws and ends of nature, as also the principles of cognition, and of moral action, and the essences of individual, concrete, thinking souls (*Phileb. p. 15, a. de Rep. vii. p. 532, a., Tim. p. 51, Phaedo, p. 106, b. p. 102, c. &c.). To that only which can be conceived as an entirely formless and undetermined mass, or as a part of a whole, or as an arbitrary relation, do no ideas whatever correspond (*Parm. p. 130, c.).

But how are we to understand the existence of ideas in things? Neither the whole conception, nor merely a part of it, can reside in the things; neither is it enough to understand the ideas to be conceptions, which the soul beholds together with the things (that is, as we should call them, subjectively valid conceptions or categories), or as bare thoughts without reality. Even when viewed as the archetypes of the changeable, they need some more distinct definition, and some security against obvious objections. This question and the difficulties which lie against its solution, are developed in the Parmenides, at the beginning of the dialogue, with great acuteness. To introduce the solution to that question, and the refutation of these difficulties, is the evident intention of the succeeding dialectical antinomical* of the ideas of unity, as a thing being and not being, as it is viewed in relation to itself and to what is different. How far Plato succeeded in separating ideas from mere abstract conceptions, and making their reality distinct from the natural causality of motion, we cannot here inquire. Neither can we enter into any discussions respecting the Platonic methods of division, and of the antinomical definitions of ideas, respecting the leading principles of these methods, and his attempt in the Cratylus to represent words as the immediate copy of ideas, that is, of the essential in things, by means of the fundamental parts of speech, and to point out the part which dialectics must take in the development of language. While the foundation which Plato lays for the doctrine of ideas or dialectics must be regarded as something finished and complete in itself, yet the mode in which he carries it out is not by any means beyond the reach of objections; and we can hardly assume that it had attained any remarkably higher development either in the mind of Plato himself, or in his lectures, although he appears to have been continually endeavouring to grasp and to represent the fundamental outlines of his doctrine from different points of view, as is manifest especially from the arguments which are preserved to us in Aristotle's work on Plato's ideas. (Brandis, de perditis Aristotelis Libris de Ideis et de Bono, p. 14, &c.; also Handbuch der Geschichte der Griechisch-Römiscr Philosopfr, vol. ii. p. 227, &c.) That Plato, however, while he distinctly separated the region of pure thinking or of ideas from that of sensuous perception and the world of phenomena, did not overlook the necessity of the connexion between the intelligible and the sensible world, is abundantly manifest from the gradations which he assumes for the development of our cognition. In the region of sense—perception, or conception, again, he distinguishes the comprehension of images, and that of objects (eikasia and παρίσι), while in the region of thinking he separates the knowledge of those relations which belong indeed

PLATO, but which require intuition in the case of sensuous objects, from the immediate grasp by thought of intelligible objects or ideas themselves, that is, of ultimate principles, devoid of all presupposition (σαφῶς, νοῦς). To the first gradation of science, that is, of the higher department of thinking, belong principally, though not exclusively, mathematics; and that Plato regarded them (though he did not fully realise this notion) as a necessary means for elevating experience into scientific knowledge, is evident from hints that occur elsewhere. (Comp. Brandis, Handbuch, &c., vol. ii. pp. 269, &c.—274, &c.) The fourfold division which he brings forward, and which is discussed in the De Republica (vi. p. 509, &c.) he appears to have taken up more definitely in his oral lectures, and in the first department to have distinguished perception from experience (αἴσθημα from δῶς), in the second to have distinguished mediate knowledge from the immediate thinking consciousness of first principles (ἐνεργον from νοῦς; see Arist. De Anima, i. 2, with the note of Trendelenburg).

Although, therefore, the carrying out of Plato's dialectics may be imperfect, and by no means proportional to this excellent foundation, yet he had certainly taken a steady view of their end, namely, to lay hold of ideas more and more distinctly in their organic connection at once with one another and with the phenomenal world, by the discovery of their inward relations; and then having done this, to refer them to their ultimate basis. This ought at the same time to verify itself as the unconditional ground of the reality of objects and of the power we have to take cognisance of them, of Being and of Thought; being comparable to the intellectual sun. Now this absolutely unconditional ground Plato describes as the idea of the good (De Rep. vi. p. 505, &c.), convinced that we cannot imagine any higher definiteness than the good; but that we must, on the contrary, measure all other definites by it, and regard it as the aim and purpose of all our endeavours, nay of all developments. Not being in a condition to grasp the idea of the good with full distinctness, we are able to approximate to it only so far as we elevate the power of thinking to its original purity (Brandis, Ibid. pp. 291, &c. 324, &c.). Although the idea of the good, as the ultimate basis both of the mind and of the realities laid hold of by it, of thought and of existence, is, according to him, more elevated than that of spirit or actual existence itself, yet we can only imagine its activity as the activity of the mind. Through its activity the determinate natures of the ideas, which in themselves only exist, acquire their power of causation, a power which must be set down as spiritual, that is, free. Plato, therefore, describes the idea of the good, or the Godhead, sometimes teleologically, as the ultimate purpose of all conditioned existence; sometimes cosmologically, as the ultimate operative cause; and has begun to develop the cosmological, as also the physico-theological proof for the being of God; but has referred both back to the idea of the Good, as the necessary presupposition to all other ideas, and our cognition of them. Moreover, we find him earnestly endeavouring to purify and free from its restrictions the idea of the Godhead, to establish and defend the belief in a wise and divine government of the world; as also to set aside the doubt that arises from the existence of evil and suffering in the world. (Brandis, Ibid. p. 331, &c.)

But then, how does the sensuous world, the world of phenomena, come into existence? To suppose that in his view it was nothing else than the mere subjective appearance which springs from the commingling of the ideas, or the confused conception of the ideas (Ritter, Geschichte der Philosophie, vol. ii. pp. 295, &c. 339, &c.), not only contradicts the declarations of Plato in the Phaedon (p. 23, b. 54, a.), Timaeus (pp. 27, e. 48, e. 51), &c., but contradicts also the dualistic tendency of the whole of the ancient philosophy. He designates as the, we may perhaps say, material ground of the phenomenal world, that which is in itself unlimited, ever in a process of becoming, never really existing, the mass out of which every thing is formed, and connects with it the idea of extension, as also of unregulated motion; attributes to it only the joint causality of necessity, in opposition to the free causality of ideas, which works towards ends. And yet it is my belief that the soul of the universe, seeks to fill up the chasm between these opposed primary essences. This, standing midway between the intelligible (that to which the attribute of sameness belongs) and the sensible (the diverse), as the principle of order and motion in the world, according to him, comprehends in itself all the relations of number and measure. Plato had made another attempt to fill up the gap in the development of ideas by a symbolical representation, in the lectures he delivered upon the Good, mentioned by Aristotle and others. In these he partly referred ideas to intelligible numbers, in order, probably, that he might be able to denote more definitely their relation of dependence on the Godhead, as the absolute one, as also the relation of their succession and mutual connection; and partly described the Godhead as the ultimate ground of both of ideas and also of the material of phenomena, inasmuch as he referred them both to the divine causality—the former immediately as original numbers, the latter through the medium of the activity of the ideas. But on this Pythagorean mode of exhibiting the highest principles of Plato's doctrine we have but very imperfect information. (Brandis, Ibid. vol. ii. 1, p. 336, &c.)

Both these departments which form the connecting link between Dialectics and Physics, and the principles of Physics themselves, contain only preliminary assumptions and hypothetical declarations, which Plato describes as a kind of recreation from more earnest search after the really existent, as an innocent enjoyment, a rational sport (Tim. pp. 27. e. 29. b. 59. c.). Inasmuch as physics treat only of the changeable and imitative, they must be contented with attaining probability; but they should aim, especially, at investigating teleologically the conditions, that is, free causality, and showing how they converge in the realisation of the idea of the good. All the determinations of the original undetermined matter are realised by corporeal forms; in these forms Plato attempts to find the natural or necessary basis of the different kinds of feeling and of sensuous perception. Throughout the whole development, however, of his Physiology, as also in the outlines of his doctrine on Health and Sickness, pregnant ideas and clear views are to be met with. (See especially

With the physiology of Plato his doctrine of the Soul is closely connected. Endowed with the same nature as the soul of the world, the human soul is that which is spontaneously active and unapproachable by death, although in its connection with the body bound up with the appetitive, the sensuous; and the sōnías, that which is of the nature of affection or eager impulse, the ground of courage and fear, love and hope, designed, while subordinating itself to the reason, to restrain sensuality, must be regarded as the link between the rational and the sensuous. (Tim. p. 69, d. 71, b., de Rep. iv. p. 435, &c. ix. p. 571.) Another link of connection between the intellectual and sensuous nature of the soul is referred to Love, which, separated from concupiscence, is conceived of as an inspiration that transcends mere mediate intellation, whose purpose is to realise a perpetual striving after the immortal, the eternal; — to realise, in a word, by a close connection with others, the Good in the form of the Beautiful. In the Phaedrus Plato speaks of love under the veil of a myth; in the Lysis he commences the logical definition of it; and in the Symposium, one of the most artistic and attractive of his dialogues, he analyses the different moments which are necessary to the complete determination of the idea. In these and some of the other dialogues, however, beauty is described as the image of the ideas, penetrating the veil of phenomena and apprehended by the purest and brightest exercise of sense, in relation to colours, forms, actions, and morals, as also with relation to the harmonious combination of the manifold into perfect Unity, and distinctly separated from the Agreeable and the Useful. Art is celebrated as the power of producing a whole, inspired by an invisible arrangement; of grouping together into one form the images of the ideas, which are everywhere scattered around.

That the soul, when separated from the body,—or the pure spirit,—is immortal, and that a continuance, in which power and consciousness or intelligence are preserved, is secured to it, Socrates, in the Phaedo of Plato, represented as approaching death, endeavours to convince his friends, partly by means of analogies drawn from the nature of things, partly by the refutation of the opposed hypothesis, that the soul is a harmonious union and tuning of the constituents of the body, partly by the attempt to prove the similitude of the essential nature of the soul, its consequent indestructibility, and its relation to the Eternal, or its pre-existence; partly by the argumentation that the idea of the soul is inseparable from that of life, and that it can never be destroyed by moral evil,—the only evil to which, properly speaking, it is subjected (comp. de Rep. x. p. 609, b. &c., Phaedr. p. 245, c.). Respecting the condition of the soul after death Plato expresses himself only in myths, and his utterances respecting the Transmigration of Souls also are expressed in a mythical form.

As a true disciple of Socrates, Plato devoted all the energy of his soul to ethics, which again are closely connected with politics. He paves the way for a scientific treatment of ethics by the refutation of the sophistical sensualistic and hedonistic (selfish) theories, first of all in the Protagoras and the three smaller dialogues attached to it (see above), then in the Gorgias, by pointing out the contradictions in which the assertions, on the one hand that wrong actions are uglier than right ones but more useful, on the other that the only right recognised by nature is that of the stronger, are involved. In this discussion the result is deduced, that neither happiness nor virtue can consist in the attempt to satisfy our unbridled and ever-increasing desires (de Rep. l.) In the Menon the Good is defined as that kind of utility which can never become injurious, and whose realisation is referred to a knowledge which is absolutely fixed and certain,—a knowledge, however, which must be viewed as something not externally communicable, but only to be developed from the spontaneous activity of the soul. Lastly, in the Philebus, the investigation respecting pleasure and pain, which was commenced in the Gorgias, as also that on the idea of the Good, is completed; and this twofold investigation grounded upon the principles of dialectics, and brought into relation with physics. Pain is referred to the disturbance of the inward harmony, pleasure to the maintenance, or restoration of it; and it is shown how, on the one hand, true and false, on the other, pure and mixed pleasure, are to be distinguished, while, inasmuch as it (pleasure) is always dependent on the activity out of which it springs, it becomes so much the truer and purer as the activity itself becomes more elevated. In this way the first sketch of a table of Goods is attained, in which the eternal nature of Measuré, that is, the sum and substance of the ideas, as the highest canon, and then the different steps of the actual realisation of them in life, in a regular descending scale, are given, while it is acknowledged that the accompanying pure (unsensual) pleasure is also to be regarded as a good, but inferior to that on which it depends, the reason and the understanding, science and art. Now, if we consider that, according to Plato, all morality must be directed to the realisation of the ideas in the phenomenal world; and, moreover, that these ideas in their reality and their activity, as also the knowledge respecting them, is to be referred to the Godhead, we can understand how he could designate the highest good and being his simulation to God (Theocr. p. 176, a., de Rep. x. 613; comp. Wyttenbach, ad Plut. de Ser. Num. Vind. p. 27.

In the Ethics of Plato the doctrine respecting virtue is attached to that of the highest good, and its development. This virtue is essentially one, and the science of the good, had been already deduced in the critical and dialectical introductory dialogues; but it had been also presupposed and even hinted that, without detriment to its unity, different phases of it could be distinguished, and that to knowledge there must be added practice, and an earnest combating of the sensuous functions. In order to discover these different phases, Plato goes back upon his triple division of the faculties of the soul. Virtue, in other words, is fineness of the soul for the operations that are peculiar to it (de Rep. i. p. 533, d. x. p. 601, d.), and it manifests itself by means of its (the soul's) inward harmony, beauty, and health (Gorg. pp. 504, b. 506, b., Phaedo, p. 93, e., de Rep. iv. pp. 444, d. viii. 554, e.). Different phases of virtue are distinguishable so far as the soul is not pure spirit; but just as the spirit should rule both the other elements of the soul, so also should wisdom, as the inner development of the spirit, rule the... other virtues. Ability of the emotive element (Συμποιητικός), when penetrated with wisdom to govern the whole sensuous nature, is Courage. If the sensuous or appetitive (ετεραπητικός) element is brought into unity with the ends of wisdom, moderation or prudence (σωφροσύνη), as an inward harmony, is the result. If the inward harmony of the activities shows itself active in giving an harmonious form to our outward relations in the world, Virtue exerces itself in the form of Justice (de Rep. iv. p. 426, b. &c.). That happiness coincides with the inward harmony of virtue, is inferred from this deduction of the virtues, as also from the discussions respecting pleasure (de Rep. viii. p. 547, &c. ix. p. 580, &c.).

If it be true that the ethico-rational nature of the individual can only develop itself completely in a well-ordered state (de Rep. vi. 496, b.), then the object and constitution of the state must perfectly answer to the moral nature of the individual, and politics must be an essential, inseparable part of ethics. While, therefore, Plato considers the state as the copy of a well-regulated individual life (de Rep. ii. p. 368, e. viii. p. 544, e. &c.), he demands of it that it should exhibit a perfect harmony, in which everything is common to all, and the individual in all his relations only an organ of the state. The entire merging of the individual life in the life of the state might have appeared to him as the only effectual means of stimulating that selfishness and licence of the citizens, which in his time was becoming more and more predominant. Plato deduces the three main elements of the state from the three different activities of the soul; and just as the appetitive element should be absolutely under control, so also the working class, which answers to it; and the military order, which answers to the emotive element, should develop itself in thorough dependence upon the reason, by means of gymnastics and music; and from that the governing order, answering to the rational faculty, must proceed. The right of passing from the rank of a guard (φάλακς, τὸ ἐκπαιδευτικός) to that of a ruler, must be established by the capacity for raising oneself from becoming to being, from notion to knowledge; for the ruler ought to be in a condition to extend and confirm the government of the reason in the state more and more, and especially to direct and watch over training and education. Without admitting altogether the impracticability of his state, yet Plato confesses that no realisation of it in the phenomenal world can fully express his idea, but that an approximation to it must be aimed at by a limitation of unconditional unity and community, adapted to circumstances. On this account, with the view of approximating to the given circumstances, he renounces, in his book on the Laws, that absolute separation of ranks; limits the power of the governors, attempts to reconcile freedom with reason and unity, to mingle monarchy with democracy; distinguishes several classes of rulers, and will only commit to their organically constructed body the highest power under the guarantee of the laws.

[Ch. A.B.]

There are numerous editions both of the entire text of Plato, and of separate dialogues. The first was that published by Aldus at Venice, in A.D. 1513. In this edition the dialogues are arranged in nine tetralogies, according to the division of Thrasyllus (see above). The next edition was that published at Basle, in 1534. It was edited chiefly by Johannes Oporinus, who was afterwards professor of Greek in that university. It does not appear that he made use of any manuscripts, but he succeeded in correcting many of the mistakes to be found in the edition of Aldus, though some of his alterations were corruptions of sound passages. The edition was, however, enriched by having incorporated with it the commentaries of Proclus on the Timaeus and the State, which had shortly before been discovered by Simon Grynaeus in the library of the university at Oxford, and a triple Greek index,—one of words and phrases, another of proper names, and a third of proverbs to be found in Plato. The next edition, published at Basle in 1556, was superintended by Marcus Hopperus, who availed himself of a collation of some manuscripts of Plato made in Italy by Arnoldus Arle- nius, and so corrected several of the errors of the previous Basle edition, and gave a large number of various readings; the edition of H. Stephanus (1578, in three volumes) is equally remarkable for its careful preparation, by collecting the mistakes of copyists and typographers, and introducing in several instances very felicitous improvements, and for the dishonesty with which the editor appropriated to himself the labours of others without any acknowledgment, and with various tricks strove to conceal the source from which they were derived. His various readings are taken chiefly, if not entirely, from the second Basle edition, from the Latin version of Ficinus, and from the notes of Cornarius. It is questionable whether he himself collated a single manuscript. The Latin version of Seraurus, which is printed in this edition, is very bad. The occasional translations of Stephanus himself are far better. The Bipont edition (11 vols. 8vo. A.D. 1781—1786) contains a reprint of the text of that of Stephanus, with the Latin version of Marsilius Ficinus. Some fresh various readings, collected by Mitscherlich, are added. It was, however, by Immanuel Bekker that the text of Plato was first brought into a satisfactory condition in his edition, published in 1816—18, accompanied by the Latin version of Ficinus (here restored, generally speaking, to its original form, the reprints of it in other previous editions of Plato containing numerous alterations and corruptions), a critical commentary, an extensive comparison of various readings, and the Greek scholia, previously edited by Ruhnken, with some additions, together with copious indexes. The dialogues are arranged according to the scheme of Schleiermacher. The Latin version in this edition has sometimes been erroneously described as that of Wolf. A joint edition by Bekker and Wolf was projected and commenced, but not completed. The reprint of Bekker’s edition, accompanied by the notes of Stephanus, Heindorf, Wytenbach, &c., published by Priestley (Lond. 1826), is a useful edition. A 3rd edition (Lips. 1821—1827, 9 vols. 8vo., to which two volumes of notes on the four dialogues, Protagoras, Phaedrus, Georgias, and Phaedo, have since been added) contains many ingenious and excellent emendations of the text, which the editor’s profound acquaintance with the phraseology of Plato enabled him to effect. G. Stallbaum, who edited a critical edition of the text of Plato (Lips. 1821—1825, 8 vols. 8vo., and 1826, 8 vols. 12mo.), commenced in 1827 an elaborate edition of Plato, which is not yet quite completed. This is perhaps the best and most useful edition which has appeared. The edition of J. G. Baiter, J. C. Orelli, and A. G. Winckelmann (one vol. 4to. Zürich, 1839) deserves especial mention for the accuracy of the text and the beauty of the typography.

Of separate dialogues, or collections of dialogues, the editions are almost endless. Those of the Cratylus and Theaetetus, of the Euthyphro, Apology, Crito, and Phaedo, of the Sophista, Politicus and Parmenides, and of the Philebus and Symposium by Fischer; of the Lysis, Charmides, Hippias Major, and Phaedrus, of the Gorgias and Theaetetus, of the Cratylus, Euthydemus and Parmenides, of the Phaedo, and of the Protagoras and Sophisties by Heindorf (whose notes exhibit both acuteness and sound judgment); of the Phaedo by Wyttenbach; of the Philebus, and of the Parmenides by Stallbaum (in the edition of the latter of which the commentary of Proclus is incorporated), are most worthy of note. Of the translations of Plato the most celebrated is the Latin version of Marsilius Ficinus (Flor. 1483—1484, and frequently reprinted). It was in this version, which was made from manuscripts, that the writings of Plato first appeared in a printed form. The translation is so extremely close that it has almost the authority of a Greek manuscript, and is of great service in ascertaining varieties of reading. This remark, however, does not apply to the later, altered editions of it, which were published subsequently to the appearance of the Greek text of Plato. There is no good English translation of the whole of Plato, that by Taylor being by no means accurate. The efforts of Floyer Sydenham were much more successful, but he translated only a few of the pieces. There is a French translation by V. Cousin. Schleiermacher's German translation is incomparably the best, but is unfortunately incomplete. There is an Italian translation by Dardi Benbow. The versions of separate dialogues in different languages are too numerous to be noticed.

We have space to notice only the following out of the very numerous works written in illustration of Plato: — Platonis Dialogorum Argumenta Exposita et Illustrata, by Tiedemann (Bip. 1786); System der Platonischen Philosophie, by Tennesse (4 vols. 8vo. Leipz. 1792—5); Initia Philosophiae Platonicae, by P. G. Van Heusde (ed. ii. Lugd. Bat. 1842); Platonis Leben und Schriften, by G. A. F. Ast (Leipz. 1816); Geschichte und System der Platonischen Philosophie, by K. F. Hermann (Heid. 1838); Platonis de Ideis et Numeris Doctrina ex Aristotele illustrata, by F. A. Trendelenburg (Lips. 1826); Platonische Studien, by E. Zeller (Tübing. 1839). There are also numerous smaller treatises by Böckh, C. F. Hermann, Stallbaum, &c., which may be consulted with profit. Schleiermacher's introductions to some of the dialogues have been translated and published in a separate form in English.

PLATONIUS (ΠΑΤΟΝΙΟς), a grammarian, of whom all that we know is that a treatise bearing his name is generally prefixed to the editions of Aristophanes. It is entitled Περὶ διάφορον κωμωδίων. The subject is the difference between volumes containing the various readings, and portions of the commentary of Proclus on the Cratylus, edited by Boissoane.

the characteristics of the old, the middle, and the new comedy, especially the two first, and the causes of the various points of difference. The remarks are brief, but judicious. [W. M. G.]

PLATOR. 1. The commander of Ourem for Philip, betrayed the town to the Romans, n.c. 207 (Liv. xxviii. 6). He is probably the same Plator whom Philip sent with some Illyrians, about the commencement of the Second Punie war, to the assistance of the Cretans. (Polyb. iv. 55.)

2. The brother of Gentius, the Illyrian king, who is called Plator by Livy (xliv. 30), but Pleuratus by Polybius. [PLAURATUS.]

3. Of Dyrhacium, was slain by Piso, proconsul in Macedonia, n.c. 57, although he had been hospitably received in the house of Plator. (Cic. in Pison. 34, comp. de Harus. Resp. 16.)

PLATORI/NUS, a cognomen of the Sulpicia gens, which occurs only upon coins, one of which is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Augustus with the legend CAESAR AVGSTVS, the reverse the head of M. Agrippa, with the legend PLATORINVS IVIR. M. AGRIFFA (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 317.)

COIN OF PLATORIUS.

PLAUTIA GENS, plebeian. The name is also written Plotius, just as we have both Claudius and Claudius. The first person of this gens who obtained the consulship was C. Plautius Proculus in n.c. 358; and from that time down to the imperial period many of the Plautii held at different intervals the highest offices in the state. Under the republic we find the cognomens of Decius, Hydrops, Proculus, Silvanus, Venno, Venox: and to these there were still further additions in the time of the empire, a list of which is given below. A few of the Plautii occur without any surname; and of them an account is also given below. Those persons whose names are usually written Plotius are spoken of under this form. The only cognomens occurring on coins are Hyppaeus and Plancus; and the latter surname does not properly belong to the Plotii, but was retained by Munatius Plancus after he had been adopted by L. Plautius. [PLANCUS, No. 5.]

PLAUTIA URGULANILIA, the first wife of the emperor Claudius, who divorced her on account of her lewd conduct, and of her being suspected of murder. She bore two children during her marriage, Drusus, who died at Pompeii in a. d. 20 [Drusus, No. 23], and Claudia, whom she had by a freedman of Claudius, and who was therefore exposed by command of the emperor. (Suet. Claud. 26, 27.)

PLAUTIUS NUS, L. (or C.) FULVIUS, an African by birth, the fellow-townsmen and probably a connection of Septimius Severus. He served as praefect of the praetorium under this emperor, who loaded him with honours and wealth, deferred to his opinion upon important...

points of state policy, granted all his requests, and virtually made over much of the imperial authority into his hands. Intoxicated by these distinctions Plautianus indulged in the most despotic tyranny; and perpetrated acts of cruelty almost beyond belief. His captivity was boundless: no state, no province, no city escaped his exactions; in Rome he plundered all whose wealth excited his avarice, contrived the banishment or death of every one who impeded or thwarted his schemes, and ventured to treat with contumely even the empress Domna and her sons. He reached the pinnacle of his ambition when Severus in the year A. D. 202 selected his daughter Plautilla as the wife of Caracalla, and on that occasion he presented the bride with an outfit which a contemporary historian declares would have sufficed for fifty queens. But even gratified ambition brought him no happiness. His external appearance gave evidence of a mind ill at ease: when seen in public he was ever deadly pale, and shook with nervous agitation, partly, says Dion Cassius who was himself an eye-witness of these things, from the recurrent lassitudes of his life and diet, and partly from the hopes by which he was excided, and the terrors by which he was tormented. But the high fortunes of this second Sejanus were short-lived. Having soon discovered the dislike cherished by Caracalla towards both his daughter and himself, and looking forward with apprehension to the downfall which awaited him upon the death of the sovereign, he resolved to anticipate these threatened disasters by effecting the destruction of his benefactor and of his son-in-law. His treachery was discovered, he was suddenly summoned to the palace, and there put to death in A. D. 203. His property was confiscated, his daughter banished, and his name erased from the public monuments on which it had been inscribed side by side with those of the emperor and the royal family. We ought to remark that the treason of Plautianus results from the testimony of Herodian for Dion Cassius rather leans to the belief that this charge was fabricated by Caracalla for the ruin of an obnoxious favourite. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 14—16, lxxvi. 2—9, lxxvii. 1; Herodian, iii. 13. § 7, iv. 6. § 7; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 225.) [W. R.]

PLAUTIUS, QUINTILLUS, a senator of high rank, blameless life and retired habits, who when far advanced in years was rashly put to death by Septimius Severus upon some vague suspicion. His last words have been preserved by Dion Cassius (lxxvi. 7). [W. R.]

PLAUTIUS, LA, FULVIA, daughter of Plautius [PLAUTIUS] praefect of the praetorium under Septimius Severus, by whom she was selected as the bride of his eldest son. This union, which took place in A. D. 202, proved most unhappy, for Caracalla was from the first averse to the match, and even after the marriage was concluded virtually refused to acknowledge her as his wife. Upon the disgrace and death of her father she was banished, first, it would appear, to Sicily, and subsequently to Lipara, where she was treated with the greatest harshness, and supplied with scarcely the necessaries of life. After the murder of Geta in A. D. 212, Plautilla was put to death by order of her husband. According to the narrative of Dion Cassius, who represents her a woman of most profligate life, a very short period, not more, probably, than a few months, intervened between her marriage and exile, a statement which it is extremely difficult to reconcile with the fact that a vast number of coins were struck in honour of this princess, not only in the city but in the more distant provinces. She had a brother, Plautus, who shared her banishment and her fate. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 6, lxxvii. 1; Herodian, iii. 13. § 7, iv. 6. § 7; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 225.) [W. R.]

COIN OF PLAUTILLA.

PLAUTIUS. 1. A comic poet, some of whose comedies were erroneously ascribed to Plautus, as we learn from Varro (Gell. iv. 13.)

2. Plautius was sent by the emperor Claudius in A. D. 43 to subdue Britain. As he is called both by Tacitus and Suetonius a man of consular rank, he is perhaps the same as the A. Plautius, who was one of the consules suffecti in A. D. 29. Plautius remained in Britain four years, and subdued, after a severe struggle, the southern part of the island. Vespasian, who was afterwards emperor, served under him and distinguished himself greatly in the war. In the first campaign Claudius himself passed over to Britain, and on his return to Rome celebrated a triumph for the victories which he pretended to have gained. Plautius came back to the city in A. D. 47, and was allowed by Claudius the unusual honour of an ovation; and to show the favour in which he was held by the emperor, the latter walked by his side both on his way to and his return from the Capitol. When subsequently his wife Pomponia Graecina was accused of religious worship unauthorised by the state, her husband was granted the privilege of deciding upon the case himself, according to the custom of the old Roman law. 5. Son of Fulvius Plautianus [PLAUTIANUS], upon the downfall of his father was banished along with his sister Plautilla [PLAUTILLA] to Lipara, where he was subsequently put to death by Caracalla. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 7, lxxvii. 1; Herodian iii. 13. § 7, iv. 6. § 7.)

PLAUTIUS, a Roman jurist, who is not mentioned by Pomponius, though he lived before Pomponius. That he was a jurist of some note may be inferred from the fact that Paulus wrote eighteen Libri ad Plautium [PAULUS, JULIUS]. Juvencus also wrote five books ad Plautium or ex Plautio, and Pomponius seven books. Plautius cited Cassius (Dig. 34, tit. 2. s. 8) and Proculius (Dig. 35. tit. 1. s. 43), and was cited by Neratius Priscus, who wrote Libri ex Plautio [NERATIUS PRISCUS]. Plautius therefore lived about the time of Vespasian. (Grotius, Titiae jurisconsultae: Zimmern, Geschichte des Rom. Privatrechts, p. 322; Vatican.

PLAUTUS LATERNANS. [LATERANUS]

PLAUTUS, NOVIUS, a Roman artist, in the department of ornamental metal-work (cealaturo). He was the maker of one of the most admired of those cylindrical bronze caskets (cistae mystice), which are found in tombs in Italy, containing paterae, mirrors, and utensils of the bath, such as striigs. The greatest number of such caskets have been found at Proneeste, where some of them seem to have been laid up in the temple of Fortune, as votive offerings from women. The one which bears the name of Plautus is beautifully engraved with subjects from the Argonautic expedition; a hunt is engraved round the lid, which is surmounted by three figures in bronze; and on the lid is the following inscription: on the one side, DINDIA MA-colina, ПИЕЛА, ДЕДИТ,—on the other, NOVIOS.

PLAUTUS, MED., (in) ROMAL FEIT. From the style of the workmanship and of the inscription, the date of the artist is supposed to be about A. u.

PLAUTUS RUFUS. [RUFUS]

PLAUTUS, the most celebrated comic poet of Rome, was a native of Sarsina, a small village in Umbria. Almost the only particulars, which we possess respecting his life, are contained in a passage of A. Gallius (iii. 3), which is quoted from Varro. According to this account it would appear that Plautus was of humble origin (compare Plau-tium prosopain homon, Minne, Felix, Oct. 14), and that he came to Rome at an early age. Varro related that the poet was first employed as a workman or a menial for the actors on the stage (in operis artificium scenicorum), and that with the money which he earned in this way, he embarked in some business, but that having lost all his money in trade, he returned to Rome, and, in order to gain a living, was obliged to work at a hand-mill, grinding corn for a baker. Varro further adds that while employed in this work (in pistorio), he wrote three comedies, the Saturnio, Addietus, and a third, of which the name is not mentioned. Hieronymus, in the Chronicon of Eusebius, gives almost the same account, which he probably also derived from Varro. It would seem that it was only for the sake of varying the alternative that he wrote "that as often as Plautus had leisure, he was accustoned to write plays and sell them."

This is all that we know for certain respecting the life of Plautus; but even this little has not been correctly stated by most authors of his life. Thus Lessing, in his life of the poet, relates that Plautus early commenced writing plays for the aediles, and acquired thereby a sufficient sum of money to enable him to embark in business. It is the more necessary to call attention to this error, since, from the great authority of Lessing, it has been repeated in most subsequent biographies of the poet. The words of Gallius, in operis artificium scenicorum, have no reference to the composition of plays. The artifices scenici are the actors, who employed servants to attend to various things which they needed for the stage, and a servant of such a kind was called an operarius, as we see from funeral inscriptions. Moreover, if Plautus had previously written plays for the stage, which must have already gained him some reputation, it is not likely that he should have been compelled on his return to Rome to engage in the menial office of a grader at a mill for the sake of obtaining a livelihood. On the contrary, it is much more probable that the comedies which he composed in the mill, were the first that he ever wrote, and that the reputation and money which he acquired by them enabled him to abandon his menial mode of life.

The age of Plautus has been a subject of no small controversy. Cicero says (Brut. 15) that he died in the consulship of P. Claudius and L. Por-cius, when Cato was censor, that is, in b. c. 184; and there is no reason to doubt this express statement. It is true that Hieronymus, in the Chronicon of Eusebius, places his death in the 145th Olympiad, fourteen years earlier (n. c. 200); but the dates of Hieronymus are frequently erroneous, and this one in particular deserves all the less credit, since we know that the Pseudolus was not repre-tented till n. c. 191, and the Bacchides somewhat later, according to the probable supposition of Ritschel. But though the date of Plautus's death seems certain, the time of his birth is a more doubtful point. Ritschel, who has examined the subject with great diligence and acumen in his essay De Actato Plauti, supposes that he was born about the beginning of the sixth century of the city (about b. c. 254), and that he commenced his career as a comic poet about b. c. 224, when he was thirty years of age. This supposition is confirming by the fact that Cicero speaks (Cato, 14) of the Pseudolus, which was acted in b. c. 191, as written by Plautus when he was an old man, an epi-theater which Cicero would certainly have given to no one under thirty years of age; and also by the circumstance that in another passage of Cicero (quoted by Augustine, De Civ. Dei, ii. 9), Plautus and Naevius are spoken of as the contemporaries of P. and Cn. Scipio, of whom the former was consul in b. c. 222, and the latter in b. c. 218. The principal objection to the above-mentioned date for the birth of Plautus, arises from a passage of Cicero, in his Tuscan Disputations (i. 1), according to which it would appear that Plautus and Naevius were younger than Ennius, who was born in b. c. 239. But we know that this cannot be true of Naevius; and Ritschel has shown that the passage, when rightly interpreted, refers to Livius, and not to Ennius, being older than Naevius and Plautus. Indeed, Cicero, in an epitaph of his works (Plaut. 18, § 23), pronounces Plautus somewhat (aliquanto) older than Ennius, and states that Naevius and Plautus had exhibited many plays before the consulship of C. Cornelius and Q. Minucius, that is, before b. c. 197. Moreover, from the way in which Naevius and Plautus are mentioned together, we may conclude that the latter was older than Ennius. Terence, therefore, in his Prologue to the Andria (v. 18), has preserved the chronological order, when he speaks of "Naevium, Plautum, Ennium." We may safely assign the second Punic war and a few years subsequently, as the flourishing period of the literary life of Plautus.

It is a curious fact that the full name of the

* Read " cui si aequalis fuerit," and not " cui quum aequalis fuerit."
Plautus. The poet has been erroneously given in all editions of Plautus from the revival of learning down to the present day. Ritschel first pointed out, in an essay published in 1842, that the real name of the poet was T. Maccius Plautus, and not M. Accius Plautus, as we find in all printed editions. It would take too much space to copy the proofs of this fact, which are perfectly satisfactory. We need only state here that in not a single manuscript is the poet called M. Accius Plautus, but almost always Plautus simply, Plautus Comicus, or Plautus Comicus Poeta. Ritschel was first led to the discovery of the real name of the poet by finding, in the Palimpsest manuscript in the Ambrosian library at Milan, the plays entitled T. Macci PLAUTI, and not M. Acci PLAUTI. He has shown that the two names of M. Accius have been manufactured out of the one of Maccius, just as the converse has happened to the author of the Noctes Atticae, whose two names of A. Gallius have been frequently contracted into Agellius. Ritschel has restored the true name of the poet in the prologues to two of his plays, where the present reading bears evident marks of corruption. Thus in the prologue to the Mercator (v. 10), we ought to read "Eadem Latine Mercator Macci Titi," instead of "Eadem Latine Mercator Marci Accii," and in the prologue to the Asinaria (v. 11), "Demophilus scripsit, Maccia' vortit barbaru" is the true reading, and not "Demophilus scripsit, Marcus vortit barbaru."

T. Maccius was the original name of the poet. The surname of Plautus was given him from the flatness of his feet, according to the testimony of Festus (p. 236, ed. Müller), who further states that people with flat feet were called Ploti by the Umbrians. But besides Plautus we find another surname given to the poet in many manuscripts and several editions, namely, that of Asinius. In all these instances, however, he is always called Plautus Asinivs, never Asinivs Plautus, so that it would appear that Asinius was not regarded as his gentile name, but as a cognomen. Hence some modern writers have supposed that he had two cognomina, and that the surname of Asinivs was given to him in contempt, from the fact of his working at a mill, which was usually the work of an ass (Asinivs), and that this surname was changed by the copyists into Asinivs. But this explanation of the origin of the surname is in itself exceedingly improbable; and if Asinivs were a regular cognomen of the poet, it is inconceivable that we should find no mention of it in any of the ancient writers. Ritschel, however, has pointed out the true origin of the name, and has proved quite satisfactorily, however improbable the statement at first sight, that Asinivs is a corruption of Sarivinis, the ethnic name of the poet. He has, by a careful examination of manuscripts, traced the steps by which Sarivinis first became Arivinis, which was then written Arisivs, subsequently Arisiv, and finally Asivs.

Having thus discussed the chief points connected with the life of our poet, we may sum up the results in a few words. T. Maccius Plautus was born at the Umbrian village of Sarisina, about B.c. 254. He probably came to Rome at an early age, since he displays such a perfect mastery of the Latin language, and an acquaintance with Greek literature, which he could hardly have acquired in a provincial town. Whether he ever obtained the Roman franchise is doubtful. When he arrived at Rome he was in needy circumstances, and was first employed in the service of the actors. With the money he had saved in this inferior station he left Rome and set up in business: but his speculations failed; he returned to Rome, and his necessities obliged him to enter the service of a baker, who employed him in turning a hand-mill. While in this degrading occupation he wrote three plays, the sale of which to the managers of the public games enabled him to quit his drudgery, and begin his literary career. He was then probably about 30 years of age (n. c. 224), and accordingly commenced writing comedies a few years before the breaking out of the Second Punic War. He continued his literary occupation for about forty years, and died n. c. 184, when he was seventy years of age. His contemporaries at first were Livius Andronicus and Naevius, afterwards Ennius and Caecilius: Terence did not rise into notice till almost twenty years after his death. During the long time that he held possession of the stage, he was always a great favourite of the people; and he expressed a bold consciousness of his own powers in the epitaph which he wrote for his tomb, and which has been preserved by A. Gallius (I. 24):

"Postquam est mortem aptus Plautus, comedia luget Scena deserta, dein risus, ludus jocosus
Et numeri innumeris omnes collocarumant.

We now come to the works of Plautus. In the time of Varro there were 150 plays, which bore the name of Plautus, but of these a large portion was considered by the best Roman critics not to be the genuine productions of the poet. Some of them were written by a poet of the name of Plautus, the resemblance of whose name to that of the great comic poet caused them to be attributed to the latter. Others were said to have been written by more ancient poets, but to have been retouched and improved by Plautus, and hence from their presenting some traces of the genuine style of Plautus, to have been assigned to him. The grammarians L. Aelius considered twenty-five only to have been the genuine productions of the poet; and Varro, who wrote a work upon the subject, entitled Quaestiones Plautinae, limited the undoubted comedies of the poet to twenty-one, which were hence called the Fabulae Varrioviae. At the same time it appears clearly from A. Gallius (lii. 3), to whom we are indebted for these particulars, that Varro looked upon other comedies as in all probability the works of Plautus, though they did not possess the semblance of Plautus."
evidence of having been composed by him. 3. Those which were not assigned to Plautus by the authorities, or were even attributed to other writers, but which appeared to Varro to have such internal evidence in their favour (adductus filo augea fucatis servatis Plauto congruentiis), that he did not hesitate to regard them as the genuine works of the poet. To this third class, which naturally contained but few, the Boocota belonged. There is a statement of Servius in the introduction to his commentary on the Aeneid, that according to some, Plautus wrote twenty-one, according to others forty, and, according to others again, a hundred comedies. Ritschl supposes, with great ingenuity, that the forty comedies, to which Servius alludes, were those which Varro regarded as genuine, the twenty-one, which were called pre-eminently Varronianae, belonging to the first class, spoken of above, and the other nineteen being comprised in the second and third classes.

In order to understand clearly the difficulties which the Roman critics experienced in determining which were the genuine plays of Plautus, we should bear in mind the circumstances under which they were composed. Like the dramas of Shakspere and Lope de Vega they were written for the stage, and not for the reading public. Such a public, in fact, did not exist at the time of Plautus. His plays were produced for representation at the great public games, and, content with the applause of his contemporaries and the pay which he received, he did not care for the subsequent fate of his works. A few patrons of literature, such as the Scipios, may have preserved copies of the works; but the chief inducement to their preservation was the interest of the managers of the different troops of actors, the domini gregis, who had originally engaged the poet to write the comedies, and had paid him for them, and to whom the manuscripts accordingly belonged. It was the interest of these persons to preserve the manuscripts, since they were not always obliged to bring forth new pieces, but were frequently paid by the magistrates for the representation of plays that had been previously acted. That the plays of Plautus were performed after his death is stated in several authorities, and may be seen even from some of the prologues (e.g. the Prologue to the Casina). But when, towards the middle of the sixth century of the city, one dramatic poet arose after another, and the taste for stricter imitations from the Greek began to prevail, the comedies of Plautus gradually fell into neglect, and consequently the contractors for the public games ceased to care about their preservation. Towards the latter end of the century, however, no new comic poets appeared; and since new comedies ceased to be brought before the public, attention was naturally recalled to the older dramas. In this manner Plautus began to be popular again, and his comedies were again frequently brought upon the stage. Owing, however, to the neglect which his works had sustained, it would appear that doubts had arisen respecting the genuineness of many of his plays, and that several were produced under his name, of which the authorship was at least uncertain. Thus the grammarians, who began to draw up lists of his plays in the seventh century of the city, had no small difficulties to encounter; and the question respecting the genuineness of certain plays was a fertile subject of controversy. Besides the treatise of Varro already mentioned, which was the standard work on the subject, A. Gellius (i.e.) also refers to lists of his comedies drawn up by Aelius, Sedigittus, Claudius, Aurelius, Accius, and Manlius.

After the publication of Varro's work, the twenty-one comedies, which he regarded as unquestionably genuine, were the ones most frequently used, and of which copies were chiefly preserved. These Varronian comedies are the same as those which have come down to our own time, with the loss of one. At present we possess only twenty comedies of Plautus; but there were originally twenty-one in the manuscripts, and the Vidularia, which was the twenty-first, and which came last in the collection, was torn off from the manuscript in the middle ages. The last-mentioned play was extant in the time of Priscian, who was only acquainted with the twenty-one Varronian plays. The ancient Codex of Conimerius has at the conclusion of the Truculentus the words inscriptio vidularii, and the Veditaria. This manuscript also contains several lines from the Vidularia.

The titles of the twenty-one Varronian plays, of which we have already remarked, twenty are still extant, are: 1. Amphitruo. 2. Asinaria. 3. Aulularia. 4. Captivi. 5. Curculio. 6. Casina. 7. Cicistellaria. 8. Epidicus. 9. Bacchides. 10. Mostellaria. 11. Menacehmi. 12. Miles. 13. Mercator. 14. Pseudolus. 15. Poenulus. 16. Persa. 17. Rudens. 18. Stichus. 19. Timunmus. 20. Truculentus. 21. Vidularia. This is the order in which they occur in the manuscripts, though probably not the one in which they were originally arranged by Varro. The present order is evidently alphabetical; the initial letter of the title of each play is alone regarded, and no attention is paid to those which follow: hence we find Captivi, Curculio, Casina, Cicistellaria: Mostellaria, Menacehmi, Miles, Mercator: Pseudolus, Poenulus, Persa. The play of the Bacchides forms the only exception to the alphabetical order. It was probably placed after the Epidicus by some copyist, because he had observed that Plautus, in the Bacchides (ii. 2. 36), referred to the Epidicus as an earlier work. The alphabetical arrangement is attributed by many to Priscian, to whom is also assigned the short acrostic argument prefixed to each play; but there is no certainty on this point, and the Latinity of the acrostic arguments is too pure to have been composed so late as the time of Priscian. The names of the comedies are either taken from some leading character in the play, or from some circumstance which occurs in it: those titles ending in aria are adjectives, giving a general description of the play: thus Asinaria is the "Ass-Comedy." Besides these twenty-one plays we have already remarked, that Varro, according to Ritschl's conjecture, regarded nineteen others as the genuine productions of Plautus, though not supported by an equal amount of testimony as the twenty-one. Ritschl has collected from various authorities the titles of these nineteen plays. They are as follows: 22. Saturio. 23. Addictus. 24. Boeotia. 25. Nervolaria. 26. Pertium. 27. Trigemini. 28. Astraba. 29. Parasitus niger. 30. Parasitus medicus. 31. Commoriantes. 32. Condalium. 33. Gemini leones. 34. Foenertrix. 35. Frivolaria. 36. Stelletergus. 37. Fugitiva. 38. Cacicito. 39. Hortulus. 40. Arieto. Of the still larger number of comedies commonly ascribed to Plautus, but not recognised by Varro, the titles of only a few have been preserved. They are:—
1. Colax. 2. Carbonaria. 3. Acharistio. 4. Bis compressa. 5. Anns. 6. Agroecus. 7. Dyscolus. 8. Phagom. (9). 9. Cornelia or Cornicularia. 10. Calceolus. 11. Baccaria. 12. Lipargus. (13). Caeceus or Praedones. Thus we have the titles of 21 Varroian comedies of the first class, 19 of the second and third classes, and 13 comedies not acknowledged by Varro, in all 53. Accordingly, if there were 130 comedies bearing the name of Plautus, we have lost all notice of 77. There is a play entitled Querolus or Aulularia, which bears the name of Plautus in the manuscripts, and is quoted under his name by Servius (ad Virg. Aen. ill. 226). It is evidently, however, not the production of our poet, and was probably written in the third or fourth century of the Christian era. The best edition of it is by Klinkhammer, entitled, "Querolus sive Aulularia, incerti auctoris comicodia togata," Amsterdam, 1629.

The comedies of Plautus enjoyed unrivalled popularity among the Romans. Of this we have a proof in their repeated representations after the poet's death, to which we have already alluded. In a house at Pompeii a ticket was found for admission to the representation of the Casina of Plautus (see Orelli, Inscript. No. 2539), which must consequently have been performed at that time, shortly before its destruction in a.d. 79; and we learn from Arnobius that the Amphitruo was acted in the reign of Diocletian. The continued popularity of Plautus, through so many centuries, was owing, in a great measure, to his being a national poet. For though his comedies belong to the Comedia paliata, and were taken, for the most part, from the poets of the new Attic comedy, we should do great injustice to Plautus if we regarded him as a slavish imitator of the Greeks. Though he founds his plays upon Greek models, the characters in them act, speak, and joke like genuine Romans, and he thereby secured the sympathy of his audience more completely than Terence could ever have done. Whether Plautus borrowed the plan of all his plays from Greek models, it is impossible to say. The Cistellaria, Bacchides, Poenulius, and Stichus were taken from Menander, the Casina and Rudens from Diphilus, and the Mercator and the Trinummus from Philemon, and many others were undoubtedly founded upon Greek originals. But in all cases Plautus allowed himself much greater liberty than Terence; and in some instances he appears to have simply taken the leading idea of the play from the Greek, and to have filled it up in his own fashion. It has been inferred from a well-known line of Horace (Epist. ii. 1. 58), "Plautus ad exemplar Siculi propretar Epicharmi," that Plautus took great pains to imitate Epicharmus. But there is no correspondence between any of the existing plays of Plautus, and the known titles of the comedies of Epicharmus; and the verb propretar probably has reference only to the liveliness and energy of Plautus's style, in which he bore a resemblance to the Sicilian poet. Another mistake has arisen from the statement of Jerome (Ep. 57, 101) that Plautus imitated the poets of the old Attic comedy, but the only resemblance he bears to them is in the coarseness and boldness of his jokes. He borrowed to a slight extent from the middle Attic comedy, from which the Amphitruo was taken; but, as we have already remarked, it was the poets of the new Attic comedy whom Plautus took as his models.

It was, however, not only with the common people that Plautus was a favourite; educated Romans read and admired his works down to the latest times. The purity of his language and the refinement and good-humour of his wit are celebrated in particular by the ancient critics. The grammarians L. Aelius Stilo used to say, and Varro adopted his words, "that the Muses would use the language of Plautus, if they were to speak Latin." (Apud Quintil. x. 1. § 99.) In the same manner A. Gallius constantly praises the language of Plautus in the highest terms, and in one passage (vii. 17) speaks of him as "homo linguae atque elegante oratione, Bonus Latinus princeps." Cicero (De Off. i. 29) places his wit on a par with that of the old Attic comedy, and St. Jerome used to console himself with the perusal of the poet after spending many nights in tears, on account of his past sins.

The few and jests; but it must be recollected that the taste of Horace had been formed by a different school of literature, and that he disliked the ancient poets of his country. Lessing, however, has shown that the censure of Horace probably does not refer to the general character of Plautus's poetry, but merely to his inharmonious verses and to some of his jests. And it must be admitted that only a blind admiration of the poet can fail to recognise some truth in the censure of Horace. Prosody and metre are not always strictly attended to, and there is frequently a want of harmony in his verses. His jests, also, are often coarse, and sometimes puerile; but it must be recollected that they were intended to please the lower classes of Rome, and were accordingly adapted to the tastes of the day. The objections brought against the jokes of Plautus are equally applicable to those of Shakspere.

The text of Plautus has come down to us in a very corrupt state. It contains many lacunae and interpolations. Thus the Aulularia has lost its conclusion, the Bacchides its commencement, &c.; and we find in the grammarians several quotations from the existing plays of Plautus which are not found in our present copies. The interpolations are still more numerous than the lacunae, and were for the most part made for the purpose of supplying gaps in the original manuscript. Some of these were introduced in ancient times, as is proved by their existence in the Palimpsest manuscript at PLAUTUS.

Milan, which is as old as the fifth century, but most of them were executed at the revival of learning, and evidently betray their modern origin. See the essay of Niebuhr on this subject, entitled "Uber die Säulen und die gleichzeitigen bekannter Scenen im Plautus," in his "Kleine Schriften," vol. i. p. 139, &c. The corruptions of the text are owing to the fact that all the existing manuscripts of Plautus, with the exception of the Milan Palimpsest, are derived from one common source. The editors of Plautus, however, have not founded the text upon the best existing manuscripts. These are the Codex vetus and decurtatus, which must, in connection with the Palimpsest manuscript of Milan, form the basis with any future editor for a restoration of the genuine text. (See Ritschl, Ueber die Kritik des Plautus, in the Rheinisches Museum, vol. iv. p. 153, &c.) It appears that the comedies of Plautus were, at an early time, divided into two parts, the first containing eight plays (Amphitruo—Epidicus), the second the remaining twelve (Bucchides—Truculentus). The last twelve plays were at first printed only at the revival of learning: they were discovered in Germany about 1430, and from thence conveyed to Italy. It may be mentioned in passing, that this division of the plays into two parts accounts for the loss of the beginning of the Bucchides, which was the first play of the volume, and the commencement of which might therefore have been easily torn away.

The edict princes of the complete works of Plautus was published at Venice, by Georgius Mura, in 1472. There was a still earlier edition of the first eight plays of Plautus (Amphitruo—Epidicus), printed at Venice, without date, of which probably only one copy is now in existence, preserved in the public library at Venice. Niebuhr called attention to this edition (Kleine Schriften, vol. i. p. 176, &c.), but it had been previously noticed by Harles (Suppl. ad Brev. Notit. Lit. Rom. part ii. p. 488). On the other earlier editions the best are those by Camerarius, Basel, 1558; by Lambarini, Paris, 1576; by Taubmann, Wittenberg, 1605; by Pareus, Frankfort, 1610; by Groter, with Taubmann's commentary, Wittenberg, 1621; by J. Fr. Gronovius, Leyden, 1664, reprinted at the same place in 1669, at Amsterdam in 1684, and again at Leipzig, under the care of J. A. Ernesti, in 1760. The best modern editions of the complete works of Plautus are by Bothe, Berlin, 1809—1811, 4 vols. 8vo, again at Stuttgart, 1829, 4 vols. 8vo, and lastly at Leipzig, 1834, 2 vols. 8vo; and by Weise, Quedlinburg, 1837—1838, 2 vols. 8vo. There are some editions of the separate plays of Plautus which deserve particular recommendation. These are the Captivi, Miles, and Trinummi, by Lindemann, Leipzig, 1844, 24 editions, the last by Ritschel-Halle, 1830; and the Trinummi by Hermann, Leipzig, 1860. Plautus has been translated into almost all the European languages. In English some of the plays were translated by Echard in 1716, by Cooke in 1754, and by Cotter in 1827; and there is a translation in English of all the works of Plautus by Thornton and Warner, 1767—1774, 5 vols. 8vo. In French we have the translations of the Amphitruo, Epidicus, and Rudens, by Madame Darier, 1683, and of the complete works by Limiers, Amsterdam, 1719, 10 vols. 8vo, and by Guenette, Leyden, 1719, 10 vols. 8vo. In German there are several translations of single plays, of which Lessing's excellent translation of the Captivi deserves to be particularly mentioned. There is likewise a translation in German of the complete works by Kuffner, Vienna, 1806—1807, 5 vols. 8vo, of nine of the plays by Köpke, Berlin, 1809-20, 2 vols. 8vo, and of eight by Rapp, Stuttgart, 1838-46.

PLAUTUS, C. RUBEILLIUS, was the son of Rubellius Blandus [Blandus] and of Julia, the daughter of Drusus, the son of the emperor Tiberius. Plautus was thus the great-grandson of Tiberius, and the great-great-grandson of Augustus, in consequence of Tiberius having been adopted by Augustus. Descended thus from the founder of the Roman empire, Plautus incurred the jealousy of Nero. He was involved in the accusations which Junia Silana brought against Agrippina in A. D. 55, whom she accused of a design of marrying Plautus, and raising him to the imperial throne. Five years afterwards, A. D. 60, a comet appeared, which, according to the popular opinion, was thought to forebode a change in the empire. The people thereupon were set thinking who would be Nero's successor; and no one appeared to them so fit as Rubellius Plautus. Although the latter lived in the most quiet manner, avoiding the popular notice, and harbouring no traitorous designs, Nero wrote to him, recommending him to withdraw from the city to his estates in Asia. Such advice was, of course, equivalent to a command; Plautus accordingly retired to Asia with his wife Antistia, the daughter of L. Antistius Vetus, and employed himself in his exile in the study of the Stoic philosophy. But even in this retreat he was not safe; for Tigellinus having again excited the fears of Nero in A. D. 62 against Plautus, he was murdered in Asia by command of the emperor. Many of his friends advised him to take up arms to resist his execution; and his father-in-law, Antistius Vetus wrote to him to the same effect; but Plautus preferred death to an uncertain struggle for the empire. (Tac. Ann. xii. 10, xiv. 22, 57, 59; Dion Cass. lxi. 14; Juv. viii. 39.)

PLEIADES (Πελείαις or Πελείαδες), the Pleiads, are called daughters of Atlas by Pleione (or by the Oceanid Aethra, Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1155), of Erechtheus (Serv. ad Aen. i. 744), of Cadmus (Theon, ad Aret. p. 22), or of the queen of the Amazons. (Schol. ad Theocr. xiii. 23.) They were the sisters of the Hyades, and seven in number, six of whom are described as visible, and the seventh as invisible. Some call the seventh Sterope, and relate that she became invisible from shame, because she alone among her sisters had had intercourse with a mortal man, others call her Electra, and make her disappear from the choir of her sisters on account of her grief at the destruction of the house of Dardanus (Hygin. Fab. 192, Poet. Astr. ii. 21). The Pleiades are said to have made away with themselves from grief at the death of their sisters, the Hyades, or at the fate of their father, Atlas, and were afterwards placed as stars at the back of Taurus, where they form a cluster resembling a bunch of grapes, whence they were sometimes called Bôtrus (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1155). According to another story, the Pleiades were virgin companions of Artemis, and, together with their mother Pleione, were pursued by the hunter Orion in Boeotia; their prayer to be rescued from him was heard by the gods, and they were metamorphosed into doves (πελεάδες), and placed among the stars (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 21; Schol. ap. Apollod. iii. 23 p. 16 B.); (Pind. Nem. ii. 17). The rising of the Pleiades in Italy was about the beginning of May, and their setting about the beginning of November. Their names are Electra, Maia, Taygete, Alcyone, Celaeno, Sterope, and Merope (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 219, comp. 149; Apollod. iii. 10. § 1). The scholiast of Theocritus (xiii. 25) gives the following different set of names: Ceycymo, Plaucia, Protia, Parthenia, Maia, Stonychin, Lampatho. (Comp. Hom. ii. xviii. 486, Od. v. 272; Ov. Fast. iv. 169, &c.; Hyades; and Ideler. Untersuch. über die Sternennamen, p. 144.)

PLEITONE (Πλείτωνη), a daughter of Oceanus, and mother of the Pleiades by Atlas. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1; Pind. Fragm. 53; comp. Atlas; Pleiades.)

PLEISTAI'NE'TUS (Πλεισταῖνετος), an Athenian painter, the brother of Phéidias, is mentioned by Plutarch (De Gior. Athen. ii. p. 346) among the most illustrious, with Apollodorus, Euphoror, Nicias, and Asclepiodorus, who painted victories, battles, and heroes; but there is no other mention of him. [P. S.]

PLEISTARCHUS (Πλειστάρχος). 1. King of Sparta, of the line of the Agiads, was the son and successor of the heroic Leonidas, who was killed at Thermopylae, b.c. 489. He was a mere child at the time of his father's death, on which account the regency was assumed by his cousin Pausanias, who commanded the Greeks at Plataea. (Herod. ix. 10; Paus. iii. 4. § 9.) It appears that the latter continued to administer affairs in the name of the young king till his own death, about b.c. 467 (Thuc. i. 132). Whether Pleistarchus was then of age to take the reins of government into his own hands we know not, but Pausanias tells us that he died shortly after assuming the sovereign sway, while it appears, from the date assigned by Diordorus to the reign of his successor Pleistostenus, that his death could not have taken place till the year b.c. 458. (Paus. iii. 5. § 1; Diod. xiii. 75. 5; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 210.) No particulars of his reign are recorded to us.

2. Son of Antipater and brother of Cassander, king of Macedonia. He is first mentioned in the year b.c. 313, when he was left by his brother in the command of Chalico, to make head against Ptolemy, the general of Antigonus, when Cassander himself was recalled to the defence of Macedonia. (Diod. xix. 77.) Again, in b.c. 302, when the general coalition was formed against Antigonus, Pleistarchus was sent forward by his brother, with an army of 12,000 foot and 500 horses, to join Lysimachus in Asia. As the Hellespont and entrance of the Euxine was occupied by Demetrius, he endeavoured to transport his troops from Odessus direct to Hерaclea, but lost by far the greater part of the passage, some having been captured by the enemy's ships, while others perished in a storm, in which Pleistarchus himself narrowly escaped shipwreck. (Ibid. xx. 112.) Notwithstanding this misfortune, he seems to have rendered efficient service to the confederates, for which he was rewarded after the battle of Ipsus (b.c. 301) by obtaining the province of Cilicia, an independent government. This, however, he did not long retain, being expelled from it in the following year, by Demetrius, almost without opposition. (Plut. Demet. 31.) Hereupon he returned to his brother Cassander, and from this time we hear no more of him. Pleistarchus as having been defeated by the Athenians in an action in which he commanded the cavalry and auxiliaries of Cassander; but the period at which this event took place is uncertain. (Paus. i. 15. § 1.) It is perhaps to him that the medical writer, Dioscorides of Caryustrus, addressed his work, which is cited more than once by Athenaeus, as τὰ πρὸς Πλειστάρχου Γένεια, (Athen. vii. p. 329, d, 324, f.)

PLEIOTHENES (Πλεῖοθηνῆς), a son of Areus, and husband of Andrope or Eryphile, the daughter of Catanes, by whom he became the father of Agamemnon, Menelaus, and Anaxibis (Apollod. ii. 2. § 2; Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 5; Aeschyl. Agam. 1569; comp. Agamemnon; Areus). A son of Thyestes, who was killed by Areus, was likewise called Pleiosthenes. (Hygin. Fab. 86.) [L.S.]

PLEISTOANAX (Πλείστοανξ), the nineteenth king of Sparta in the line of the Agiads, was the elder son of the Pausanias who was killed at Plataea in b.c. 479. On the death of Pleistarchus, in b.c. 458, without issue, Pleistostanax succeeded to the throne, being yet a minor, so that in the expedition of the Lacedaemonians in behalf of the Dorians against Phocius, in b.c. 457, his uncle Nicomedes, son of Cleombrotus, commanded for him. (Thuc. i. 107; Dios. xii. 79; Paus. i. 13, iii. 5.) In b.c. 445 he led in person an invasion into Arcadia, being however, in consequence of his youth, accompanied by Cleandridas as a counsellor. The premature withdrawal of his army from the enemy's territory exposed both Cleandridas and himself to the suspicion of having been bribed by Pericles, and, according to Plutarch, while Cleandridas fled from Sparta and was condemned to death in his absence, the young king was punished by a heavy fine, which he was unable to pay, and was therefore obliged to leave his country. Pleistostanax remained nineteen years in exile, till he was restored to rank by the temple of Zeus on Mount Lycaeus in Arcadia, and having half his house within the sacred precincts that he might enjoy the benefit of the sanctuary. During this period his son Pausanias, a minor, reigned in his stead. The Spartans at length recalled him in b.c. 426, in obedience to the repeated injunctions of the Delphic oracle,—"to bring back the seed of the demi-god, the son of Zeus; else they should plough with a silver plough;"—and his restoration was accompanied with solemn dances and sacrifices, such as those with which the first kings of his race had been inaugurated. But he was accused of having tampered with the Pythian priestess to induce her to interpose for him, and his implied impiety in this matter was continually assigned by his enemies as the cause of all Sparta's misfortunes in the war; and therefore it was that he used all his influence to bring about peace with Athens in B.C. 421. (Thuc. i. 114, ii. 21, iii. 26, v. 16, 19, 24; Arist. Nub. 849; Ephor. ap. Schol. ad loc.; Plut. Per. 22, N. 28; Diod. xiii. 106.) [CLEANDRIDAS; PERICLEES.]

In the last-mentioned year he marched with an army into Arcadia, where he released the Parrhasians from their dependence on Mantinea, and destroyed the fortress which the Mantineans had built, to command Laconia, at a place called Cypselon on the borders. (Thuc. v. 33.) In B.C. 418 he set forth at the head of the old men and boys to the assistance of his colleague, Agis 11; but, on his arrival, the Thermopylaeans heard of the victory which Agis had just won at Mantinea, and, finding that his presence was not required, he returned to Sparta. (Thuc. v. 75.) He died in B.C. 408, after a reign of 50 years, and was succeeded by his son Pausanias. (Diod. xiii. 75; Wess. ad loc.; comp. Cic. F. II. vol. ii. App. iii.) One saying of Pleistomax is found in Plutarch's collection (Apoph. Luc.), but it is hardly brilliant enough to deserve being recorded. [E. E.]

Q. PLEM'TNIUS, propurator and legatus of Scipio Africanus, was sent in B.C. 205 against the town of Locri, in southern Italy, which still continued to be in the possession of the Carthaginians. He succeeded in taking the town, of which he was left governor by Scipio; but he treated the inhabitants with the greatest cruelty, and not contented with robbing them of their private property, plundered even the temple of Proserpine. The Locrians accordingly sent an embassy to Rome to complain of his conduct; and the senate, upon hearing their complaints, commanded Pleminius to be brought back to Rome, where he was thrown into prison, B.C. 204, but died before his trial came on. According to another account preserved by Claudius Licinius, Pleminius endeavoured to set the city on fire, but being detected was put to death in prison by command of the senate. (Liv. xxix. 6—9, 16—22, xxxiv. 44; Val. Max. i. 1, § 21; Dion Cass. Frop. 64, ed. Reimar; Appian. Ann. 55.)

PLEMINAUS (Πελμεναύς), a son of Peratus in Aegaeis, was the father of Orthopolis whom Demetrius reared, all the other children of Pleminaus having died immediately after their birth. He afterwards was appointed by Philip to build and endow a temple to her. (Paus. ii. 5, § 5, 11, § 2.) [L. S.]

PLENNIUS, one of the chief legates of Sex. Pompeius in the war of the year B.C. 36, which ended in the defeat of the latter. Pleminius was stationed near Lilibucem to oppose Lepidus. (Appian, B. C. v. 97, &c. 122.)

PLESIMACHUS (Πλησιμαχος), the writer of Νόστοι (Plut. de Phere. 18), is probably a false reading for Lysimachus, as the ancients frequently mention the Νόστοι of the latter [LYSIMACHUS, literary, No. 5], and the name of Plesimachus does not occur elsewhere.

PLETHIO or GEMISTUS GEORGIUS. [GEMISTUS.]

PLEURATUS (Πλεύρατος). 1. Father of Agron, king of Ilyria (Polyb. ii. 2), as well as in all probability of Scredilidias also, though this is no where distinctly stated. (See Schweighäuser, ad Polyb. ii. 5, § 6.)

2. King of Ilyria, son of Scredilidias, and therefore probably a grandson of the preceding. He appears to have been associated with his father in the sovereignty for some years before the death of the latter, whether as joint ruler, or as holding the separate command of some of the Ilyrian tribes, is uncertain, but the last supposition seems the most probable. Livy, in one passage (xxvi. 24), calls him a Thracian prince, but this seems to be certainly a mistake. His name was included, together with that of Scredilidias in the treaty of alliance concluded by M. Valerius Laevinus with the Aetolians, B.C. 211, and the two were associated together on several occasions during the war with Philip, as well as in the peace concluded by P. Sempronius with that monarch in B.C. 204. (Livy. xxvi. 24, vii. 11, v. 22, xxxiv. 12; Polyb. x. 41.) But after this period that of Pleuratus appears alone, and he seems to have become sole ruler. On the renewal of the war with Macedonia by the Romans (B.C. 201) he hastened to offer his assistance to the consul Sulpicius, but his services were declined for the moment, and were not subsequently called for. But though he rendered no active assistance, his fidelity to the Roman cause was rewarded by Flamininus at the peace of 196, by the addition to his territories of Lycnndus and the Parthini, which had been previously subject to Macedonia. (Livy. xxxii. 28, xxxiii. 34; Polyb. xviii. 30, xxxi. 9, xxxii. 4.) During the war of M. Fulvius in Aetolia, N. C. 189, he again came to the assistance of the Romans with a fleet of 60 ships, with which he laid waste the coasts of Aetolia, but did not effect any thing of moment. (Livy. xxxvii. 7.) The date of his death is unknown, but it must have occurred previous to B.C. 180, at which time we find his son Gentius already on the throne. (Id. xl. 42.)

3. A brother of Gentius, and son of the preceding, who is called PLATOR by Livy, but Pleuratus by Polybius. He was put to death by Gentius, in order that the king might himself marry a daughter of Monunius who had been betrothed to his brother. (Polyb. xxxix. 5; Liv. xliv. 30.)

4. A son of Gentius, king of Ilyria, who was taken prisoner, together with his father, and carried captive to Rome. (Livy. xxxvii.)

5. An Ilyrian exile, of whose services Perseus, king of Macedonia, availed himself on his embassies to Gentius, king of Ilyria, in B.C. 169. (Livy. xliii. 19, 20; Polyb. xxviii. 8, 9.) We afterwards heard of him mentioned as levying a force of Ilyrian auxiliaries for the service of Perseus. (Livy. xlvii. 11.)

PLEURON (Πλευρων), a son of Aetolius and Pronee, and brother of Calydon, was married to Xanthippa, by whom he became the father of Agenor, Sterope, Stratoniace, and Laophonte. He is said to have founded the town of Pleuron in Aetolia, but he had a heroon at Sparta. (Apollod. i. 7, § 7; Paus. iii. 13, § 5.)

PLEXARE (Πλεξαρέ), a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys (Hes. Theog. 553), or, according to others, of Nereus and Dora. (Apollod. i. 2, § 7.)

PLEXIPPOUS (Πλεξιππός). 1. A son of PLINIUS.

Thestius, and brother of Althaea, was killed by Meleager. (Apollod. i. 7, § 10; Mel. Ag.)

2. A son of Phineus, by Cleopatra. (Apollod. iii. 15, § 3; Schol. ad Soph. Antig. 980.)

3. One of the sons of Aggyptus (Hygin. Fab. 170.) [L.S.]

C. PLINIUS SECUNDUS, the celebrated author of the Historia Naturalis, was born A.D. 23, having reached the age of 56 at the time of his death, which took place in A.D. 79. (Plin. Jun. Epist. iii. 5.) The question as to the place of his birth has been the subject of a voluminous and rather angry discussion between the champions of Verona and those of Novum Comum (the modern Como). That he was born at one or other of these two towns seems pretty certain; Hadrouin's notion, that he was born at Rome, has nothing to support it. The claim of Comum seems to be, on the whole, the better founded of the two. In the life of Pliny ascribed to Suetonius, and by Eusebius, or his translator Jerome, he is styled Novocomensis. Another anonymous writer (not of the first rank and of no authority) calls him a native of Verona; and it has been thought that the claim of Verona to be considered as his birth-place is confirmed by the fact that Pliny himself (Praef. init.) calls Catullus, who was a native of Verona, his conterraneus. On the other hand, it has been urged with more discerning criticism, that as the two towns were both situated beyond the Padus in Gallia Cisalpina, and at no very great distance from each other, this somewhat barbarous word is much better adapted to intimate that Catullus was a fellow-countryman of Pliny, than that he was a fellow-townsmen. In a similar manner the younger Pliny, who was undoubtedly born at Novum Comum, speaks of Veroneses nostri (Epist. vi. ult.). Of two Veronese inscriptions which have been adduced, one appears to be spurious. The other, which is admitted to be genuine, is too mutilated for its tenour to be ascertained. It appears to have been set up by Plinius Secundus, but whether the author of the Natural History or not, there is nothing to show.

Nor would it in any case be decisive as to the birthplace of Pliny. That the family of the Plinii belonged to Novum Comum is clear from the facts that the estates of the elder Pliny were situated there, and that the younger Pliny was born there, and from several inscriptions found in the neighbourhood relating to various members of the family.

Of the particular events in the life of Pliny we know but little; but for the absence of such materials for biography we are in some degree compensated by the valuable account which his nephew has left us of his habits of life. He came to Rome while still young, and being descended from a family of wealth and distinction, he had the means at his disposal for availing himself of the instruction of the best teachers to be found in the imperial city. In one passage of his work (ix. 58) he speaks of the enormous quantity of jewellery which he had seen worn by Lolilia Paulina. That must have been before A.D. 40, in which year Caligula married Cesonia. It does not appear necessary to suppose that at that early age Pliny had already been introduced at the court of Caligula. The strange animals exhibited by the emperors and wealthy Romans in spectacles and combats, seem early to have attracted his attention (comp. H. N. ix. 5). He was for some time on the coast of Africa, though in what capacity, or at what period, we are not informed (H. N. vii. 3). At the age of about 29 he went to Germany, where he served under L. Pomponius Secundus, of whom he afterwards wrote a memoir (Plin. Jun. Ep. iii. 5), and was appointed to the command of a troop of cavalry (praefectus alae) (Plin. Jun. l. c.). It appears from notices of his own that he travelled over most of the frontier of Germany, having visited the Cunci, the sources of the Danube, &c. It was probably in Belgium that he became acquainted with Cornelius Tacitus (not the historian of that name, H. N. vii. 16). It was in the intervals snatched from his military duties that he composed his treatise de Jaculatione equesti. (Plin. Jun. l. c.) At the same time he commenced a history of the Germanic wars, being led to do so by a dream in which he fancied himself commissioned to undertake the task by Drusus Nero. This work he afterwards completed in twenty books.

Pliny returned to Rome with Pomponius (A. D. 52), and applied himself to the study of jurisprudence. He was commissioned for no particular object, but does not seem to have distinguished himself very greatly in that capacity. The greater part of the reign of Nero he spent in retirement, chiefly, no doubt, at his native place. It may have been with a view to the education of his nephew that he composed the work entitled Studiosiss, an extensive treatise in three books, occupying six volumes, in which he marked out the course that should be pursued in the training of a young orator, from the cradle to the completion of his education and his entrance into public life. (Plin. Jun. l. c.; Quintil. iii. 1. § 21.) Towards the end of the reign of Nero he wrote a grammatical work in eight books, entitled Dubiius Sermo, confutations of which were promised by various professed grammarians, Stoics, dialecticians, &c.; though ten years afterwards, when the Historia Naturalis was published, they had not appeared. (Plin. H. N. ii. 9. Plin. Ep. iii. 18.) This is one of the works of the reign of Nero that Pliny was appointed procurator in Spain. He was here in A. D. 71, when his brother-in-law died, leaving his son, the younger Pliny, to the guardianship of his uncle, who, on account of his absence, was obliged to entrust the care of him to Virginius Rufus. Pliny returned to Rome in the reign of Vespasian, shortly before A. D. 73, when he adopted his nephew. He had known Vespasian in the Germanic wars, and the emperor received him into the number of his most intimate friends. For the assertion that Pliny served with Titus in Judaea there is no authority. He was, however, on intimate terms with Titus, to whom he dedicated his great work. Nor is there any evidence that he was ever created senator by Vespasian. It was doubtless at this period of his life that he wrote a continuation of the history of Aüdlius Bassus, in 31 books, carrying the narrative down to his own times (H. N. praef. § 19). Of his manner of life at this period an interesting account has been preserved by his nephew (Epist. iii. 5). It was his practice to begin to spend a portion of the night in studying by candle-light, at the festival of the Vlekmalin (towards the end of August), at first at a late hour of the night, in winter at one or two o’clock in the morning. Before it was light he betook himself to the emperor Vespasian, and after executing such commissions as he might be charged with, returned home and devoted the time which he still had remaining to study. After a slender meal he would, in the summer time, lie in the sunshine while some one read to him, he himself making notes and extracts. He never read anything without making extracts in this way, for he used to say that there was no book so bad but that some good might be got out of it. He would then take a cold bath, and, after a slight repast, sleep a very little, and then pursue his studies till the time of the cena. During this meal some book was read to, and commented on by him. At table, as might be supposed, he spent but a short time. Such was his mode of life when in the midst of the bustle and confusion of the city. When in retirement in the country, the time spent in the bath was nearly the only interval not allotted to study, and that he reduced to the narrowest limits; for during all the process of scraping and rubbing he had some book read to him, or himself dictated. When on a journey he had a secretary by his side with a book and tablets, and in the winter season made him wear gloves that his writing might not be impeded by the cold. He once found fault with his nephew for walking, as he was doing, he lost much of time that might have been employed in study. By this incessant application, persevered in throughout his lifetime, he amassed an enormous amount of materials, and at his death left to his nephew 160 volumina of notes (electoratn commentarit), written extremely small on both sides. While procurator in Spain, when the number of them was considerably less, he had been offered 400,000 sesterces for them, by one Largius Licinius. With some reason might his nephew say that, when compared with Pliny, those who had spent their whole lives in literary pursuits seemed as if they had spent them in nothing else than sleep and idleness. When we consider the multiplicity of his engagements, both public and private, the time occupied in military services, in the discharge of the duties of the office which he held, in his forensic studies and practice, in visits to the emperor, and the performance of the miscellaneous commissions entrusted to him by the latter, the extent of his acquisitions is indeed astonishing. From the materials which he had in this way collected he compiled his celebrated Historia Naturalis, which he dedicated to Titus, and published, as appears from the titles given to Titus in the preface, about A. D. 77.

The circumstances of the death of Pliny were remarkable. The details are given in a letter of the younger Pliny to Tacitus (Ep. vi. 16). Pliny had been appointed admiral by Vespasian, and in A. D. 79 was stationed with the fleet at Misenum, when the celebrated eruption of Vesuvius took place, which overwhelmed Herculanenum and Pompeii. On the 24th of August, while he was, as usual, engaged in study, his attention was called by his sister to a cloud of unusual size and shape, rising to a great height, in the form of a pine-tree, from Vesuvius (as was afterwards discovered), sometimes white, sometimes blackish and spotted, according as the smoke was more or less mixed with cinders and earth. He immediately went to a spot from which he could get a better view of the phænomenon; but, desiring to examine it still more closely, he ordered a light vessel to be got ready, in which he embarked, taking his tablets with him. The sailors of the ships at Retina, who had just escaped from the imminent danger, urged him to turn back. He resolved, however, to proceed, and in the hope of rendering assistance to those who were in peril, ordered the ships to be launched, and proceeded to the point of danger, retaining calmness and self-possession enough to observe and have noted down the various forms which the cloud assumed. Hot cinders and pumice stones now fell thickly upon the vessels, and they were in danger of being left aground by a sudden retreat of the sea. He hesitated for an instant whether to proceed or not; but quoting the maxim of Terence, fortes fortuna adiuvat, directed the steersman to conduct him to Pompeianus, who was at Stabiae, and whom he found preparing to set sail. Pliny did his best to restore his courage, and ordered a bath to be prepared for himself. He then, with a cheerful countenance, presented himself at the dinner-table, endeavouring to induce his friend to believe that the flames which burst out with increased violence were only those of some villages which the peasants had abandoned, and afterwards retired to rest, and slept soundly. But, as the court of the house was becoming fast filled with cinders, so that egress would in a short time have become impossible, he was roused, and joined Pompeianus. As the house, from the frequent and violent shocks, was in momentary danger of falling, it appeared the safer plan to betake themselves into the open fields, which they did, tying pillows upon their heads to protect them from the falling stones and ashes. Though it was already day, the darkness was profound. They went to the shore to see if it were possible to embark, but found the sea too tempestuous to allow them to do so. Pliny then lay down on a sail which was spread for him. Alarmed by the approach of flames, preceded by a smell of sulphur, his companions took to flight. His slaves assisted him to rise, but he almost immediately dropped down again, suffocated, as his nephew conjectures, by the vapours, for he had naturally weak lungs. His body was afterwards found unhurt, even his clothes not being disordered, and his attitude that of one asleep rather than that of a corpse.

It may easily be supposed that Pliny, with his inordinate appetite for accumulating knowledge out of books, was not the man to produce a scientific work of any value. He had no genius, as indeed might have been inferred from the bent of his mind. He was not even an original observer. The materials which he worked up into his huge encyclopaedic compilation were almost all derived at second-hand, though doubtless he has incorporated the results of his own observation in a larger number of instances than those in which he indicates such to be the case. Nor did he, as a compiler, show either judgment or discrimination in the selection of his materials, so that in his accounts the true and the false are found intermixed in nearly equal proportion,—the latter, if any thing, predominating, even with regard to subjects on which more accurate information might have been obtained; for, as he wrote on a multiplicity of subjects with which he had no scientific acquaintance, he was entirely at the mercy of those from whose writings he borrowed his information, being incapable of correcting their errors, or, as may be seen even from what he has borrowed from Aristotle, of determining the relative importance of the facts which he selects and those which he passes over. His love of the marvellous, and his contempt for human nature, lead him constantly to introduce what is strange or wonderful, or adapted to illustrate the wickedness of man, and the unsatisfactory arrangements of Providence. He was, as Cuvier remarks, "an author without critical judgment, who, after having spent a great deal of time in making extracts, has ranged them under certain chapters, to which he has added reflections which have no relation to science properly so called, but display alternately either the most superstitious or the most demented meditations on a discontented philosophy, which finds fault continually with mankind, with nature, and with the gods themselves." His work is of course valuable to us from the vast number of subjects treated of, with regard to many of which we have no other sources of information. But what he tells us is often unintelligible, from his retailing accounts of things with which he was himself personally unacquainted, and of which he in consequence gives no satisfactory idea to the reader. Though a writer on zoology, botany, and mineralogy, he has no pretensions to be called a naturalist. His compilations exhibit scarcely a trace of scientific arrangement; and frequently it can be shown that he does not give the true sense of the authors whom he quotes and translates, giving not uncommonly wrong Latin names to the objects spoken of by his Greek authorities. That repeated contradictions should occur in such a work is not to be wondered at. It would not, of course, be fair to try him by the standard of modern times; yet we need but place him for an instant by the side of a man like Aristotle, whose learning was even more varied, while it was incomparably more profound, to see how great was his inferiority as a man of science and reflection. Still it is but just to him to add, that he occasionally displays a vigour of thought and expression which shows that he might have attained a much higher rank as an author, if his mental energies had not been weighed down beneath the mass of unorganized materials with which his memory and his note-tablets were overloaded. In private life his character seems to have been estimable in a high degree, and his work abounds with grave and noble sentiments, exhibiting a love of virtue and honour, and the most unimpeachable contempt for the luxury, profligacy, and meaness which he himself had so deeply斯坦 the Roman people. To philosophical speculation on religious, moral, or metaphysical subjects he does not seem to have been much addicted. All that is very distinctive of his views on such matters is that he was a decided pantheist.

With the exception of some minute quotations from his grammatical treatise (Lersch, Sprachphilosophie der Alten, vol. i. p. 179, &c.), the only work of Pliny which has been preserved to us, (for it does not appear that any reliance can be placed on the statement that the twenty books on the Germanic wars were seen by Conrad Gesner in Augsburg,) is his Historia Naturalis. By Natural History the ancients understood more than modern writers would usually include in the subject. It embraced astronomy, meteorology, geography, mineralogy, zoology, botany,—in short, every thing that does not relate to the results of human skill or the products of human faculties. Pliny, however, has not kept within even these extensive limits. He has broken in upon the plan implied by the title of the work, by considerable digressions on human inventions and institutions (book vii.), and on the history of the fine arts (xxxv.—xxxvii.). Minor digressions on similar topics are also interspersed in various parts of the work, the arrangement of which in other respects exhibits but little scientific discrimination. The younger Pliny fairly enough describes it as opus diffusum, eruditum, nec minus variam quam ipsa Natura (Epist. ii. § 20). It comprises, as Pliny says in the preface (§ 17), "a collection of thirty-six books, 20,000 matters of importance, drawn from about 2000 volumes, the works of one hundred authors of authority, the greater part of which were not read even by those of professedly literary habits, together with a large number of additional matters not known by the authorities from which he drew." Hardouin has drawn up a catalogue of the authors quoted by Pliny in the first book, or in the body of the work itself, amounting to between 400 and 500. When it is remembered that this work was not the result of the undistracted labour of a life, but written in the hours of leisure secured from active pursuits, interrupted occasionally by ill health (Proof. § 18), and that too by the author of other extensive works, it is, to say the least, a wonderful monument of human industry. Some idea of its nature may be formed from a brief outline of its contents.

The Historia Naturalis is divided into 37 books, the first of which consists of a dedicatory epistle to Titus, followed by a table of contents of the other books. It is curious that ancient writers should not more generally have adopted this usage. No Roman writer before Pliny had drawn out such a table, except Valerius Soranus, whose priority in the idea Pliny frankly confesses. (Proof. § 26.) Pliny has also adopted a plan in every way worthy of imitation. After the table of the subject-matter of each book he has appended a list of the authors from whom his materials were derived; an act of honesty rare enough in ancient as well as modern times, and for which in his prefatory epistle (§§ 16, 17) he deservedly takes credit. It may be noticed too, as indicating the pleasure which he took in the quantity of the materials which he accumulated, that he very commonly adds the exact number of facts, accounts, and observations which the book contains.

The section of the book treats of the mundane system, the sun, moon, planets, fixed stars, comets, meteoric prodigies, the rainbow, clouds, rain, &c., eclipses of the sun, and earthquakes, the seas, rivers, fountains, &c. He makes no attempt to distinguish between astronomy and meteorology, but jumbles both together in utter confusion. The book opens with a profession of the pantheistic creed of the author, who assails the popular mythology with considerable force on the ground of the degrading views of the divine nature which it gives (ii. 5, or 7). The consideration of the debasing, idle and conflicting superstitions of mankind draws from him the reflection: Quae singulae improvisa mortalitatem involvent, solam ut inter tela certum sit nihil esse certi, nec miserius quidquid hominis, aut superans. Similar half gloomy, half contemptuous views of human nature, and com-
Pliny against the arrangements of Providence, are of frequent occurrence with Pliny. His own appetite for the marvellous however frequently leads him into an excess of credulity scarcely distinguishable from the superstition which he condemns; though we must at the same time remember that with Pliny Nature is an active and omnipotent deity; and that his love for the marvellous is not mere gaping wonder, but admiration of the astonishing operations of that deity. It is a distinctly recognised maxim with him: Miki contuente se persuasit rerum natura nihil incredibile existinare de ea. (H. N. xi. 3.) The mundus is in his view divine in its nature, eternal, infinite, though resembling the finite, globular in form, the sun being the animus or mens of the whole, and itself a deity (ii. 4). He of course supposed this mundus to revolve round an axis in 24 hours. The earth he looked upon as globular, being fashioned into that shape by the perpetual revolution of the mundus round it, and inhabited on all sides. The fact that such is its shape he demonstrates by a variety of pertinent arguments (ii. 64—71). His ideas with regard to the universe, the manner of its formation, are their important relation to us as the origin of human souls (ii. 29), are in the main very much the same as those which through the influence of the Stoic school became generally prevalent among the Roman philosophers, though on various subordinate points Pliny had some singular notions, whether his own, or copied from authors with whom we are unacquainted, many of them ingenuous, still more puerile. The notion which he adopted from the earlier propagators of it, that the germs of the innumerable forms of animals, &c., with which the stars and the universe abound, find their way to the earth, and there frequently become intermingled, producing all kinds of monstrous forms (c. 2), accounts for the readiness with which he admits the most fabulous and impossible monsters into his zoology.

The historical and chronological notices with respect to the progress of astronomy which he intersperses are very valuable. Of the beneficial effects of the spread of such knowledge he speaks with generous enthusiasm (ii. 12). With respect to the changes in the surface of the earth, produced by the depositions of rivers, and the appearance of volcanic islands, he has some valuable and interesting statements (ii. 83, &c.). These changes, and the other startling natural phænomena which present themselves in considerable number and variety in the volcanic region of Italy and Sicily, are to Pliny so many proofs of the manifold divine activity of nature (c. 93). Some of the wonders he adduces are however more than apocryphal. On the tides (of the influence of the sun and moon upon which he was well aware), currents and marine springs, he has some remarks which show that his official duties in Spain did not keep him from a careful observation of natural phænomena (c. 97). The wonderful qualities and phænomena of various waters and fountains (nam nec aquarum natura a miraculis cesset, c. 103), supply him with details, many of them curious and probably true, others requiring the credulity of Pliny for their belief. From the wonders of water he passes to those of fire (c. 104, &c.), and then, by a rather curious arrangement, closes the book with some statements regarding the size of the earth and the distance between various points of it.

The four following books (iii.—vi.) are devoted to geography, and this somewhat small space Pliny has still further narrowed by digressions and declamations, so that his notices are confined chiefly to the divisions of the countries and the mere names of the places in them. Of these he has preserved a very large number which would otherwise have been utterly lost, though the lists are considerably swelled by the unconscious repetition of the same names, sometimes several times over, in slightly varied forms. Pliny was himself but a poor geographer, and his erroneous conception of the forms of different countries often materially affected the way in which he made use of the information which he obtained. This part of his work contains a curious medley of the geographical knowledge of different ages, not distinguished and corrected, but pieced together into one whole in the best way that the discordant statements allowed. This discrepancy Pliny sometimes points out, but frequently he omits to do this, and strives to blend the ancient and modern accounts together, so that he often makes the earlier writers the last as far as they had used and been familiar with names not in vogue till some time later. (Comp. iv. 27, xxxvii. 11.) He does not altogether discredit the stories of early times, and speaks of the Rhipaean mountains and the Hyperboreans with at least as much confidence as of some other better authenticated races. His geography of Italy, Greece, and Asia Minor is that of the times of Strabo. For the N. E. portion of Asia we have that of the time of Eratosthenes. For the southern Asiatic coast up to India we have ancient and recent accounts intermingled; for the North of Europe we have the knowledge of his own times, at least as it appears through the somewhat distorted medium of his imperfect notions. With regard to India and Ceylon he has some very recent and trustworthy accounts.

Pliny, like Posidonius, makes the habitable earth to extend much farther from east to west than from north to south. By the western coast of Europe he understands simply Spain and Gaul; after them begins the northern ocean, the greater part of which he thought had been sailed over, a Roman fleet having reached the Cimbrian peninsula, and ascertained that a vast sea stretches thence to Scythia. He seems to have imagined that the northern coast of Europe ran pretty evenly east and west, with the exception of the break occasioned by the Cimbrian Chersonesus (iv. 13, &c.). Beyond Germany, he says, immense islands had been discovered, Scandianavia, Eulingia, &c. He also believed the northern coast of the earth to have been explored from the east as far as the Caspian sea (which he regarded as an inlet of the northern ocean) in the time of Seleucus and Antiochus. More than one voyage had also been made between Spain and Arabia (ii. 67, 68). He evidently considered India the most eastern country of the world (vi. 17). The third and fourth books are devoted to Europe, the countries of which he takes up in a somewhat curious order. He begins with Spain, specifying its provinces and conventus, and giving lists of the towns, the position of some of which he defines, while the greater number are merely enumerated in alphabetical order; mentioning the principal rivers, and noting the towns

VOL. III.
PLINIUS.

It is unnecessary to follow him in detail through the rest of this part of his work. It is carried on in much the same style. When treating of Africa he mentions (apparently without disbelieve) the monstrous races in the south, same without articulate language, others with no heads, having mouths and eyes in their breasts. He accedes to the opinion of king Juba, that the Nile rises in a mountain of Mauritania, and that its inundations are due to the Etesian winds, which either force the current back upon the land, or carry vast quantities of clouds to Aethiopia, the rain from which swells the river. Of the races to the north and east of the Pontus and on the Tanais he has preserved a very large number of names. With regard to India he has some accounts which show that amid the conflicting, and what even Pliny calls incredible statements of different writers, a good deal of accurate information had reached the Romans. It is to be regretted that Pliny was deterred by the nature of these accounts from giving us more of them. It would have been interesting to know what Greeks who had resided at the courts of Indian kings (vi. 17) told their countrymen. We could have spared for that purpose most of the rough and inaccurate statements of Indian matters which he has taken in treating of India. Some intercourse which had taken place with the king of Taprobane in the reign of the emperor Claudius enabled Pliny to give a somewhat circumstantial account of the island and people. Though of very small value as a systematic work, the books on geography are still valuable on account of the extensive collection of ancient names which they contain, as well as a variety of incidental facts which have been preserved out of the valuable sources to which Pliny had access.

The five following books (vii.—xi.) are devoted to zoology. The seventh book treats of man, and opens with a preface, in which Pliny indulges his querulous dissatisfaction with the lot of man, his helpless and unhappy condition when brought into the world, and the pains and viciss to which he is subject. After bespeaking some measure of relief for the marvellous accounts that he has to give, and suggesting that what appears incredible should be reduced to a great whole (naturae vero verum via atque maxesita in omnibus momentis fide caret, sequi modo partes ejus ac non totam complexatur animo), he enumerates a number of the most astonishing and curious races reported to exist upon the earth:—cannibals, men with their feet turned backwards; the Psylli, whose bodies produce a secretion which is deadly to serpents; tribes of Androgyni; races of enchanters; the Scipodae, whose feet are so large, that when the sun's heat is very strong they lie on their backs and turn their feet upwards to shade themselves; the Astomi, who live entirely upon the scents of fruits and flowers; and various others almost equally singular. Hucce, he remarks, atque talia ex hominum genere ludibria sit, nobis miracula, ingeniosa ficta natura. He then proceeds to a variety of curious accounts respecting the generation and birth of children, or of monsters in their place. An instance of a change of sex he affirms to have come within his own knowledge (vii. 4). The dentition, size, and growth of children, examples of an extraordinary precocity, and remarkable bodily strength, swiftness, and keenness of sight and hearing, furnish him with some singular details. He then brings forward a variety of examples (chiefly of Romans) of persons distinguished for remarkable mental powers, moral greatness, courage, wisdom, &c., preserving some interesting anecdotes respecting the persons adduced. Then follow some notices of those most distinguished in the sciences and arts, and of persons remarkable for their honours or good fortune, in connection with which he does not forget to point out how the most pro-perous condition is frequently marred by adverse circumstances. He then mentions a number of instances of great longevity. Men’s liability to disease draws from him some pettish remarks, and even some instances which he mentions of resuscitation from apparent death only lead to the observation: haec est conditio mortalis; ad has et ejusmodi occasiones fortunae gignitur, uti de homine ne morti quiem debet credi (vii. 52). Sudden death he looks upon as an especially remarkable phenomenon, and at the same time the happiest thing that can happen to a man. The idea of a future existence of the soul he treats as ridiculous, and as spoiling the greatest blessing of nature—death (c. 55 or 56). It must have been in some peculiar sense, then, that he believed in apparitions after death (c. 52 or 53). The remainder of the book is occupied with a digression on the most remarkable inventions of men, and the authors of them. He remarks that the first thing in which men agreed by tacit consent was the use of the alphabet of the Ionians; the second the employment of barbers; the third marking the hours.

The eighth book is occupied with an account of terrestrial animals. They are not enumerated in any systematic manner. There is, indeed, some approximation to an arrangement according to size, the elephant being the first in the list and the dormouse the last, but mammals and reptiles, quadrupeds, serpents, and snails, are jumbled up together. For trustworthy information regarding the habits and organisation of animals the reader will commonly look in vain: a good part of almost every article is erroneous, false, or fabulous. Pliny’s account is, of course, filled with all the most extraordinary stories that he had met with, illustrating the habits or instinct of the different animals. The elephant he even believes to be a moral and religious animal, and to worship the sun and moon (viii. 1). His entertaining account of the elephant and the lion will give somewhat favourable samples of the style in which he discusses natural history (viii. 1—11, 16). The reader of the seventh book will be prepared to find in the eighth the most extraordinary and impossible creatures figuring by the side of the lion and the horse. Thus we have the achilis, without joints in its legs (c. 16); winged horses armed with horns (c. 30); the mantichora, with a triple row of teeth, the face and ears of a man, the body of a lion, and a tail which pierces like that of a scorpion (ib.); the monoceros, with the body of a horse, the head of a stag, the feet of an elephant, the tail of a boar, and a black horn on its forehead two tresses long (c. 91); the euleopas, whose eyes are instantly fixed to any man who meets their glance (c. 32); and the basilisk, possessed of powers equally remarkable (c. 33). Pliny certainly was not the man to throw out the taunt: mirum est quo procedat Graecae credulitas (viii. 22 or 34). He cites Ctesias with as much confidence as Aristotle; and it is not unlikely that in some instances he has transformed the symbolical animals sculptured at Persepolis into real natural productions. With his usual pravity to ramble off into digressions, his account of the sheep furnishes him with an opportunity for giving a variety of details regarding different kinds of clothing, and the novelties or improvements introduced in it (vii. 48 or 73).

In the ninth book he proceeds to the different races inhabiting the water, in which element he believes that even more extraordinary animals are produced than on the earth, the seeds and germs of living creatures being more intermingled by the agency of the winds and waves, so that he ascertains to the common opinion that there is nothing produced in any other part of nature which is not found in the sea, while the latter has many things peculiar to itself. Thus he finds no difficulty in believing that a live Triton, of the commonly received form, and a Nereid, had been seen and heard on the coast of Spain in the reign of Tiberius, and that a great number of dead Nereids had been found on the beach in the reign of Augustus, to say nothing of sea-animals and sea-goats. The story of Arion and the dolphin he thinks amply confirmed by numerous undoubted instances of the attachment shown by dolphins for men, and especially boys. It seems that these creatures are remarkably apt at answering to the name Simon, which they prefer to any other (c. 8). Pliny, however, rightly terms whales and dolphins belugas, not pisces, though the only classification of marine animals is one according to their integuments (ix. 12 or 14, 13 or 15). His account of the ordinary habits of the whale is tolerably accurate; and indeed, generally speaking, the ninth book exhibits much less of the marvellous and exaggerated than some of the others. He recognises seventy-four different kinds of fishes, with thirty of Crustacea (14 or 16). The eagerness with which pearls, purple dye, and shell-fish are sought for excites Pliny to vehement denunciation of the luxury and rapacity of the age (c. 34). On the supposed origin of pearls, and the mode of extracting the purple dye, he enters at considerable length (c. 34—41). Indeed, as he sarcastically remarks: abunde tractata est ratio quo se vironum jueta feminarumque forma credid amplissimum fuit.

The tenth book is devoted to an account of birds, beginning with the largest—the ostrich. As to the phoenix even Pliny is sceptical; but he has some curious statements about eagles, and several other birds. The leading distinction which he recognises among birds is that depending on the form of the feet (x. 11 or 13). Those, also, which have not talons but toes, are subdivided into oscines and alites, the former being distinguished by their note, the latter by their different sizes (c. 19 or 22). He notices that those with crooked talons are usually carnivorous; that those which are heavy feed on grain or fruits; those that fly high, on flesh (c. 47). The validity of augury he does not seem to consider, though he had found much difficulty in winged horses (viii. 21), he regards as fabulous winged Pegasi with horses’ heads. The substance of the bird when hatched he states to be derived from the white of the egg, the yolk serving as its food (c. 53). From his account of eggs he digresses into a general discussion of the phaenomena of generation in animals of all kinds (c. 62, k.), in connection with which He has several most extraordinary statements, as, e. g., that the spinal marrow of a man may turn into a serpent (c. 66), and that mice can generate by licking each other. The generation and fecundity of these little creatures he regards as especially astonishing; and what becomes of them all he cannot think, as they are never picked up dead, or dug up in winter in the fields (c. 65). He then proceeds to some statements as to the relative acuteness of the senses in different animals, and other miscellaneous matters. The reciprocal enmities and attachments of different animals are frequently touched upon by him.

The first part of the eleventh book is occupied with an account of insects. The phaenomena of the insect kingdom Pliny regards as exhibiting the wonderful operations of nature in even a more surprising manner than the others. He, however, only notices a few of the most common insects. On bees he treats at considerable length. He finds space, however, to mention the pyralis, an insect which is produced and lives in the fire of furnaces, but dies speedily if too long away from the flame (c. 36). The remainder of the book (c. 37 or 44, &c.) is devoted to the subject of comparative anatomy, or at least something of an approximation to that science. Considerable ingenuity has been shown by those from whom Pliny copies in bringing together a large number of coincidences and differences, though, as might have been expected, there are many errors both in the generalisations and in the particular facts.

Botany, the next division of natural history taken up by Pliny, occupies by far the largest portion of the work. Including the books on medical botany, it occupies sixteen books, eight on general botany (xii.—xix.), and eight more on medicines derived from plants. Pliny's botany is altogether devoid of scientific classification. The twelfth book treats of exotics, especially the spice and scent bearing trees of India, Arabia, and Syria. Of the trees themselves Pliny's account is extremely unsatisfactory: frequently he merely names them. The book is chiefly occupied with an account of their products, the modes of collecting and preparing them, &c. The first part of the thirteenth book is occupied with a general account of plants. The description of the various medicines and of those to be compounded, and the plants from which they are chiefly derived, palms and other exotics, chiefly those of Syria, Arabia, and Egypt, taken up without any principle of arrangement, are noticed or described in the remainder of the book. His account of the papryus (c. 11 or 21—13 or 27) goes considerably into detail. The fourteenth book is occupied with an account of the vine, and different notices respecting the various sorts of wines, closing with a somewhat spirited review of the effects of drunkenness. The fifteenth book treats of the more common sorts of fruit, the olive, apple, fig, &c. The sixteenth passes first to the most common kinds of forest trees, and then contains a great variety of remarks on general botany, and other miscellaneous notices, especially on the uses of wood and timber, into the midst of which there is awkwardly thrust some account of reeds, willows, and other plants of that kind. The seventeenth book treats of the cultivation and arrangement of trees and plants, the modes of propagating and grafting them, the diseases to which they are subject, with the modes of curing them, &c. The eighteenth book opens with an apology, in Pliny's peculiar style, on behalf of the earth, the benign parent of all, whom men have unjustly blamed for the mischievous use which they themselves have made of some of her products. The rest of the book is occupied with an account of the different sorts of grain and pulse, and a general account of agriculture. This and the preceding are by far the most valuable of the botanical books of the Historia Naturalis, and exhibit a great amount of reading, as well as considerable observation.

The next eight books (xx.—xxvii.) are devoted, generally speaking, to medical botany, though the reader must not expect a writer like Pliny to adhere very strictly to his subject. Thus, a great part of the twenty-first book treats of flowers, scents, and the use of chaplets; and some of the observations about bees and bee-hives are a little foreign to the subject. Indeed, the 20th and part of the 21st book are rather a general account of the medical, floral and other productions of gardens (see c. 49, end). Then, after giving an account of various wild plants, and some general botanical remarks respecting them, Pliny returns to the subject of medicines. The classification of these is chiefly according to the sources from which they are derived, whether garden or other cultivated plants (xx.—xxii.), cultivated trees (xxiii.), or wild plants (xxv.); partly according to the diseases for which they are adapted (xxvi.). Cuvier (l.c.) remarks that almost all that the ancients have told us of the virtues of their plants is lost to us, on account of our not knowing what plants they are speaking of. If we might believe Pliny, there is hardly a single human malady for which nature has not provided a score of remedies.

In the twenty-eighth book Pliny proceeds to notice the medicines derived from the human body, and from other land animals, commencing with what is tantamount to an apology for introducing the subject in that part of the work. Three books are devoted to this branch, diversified by some notices respecting the history of medicine (xxix. 1—8), and magic, in which he does not believe, and which he considers an offshoot from the art of medicine, combined with religion and divination (xxx., &c.). The thirty-first book treats of the medical properties of various waters; the thirty-second of those of fishes and other aquatic creatures.

The remaining section of the Historia Naturalis would doubtless have been headed by Pliny "Minerology," though this title would give but a small idea of the nature of the contents. In the 33d book the subject of metals is taken up. It begins with various denunciations of the wickedness and cupidity of men, who could not be content with what nature had provided for them on the surface of the earth, but must needs desecrate even the abode of the Manes to find materials for the gratification of their desires. Pliny's account of gold and silver consists chiefly of historical disquisitions about rings, money, crowns, plate, statues, and the other various objects in the making of which the precious metals have been used, in which he has presented us with a number of curious and interesting notices. He also specifies when and how metallic products are used as remedies. The mention of bronze (book xxxiv.) leads him to a digression about statutes and statuaries, again chiefly of an historical kind, and preserving several interesting and valuable facts (c. 9—19). In the 19th chapter he enumerates the chief works of the most celebrated statuaries, but the barren inventory is enlivened by very few remarks which can satisfy the curiosity of the artist or the lover of art. The introduction of this digression, and the mention of some mineral pigments, leads Pliny to take up the subject of painting in the 35th book. His account, however, is chiefly that of the historian and anecdote collector, not that of a man who understood or appreciated the art. The early stages of it he discusses very summarily; but on its progress after it had reached some maturity, and the various steps by which it rose in estimation among the Romans, he has many valuable and interesting records. In his account of the pigments employed by the ancient painters, he mixes up the medical properties of some of them in a way peculiarly his own, though not very conducive to regularity of arrangement. His chronological notices of the eras of the art and of the most distinguished painters are extremely valuable, and he notices, usually with tolerable clearness, the great improvements of the art, and the advances which they respectively made. The reader will find in this part of the work many interesting anecdotes of the great painters of Greece; but will often wish that instead of a great variety of unimportant details, and accounts of trivial processes and mechanical excellences, Pliny had given a more full and satisfactory account of many of the masterpieces of antiquity, which he only barely mentions. The excellent materials which he had before him in the writings of several of the ancient artists, and others which he might have consulted, might have been worked up, in better hands, into a far more interesting account. After a short notice of the plastic art, a few chapters at the end of the book are devoted to the medical and other properties of various mineral products, the use of bricks, &c.

For the 36th book "lapidum natura restitat," as Pliny says, "loc est processeus morum insignis." Marble and the other kinds of stone and kindred materials used in buildings, or rather the admirable and curious works in which they have been employed (including a notice of sculpture and sculptors), occupy the greater portion of the book, the remainder of which treats of other minerals, and the medicinal and other uses to which they were applied. The 37th book treats, in a similar manner, of gems and precious stones, and the fine arts as connected with the department of engraving, the whole concluding with an energetic commendation of Italy, as the land of all others the most distinguished by the natural endowments and the glory of its inhabitants, by the beauty of its situation, and its fertility in everything that can minister to the wants of man.

The style of Pliny is characterised by a good deal of masculine vigour and elevation of tone, though its force is frequently rather the studied vehemence of the rhetoric than the spontaneous outburst of impassioned feeling. In his fondness for point and antithesis, he is frequently betrayed into harshness, and his pregnant brevity not uncommonly degenerates into abruptness and obscurity, though much of this latter characteristic which is found in his writings is probably due to the corrupt state of the text.

The editions of Pliny's Natural History are very numerous. The first was published at Venice 1469, and was rapidly followed by many others; but the first edition of any great merit was that by Hardouin (Paris, 1635, in 5 vols. 4to. ; 2nd edition 1723, 3 vols. fol.), which exhibits great industry and learning. The edition published by Panckoucke (Paris, 1799—1833, in 20 vols.) with a French translation by Ajasson de Grandsangne is enriched by many valuable notes by Cuvier and other eminent scientific and literary men of France. These notes are also appended, in a Latin form, in another edition in six volumes (Paris, 1836—38, Panckoucke). The most valuable critical edition of the text of Pliny is that by Sillig (Leipzig, 1831—36, 5 vols. 12mo.). The last volume of this edition contains a collation of a MS. at Bamberg of great value (containing, however, only the last six books), which supplies words and clauses in many passages not suspected before of being corrupt, from which it may be inferred that the text of the earlier books is still in a mutilated state, and that much of the obscurity of Pliny may be traced to this cause. A considerable passage at the end of the last book has been supplied from this manuscript. It appears from his preface that Sillig is engaged upon a more extensive edition of Pliny.

The Natural History of Pliny has been translated into almost all languages: into English by Holland (London, 1601); into German by Denso (1764—65), and Grosse (1781—88, 12 vols.); besides translations of parts by Fritsch and Kilb; into Italian by Landino (Ven. 1476), Brucelli (Ven. 1548), and Domenichi (Ven. 1561); into Spanish by Huerta (Madrid, 1624—29); into French by Dupinet (1663), Poinsinet de Sivry (1771—82), and Ajasson de Grandsangne; into Dutch (ARNHEIM, 1617); into Arabic by HOMAIN IBN ISHAK (JOANNITUS). A great deal of useful erudition will be found in the Exercitaciones Plinianae on the Polyhistor of Solinus, by Salmasius. Another valuable work in illustration of Pliny is the Disquisitiones Plinianae, by A. JOAN HADRIANUS, PARMA, 1763—67, 2 vols. fol. (Ajasson de Grandsangne, Notice sur la Vie et les Ouvrages de Plinie Czocien; Bähr, Geschichte der Römischen Literatur, p. 471, &c.)

[PLINIUS CAECILIUS SECUNDUS, was the son of C. Caecilius, and of Plinia, the sister of C. Plinius, the author of the Naturalis Historia. His native place was probably Comum, now Como, on the Lake Larius, Lake of Como, on the banks of which he had several villæ (Ep. ix. 7). The year of his birth was A. D. 61 or 62, for, in a letter addressed to Cornelius Tacitus (Ep. vi. 20), in which he describes the great eruption of Vesuvius, which happened A. D. 79, he says that he was then in his eighteenth year. His father died young, and after his death Plinia and her son lived with his younger brother, who adopted his nephew, Caecilius. Under the republic his name after adoption would have been C. Plinius Caecilius Secundus.

The education of Plinius was conducted under the care of his uncle, his mother, and his tutor, Verginianus Rufus (Ep. ii. 1). From his youth he was devoted to letters. In his fourteenth year he wrote a Greek tragedy (Ep. vii. 4); but he adds, "what kind of a thing it was, I know not: it was called a tragedy." He studied eloquence under Quintilianus and Noetes Sacerdos (Ep. vi. 9). His acquisitions finally gained him the reputation.

C. P. M. J."

of being one of the most learned men of the age; and his friend Tacitus, the historian, had the same honourable distinction. He was also an orator. In his nineteenth year he began to speak in the forum (Ep. v. 8), and he was frequently employed as an advocate before the court of the Centumviri (Ep. i. 18—ix. 23), and before the Roman senate, both on the side of the prosecution, as in the cases of Baebius Massa and Marius Priscus, and for the defence, as in the cases of Julius Bassus and Rufus Varenus (Ep. vi. 29).

He filled numerous offices in succession. While a young man he served in Syria, as tribunus militiae, and was there a hearer of the stoic Euphrates (Ep. i. 10), and of Artemidora. He was subsequently questor Caesaris, prator in or about a. d. 93 (Ep. iii. 11), and consul a. d. 104, in which year he wrote his Panegyricus, which is addressed to Trajanus (Ep. iii. 13). In a. d. 103 he was appointed proprietor of the province Pontica (Ep. x. 77), where he did not stay quite two years. Among his other functions he also discharged that of curator of the channel and the banks of the Tiber (Ep. v. 15, and an inscription in Gruter, p. 454. 3).

Plinius was twice married. His second wife was Calpurnia, the granddaughter of Calpurnius Fabatus, and an accomplished woman: she was considerably younger than her husband, who has recorded her kind attentions to him, and her affection in a letter to her aunt Hispalla (Ep. iv. 19). He had no children by either wife, born alive.

The life of Plinius is chiefly known from his letters. So far as this evidence shows, he was a kind and benevolent man, fond of literary pursuits, and of building on and improving his estates. He was rich, and he spent liberally. He built a temple at Tiberius, at his own cost, and an aedes to Ceres, on his own property. He contributed, or offered to contribute a third of the cost of establishing a school in his patria (probably Comum), for the education of the youth there, and he asked his friend Tacitus to look out for teachers (Ep. iv. 13). The dedication of a library at the same place, and the establishment of a fund for the benefit of youths (annuus sumptus in alimenita ingeniorum, Ep. i. 8), are among the instances of his generosity recorded in his letters. He was a kind master to his slaves. His body was feeble, and his health not good. Nothing is known as to the time of his death.

The extant works of Plinius are his Panegyricus and the ten books of his Epistolas. The Panegyricus is a fulsome eulogium on Trajanus, in the exordium of which he-addresses the patres conscripti, but in the center of the Panegyricus the emperor himself is addressed in the second person. It is of some small value for the information which it contains about the author himself and his times.

The letters of Plinius, contained in ten books, furnish the chief materials for his life, and also considerable information about his contemporaries. The tenth book consists entirely of letters from Plinius to Trajanus, and from Trajanus to Plinius. The index to Schneer's edition of Plinius indicates the names of all the persons to whom his extant letters are addressed.

Plinius collected his own letters, as appears from the first letter of the first book, which looks something like a preface to the whole collection. He speaks of collecting others of his letters. It is not an improbable conjecture that Plinius may have written many of his letters with a view to publication, or that when he was writing some of them, the idea of future publication was in his mind. However they form a very agreeable collection, and make us acquainted with many interesting facts in the life of Plinius and that of his contemporaries.

The letters from Plinius to Trajanus and the emperor's replies are the most valuable part of the collection. The first letter in the tenth book is a letter of congratulation to Trajanus on his accession to the imperial dignity. Other letters contain requests for favours to himself or his friends; and many of them are on public affairs, on which he consulted the emperor during his government in Asia Minor. The replies of Trajanus are short, and always to the purpose in hand; and in most of them he expresses the matter of the acquiescence of Nicomedia (x. 46, 47), and the aqueduct of Sinope (x. 91, 92); as to covering over a dirty drain in Amastis, which sent forth a pestilent stench (x. 99); on the plan for uniting the lake of Nicomedia to the sea by a canal (x. 50, 51, 69, 70); and on the proposal to compel the deceivers to accept loans of the public money, in order that the interest might not be lost; the emperor's notions of justice would not allow him to accede to such a proposal.

The letter on the punishment of the Christians (x. 97), and the emperor's answer (x. 98), have furnished matter for much remark. The fact of a person admitting himself to be a Christian was sufficient for his condemnation; and the punishment appears to have been death (supplicium minatos: perseverantes duci jussi). The Christians, on their examination, admitted nothing further than their practice of meeting on a fixed day, which it was no fault of theirs to Christ, as God (quasi Deo); their oath (whatever Plinius may mean by sacramentum) was not to bind them to any crime, but to avoid theft, robbery, adultery, breach of faith, and denial of a deposit. Two female slaves, who were said to be deaconesses (ministri), were put to the torture by Plinius, but nothing unfavourable to the Christians could be got out of them: the governor could detect nothing except a perversive extravagance of superstition (superstitionem pravam et immodicum). Hereupon he asked the emperor's advice, for the contagion of the superstition was spreading; yet he thought that it might be stopped. The Romans had a horror of secret meetings, especially for religious celebrations, and they had experience of their mischief, as in the case of the Bacchanalia (Liv. xxxix. 8). They made no distinction between the Christians and others who congregated contrary to law; nor did they ever presume themselves above the particular character of any of these unions: the Roman policy was generally opposed to all meetings at irregular times or places (Ep. x. 43). "It is not true," says Dr. Taylor (Elements of Civil Law, p. 579), "that the primitive Christians held their assemblies in the night to avoid the interruptions of the civil power: but the converse of that proposition is true in the utmost latitude; viz. that they met with molestations from that quarter, because their assemblies were nocturnal." It remains a question if they would have been permitted to hold their assemblies in the day time; and it is not clear that they would. This being premised, the emperor's answer is mild and measured; more mild than the practice of his governor had been, more merciful and just than the proceedings of the Inquisition, and of many religious persecutions among Christians themselves: he approves of the governor's conduct, as explained in his letter, and observes that no general rule can be laid down. Persons supposed to be Christians are not to be sought for: if they are accused and the charge is proved, they are to be punished; but if a man denied the charge, and could prove its falsity by offering his prayers to the heathen gods (dias nostris), however suspected he may have been, he shall be excused in respect of his repentance. Charges of accusation (libelli) without the name of the informer or accuser, were not to be received, as they had been: it was a thing of the worst example, and unsuited to the age.

The first edition of the Epistolae and Panegyricus of Plinius is that of Venice, 1483, 4to. One of the latest and best editions is that of J. M. Gesner, by G. H. Schaefer, Leipzig, 1806, 8vo. The best edition of the Epistolae alone is said to be by Curtius and Longolius, Amsterdam, 1734, 4to. Schaefer's edition contains the life of Plinius by Cælius, who has given references to the several passages in the letters, which are evidence of the facts. There is a much more elaborate life by Masson, Amsterdam, 1709, 8vo. There are German translations of the Epistolae, by E. Thierfeld, 1823—1829; by E. A. Schmid, 1782, &c.; and by J. B. Schaefer, 1801, &c. There is an English version of the Epistolae by Lord Orrery, and another by W. Melmoth.

PLISTONICUS or PLESTONICUS (Πλίστονικός), an ancient Greek physician, a pupil of Praxagoras (Cels. De Med. i. praef. p. 6), who therefore lived probably in the fourth and third centuries B.C. He appears to have written a work on Anatomy (Galen, Comment. in Hippocr. “De Nat. Hom.” ii. 6, vol. xv. p. 136), which is several times mentioned by Galen (De Atro Bilo, c. 1, vol. v. p. 104; De Med. H. i. 3, ii. 5, iv. 4, x. pp. 28.110, 260; De Venae Sect. ad. Erostr. cc. 5, 6, xi. pp. 163, 169; De Simplici, Medicin. et Facult. vi. proem. vol. xi. p. 795; Comment. in Hippocr. “ Epid. VI.” iii. 12, vol. xvII. pt. ii. p. 29; Adv. Julian. c. 5, xvII. pt. i. p. 270), who calls him one of the most eminent physicians of his time (De Hippocr. et Plut. Deor. vii. vol. v. p. 693). He is quoted also by Pliny (H.-N. xx. 13, 48), Atheneus (Deipn. ii. 23, p. 45), Orarius (Coll. Medic. vii. 27, p. 532), and Gairopontus (De Fac. c. 7). None of his writings are now extant.

PLOCAMUS, a Greek sculptor, whose name is inscribed on the plinth of a group of two statues, Bacchus supported by Amphelus. Besides the inscription ΠΛΟΚΑΜΟΣ ΠΟΙΗΣ, there is another on the front of the plinth, ΦΩΚΕΙΝΕ ΚΤΝ ΜΠ, which is evidently of later date. (Beosard, Antiq. Rom. p. iv. tab. 120; Montfaucon, *Antiq. Espér. vol. ii. p. 11; K. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorh. 509, p. 369) [P. S.]

PLOTINA, POMPEIA, the wife of the emperor Trajan, was, according to the concurrent testimony of all the writers who mention her, a woman of extraordinary merits and virtue. As she ascended the steps of the palace after her husband's accession, she turned round to the people, and took them to witness that she always desired to be the same as she was then; and throughout her life her conduct was regulated by this principle. She also increased the popularity of Trajan by repressing the exactions of the procurators. As she had no children, she persuaded her husband to adopt Hadrian, to whom she was much attached; but the statement of Dion Cassius, that her intercourse with Hadrian was of a criminal character, is opposed to all that we know of her character. Plotina survived her husband and died in the reign of Hadrian, who honoured her memory by mourning for her nine days, by building a temple in her honour, and by composing hymns in her praise. Hadrian likewise erected in honour of her a magnificent temple at Nemausus in Gaul. (Dion Cass. lxvII. 5, ixx. 1, 10; Plin. Paneg. 93, 94; Anr. Vict. Epit. 42. § 21; Spartan. Hadr. 4, 12.) In the coin annexed Plotina is called Augustus, but in what year she received that title is uncertain. When Pliny pronounced his Panegyric, that is, in a.d. 100, she had not yet obtained it (Paneg. 94); but an ancient inscription informs us that she was so called in a.d. 105. (Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 465.)

COIN OF PLOTINA, WIFE OF TRAJAN.

PLOTINUS (Πλοτίνος), the originator of the new Platonic system (though not of its fundamental principles), lived so exclusively in speculation, that he appears to have had no other earthly organisation (ἐξορία μὲν ἀκριβῶς ἔρι ἐκ αὐτωτοί ἡμῖν, Porphyry, Vita Plotini, c. 1; comp. Ennod. i. 4. §§ 14, 15), and would tell neither his parents, his forefathers, his native country, nor his birthday, in order to avoid the celebration of it. (Porphyry. cc. i. 2.) When requested to sit for his portrait, he asked, whether it was not enough to bear the image in which nature had veiled us, and whether we ought to commit the folly of leaving to posterity an image of this image? so that his enthusiastic friend, Amelius, only succeeded in getting a faithful portrait of him by introducing an artist to his open lectures, in order that he might observe him accurately and then paint him from memory. (Porphyry. l.c. According to Suidas and others, he was born at Lykopis (Sivrihis) in Asia Minor. That he was of Roman descent, or at least born of a freed man of Rome, is conjectured with great probability from his name. Porphyry could give very little information respecting his earlier life, at least from any personal communication. He learned, however, that he had been fed from the nurse's breast up to his eighth year, although he was already sent to school; that in his twenty-eighth year the impulse to study philosophy was awakened in him, but that not obtaining satisfaction from the teacher he attended (who was named Alexandrius), he fell into a state of great anxiety, and was then brought by a friend to Ammonius Saccas; that from that day forward he remained continuously with Ammonius for eleven years, until in his thirty-ninth year the desire he experienced to learn the philosophy of the Persians and Indians, induced him to join the expedition of the emperor Gordian (A.D. 242). After the death of Gordian he retreated with great difficulty to Antioch, and from thence went, in his fortieth year, to Rome. There he held communication with some few individuals, but kept the doctrines of Ammonius secret, as he had concerted to do with two others of the same school, namely, Herennius and Origen. Even after Herennius and Origen had successively, in opposition to the agreement, begun to make known these doctrines in their books, Plotinus continued only to make use of them in oral communications (ζητηθησαν συνεργείοις παραλληλούς τὰς διατριβάς), in order to excite his friends to investigation, which communications, however, according to the testimony of Amelius, were characterised by great want of order and superfluity of words (ἵνα δὲ η διατριβή... ἀτάξια πλήθος καὶ πολλάζσ φλοραίς). In this manner, when, ten years later, Porphyry came to Rome and joined himself to Plotinus, twenty-one books of various contents had been already composed by him, which in the daily dispersed, however, with discretion and put into the hands of the initiated. (Ib. c. 4.) During the six years that Porphyry lived with Plotinus at Rome, the latter, at the instigation of Amelius and Porphyry, wrote twenty-three books on the subjects which had been earnestly discussed in their meetings, to which nine books were afterwards added. (Porphyry had returned to Sicily in the year 268.) Of the fifty-four books of Plotinus, Porphyry remarks, that the first twenty-one were of a lighter character, that only the twenty-three following were the production of the matured powers of the author, and that the other nine, especially the four last, were evidently written with diminished vigour. Although Porphyry's judgment, however, might only have approved of the edition which he had himself arranged, yet he has carefully given the titles to all three of the portions, as, with justifiable variation, they again appear in the hands of the initiates. (Ec. 5, 6.)

The correction of his writings Plotinus himself committed to the care of Porphyry, on account of the weakness of his sight he never read them through a second time, to say nothing of making corrections; intent simply upon the matter, he was alike careless of orthography, of the division of the syllables, and the clearness of his handwriting. He was accustomed, however, to think out his conceptions so completely, that what he had sketched out in his mind seemed copied as though from a book. He could always, with the utmost confidence, take up the thread of the investigation where he had broken off, without being obliged to read the preceding paragraph anew, even though foreign investigations might have filled up the intervening time. He lived at the same time with himself and with others, and the inward activity of his spirit only ceased during the hours of sleep, which, moreover, this very activity, as well as the scantiness of food to which he had accustomed himself, greatly abridged (Ec. 7, 8); even bread itself he but seldom enjoyed (Ec. 8), and when suffering from pains of the stomach denied himself the bath as well as treacle (a kind that was made of viper's flesh and poppies), the latter because he generally abstained from flesh altogether. (c. 2, ib. Kreuzer.) His written style was close (συνεργείον), pregnant (πελάσων), and richer in thoughts than in words, yet enthusiastic, and always pointing entirely to the main object (εκαθόρισα ρητάς, c. 14). Probably he was more eloquent in his oral communications, and was said to be very clever in finding the appropriate word, even if he failed in accuracy on the whole. Beside this, the beauty of his person was increased when discoursing; his countenance was lighted up with genius, and covered with small drops of perspiration. Although he received questions in a gentle and friendly manner, yet he knew well how to answer them forcibly or to exhaust them. For three whole days, on one occasion, he discussed with Porphyry the relation of the soul to the body. (c. 13.) He ever expressed himself with the great warmth of acknowledgment respecting any successful attempts of his younger friends; as, for example, respecting a poem by Porphyry. Immoral principles he met by exciting opposition against them. (c. 15.)

At a time when, notwithstanding the reigning demoralisation, a deep religious need was awakened, noble minds, which had not yet obtained satisfaction from the open teaching of Christianity, must have attached themselves with great confidence and affection to a personality so fraught with deep reflection as was that of Plotinus. It was not only men of science like the philosophers Amelius, Porphyry, the physicians Paulinus, Eustochias, and Zethus the Arab, who regarded him with deep respect, but even senators and other statesmen did so as well. One of them, named Rogatusian, respected him to such a degree, that he stripped himself of his dignity (he had attained the praetorian rank) and renounced all kind of luxury; this he did, however, to his own bodily comfort, for having been previously lame both in his hands and feet, he perfectly recovered by this simple habit of living the use of all his limbs. (Ec. 7.) Even women attached themselves to him, and his house was filled with youths and maidens, whom their dying parents had entrusted to his direction. He did not only, but in the practical skill that was requisite to manage their affairs, his sharp penetrating judgment and good sense in such matters are highly extolled (Ec. 11), and the care with which he looked through all the accounts respecting their fortune is much praised (Ec. 9).

He enjoyed the favour of the emperor Gallienus and the empress Salonina to such a degree, that he obtained almost the rebuilding of two destroyed towns in Campania, with the view of their being governed according to the laws of Plato (c. 12). Even envy itself was constrained to acknowledge his worth. It is said that the attempt of a certain Alexandrian, named Olympius (who for a short time had been a pupil of Ammonius), to injure Plotinus by magical arts (ἀπειρολογημένου αὐτόν μαγείας) recoiled upon himself, and revenged itself on him by causing the contraction of all his limbs. It is further related, that an Egyptian priest, in the temple of Isis, essayed in the presence of Plotinus to make his attending δαίμων appear, but that instead of this a god presented plotinus himself as the protecting spirit of the philosopher, whose high dignity the Egyptian could now no longer call in question. these relations, occurring as they did at the comparatively sober-mind of porphyry (c. 10; comp. procl. in alcibiad. i. 23. p. 198. cons.), are well worthy of observation, as characteristic of the tendencies of that age, however little disposed we may be to attach any reality to them. although plotinus only attached any faith to the prophecies of the astrologers after a searching examination (c. 15, extr.), yet he believed, as that egypiot did (comp. emeudo. iii. 4), in protecting spirits of higher and lower ranks, and not less, probably, in the power of calling them up through intense meditation, or of working upon those at a distance by magic. it was not indeed to his individual power, but to the divine power, gained by vision, that he ascribed this miraculous agency, but he would none the more acknowledge that the gods had any individual interest in himself; but professed occasion he shut off amelius' request to share with him in a sacrifice, with the words, "these gods of yours must come to me, not to you." (c. 10.)

after plotinus' death, amelius inquired of the delphic apollo whither his soul was gone, and received in fifty-one lam hexameters an ardent panegyric on the philosopher, in which he was celebrated as mild and good, with a soul aspiring to the divinity, loved of god, and a fortunate searcher after truth; now, it was said, he abides like minos, rhadamantus, aeneas, pluto, and pythagoras, where friendship, undisturbed joy (ebipoqivon), and love to deity are enthroned, in fellowship with the ever-blessed spirits (bausovers, c. 22). porphyry, his biographer, adds, that he had raised his soul to the contemplation of the supreme and personal god not without success, and that the deity appeared to him to be something elevated above all body and form, beyond thought and imagination; yes, that during his own intercourse with him, he (plotinus) had, by a transcendent energy of soul, four times risen to a perfect union with god, and confesses that he himself, during a life of sixty-eight years, had only once attained that elevation. (c. 23; comp. plotin. emeudo. v. 5. § 3.) the acknowledgments of longinus, however, speak far more for the influence which plotinus exercised on the mind of his age, than do the manifested deity or the admiring love of porphyry. that excellent critic had at first (having been himself a constant hearer of ammonius and origen) regarded plotinus with contempt (c. 20), and even after his death could not assuredly any kind of agreement with most of his doctrine, and therefore condemned plotinus' doctrine of ideas, and not given in to the answers of porphyry and amelius; yet still he was most anxious to get perfect copies of his books, and extolled at once the pregnancy of their style and the philosophical treatment of the investigations. in the same manner he expresses himself in his work on final causes, and also in a letter written before the death of plotinus; in these writings he unconditionally prefers our lecopolisian, not only to the other philosophers of his time, whether platoons, stoics, or peripatetics, but also to numenius, cronius, moderntius, and thursyllis, more especially in reference to the fullness of the objects treated of (proδhiastae), the originality of the manner in which they were discussed (τρπων θεωριας ἵνα χρησάμενον; amelius is in this respect placed by his side), and the closeness of the reasoning. (ce. 21, 22.)

when suffering from pain in the bowels, plotinus used no other means than daily rubbing, and left this off when the men who assisted him died of the pest (a. d. 263). suidus (who, however, is not to be relied on) says, that plotinus himself was attacked by the plague; porphyry on the contrary (c. 15) states, that the omission of these rubbings produced only disease of the throat (καυναίγας), which gradually became disjointed, so that at last he became speechless, weak of vision, and contracted both in hands and feet. plotinus, therefore, withdrew to the country seat of his deceased friend zethius in campania, and, according to eustochius, passed by puteoli. there was only one of his friends present in the neighbourhood when he died (porphyry had been obliged to go on account of health to lilybaean in sicily, and amelius was on a journey to apaneia in syria), and of him he took leave in the following words: "thee have i waited for, but now i seek to lead back the divine principle within me to the god who is all in all." at his last breath, porphyry relates that a dragon glided from under the bed, and escaped through an opening in the wall. (c. 2.)

in reference to former systems of greek philosophical, we are fully able to point out, for the most part with decision, how far they had prepared the way for plotinus by earlier developments, and how much the peculiarity, both of their matter and their form, gained by his additional and creative reflections. it is not so easy, however, to decide by what peculiar ideas plotinus compressed the new plotonic doctrines into that systematic form in which they lie before us in the emeudoth. this result, indeed, we may see was prepared for by the philosophical efforts of almost two centuries. on the one side, philon and others had attempted to bring the emanation-theory, peculiar to the east, into harmony with the flower of the hellenistic philosophy, namely with platonism; on the other side, various greeks had attempted partly to perfect and complete this theory, as the mature fruit of the greek philosophic spirit, by a selection from the plotonic, aristotelian, and stoic doctrines, partly (as a satisfaction for the religious wants of the age) to base upon it the elements of the symbolism and the faith both of the oriental and greek religions. with reference to the latter, that which first of all had sprung out of the religious wants of the age, was afterwards continued in the hope of raising a barrier against the spread of the christian doctrines, by ennobling the various polytheistic religions, and by perverting the brahminism on a rational basis. but as, on the one hand, the oriental emanation-theory, with its hidden and self-excluding deity, could not strike its roots in the soil of the grecian philosophy, so neither, on the other hand, could the eclectic and syncretic attempts of plutarch, maximus tyrinus, and others, satisfy the requisitions of a regular philosophy of religion. without altogether renouncing these syncretic and eclectic attempts, or rejecting the new intuitive method of the oriental emanation-theories, numenius and his contemporary cronius appeared to be striving to make these several systems accessible to the grecian dialectics. in place of emanations from the divine self-revealing essence, which become more and more finite in proportion as they stand further from the godhead, numenius, approaching nearer to Plato, substitutes the development of eternal ideas, by the intuition (epoiein) of the separate and independent soul, as directed to that absolute and unchangeable Divine essence from which it first proceeded. The unconditional existence, or the good, is not supposed to enter into this development; but its fluctuating image, the soul, by virtue of its innate intuition, can explain the hidden fulness of the original being, and by virtue of its peculiar striving (epoiesis), can set it as, it were, out of itself, and so separate in itself the soul and the spirit. How far Ammonius Saccas entered into such a logical modification of the Emancipation, we cannot decide, neither do we know how far he surpassed his teachers in the form of his logical definitions. We only learn that he pointed out the unanimity of Plato and Aristotle in their essential doctrines, and chose them for his leaders. (Hierocles, de President. ap. Phot. Cod. 214, 251.) According to the fore-mentioned authority of Porphyry, Plotinus had joined himself entirely to Ammonius in the first years of his residence in Rome, and even afterwards, when he had the commentaries of Severus, Cronius, Numenius, Gaius, Atticus, as also those of the Peripatetics, Aspasius, Alexander, Adrasus, read in their meetings, without at the same time following them, the spirit of his former teacher was predominant in all their investigations. (Porphyr. c. 14.) Against the charge of having copied Numenius, Amelius had defended him in a letter to Porphyry (Porph. 17, where the letter referred to is given); and indeed from the worthless fragments that have been handed down to us from the books of Numenius, we could well judge of the matter, even if Plotinus had simply surpassed that Platonic in a few important points, and not in his whole method of philosophising.

With the doctrines of Aristotle, of the Pythagoreans and Stoics, of Hermocles, of the Eleatics, of Anaxagoras and Empedocles, our philosopher was clearly acquainted; he appropriates much from them, and opposes much often with great acuteness; as, for example, in the books on the different species of existence, the Categories. (Ennead. vii. 1—3; comp. Trendelenburg's Historische Beiträge zur Philosophie, 1st vol., Geschichte der Kategorienlehre.) Plato, however, is his constant guide and master. In him he finds the very basis and point of his philosophy more or less distinctly hinted at; he quotes him often with a bare "ipse dixit," is fond of joining his own speculations upon his remarks, and of exhibiting his own agreement with that great Athenian. This connection with Plato is probably common to him with Numenius, as also the critical method of examining the other Grecian systems, which was borrowed from Aristotle. But to him Plato was not, as with Numenius, the Attic Moses; on the contrary, he appears almost designedly to avoid any reference to the Oriental philosophy and religion; he attempts to find all this under the veil of the Greek mythology, and points out here the germ of his own philosophical and religious convictions. Of the Egyptian and other Oriental doctrines of religion he hardly makes any mention at all; and yet to one who was a born Egyptian, and had penetrated so far into Asia, such knowledge could not have been wanting. Case. Plotinus, therefore, cannot be accused of that commixture and falsification of the Oriental mythology and mysticism, which is found in Iamblichus, Proclus, and others of the New Platonian school. Probably it was at his suggestion that Amelius and Porphyry had written against the misuse which already began to be made of the doctrines of Zoroaster. Porphyry (Plotin. c. 16) mentions these writings in connection with the book which Plotinus aimed against the Gnostics, and there can be no doubt but that in this discussion he had to deal also with the Christian Gnostics. It is only their arbitrary Emanation-phantasies, however, their doctrines of matter and evil, and their astrological fatalism that he opposes—the Christian doctrine respecting salvation, which he rather veiled than revealed by them, he leaves entirely untouched; also in the different explanations he gives of his threefold principle, he makes no reference to the Christian Trinity. Porphyry was the first to enter decidedly into the lists against the Christian revelation, and we must attribute it to the manner in which he viewed the task committed to his care, that in the books of Plotinus, which were edited by him, he introduced no unfavourable reference whatever to a religion which he detested.

In order to estimate these writings correctly, we ought not to forget that they originated for the most part in some question or other of temporary interest. Only a few of them can be considered as the commencements of a complete development of their respective subjects; as, for example, the three books on philosophical problems (iv. 8—9) on the different species of existence (vi. 1—3); and on unity and uniformity (vi. 4—5); yet it would be difficult to unite even them in one continuous series of investigations, and still more so the others, especially those that were completed in the first period, which, however, bear more than those of the other periods the character of separate treatises, being adapted only in some few respects to stand in connection with them. We need not, therefore, blame Porphyry, that despairing of all such attempts, he has divided and arranged the books according to the similarity of their subject-matter; perhaps it would have been still better if he had entirely separated the treatises of the first period from those of both the others, and arranged consecutively each of the other divisions separately for itself, on the very same principles by which he had already been guided. These chronological references would, at least, have necesitated a complete discussion of Plotinus's system, however little it might have been practicable to trace the gradual development of that system in the mind of the author. The fundamental and main doctrines of it appear to have been fixed when he first began to write (which was at a tolerably mature period of life), only in the earlier periods they seem to have been concealed behind the particular object he had in view, more than was the case in those elaborations of a later date, which were directed towards the elucidation of the essential features of his own peculiar system. In these latter writings, the endeavour which, as far as we can judge, characterised Plotinus more than any other philosopher of his age, was especially prominent, the endeavour, namely, to pave the way to the solution of any question by a careful discussion of the difficulties of the case. However unsatisfactory this process may generally have proved, yet the insight which it afforded into the peculiarity of the problems was only second to that of Aristotle himself, whom in this respect he appears to have chosen as his master.

The difficulty of comprehending and appreciating the system of Plotinus is greatly increased, not only by the want of any systematic and scientific exhibition of it, and the consequent tedious repetitions, but also by the impossibility of finding in such a mass of isolated treatises the connection of the parts and the foundation of the whole system. No treatises like the Theaetetus and Sophistae of Plato, which undertake to develop and fix the idea of knowledge, and of its objects, are to be found in the Ennead of Plotinus; and from this circumstance we can see how the desire for a strictly scientific foundation in the philosophy of the age had been lost. The middle point of the system, however, may be regarded as involved in the doctrines of a threefold principle, and of pure intuition. We find, if not a perfectly satisfactory, yet at any rate a vigorous attempt to establish these points in the argument, that true knowledge is not attained so long as the knowing and the known, subject and object, are separate from each other. We trust, says Plotinus, to our sense-perceptions, and yet we are ignorant what it is in them which belongs to the objects themselves. We must be ready to suppose that the objects themselves (Σωτάσεως) are to us premises, judgments, or propositions (v. 5, § 1, comp. v. 3, §§ 1—3).

To despair of truth altogether, he considered, notwithstanding this, to be equivalent to a denial of mind itself. Accordingly, we must of necessity presuppose knowledge, truth, and existence; we must admit that the real spirit carries every thing (spiritual) in itself, not merely their types or images; and that for this very reason there is no need of any demonstration or guarantee of truth; but rather, that truth carries its own evidence to the soul. (Ἡ ἐνότατα ἀληθεία συν αὐτοποίησις οὐκ έλθει διὰ' εἰσόργυ, ἢ ν. § 2.)

The true soul cannot therefore deceive; and its knowledge is nothing representational, uncertain, or borrowed from other sources (§ 1). This argumentation, directed as well against the Stoics as the atomistic Sensationalists (comp. vi. 1, § 23, ii. 6, § 1, iii. 6, § 6, iv. 4, § 23, v. 3, §§ 3, 18, ii. 14, 10, vi. 7, § 9), now breaks off, and lends immediately to considerations, in which the mind is regarded as a cosmical principle, not a knowing principle. The conclusion of this train of reasoning is found in the third book of the Enneads, which starts from the question, whether the self-conscious (πνευμόνη) subject, in order to separate the thinking from the thought, presupposes an inherent multiplicity; or whether the simple me can comprehend itself. The former Plotinus cannot admit as valid, since on such a supposition, self and knowledge, the comprehending principle and the comprehended, would be separated from each other; he cannot renounce the idea of a pure self-comprehension, without at the same time renouncing the knowledge of every thing that can be thought of likewise (v. 3, § 1, comp. §§ 4, 5).

After an acute development of the difficulties which oppose themselves to the idea of an absolutely simple self-consciousness, Plotinus attempts to solve them by the supposition that the essence of the soul is a spontaneous activity, and that self-consciousness is to be regarded as including at once thinking itself—the thinking principle; and the object thought (v. 3, §§ 5, 8, § 1). From this it follows still further, that the pure spirit (which does not strive to work out of itself) lives necessarily in a state of self-consciousness and self-knowledge; that the human spirit, however, develops its pure activity only so far as it masters the soul, with which it is connected by the bond of a mediating thought (διάνοια), and rests simply upon itself (v. 3, § 7). Lastly, it is concluded that the human spirit can only know the divine and the spiritual, so far as it knows itself (c. c.). In self-knowledge, thought and existence fall absolutely together; for the former is implied in the process of knowing, the latter in self or the me (vi. 1, § 1). So likewise in all true knowledge, the object must be comprehended immediately (vi. 13, § 9); and have reference to those ideas which are innate in the soul itself. Mediation, or meditating thought, can only be regarded as the way to truth (iv. 4, § 12), without being ever able to reach it (v. 5, §§ 1, 3, 6, 8, § 4, comp. i. 3, §§ 4, 5, 8, § 2). Nay, unconditioned Being, or the Godhead, cannot be grasped by thinking, or science, only by intuition (πανοραμία, vi. 9, § 4, 7, § 35). In this pure intuition, the good, or the absolute being, gazes upon itself through the medium of our own spirits (vi. 7, §§ 16, 34, vi. 6, §§ 7, 8, 19, 9, § 4, iv. 4, § 2, v. 3, § 3). To close the eye against all things transient and variable (δόντα μεταμεμφάσματα, i. 6, § 8), to raise ourselves to this simple essence (πάλπωσις), to take refuge in the absolute (vi. 9, § 11, v. 6, § 11), this must be regarded as the highest aim of all our spiritual efforts. We are necessitated, however, to regard the unconditioned or the good, as the primary ground of the spirit, and of its fundamental idea of being, or of the world of ideas, by virtue of the multiplicity of the acts of the soul's activity, and of their objects, all being included in the conception of being (vi. 3, § 10, 6, § 1, vi. 7, § 37, 9, § 2); for all multiplicity is conditioned and dependent. In this way the unconditioned shows itself as the absolutely simple,—the unconditioned one (v. 4, § 1, vi. 9, § 6), which for that very reason has no need of thinking nor of willing (vi. 9, § 6); and being raised entirely above all the determinations of existence (v. 3, §§ 12, vi. 2, § 3, &c. vi. 18, § 9, § 3) can be described neither as being or not being; neither as moved or resting; neither as free or necessary; neither as a principle or as no principle; nay, which can only be characterised as the unconditioned one, and as the good (v. 2, § 1, 4, § 1, vi. 8, §§ 3, 9, § 9). Accordingly, the absolute is something inexpressible (v. 3, § 8), and can only be reached by the above-mentioned yielding up of the soul to it (comp. vi. 9, § 3, 4, § 9, &c.). Consequently, it is a necessary presupposition to all being, that we think of every kind of existence as dependent upon the absolute, and in a certain sense produced from it (vi. 9, § 3, comp. v. 1, § 6). It (the absolute) must ever stream forth as inexhaustible (v. 2, § 1); it must bring everything else out of itself without becoming the weaker (vi. 8).
§ 19. Essences must flow from it, without its experiencing any change; it must dwell in all existences so far as they partake of the one essential existence (iv. § 17, vi. 9, § 1); as absolutely perfect it must be the end (not the operating cause) of all being (vi. §§ 8, 9). The immediate productive power of the unconditioned one absolutely exists; and next to it stands the spirit, which has a certain connection with duality and plurality, and is the source of all the determinations of being and knowing (v. 1. § 6, v. 6, § 1, v. 2. § 1, vi. 9. § 2). This partakes both of uniformity and diversity—of unity and plurality (v. 1. § 4, vi. 1). The spirit is the basis both of being and thinking, for every act of thought, directed to the unconditioned, produces a real existence, an idea; each one of which is different from the rest by virtue of its form, but identical in respect of the matter (ii. 4. § 4, ii. 5. § 6, iii. 6. §§ 9, 10, vi. 1. § 7, vi. 7. § 10). Out of the spirit is developed the idea itself about it (ii. 4. (A070S, iii. 2. § 2, iv. v. 3—6), that is, the soul. As being the immediate production of the spirit, the soul has a share in all existence or in ideas, being itself an idea (iii. 6. § 18). By it is produced the transition from eternity to time, from rest to motion (iv. 4. § 15, i. 9. § 1; comp. v. 1, § 4) ; to it belongs, in contradiction from the spirit, the power of looking out of itself; and as the result of this a practical activity (ii. 1. § 2, iii. 5. § 3, iii. 6. § 4, v. 1. §§ 6,10, v. 3. § 1, vi. 2. § 22). In its power of imaging the world, it (the soul) stands midway between the intelligible and the sensuous (iv. 8. §§ 2, 3, iv. 9. § 7); the latter is an image of itself, as itself is an image of the spirit. The boundary of being, or the lowest principle of all, is matter; the necessary contrast of the first, or the good (i. 8. § 1, &c.); and in so far it must also be negative and evil (i. 8, i. 7. § 15, iii. 4. § 9); nevertheless in consequence of its subsistence of form, it must have something positive about it (ii. 4. §§ 10—13). Nature, or which is also a soul (iii. 8. § 3), and perception at once the ground and aim of all becoming. But in proportion as the perception becomes more clear and distinct, the corresponding essence belongs to a higher step in the scale of being (iii. 8. §§ 3, 7).

The further development of Plotinus's three principles, and of the dim idea of matter (see especially i. 4, &c.), and the attempts he made to determine the idea of time in opposition to that of eternity (iii. 7), to explain the essential constitution of man, and his immortal blessedness (i. 4, &c.), to maintain the belief in a divine providence, and the freedom of the will, in opposition to the theory of an evil principle, and the inexorable necessity of predetermination or causal sequence (iii. 1—3, comp. ii. 9), together with the first weak beginnings of a natural philosophy (ii. 5—8), and the foundations of an ethical science answering to the above principle grounded on the separation of the lower or political from the higher or intelligible virtue,—these points, as also his researches on the Beautiful, can only just be mentioned in passing (i. 2, 3, comp. 4. 5, and ii. 6).

Beside Porphyry's recension of the books of Plotinus there was also another furnished by Eustochius, out of which a more extensive division of the books on the soul (iv. § 30) has been quoted in a Greek Scholion, and the operation of which on the present text has been traced and pointed out by Fr. Kreuzer (see his remarks to i. 9. § 1, ii. 3. § 8, p. 248. 12, Kreuz. iv. §§ 2, iv. 7. § 8, p. 357, Kr.). Moreover, there is in connection with the last-mentioned passage a completion by Eusebius (Pr. Ec. xv. 22).

The Enneads of Plotinus appeared first in the Latin Translation of Marsilius Ficinus (Florence, 1492), a translation which was furnished with an elaborate introduction to each part, and a full table of contents, and to which the very faulty Greek text of Petrus Perna was appended (Basel, 1530). The Greek and Latin edition of Fr. Kreuzer is much more satisfactory, which is furnished, moreover, with critical and exegetical annotations: "Plotini opera omnia," &c. Oxoni, 1833, 5 vols. 4to. There is an English translation of Selections from the works of Plotinus by Thomas Taylor, London, 1834. [Ch. A. B.]

PLOTIUS. 1. A. PLOTIUS, a friend of Cicero, was curule aedile with Cn. Planiceps, B. C. 54, Sacerdos urbanus with C. Rutilius, proconsul of Bithynia and Pontus, in which province he was at least as late as B. C. 48. (Cic. pro Planc. 7, 22, ad Att. v. 15, ad Fam. xiii. 29.)

2. M. PLOTIUS, was engaged in the civil war, B. C. 48, between Caesar and Pompey. (Cass. B. C. iii. 19.)

PLOTIUS, whose full name was MARIUS PLOTIUS SACERDOS, a Latin grammarian, the author of De Metris Liber, dedicated to Maximus and Simplicius. All that we know with regard to the writer is comprised in the brief notice prefixed by himself to his work "Marius Plotius Sacerdos, Lib. 1. de Metris, de Ratione nec non de Structuram Compositionibus."

Although we have no direct means of determining the period when Plotius flourished we are led to infer from his style that he cannot be earlier than the fifth or sixth century. Endlicher published in his "Analecta Grammatica" from a MS. which once belonged to the celebrated monastery of Bobbio a tract, entitled M. Claudii Sacerdotis Artian Grammaticarum Liber duo, which he endeavoured to prove were in reality the two books by Marius Plotius Sacerdos described above, but there is not sufficient evidence to warrant this conclusion.

The "Liber de Metris" was first published by Putschius in his "Grammaticae Latinae Autors antiqui," 4to. Hanno. 1605. p. 2623—2663, from a MS. or MSS. belonging to Andreas Schottus and Joannes a Wewener. It will be found also in the "Scriptores Latini Rei Metrice" of Gaisford, 8vo. Oxon. 1837. p. 242—302.

PLUTARCHUS. (Πλούταρχος), a tyrant of Eretria in Euboea. Whether he was the immediate successor of Themison, and also whether he was in any way connected with him by blood, are points which we have no means of ascertaining.
PLUTARCHUS.

TRUSTING perhaps to the influence of his friend Meidias, he applied to the Athenians in B.C. 354 for aid against his rival, Callias of Chalcis, who had allied himself with Philip of Macedon. The application was granted in spite of the resistance of Demosthenes, and the command of the expedition was entrusted to Phocion, who defeated Callias at Tanymae. But the conduct of Plutarchus in the battle had placed the Athenians in great jealousy, and though it may have been nothing more than rashness, Phocion would seem to have regarded it as treachery, for he thereupon treated Plutarchus as an enemy and expelled him from Ecretia (Dem. de Pac. p. 58, Philipp. iii. p. 125, c. Meid. pp. 550, 567, 579; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. p. 30, c. Ctes. p. 66; Plut. Phoc. 12, 13; Paus. i. 36.)

CALLIAS; PHOCION.) [E. E.]

PLUTARCHUS (Πλούταρχος), was born at Chaeroneia in Boeotia. The few facts of his life which are known, are chiefly collected from his own writings.

He was studying philosophy under Ammonius at the time when Nero was making his progress through Greece (Περι τῶν Εἰς Ἑλέους, 1), as we may collect from the passage referred to. Nero was in Greece and visited Delphi in A.D. 66; and Plutarch seems to say, that he was at Delphi at that time. We may assume then that he was a youth or a young man in A.D. 66. In another passage (Antonius, 87) he speaks of Nero as his contemporary. His great-grandfather Nicarchus told him what the citizens of Chaeroneia had suffered at the time of the battle of Actium (Plut. Antonius, 68). He also mentions his grandfather Lamprias, from whom he heard various anecdotes about M. Antonius, which Lamprias had heard from Philotas, who was studying medicine at Alexandria when M. Antonius was there with Cleopatra. (Antonius, 29.) His father’s name does not appear in his extant works. He had two brothers, Timon and Lamprias. As a young man, he was once employed on a mission to the Roman governor of the province. (Πολιτικά παραγγέλματα, 20.)

It appears incidentally from his own writings that he must have visited several parts of Italy: for instance, he speaks of seeing the statue or bust of Livius in C. Marius at Ravenna (Marius, 2). But he says in express terms that he spent some time at Rome, and in other parts of Italy (Demosthenes, 2). He observes, that he did not learn the Latin language in Italy, because he was occupied with public commissions, and in giving lectures on philosophy; and it was late in life before he busied himself with Roman literature. He was lecturing at Rome during the reign of Domitianus, for he gives an account of the stoic L. Junius Arulenus Rusticus receiving a letter from the emperor while he was present at one of Plutarch’s discourses (Περι πολυσαγμοσύνης, c. 15). Rusticus was also a friend of the younger Plinius, and was afterwards put to death by Domitianus. Sossius Senecio, whom Plutarch addresses in the introduction to his life of Theophrastus (Plut. Theophr. 1), is probably the same person who was a friend of the younger Plinius (Epist. 13), and consuls several times in the reign of Trajanus.

The statement that Plutarchus was the preceptor of Trajanus, and that the emperor raised him to the consular rank, rests on the authority of Suidas (σ. ε. Πλούταρχος), and a Latin letter addressed to Trajanus. But this short notice in Suidas is a worthless authority; and the Latin letter to Trajanus, which only exists in the Poliarticus of John of Salisbury (Lib. 5. c. 1, ed. Leiden, 1639), is a forgery, though John probably did not forge it. John’s expression is somewhat singular: “ Extat Epistola Plutarchi Trajanum instituentis, quae cujusdam politicæ constitutionis exprimt sensum. Ex dictur esse hujusmodi;” and then he gives the letter.

In the second chapter of this book John says that this Poliarticus Consititutio is a small treatise inscribed “Institutio Trajani,” and he gives the substance of part of the work. Plutarch, who dedicated the Λασαργίματα Βασιλέως καὶ Στρατηγῶν to Trajanus, says nothing of the emperor having been his pupil. But some critics have argued that Plutarch is not the author of the Apophthegmata, because he says in the dedication that he had written the lives of illustrious Greeks and Romans; for they assume that he did not return to Chaeroneia until after the death of Trajanus, and did not write his Lives until after his return. If these assumptions could be proved, it follows that he did not write the Apophthegmata, or at least the dedication. If we assume that he retired to Chaeroneia before the death of Trajanus, we may admit that he wrote his Lives at Chaeroneia and the Apophthegmata afterwards. It appears from his Life of Demosthenes (c. 2), that he certainly wrote that Life at Chaeroneia, and this Life and that of Cicero were the fifth pair. (Demosthenes, c. 3.) Plutarch probably spent the later years of his life at Chaeroneia, where he discharged various magisterial offices, and had a priesthood.

Plutarch’s wife, Timoxena, bore him four sons and a daughter, also named Timoxena. It was on the occasion of his daughter’s death that he wrote his sensible and affectionate letter of consolation to his wife (Παραμυθητικὸς εἰς τὴν ἱδίαν γυναῖκα).

The time of Plutarch’s death is unknown. The work which has immortalised Plutarch’s name is his Parallel Lives (Βίοι Παράλλαλοι) of forty-six Greeks and Romans. The forty-six Lives are arranged in pairs; each pair contains the life of a Greek and a Roman, and is followed by a comparison (σύγκρισις) of the two men: in a few pairs the comparison is omitted or lost. He seems to have considered each pair of Lives and the Parallel as making one book (βιολογια). When he says that the book of the Lives of Demosthenes and Cicero was the fifth, it is the most natural interpretation to suppose that it was the fifth in the order in which he wrote them. It could not be the fifth in any other sense, if each pair composed a book.

There are also the Lives of Artaxerxes Mmenon,
The following Lives by Plutarch are lost:— Epaminondas, Scipio, Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero, Vitellius, Hesiod, Pindar, Crates the Cynic, Diophantus, Aristomenes, and the poet Aratus.

There is extant an imperfect list of the works of Plutarch, intitled Παραπεραγος Βιβλων πιστ., which is attributed to his son Lamprias. Whether Lamprias made the list or not, may be doubtful; but it is probable that a list of Plutarch's works was made in ancient times, for it was common to make such lists; and his son may have performed the pious duty. (Suidas, s. v. Λαμπριας.)

The authorities for Plutarch's Lives are incidentally indicated in the Lives themselves. He is said to quote two hundred and fifty writers, of whom about eighty are writers whose works are entirely or partially lost. The question of the sources of Plutarch's Lives has been examined by A. H. L. Heeren. (De Fontibus et Auctoritate Vitarum Parallelarum Plutarchi Commentationes IV. Goettingae, 1820, 8vo.) Plutarch must have had access to a good library; and if he wrote all his Lives during his old age at Chaeronea, we must infer that he had a large stock of books at command. The passage in the Life of Demosthenes (c. 2), in which he speaks of his residence in a small town, is perhaps correctly understood to allude to the difficulty of finding materials for his Roman Lives; for he could hardly have been deficient in materials for his Greek Biographies. It is not improbable that he may have collected materials and extracts long before he began to compose his Lives. Plutarch being a Greek, and an educated man, could not fail to be well acquainted with all the sources for his Greek Lives; and he has indicated them pretty fully. His acquaintance with the sources for his Roman Lives was less complete, and his handling of them less critical, but yet he quotes and refers to a great number of Roman writers as his authorities, as we may observe particularly in the Lives of Cicero and Caesar. He also used the Greek writers on Roman affairs—Polybius, Theophrastes the historian of Ch. Pompeius, Strabo, Nicolas Damascenus, and others.

In order to judge of his merits as a biographer we must see how he conceived his work. He explains his method in the introduction to his Life of Alexander: he says, that he does not write histories,—he writes lives: and the most conspicuous events in a man's life do not show his character so well as slight circumstances. It appears then that his object was to delineate character, and he selected and used the facts of a man's life for this purpose only. His Lives, as he says, are not histories; nor can history be written from them alone. They are useful to the writer of history, but they must be used with care, for they are not intended even as materials for history. Important historical events are often slightly noticed, and occupy a subordinate place to a jest or an anecdote. The order of time is often purposely neglected, and circumstances are mentioned just when it is most suitable to the biographer's purpose. Facts and persons are sometimes confounded; and a sober painstaking writer, like Drumann (Got-
The English translation of Sir Thomas North, London, 1612, professes to be from the French of Amyot, but it does not always follow the French version, and some passages are very incorrectly rendered by North which are correctly rendered by Amyot. North's version is, however, justly admired for the expression. The translation commonly called Dryden's, was made by many hands; Dryden did nothing further than write the dedication to the Duke of Ormond, and the Life of Plutarch, which is prefixed to the version.

The English version of John and William Langhorne has been often printed. The writer of this article has translated and written Notes on the following Lives: Tiberius and Caius Gracchi, Marius, Sulla, Sertorius, Lucullus, Crassus, Pompeius, Caesar, Cato the Younger, Cicero, M. Brutus and Antonius. The German translation of Kaltwasser, Magdeburg, 1799—1806, 10 vols. 8vo., the last of which is chiefly occupied with an Index, is on the whole a faithful version. The French translation of Dacier is often loose and inaccurate.

Plutarch's other writings, above sixty in number, are placed under the general title of Moralia or Eclogues. They are a historical and anecdotal character, such as the essay on the malignity (κακονθεία) of Herodotus, which neither requires nor merits refutation, and his Apophthegmata, many of which are of little value. Eleven of these essays are generally classed among Plutarch's historical works: among them, also, are his Roman Questions or Inquiries, his Greek Questions, and the Lives of the Ten Orators. But it is likely enough that several of the essays which are included in the Moralia of Plutarch, are not by him. At any rate, some of them are not worth reading. The best of the essays included among the Moralia are of a different stamp. There is no philosophical system in these essays: pure speculation was not Plutarch's province. His best writings are practical; and their merit consists in the soundness of his views on the ordinary events of human life, and in the benevolence of his temper. His "Moralia in Proceribus" are a sample of his good sense, and of his happiest expression. He rightly appreciated the importance of a good education, and he gives much sound advice on the bringing up of children.

His Moral writings are read less than they deserve to be; and his Lives are little read in the original. Perhaps one obstacle to the reading of Plutarch in the original is that his style is somewhat difficult to those who are not accustomed to it. His manner is totally unlike the simplicity of the best Attic writers. But it is one of his merits, that in a rhetorical age he is seldom a rhetorical writer, though he aims and strives at ornament and effect in his peculiar way. His sentences, especially in the Lives, are often ill-constructed, burdened with metaphors, and encumbered with a weight of words,—but they are not words without a meaning; there is thought under them, and we must not complain of a writer because he does not always clothe good ideas in the most becoming dress. The common fault of fine words as of fine dress is that there is nothing under either of them worth looking at.

The first edition of the Moralia, which is said to be very incorrect, was printed by the elder Aldus, Venice, 1509, fol.; and afterwards at Bâle by Froben, 1542, fol., 1574, fol. Wytenbach's edition of the Moralia, the labour of four-and-twenty years, was printed at Oxford in 4to.: it consists of four parts, or six volumes of text (1795—1800), and two volumes of notes (1810—1821). It was also printed at the same time in 8vo. The notes in Wytenbach were also printed at Leipzig, 1821, in two vols. 8vo. The Moralia were translated by Amyot into French, 1565, 3 vols. fol. Kaltwasser's German translation of the Moralia was published at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, 1783—1800, 9 vols. 8vo.

PLUTARCHUS (Πλούταρχος). 1. The youngest, was a son of the famous biographer of the same name, and is supposed by some to have been the author of several of the works which pass usually for his father's, as e.g. the Αρχαγγέλων, and the treatises περὶ ποιοτών καὶ υἱοσκοπῶν τῶν φιλοσόφων. His explanation of the fabled Sirens as seductive courtisans (Tzetz. Chil. i. 14, comp. ad Lycophr. 653) only shows that he belonged to that class of dull and tasteless critics, referred to by Niebuhr with just indi gnation, who thought that they were extracting historical truth from poetry by the very simple and ingenious process of turning it into prose. (See Voss. de Hist. Graec. pp. 231, 232, ed. Westermann; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 232.)

2. An Athenian, son of Nestorius, presided with distinction over the Neo-Platonic school at Athens in the early part of the fifth century, and was surely the Great. He was an Eclectic or Syncretist, and numbered among his disciples Syrusmus of Alexandria, who succeeded him as head of the school, and Proclus of Lycia. He appears to have followed Iamblichus in his doctrine of the efficacy of theurgic rites for bringing man into communion with God, herein illustrating what has been often remarked, that the Neo-Platonic system was the parentage of the Catholic. Plutarch wrote commentaries, which are lost, on the "Timaeus" of Plato, and on Aristotle's treatise "On the Soul." He died at an advanced age, about A. D. 430 (Suid. s. v. Δομινίγος, Ηυλα, Νικόλαος, Οδίνινος, Πρόγλος ο Δάκος; Marin. Vit. Procl. 12; Phot. Bibli. 242; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. pp. 383, 163, 235, 632, v. p. 197, ix. p. 570).

3. Secretary to the emperor Justinian, of the events of whose reign he wrote a history, which has perished. (Nic. Alem. ad Procop. 125; see Fabr. Bibli. Graec. vol. v. p. 197; Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 324, ed. Westermann.)

PLUTION (Πλούτων), a Greek rhetorician, twice quoted briefly by Seneca, as it seems safe to infer that Putton in the second passage should be read Plution. (Suet. i. p. 13, Controvers. i. 3. p. 104, ed. Genev. 1628.) The commentators on the former passage state, on the authority of Eusebius, that he was a celebrated teacher of rhetoric. Westermann places him in the period.
between Augustus and Hadrian. (Geschichte der Griech. Bericht p. 188.) [W. M. G.]

PLUTO (Πλοῦτος). 1. A daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and one of the playmates of Persphone. (Hes. Theog. 355; Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 422.)

2. A daughter of Cronos or Himantes, became by Zeus or Tmolus, the mother of Tantalus. (Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 5; Paus. ii. 22. § 4; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. iii. 41; Hygin. Fab. 155.) [L. S.]

PLUTUS (Πλούτος), the giver of wealth, at first a surname of Hades, the god of the lower world, and afterwards also used as the real name of the god. In the latter sense it first occurs in Euripides. (Herc. Fur. 1104; comp. Lucian, Tim. 21.) [L. S.]

PLUTUS (Πλούτος), sometimes also called Pluton (Aristoph. Plut. 727), the personification of wealth, is described as a son of Iasion and Demeter (Hes. Theog. 969, &c.; Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 491, Od. v. 125). Zeus is said to have blinded him, in order that he might not bestow his favours on righteous men exclusively, but that he might distribute his gifts blindly and without any regard to merit (Aristoph. Plut. 90; Schol. ad Theocrit. x. 19). At Thebes there was a statue of Tyche, at Athens one of Eirene, and at Theopis one of Athena Ergane; and in each of these cases Platus was represented as the child of those divinities, symbolically expressing the sources of wealth (Paus. ix. 16, § 1, 26, § 5). Hyginus (Poet. Astr. ii. 4) calls him the brother of Philomela. He seems to have been commonly represented as a boy with a Cornucopia. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilder, ii. p. 103, &c.) [L. S.]

PLUVIUS, i. e. the sender of rain, a surname of Jupiter among the Romans, to whom sacrifices were offered during long protracted droughts. These sacrifices were called aquitium, "the calling forth of water," because certain magic ceremonies were performed by Etruscan to call down rain from heaven. (Tibull. i. 8. 26; Tertull. Apollog. 40; Fest. p. 2, ed. Müller.) [L. S.]

PNYTAGORAS (Πνυταγόρας). 1. The eldest son of Evagoras, king of Salamis in Cyprus, who served under his father during the war carried on by the latter against the king of Persia [EVAGORAS], and contributed essentially to his successes. Isocrates speaks of him in terms of praise not inferior to those which he bestows upon the father. (Isocrat. Eucy. p. 201; Diod. xv. 4.) The circumstances of the conspiracy which led to the assassination of Evagoras are not very clearly known to us: but it is certain that Pnytagoras also was involved in his fate, and perished together with his father by the machinations of the enmity Thrasydaeus. (Theopomp. ap. Phot. p. 120, a. b. ed. Bekk, Fragm. 111, ed. Didot.)

* There is much confusion in regard to this name. Our MSS. of Diodorus and Isocrates give in some cases Pythagoras, in others Protagoras. But Theopompus, Arrian, Athenaeus, and Q. Curtius, concur in the true form Pnytagoras, which has been judiciously restored by the later editors both of Diodorus and Isocrates. Borrell (Sur les Médailles des Rois de Chypre, p. 49) endeavours to defend the reading Pythagoras on the authority of coins, but their evidence is inconclusive.

2. King of Salamis in Cyprus, in which position he probably succeeded Nicodas, though we have no account of his accession, or his relation to the previous monarchs. But we find him in possession of the city in B.C. 331, when he was besieged there by the younger Evagoras, at the head of an armament destined to reduce Cyprus for the Persian king. Pnytagoras, however, while he held out successfully against the invaders, sent an embassy with offers of submission to the king of Persia, and thus obtained the confirmation of his power. (Diod. xvi. 46.) From this time he appears to have retained the virtual sovereignty un molested until 385, when he submitted, together with the other petty princes of Cyprus, to the Macedonian monarch. He commanded, in person, the fleet with which he assisted the conquer in the siege of Tyre, and rendered important services. In one of the naval actions before that city his own quinquemere was sunk, but he himself escaped, and was rewarded by Alexander after the siege with rich presents, and an extension of territory. (Arr. Anab. ii. 20, 22; Curt. iv. 3, § 11; Durs. ap. Athen. iv. p. 167, c.) His son Nithadan accompanied Alexander throughout his campaigns, and was appointed to the command of a trireme in the descent of the Indus. (Arr. Int. 16.) Borrell, in his Essai sur les Médailles des Rois de Chypre (p. 48—50), has condemned this Pnytagoras with the preceding; and the same error has inadvertently been committed in the article Evagoras, No. 2. Vol. ii. p. 53, a, (E. B.)

POBLICIA GEN. [PUBLICIA GEN.] [PUBLICIA GEN.]

POBLICIA GEN. [PUBLILIA GEN.]

PODALEIRIU (Πόδαλειριος), a son of Asclepius and Euphlegethe, and a brother of Machon, along with whom he led the Thessaliens of Tricca against Troy (Hom. II. ii. 729, &c.; Apollod. iii. 10, § 8; Paus. iv. 31, § 9). He was, like his brother, skilled in the medical art (Hom. Il. xi. 832, &c.). On his return from Troy he was cast by a storm on the coast of Syros in Caria, where he is said to have settled (Paus. ii. 26, § 7; iii. 26, § 7). He was worshipped as a hero on mount Drias. (Strab. vi. p. 284.)

Another mythical personage of this name occurs in Virgil. (Aen. xii. 304.) [L. S.]

PODARGE [HARPYLEAE]

PODARCES (Ποδάρκης). 1. Is said to have been the original name of Priam. (Apollod. ii. 6, § 4; comp. PRIAMUS.)

2. A son of Iphiclus and grandson of Phylacus, was a younger brother of Protesilaus, and led the Thessaliens of Phylace against Troy. (Hom. Il. ii. 695; Apollod. i. § 8; Hygin. Fab. 97; Strab. i. p. 432; Schol. ad Hom. Od. xi. 269.) [L. S.]

POEAS (Πόεας), a son of Phylacus or Thauamas, and husband of Metheone, by whom he became the father of Philocletes (Hom. Od. iii. 190; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 323.). He is mentioned among the Argonauts (Apollod. i. 9, § 16; comp. Pind. Pyth. i. 53), and is said to have killed with an arrow, Talanus, in Crete (Apollod. i. 9, § 26). At the request of Heracles, Poeas kindled the pile on which the hero burnt himself, and was rewarded with the arrows of Heracles. (Apollod. ii. 7, § 7; comp. HERACLES and PHILOCLETES.) [L. S.]

POEMANDER (Ποιεμάνδρης), a son of Charesillaus and Stratonice, was the husband of Tanagra.
POLEMUS.

dughter of Aecolus or Aecontus, by whom he became the father of Epiphanes and Leucippus. He was the reputed founder of the town of Tanagra in Boeotia which was hence called Poemantiaca. When Poemander inadverently had killed his own son, he was purified by Elephonon. (Paus. ix. 20. § 2; Plut. Quaest. Graec. 70; comp. Strab. ix. p. 404; Lyonpr. 326.)

POENA (Πόνη), a personification of retaliation, is sometimes mentioned as one being, and sometimes in the plural. They belonged to the train of Dice, and are akin to the Erinnyes (Aeschyl. Choephor. 936, 947; Paus. i. 43. § 7.) [L.S.]

POENIUS POSTUMUS, praefectus of the camp of the second legion in Britain during the war against Boadicea (Tac. Ann. xiv. 37.)

POETE/LIA GENS, plebeian (Dionys. x. 56), first occurs at the time of the decemvirate. The name is frequently confounded with that of Petullius or Petullus [PETELLIA GENS.] The only family-name in this gens is that of Libo, which is usually found with the agnomen Viscus. Livy (vii. 11), it is true, says that C. Poetellus Balbus was consul a. c. 360 with M. Fabius Ambustus; but as the Nepos Fasti make C. Poetellus Libo the colleague of Fabius, and Balbus does not occur elsewhere as a cognomen of the Poetelli, the cognomen in Livy is probably either an error or a corruption. All the other Poetelii bear the same name Libo with the exception of P. Poetellus, who was sent as one of the three ambassadors to Syphax in b. c. 210. (Liv. xxvii. 4.)

POGONATUS CONSTANTINUS. [Constantius IV.]

POLE, SERVIUS, one of Cicero's enemies, and described by him as " homo tecter et feros" (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 13, comp. ad Fam. vii. 12.) He is the same as the person called simply Servius in another passage (ad Q. Fr. ii. 6), and is supposed by Pighini to be the same as the Servius, who was condemned in b. c. 51, when he was tribune of the plebs elect (ad Fam. viii. 4.)

POLEMARCHUS (Πολεμαρχος). 1. The pupil of the celebrated astronomer Eudoxus, whose instructions he received in Cynicus, his native place, and the teacher of the more celebrated Calippus, who accompanied him to Athens (Simplicius, de Caelo, ii. p. 120, a.), He lived about the middle of the fourth century B. C.

2. Of Tarentum, and a follower of Pythagoras (Iamblich. Vit. Pyth.). Fabricius conjectures (Bibl. resec. vol. i. p. 864) that he is the same with the Polyarchius or Polyarchus, who is mentioned by Athenaeus (xvi. p. 543), as having been sent by Dionysius the younger, on an embassy to Tarentum, where, being intimate with Archytas, he dictated to that philosopher on the excellency of pleasure; his discourse being given by Athenaeus, on the authority of Aristoxenus. But this seems an unhappy conjecture. The doctrines ascribed to Polyarchus are certainly not those of the school of Pythagoras; nor is it even hinted that he was a native of Tarentum.

3. A writer of this name is quoted by Athenaeus (iv. p. 111, c.), whom, from his being named along with Arthenemus and Heracleon, we should judge to be a grammarian. [W. M. G.]

POLEMUS, or SALVIUS, or SYLVIUS, the author of a sacred calendar, drawn up a. D. 448, which is entitled Letoecius s. Iulii Divi Iulii Pectorum, and which includes Heathen as well as Vol. III.

POLEMON.

Christian festivals, is generally believed to have been bishop of Martigny, in the Valais. A portion of this Leproclus was published by Bollandi in the general preface to the Acta Sanctorum, vol. i. pp. 44, 45, and the whole will be found, but in a mutilated state, in the seventh volume of the same work, p. 178. (Mansi, ad Fabric. Bibl. Med. et Infin. Lat. vi.; Schönenmann, Bibl. Patrum Lat. vol. ii. § 50.)

POLEMOCLES (Πολεμόκρατος), a son of Machaon, and, like his father, a skilful physician; he had a heroum at Eua in Argolis. (Paus. ii. 38. § 6.)

POLEMEN (Πολέμεων), historical.

1. Son of Andromenes the Staphyman, a Macedonian officer, in the service of Alexander the Great. The great intimacy which subsisted between him and Philotas caused him to be suspected, together with his brothers Amyntas, Attalus, and Simmias, of participating in the treasonable designs imputed to Philotas; a charge to which Poemen had the imprudence to give countenance by taking to flight immediately on learning the arrest of the son of Parmenion. Amyntas, however, who remained, having successfully defended himself before the assembly of the army, obtained the pardon or acquittal of Polemon also. (Arr. Anab. iii. 27; Curt. vii. i. § 10, 2. § 1—10.)

2. Son of Theoges, a Macedonian of Pella, who was one of the officers appointed by Alexander to command the garrison at Memphis, b. c. 331. (Arr. Anab. iii. 5. § 4.)

3. Son of Themmenes, a Macedonian officer, who was left by Alexander in the command of a fleet of thirty triremes which was destined to guard the mouths of the Nile, and the sea-coast of Egypt, b. c. 331. (Arr. Anab. iii. 5. § 6; Curt. iv. 8. § 4.)

4. A Macedonian officer of rank, who, in the disputes that followed the death of Alexander, distinguished himself as a warm partizan of Perdiccas. In order to conciliate the favour of the regent, he endeavoured, though ineffectually, to prevent Arrhidaeus from transporting the body of the deceased monarch to Egypt (Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 70, b.) He afterwards served under Alcetas, the brother of Perdiccas, and was taken prisoner by Antigonus in Pisidia, together with Attalus and Docimus, b. c. 320. From this time he shared the fortunes of Attalus; the history of their captivity, escape, and final death has been already given. [ATTALUS, No. 2.] (Diod. xviii. 45, xix. 16.) It is highly probable, as suggested by Droy sen, that this Polemon is the same with the son of Andromenes (No. 1), and that he was consequently a brother of Attalus, with whom we find him so closely connected.

5. A dynast of Olba in Cilicia, whose name appears on the coins of that city, with the titles of Ἀρχισειστής and Διονυσίας. As it is associated with that of M. Antony, there is little doubt that he is the same person who is mentioned by Appian (B.C. . . . F F

v. 75) as being appointed by Antony to the sovereignty of a part of Cilicia, and who subsequently became king of Pontus [POLEMON I.] The grounds on which this identity is denied by Eckhel (vol. iii. p. 63) are not satisfactory. (Visconti, Iconographie Greque, vol. iii. p. 5, &c.) [E. H. B.]

POLEMON (Πολεμών), the name of two kings of Pontus and the Bosphorus.

1. POLEMON I., was the son of Zenon, the oment of Laodicea, and it was as a reward for the services rendered by his father as well as himself that he was appointed by Antony in n. c. 39 to the sovereignty of a part of Cilicia (Appian, B. c. v. 75; Strab. xii. p. 578.) At a subsequent period he obtained from the triumvir in exchange for this principality the more important government of Pontus with the title of king. The precise date of this change is unknown, but Polemon is already called by Dion Cassius king of Pontus in n. c. 36, in which year he co-operated with Antony in his campaign against the Parthians. On this occasion he shared in the defeat of Appius Statianus, and was taken prisoner by the Parthian king, but allowed to ransom himself, and restored to liberty. (Dion Cass. xiii. 25; Plut. Ant. 38.) In n. c. 35 he was employed by Antony to negotiate with the Median king Artavasdes, whom he succeeded in detaching from the alliance of Parthia, and gaining over to that of Rome: a service for which he was subsequently rewarded by the triumvir by the addition to his dominions of the Lesser Armenia. (Dion Cass. xiii. 34, 44.) But though he thus owed his elevation to Antony he was fortunate not only to share in his fall, and although he had sent an auxiliary force to the assistance of his patron in n. c. 30, shortly before the battle of Actium, he was able to make his peace with Octavian, who confirmed him in his kingdom, and some years afterwards bestowed on him the honorary apppellations of a friend and ally of the Roman people. (Plut. Ant. 61; Strab. xii. p. 578; Dion Cass. liii. 25.) At a subsequent period (about n. c. 16) he was intrusted by Agrippa with the charge of reducing the kingdom of Bosphorus, which had been usurped by Scribonius after the death of Assander. The usurper was put to death by the Bosphorans before the arrival of Polemon, who notwithstanding some opposition established himself in the sovereignty of the country, in which he was confirmed, first by Agrippa and then by Augustus himself. (Dion Cass. liv. 24.) His reign after this was long and prosperous: his dominions comprised, besides Pontus itself, Cethis and the other provinces, as far as the kingdom of the Bosphorus, the confines of which last he extended to the river Tanais, and destroyed the city of that name, which had ventured to throw off his yoke. (Strab. xi. pp. 493, 495, 499.) But having engaged in an expedition against the barbarian tribe of the Aspurgians (who inhabited the mountains above Phanagoria) he was not only defeated by them, but taken prisoner, and immediately put to death. (1d. xi. p. 493, xii. p. 556.) The date of this event is unknown; but it appears from an inscription that he must have been still on the throne as late as B. c. 2. (Böckh, Corp. Insr. vol. ii. No. 3524; Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 693.)

Polemon had been twice married: first to Dynamis, a daughter of Pharmaces, and granddaughter of Mithridates the Great, by whom he appears to have had no children. (Dion Cass. liv. 24); and secondly to Pythodorus, who succeeded him on the throne. By her he left two sons, Polemon II., and Zenon king of Armenia, and one daughter who was married to Cotys king of Thrace. (Strab. xii. p. 556; Tac. Ann. ii. 56.)

2. POLEMON II., was a son of the preceding and of Pythodorus. During the lifetime of his mother he was content to remain in a private station, while he assisted her in the administration of her dominions: but in a. d. 39, he was raised by Caligula to the sovereignty not only of Pontus, which had been held by Pythodorus, but of the Bosphorus also. This last was, however, afterwards taken from him by Claudius, who assigned it to Mithridates, while he gave Polemon a portion of Cilicia in its stead, A. d. 41. (Dion Cass. lix. 12, lx. 8.) He appears to have been a man of a weak character, and in a. d. 48 allowed himself to be persuaded by Berenice, the widow of Herod, king of Chalcis, to adopt the Jewish religion in order that he might marry that princess, who possessed vast wealth. But Berenice had sought this marriage only as a cloak for her illicit amours [Berenice, No. 21]; it was in consequence soon dissolved, and Polemon ceased to profess Judaism (Joseph. Ant. xx. 7. § 8). At a subsequent period he was induced by Nero to abdicate the throne, and Pontus was reduced to the condition of a Roman province. This appears to have taken place about the year A. d. 62 (Suet. Nero, 18; Eutrop. vii. 14; Abs. Vict. de Caesar. 6. § 2; Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 873.) As the city of Polemonium on the Euxine (Seym. Ch. Fr. i. 177; Steph. Byz. s. v. Πολεμών) is not mentioned by Strabo, it appears certain that we must ascribe its foundation to Polemon II., and not to his father. Concerning the coins of the two Polemons, see Cary, Hist. des Rois de Thrace et de l'Asie mineure, 4to. Paris, 1752, and Eckhel, vol. ii. pp. 368—373. [E. H. B.]

COIN OF POLEMON II.

POLEMON (Πολεμών), literary, 1. Of Athens, an eminent Platonic philosopher, and for some time the head of the Academy; he was the son of Philostratus, a man of wealth and political distinction. In his youth, Polemon was extremely profligate; but one day, when he was about thirty, on his bursting into the school of Xenocrates, at the head of a band of revellers, his attention was so arrested by the discourse, which the master continued calmly in spite of the interruption, and which chanced to be upon temperance, that he tore off his garment and remained an attentive listener, and from that day he adopted an abstemious course of life, and continued to frequent the school, of which, on the death of Xenocrates, he became the head, in Ol. 116, b. c. 315. According to Eusebius (Chron.) he died in OI. 126. 4, b. c. 273. Diogenes also says that he died at a great age, and of natural decay. He esteemed the object of philosophy to be, to exercise men in things and deeds, not in dialectic speculations; his character was grave and severe; and he took pride in displaying the mastery which he had acquired over emotions of every sort. He was a close follower of Xenocrates in all things, and an intimate friend of Crates and Crantor, who were his disciples, as well as Zeno and Arsesias; Crates was his successor in the Academy. In literature he most admired Homer and Sophocles, and he is said to have been the author of the remark, that Homer is an epic Sophocles, and Sophocles a tragic Homer. He left, according to Diogenes, several treatises, none of which were extant in the time of Suidas. There is, however, a quotation made by Clemens Alexandrinus, either from him or from another philosopher of the same name, ἐν τοῖς περὶ τοῦ κατὰ φόνον βίου (Strom. vii. p. 117), and another passage (Strom. ii. p. 410), upon happiness, which agrees precisely with the statement of Cicero (de Fin. iv. 6), that Polemon placed the sumnum bonum in living according to the laws of nature. (Diog. Laern. iv. 16—20; Suid. s. v.; Plut. de Astr. et Amic. 32, p. 71, e.; Lucian. Diass. Accusat. 16, vol. ii. p. 611; Arizot. Hist. 148, c. 6; Cic. Acad. 4, 50; Orat. iii. 18, de Fin. ii. 6, 11, iv. 2, 6, 16, 18, v. 1, 5, 7, et alii.; Horat. Serm. ii. 3. 253, fol.; Val. Max. vi. 9; Menag. ad Diog. Laern. l. c.; Fabric. Bibl. Grac. vol. iii. p. 183; comp. p. 323, n. 66.)

3. Of Athens by citizenship, but by birth either of Ilion, or Samos, or Sicyon, a Stoic philosopher and an eminent geographer, surnamed ὁ περιπατήτης, was the son of Euegetes, and a contemporary of Aristophanes of Byzantium, in the time of Polemy Epiphanes, at the beginning of the second century n. c. (Suid. s. v.; Ath. vi. p. 234; Clinton. F. H. vol. iii. sub ann. n. c. 198). In philosophy he was an ancestor of the Academy. He made extensive journeys through Greece, to collect materials for his geographical works, in the course of which he paid particular attention to the inscriptions on votive offerings and on columns, whence he obtained the surname of Ἐπιγραφαί. (Ath. l. c.; Casaub. ad loc.) As the collector of these inscriptions, he was one of the earlier contributors to the Greek Anthology, and he wrote a work expressly, Περὶ τῶν κατὰ πόλεις ἐπιγραμματῶν (Ath. x. pp. 436, d., 442, e.); besides which, other works of his are mentioned, upon the votive offerings and monuments in the Acropolis of Athens, at Lacedaemon, at Delphi, and elsewhere, which no doubt contained copies of numerous epigrams. Hence Jacobs infers that, in all probability, his works formed a chief source of the Garland of Meleager (Animad. in Anth. Graec. vol. i. Proem., pp. xxxiv. xxyv.). Athenaeus and other writers make very numerous quotations from his works, the titles of which it is unnecessary to give at length. They are chiefly descriptions of different parts of Greece; some are on the paintings preserved in various places, and several are contoversial, among which is one against Eratosthenes. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 184; Vossius. de Hist. Graec. pp. 159, foll. ed. Westermann; Clinton. F. H. vol. iii. p. 524, where a list of his works is given.)

4. Antonius, a highly celebrated sophist and rhetorician, who flourished under Trajan, Hadrian, and the first Antoninus, and was in high favour with the two former emperors. (Suid. s. v.; Philostr. Vit. Soph. p. 532.) He is placed at the sixteenth year of Hadrian, a. d. 133, by Eusebius (Chron.). His life is related at considerable length by Philostratus (Vit. Sophist. ii. 25, pp. 530—544). He was a rhetorician, at Laodicea, but spent the greater part of his life at Smyrna, the people of which city conferred upon him at a very early age the highest honours, in return for which he did much to promote their prosperity, especially by his influence with the emperors. Nor, in performing these services, did he neglect his native city Laodicea. An interesting account of his relations with the emperors Hadrian and Antoninus is given by Philostratus (pp. 533, 534).

Among the sophists and rhetoricians, whom he heard, were Timocrates, Scopelianus, Dion Chrysostom and Apollonphanes. His most celebrated disciple was Aristeides. His chief contemporaries were Herodes Atticus, Marcus Byzantinus, Dionysius Miliensis, and Favorinus, who was his chief rival. Among his imitators in subsequent times was S. Apollonfanhes, who, as was added by Zeno, his style of oration was imposing rather than pleasing; and his character was haughty and reserved. During the latter part of his life he was so tortured by the gout, that he resolved to put an end to his existence; he had himself shut up in the tomb of his ancestors at Laodicea, where he died of hunger, at the age of sixty-five. The exact time of his death is not known; but it must have been some time after a. d. 143, as he was heard in that year by Verus.

The only extant work of Polemon is the funeral orations for Cynaegirus and Callimachus, the generals who fell at Marathon, which are supposed to be pronounced by their fathers, each exulting his own son above the other. Philostratus mentions several others of his rhetorical compositions, the subjects of which are chiefly taken from Athenian history, and are orations which he pronounced, by command of Hadrian, at the dedication of the temple of Zeus Olympus at Athens, in a. d. 135.

His Λέγοι εἰκοσάτα ον were first printed by H. Stephanus, in his collection of the declamations of Polemon, Himerius, and other rhetoricians, Paris, 1547, 4to., afterwards by themselves in Greek, Paris, 1556, 4to.; and in Greek and Latin, Toless, 1637, 8vo. The latest and best edition is that of Caspar and Conrad Orelli, Lips. 1819, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 2—4; Clinton. Fasti Romani, s. a. 133, 153, 143.) There is a coin of Hadrian, bearing the inscription ΠΟΛΕΜΟΝ. ΑΝΕΘΕΙΚΕ. ΣΜΥΡΝΑΙΟΙ. (Rusche. Lexicon Rei Num. s. v. Polemon; Eckhel. Doctr. Num. Vet. vol. ii. p. 662.) This coin belongs to a class which Eckhel has explained in his style of oration (vol. iv. c. 19, pp. 368—374). The question respecting the identity of the sophist with the writer, who forms the subject of the following article, is discussed by Fr. Passow (Über Polemonen Zeitalter, in the Archiv. für Philologie und Poesiogaph, 1825, vol. i. pp. 7—9, Vermischte Schriften, p. 137.) [P. S.]

ΠΟΛΕΜΟΝ (Πολήμων), the author of a short Greek work on Physiognomy, which is still extant. Nothing is known of the events of his life, but from some expressions that he uses (e. g. the word εἰκόνομον, i. 6. p. 197) it has been supposed that he was a Christian. With respect to his date it can only be stated that he must have lived in or before the third century after POLITES.

Christ, as he is mentioned by Origen (Cont. Cels. i. 33, p.351, ed. Bened.), and from his style he cannot be supposed to have lived much earlier than this time. His work, which appears to have suffered much from the ignorance of transcribers, consists of two books: in the first, which contains twenty-three chapters, after proving the utility of physiognomy, he lays down the general principles of the science; he speaks of the shape of the head, the colour of the hair, of the forehead, the eyes, the ears, the nose, the manner of breathing, the sound of the voice, &c.; in the second book, which consists of twenty-seven chapters, he goes on to apply the principles he had before laid down, and describes in a few words the characters of the courageous man, the timid, the impudent, the passionate, the talkative, &c. It was first published in Greek by Camillus Perseus, with Aelian's "Varia Historia," and other works, at Rome, 1545, 4to. It was translated into Latin by Nicolaus Petreius, and published with Meletius "De Natura Hominis," and other works, at Venice, 1552, 4to. The last and best edition is that by J. G. F. Franz in his "Scriptores Physiognomoniae Veteres," Altenburg, 1780. 8vo. in Greek and Latin, with a Preface and Notes. It was translated into Arabic, and is still extant in that language. [Philemon.] (See Franz's Preface to his "Script. Physig. Vet." and Penny Cyclopaedia.) [W. A. G.]

POLLEMON, of Alexandria, a painter mentioned by Pliny among those who were non ignobiles quidem, in transversam tamen dixerunt (II. N. xxxvi. 14. s. 40, § 42). [P. S.]

POLI-LIAS (Πολιάς), i. e. "the goddess protecting the city," a surname of Athens at Athens, where she was especially worshipped as the protecting divinity of the acropolis. (Paus. i. 27. § 1; Arnob. adv. Gent. vi. 193.) [L. S.]

POLICHUS, artist. [Potlichus]

POLIEUS (Πολίευς), "the protector of the city," a surname of Zeus, under which he had an altar on the acropolis at Athens. Upon this altar barley and wheat were strewn, which were consumed by the bull about to be sacrificed to the god. The priest who killed the victim, threw away the axe as soon as he had struck the fatal blow, and the axe was then brought before a court of justice. (Paus. i. 24. § 4, 28, § 11.) [L. S.]

POLIOCHUS (Πολιόχου), an Athenian comic poet, of uncertain age, of whom two fragments only occur in Athenaeus (vii. p. 313, c. ii. p. 60, c.), the one from his Kýrós

POLIORCETES, DEMETRIUS. [Demetrius, p. 962.]

POLIS, a statuary, mentioned by Pliny among those who made athletas et armatnos ex velutina specifically (II. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19, § 34). [P. S.]

POLITES (Πολίτης). 1. A son of Priam and Hebebe, and father of Priam the younger, was a valiant warrior, but was slain by Pyrrhus. (Hom. ii. 791, xiii. 533, xxiv. 250; Virg. Aen. ii. 526, v. 564.)

2. A companion of Odysseus, who is said to have been worshipped as a hero at Temesa in Italy. (Hom. Od. x. 224; Strab. vi. p. 255.)

3. One of the companions of Menelaus. (Paus. v. 23. § 32.) [L. S.]

POLLYCHOS (Πολύχος), i. e. "protecting the city," occurs as a surname of several divinities, such as Athena Chalicoeus at Sparta. (Paus. iii. 17. § 2), and of Athena at Athens. (Comp. Athena.) [L. S.]

POLLA, the name of several Roman females, was merely another form of Paulia, like Claudius of Claudius.

1. The wife of D. Brutus, one of the murderers of Caesar. Cicero calls her simply Polla (ad Fam. xi. 8), but we learn from a letter of Caelius (ad Fam. vii. 7) that her full name was Paulia Valeria. She was a sister of the C. Valerius Triarius, who was tribune of the plebs b. c. 51, and who subsequently served in the civil war in Pompey's fleet. She divorced her husband, whose name is not mentioned, in b. c. 50, without being able to give any reason for so doing, and then married D. Brutus (ad Fam. viii. 7).

2. The mother of L. Gellius Publicola. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 24, where the manuscripts have Pulla.)

3. The sister of M. Agrippa. (Dion Cass. lv. 8.)

4. ACERONIA POLLIA, the friend of Agrippina, is spoken of under Aceronia.

5. VESPASIA POLLA, the daughter of Vespasian, Pollio, and the mother of the emperor Vespasian. (Suet. Vesp. 1.)

6. ARGENTARIA POLLA, the wife of the poet Lucan. (Stat. Silv. ii. 7. 62, &c.; Martial, vii. 21, 23, x. 64.)

POLLENIUS SEBENNUS, lived in the reign of Alexander Severus (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 9.)

POLLES (Πολέης). Suidas mentions (s. e. Μελανίους), that Melampus and Polles had required such celestial signs as showed that there was no current in the Melampus or a Polles to dictate it. He was a native of Aegae in Asia Minor, and wrote copiously on the subject of divination in all its forms; as on the prognostications to be derived from the objects that met a traveller on his way; from what occurred at home; regarding the result of diseases; and similar subjects, for which see Suidas (s. e. Ξωναντικήν, Πολέης). [W. M. G.]

POLLEX, one of Cicero's slaves. (Cic. ad Fam. xiv. 6, ad Att. viii. 5, xiii. 46, 47.)

POLLIA'NUS (Πολλίανος), an epigrammatic poet, five of whose pieces are preserved in the Greek Anthology. From the first of these epigrams it is probable that he was a grammarian; the third is addressed to a poet named Florus, who is possibly the Florus who lived under Hadrian; but there is no other indication of the writer's age. (Brucke, AnaL vol. ii. p. 439; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. pp. 146, 147, vol. viii. p. 940.) [P. S.]

PO'LLIO, a statuist. A gem-engraver (Brucke, Proef. ad Comm. ii. p. 6).

2. C. Postumius, an architect, whose name occurs in an inscription in the cathedral at Terracina from which it may be inferred, with much probability, that he was the architect of the celebrated temple of Apollo at that place. From another inscription it appears that C. Coecusius, the architect of the temple of Augustus at Pozzuoli, was the freedman and disciple of this Postumius Pollio. (R. Rochester, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 410—441, 2nd ed.) [P. S.]

PO'LLIO, A'NNIUS, was accused of treason (majesia) towards the end of the reign of Tiberius, but was not brought to trial. He was subsequently one of Nero's intimate friends, but was notwithstanding accused of taking part in Piso's conspiracy against that emperor in A. D. 63, and was in consequence banished. His wife's name was Servilia. (Tac. Ann. vi. 9, xv. 56, 71, xvi. 30.)

POLLIO, ANTIUS, one of the consules sufecti in A. D. 155 (Fasti).

POLLIO, ASIUS, I. C. ASINIUS POLlio, a distinguished orator, poet and historian of the Augustan age. He was descended from a family of the Marcianis, and he may have been a grandson of the Herius Asinius, who commanded this people in the Marsic war. We learn from the Fasti Capitolini, and from inscriptions, that his father's name was Cneius. Pollio was born at Rome in B. c. 76 according to Hieronymus (in Euseb. Chron.), and he had consequently frequent opportunities of hearing in his youth Cicero, Caesar, Horace, and the other great orators of the age. He was early fired with the ambition of treading in the footsteps of these illustrious men, and entered on his career when he was only twenty-two years of age. He came forward as the accuser of C. Cato, on account of the disturbances which the latter had caused in B. C. 56, when he was tribune of the plebs. Cato was defended by C. Licinius Calvus and M. Scaurus; but as the illegal acts of which he was accused, had been performed to favour the election of Pompey and Crassus to the consulship, he was now supported by the powerful influence of the former, and was accordingly acquitted. It can scarcely be inferred from this accusation that Pollio was in favour of the republican party; he probably only wished to attract attention, and obtain celebrity by his bold attack against one of the creatures of the triumvirs. At all events, he espoused Caesar's party, when a rupture at length took place between Caesar and Pompey, and repaired to Caesar in Cisalpine Gaul probably in the course of B. C. 50. He accompanied Caesar in his passage across the Rubicon at the beginning of B. c. 49, on which occasion he is mentioned in a manner that would indicate that he was one of Caesar's intimate friends (Plut. Cees. 32), and was a witness of his triumphal progress through the towns of Italy. After Caesar had obtained possession of Italy Pollio was sent, under the command of Curio, to drive M. Cato out of Sicily, and from thence crossed over with Curio into Africa. After the unfortunate battle, in which Curio was defeated by King Juba, and in which he lost his life, Pollio hastened back to the camp at Utica, collected the remains of the army, and with difficulty made his escape. He next joined Caesar, accompanied him in his campaign against Pompey in Greece, and was present at the battle of Pharsalia, B. C. 48, which he could therefore describe as an eye-witness. After the battle of Pharsalia he returned to Rome, and was probably tribune of the plebs in B. C. 47, since he is mentioned in that year as one of the opponents of the tribune Dlobulla, who was endeavouring to carry a measure for the abolition of all debts (Plut. Anton. 9), and as a private person he could not have offered any open resistance to a tribune. In the following year, B. C. 46, Pollio fought under Caesar against the Pompeian party in Africa, and he related in his history how he and Caesar on one occasion had driven back the enemy when their troops were surprised (Plut. Cees. 52). He also accompanied Caesar next year, B. C. 45, in his campaign in Spain, and on his return to Rome must have been one of the fourteen praetors, whom Caesar appointed in the course of this year, since we find him called praetorius in the history of the year 44 (Vell. Pat. ii. 75.) He did not, however, remain long in Rome, for Caesar sent him again into Spain, with the command of the further Province, in order to prosecute the war against Sex. Pompey, who had again collected a considerable force since the battle of Munda. He was in his province at the time of Caesar's death on the 15th of March, B. c. 44, and his campaign against Sextus is described by his panegyrist Velleius Paterculus (l. c.) as most glorious; but he was, in fact, defeated, and nearly lost his life in the battle (Dion Cass. xlv. 10). He would probably have been unable to maintain his position in his province, if a peace had not been concluded after Caesar's death between Rome and Sextus. This was brought about by the mediation of Antony and Lepidus; Sextus quit Spain, but Pollio continued quietly in his province.

On the breaking out of the war between Antony and the senate in B. C. 43, Pollio was strongly pressed to assist the latter with troops. In his letters to Cicero, three of which have come down to us (ad Fam. x. 31—33), he expresses great devotion to the cause of the senate, but alleges various reasons why it is impossible for him to comply with their request. Like most of Caesar's other friends, he probably did not in heart wish success to the senatorial party, but at the same time would not commit himself to Antony. Even when the latter was joined by Lepidus, he still hesitated to declare in their favour; but when Octavian espoused their side, and compelled the senate in the month of August to repeal the sentence of outlawry which had been pronounced against them, Pollio at length joined them with three legions, and persuaded L. Plancus in Gaul to follow his example. Octavian, Antony, and Lepidus then formed the triumvirate, and determined who should be consuls for the next five years. Pollio was nominated for B. c. 40, but was in return obliged to consent to the prestation of his father-in-law, L. Quintius.

In the division of the provinces among the triumvirs, Antony received the Gauls with the exception of the Narbonese. The administration of the Transpadane Gaul was committed to Pollio by Antony, and he had accordingly the difficult task of settling the veterans in the lands which had been assigned to them in this province. It was upon this occasion that he secured the property of the poet Virgil at Mantua from confiscation, whom he took under his protection from the love of literature. In the Persianian war which was carried on by Fulvia and L. Antonius against Octavian in B. C. 41 and 40, Pollio, like the other legates of Antony, took little part, as he did not know the views and wishes of his commander. Octavian compelled him to resign the province to Alfenus Varus; and as Antony, the triumvir, was now expected from Greece, Pollio exerted himself to keep possession of the sea-coast in order to secure his landing, since an open rupture between Octavian and Antony seemed now almost inevitable. He was fortunate in securing the co-operation of Domitius Ahenobarbus, who was cruising in the Ionian sea with a squadron of ships which had formed part of the fleet of Brutus and Cassius. The threatened war, however, did not break out; and a reconciliation took place at Brundusium between Octavian and Antony in B.C. 40, at which Pollio acted the part of mediator. Pollio returned to Rome with the triumvirs, and now became consul with Cn. Domitius Calvinus, according to the promise made him three years before. It was during his consularship that Virgil addressed to him his fourth Eclogue.

In the following year, B.C. 39, Antony went to Greece, and sent Pollio with a part of his army to fight against the Parthians, an Illyrian people, who had espoused the side of Brutus and Cassius. Pollio was successful in his expedition; he defeated the Parthians and took the Dalmatian town of Salona; and in consequence of his success obtained the honour of a triumph on the 25th of October in this year. He gave his son Asinius Gallus the agnomen of Saloninus after the town which he had taken. It was during his Illyrian campaign that Virgil addressed to him the eighth Eclogue (see especially Il. 6, 7, 12).

From this time Pollio withdrew altogether from political life, and devoted himself to the study of literature. He still continued however to exercise his oratorical powers, and maintained his reputation for eloquence by his speeches both in the senate and the courts of justice. When the war broke out between Octavian and Antony, the former asked Pollio to accompany him in the campaign; but he declined on account of his former friendship with Antony, and Octavian admitted the validity of his excuse. He lived to see the supremacy of Augustus fully established, and died at his Tuscan villas, a.d. 4, in the eightieth year of his age, preserving to the last the full enjoyment of his health and of all his faculties. (Val. Max. viii. 13, § 4.)

Asinius Pollio deserves a distinguished place in the history of Roman literature, not so much on account of his works, as of the encouragement which he gave to literature. He was not only a patron of Virgil, Horace (see Carm. ii. 1), and other great poets and writers, but he has the honour of having been the first person to establish a public library at Rome, upon which he expended the money he had obtained in his Illyrian campaign. (Plin. H. N. vii. 3, xxxv. 2.) He also introduced the practice of which Martial and other later writers so frequently complain, of reading all his works before a large circle of friends and critics, in order to obtain their judgment and opinion before making them public. (Senec. Contr. iv. Pref. p. 441.) None of Pollio's own works have come down to us, but they possessed sufficient merit to lead his contemporaries and successors to class his name with those of Cicero, Virgil and Sallust, as an orator, a poet and a historian. It was however as an orator that he possessed the greatest reputation. We have already seen that he distinguished himself when he was only twenty-two by his speech against C. Cato: Catullus describes him in his youth (Carm. xii. 9) as

"leporum Disertus puér et facetiarum," and Horace speaks of him in the full maturity of his powers (Carm. ii. 1. 13) as

"Insigne maestis praedium reis Et consulent, Pollio, curiae;"

and we have also the more impartial testimony of Quintilian, the two Senecas and the author of the Dialogue on Orators to the greatness of his oratorical powers. Belonging as he did both to the Ciceronian and the Augustan age, the orations of Pollio partook somewhat of the character of each period. They possessed the fertility of invention and the power of thought of the earlier period, but at the same time somewhat of the artificial and elaborate rhetoric which began to characterise the style of the empire. There was an excessive care bestowed upon the composition, and at the same time a fondness for ancient words and expressions, which often obscured the meaning of his speeches, and detracted much from the pleasure of his hearers and readers. Hence the author of the Dialogue on Orators (c. 21) speaks of him as durus et siclus, and Quintilian says (x. 1. § 113) that so far is he from possessing the brilliant and pleasing style of Cicero (nitor et jucunditas Ciceronis), that he might appear to belong to the age preceding that of the great orator. We may infer that there was a degree of pedantry and an affectation of learning in his speeches; and it was probably the same desire of exhibiting his reading, which led him to make frequent quotations from Ennius, Accius, Pacuvius, and the other ancient poets. (Quintil. i. 8, 11, ix. 4. § 76.) The care however with which he composed his speeches—his diligentia—forms an especial subject of praise with Quintilian. (Comp. in general Quintil. x. 1. § 113, x. 2. § 25, xiii. 11. § 28; Senec. Contr. iv. Pref. p. 441, Suetus vi. p. 50; Suet. Ep. 100; Auct. Dial. de Orat. 17, 21, 25.) Meyer has collected the titles of eleven of his orations. (Orator. Roman. Pragm. p. 491, &c.) As an historian Pollio was not much esteemed for his history of the civil wars in seventeen books. It commenced with the consulsipship of Metellus and Afranius, B.C. 60, in which year the first triumvirate was formed, and appears to have come down to the time when Augustus obtained the undisputed supremacy of the Roman world. It has been erroneously supposed by some modern writers from a passage in Plutarch (Caes. 46), that this work was written in Greek. Pollio was a contemporary of the whole period embraced in his history, and was an eye-witness of many of the important events which he describes. His work was thus one of great value, and is cited by subsequent writers in terms of the highest commendation. It appears to have been rich in anecdotes about Caesar, but the judgment which he passed upon Cicero appeared to the elder Seneca unjustly severe. Pollio was assisted to some extent in the composition of his history by the grammarians Atellius Philologus, who drew up the rules which made it useful to him in writing. (Suid. s. v. 'Asinovos; Senec. Suet. vi. vii.; Hor. Carm. ii. 1; Suet. Caes. 30, De Ill. Gram. 10; Plut. Caes. 46; Tac. Ann. iv. 34; Appian, B. C. ii. 82; Val. Max. viii. 13. ext. 4.)

As a poet Pollio was best known for his tragedies, which are spoken of in high terms by Virgil and Horace, but which probably did not possess any great merit, as they are hardly mentioned by subsequent writers, and only one fragment of them is preserved by the grammarians. (Verg. Ed. iii. 66, viii. 10; Hor. Carm. ii. 1. 9, Sat. i. 10. 42;
POLLOI.

Charis. i. p. 56, ed. Lind.) The words of Virgil (Ed. iii. 86), "Pollio et ipse facit nova carmina," probably refer to tragedies of a new kind, namely, such as were not borrowed from the Greek, but contained subjects entirely new, taken from Roman story. (Welecker, Die Griechischen Tragödien, p. 1421, &c.)

Pollio also enjoyed great reputation as a critic, but he is chiefly known in this capacity for the severe judgment which he passed upon his great contemporaries. Thus he pointed out many mistakes in the speeches of Cicero (Quintil. xii. p. 22), censured the Commentaries of Caesar for their want of historical fidelity, and found fault with Sallust for affectation in the use of antiquated words and expressions (Suet. de Ill. Gram. 10), a fault with which Pollio himself is charged by other writers. He also complained of a certain Porteaviney in Livy (Quintil. i. 5. § 56, viii. § 3), respecting which some remarks are made in the life of Livy. (Vol. ii. p. 735.)

Pollio had a son, C. Asinius Gallus Salonius, who is spoken of elsewhere. [GALLUS, No. 2.] Asinius Gallus married Vipsania, the daughter of Agrippa and Pomponia, the former wife of Tiberius, by whom he had several children: namely, 1. Asinius Salonius. (Tac. Ann. iii. 75.) 2. Asinius Gallus. (GALLUS, No. 3.) 3. Asinius Pollio, spoken of below [No. 2], Asinius Agrippa, consul A. d. 25 [AGrippa, p. 77., a], Asinius Celer. [CELER.] (Lipsius, ad Tac. Ann. iii. 75.)

(The following are the most important authorities for the life of Pollio, in addition to those which have been cited above: Cíc. ad Fam. ix. 25, x. 31, xi. 9, ad Att. xii. 2, 38, 39, xiii. 20; Appian, B. C. ii. 40, 43, 82, iii. 46, 74, 97, iv. 12, 27, v. 20—23, 50, 64; Vell. Pat. ii. 63, 76, 86; Dion Cass. xiv. 10, xviii. 15, 41; and among modern writers, Eckhardt, Commentatio de C. Asini, inquio optimorum Latinorum auctorum censore, Jen. 1793, and especially Thorbecke, Commentatio de C. Asini Polliunis Vita et Studiis, Lugd. Batav. 1820.)

2. C. Asinius Pollio, grandson of the preceding, and son of C. Asinius Gallus Salonius and of Vipsania, the daughter of Agrippa, was consul A. d. 23 with C. Antonius Vetus. (Tac. Ann. iv. 1; Plin. H. N. xxi. i. 8.) We learn from coins, a specimen of which is annexed, that he was also proconsul of Asia. The opposite represents Drusus, the son of the emperor Tiberius and Germanicus seated on a curule chair, with the legend ΔΡΟΤΟΣ ΚΑΙ ΕΡΜΑΝΙΚΟΣ ΚΑΙΖΑΡΕΩΝ ΝΕΟΙ ΘΕΟΙ ΦΙΑΛΑΕΦΙΩΙ; the reverse a crown of oak leaves, with the legend ΠΑΙΟΝ ΑΣΙΝΙΟ ΡΟΛΛΙΟΝΙ ΑΝΩΤΗΣ, and within the crown ΚΟΙΝΟΤ ΑΣΙΑΣ. Drusus and Germanicus are here called Philadelphia, because they were brothers by adoption; and there was an obvious reason why Pollio had these coins struck, inasmuch as Drusus was the half-brother of Pollio by the same mother Vipsania. (Eckhel, vol. vi. pp. 210, 211.)

3. Asinius Pollio, the commander of a regiment of horse, serving under Lueceius Albinius in Mauritania, was slain in A. d. 69, when the troops espoused the side of Vitellius. (Tac. Hist. ii. 59.)

4. Asinius Pollio Verucosus, consul A. d. 81. (Dion Cass. lxvi. 26; Fasti.)

POLLIO, ASINIUS, a native of Tralles in Asia Minor, is described by Suida (s. v. ΠΟΛΛΙΟΣ) as a sophist and philosopher, who taught at Rome at the time of Pompey the Great, and succeeded Timagenes in his school. But as Timagenes flourished b. c. 55 [TIMAGENES], we must place the date of Asinius Pollio rather later. Judging from the name of the latter, we may infer that he was a freedman of the great Asinius Pollio. Suidas ascribes to the Trallian the following work: 1. An Epitome of the Aththis of Philochorus, respecting which see Philochorus, p. 299, b. 2. Memorabilia of the philosopher Musonius (Rufus). 3. An Epitome of the Georgics of Diophanes, in two books. 4. A commentary on Aristotle’s work on Animals. 5. On the Civil War between Caesar and Pompey. The second of these works however could not have been written by this Pollio, since Musonius lived in the reign of Nero; some writers ascribe it to Valerius Pollio, who lived in the reign of Hadrian, but others to Claudius Pollio, a contemporary of the younger Pliny. The work on the civil war between Caesar and Pompey may perhaps have been a translation into Greek of the history of the great Pollio on the same subject. (Vossius, de Hist. Graecia, p. 197, ed. Westermann; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 566, with the note of Harles; Clinton, P. H. vol. iii. p. 530.)

POLLIO, CAE’LIUS, was commander of the Roman army in Armenia, A. d. 51, and was bribed by Rhadamistus to betray the cause of Mithridates king of Armenia, whom the Romans had placed upon the throne. Notwithstanding his corrupt conduct, he was allowed to remain in Armenia till the first year of Nero’s reign, A. d. 54, when he was succeeded by Lelius. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 44, 45; Dion Cass. ixx. 6.)

POLLIO, CARVILLIUS, a Roman eques, lived in the times of the dictator Sulla, and was celebrated for several new kinds of ornamental furniture, which he invented and brought into use. (Plin. H. N. ix. 11, xiii. 33.)

POLLIO, CLAU’DIUS, a contemporary of the younger Pliny, who extols his merits in one of his letters (vii. 31). Pliny states that Pollio had written the life of one of his friends: the name is corrupt in the manuscripts; the best modern editions have Annius Bassus; but some read Musonius, and therefore suppose that the Memorabilia of Musonius, which Suidas ascribes to Asinius Pollio, is the very work alluded to by Pliny. The name however of the philosopher was Musonius Rufus, and not Bassus; and the way in which he is spoken of by Pliny would lead to the conclusion that he was not the celebrated philosopher.

POLLIO, CLAU’DU’LIUS, a centurion, who put Didumnenianus to death. (Dion Cass. lxviii. 40.)
PO'LLIO, CI'LO'DIUS, a man of praetorian rank, against whom Nero wrote a poem, entitled "Lucio. (Suet. Dom. 1.)

PO'LLIO, DOM'ITIUS, offered his daughter for a Vestal Virgin in the reign of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. ii. 97.)

PO'LLIO, L. FUFI'DIUS, consul A.D. 166 with Q. Sercius Pudens. (Lamprid. Commod. 11; Fasti.)

PO'LLIO, HERR'ENNUS, a Roman orator, and a contemporary of the younger Pliny. (Plin. Ep. iv. 19.)

PO'LLIO, JU'LIUS, a tribune of the praetorian cohort, assisted Nero in poisoning Britannicus. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 15.)

PO'LLIO, MEM'MIUS. [MEMMIIUS, No. 1972.]

PO'LLIO, RU'BRIUS, the commander of the praetorian cohorts in the reign of Claudius, was allowed a seat in the senate as often as he accompanied the emperor thither. (Dion Cass. lxx. 23.)

PO'LLIO, TREBE'LLIUS. [TREBELLIIUS.]

PO'LLIO, VALE'RIUS, an Alexandrian philosopher, lived in the time of the emperor Hadrian, and was the father of the philosopher Diodorus. (Suidas, s. v. Πολλιόν.) [DIODORUS, literary, No. 2.]

PO'LLIO, VE'DIUS, a Roman eques and a friend of Augustus, was by birth a freedman, and has obtained a place in history on account of his riches and his cruelty. He was accustomed to feed his lampreys with human flesh, and whenever a slave displeased him, the unfortunate wretch was forthwith thrown into the pond as food for the fish. On one occasion Augustus was supping with him, when a slave had the misfortune to break a crystal goblet, and his master immediately ordered him to be thrown to the fishes. The slave fell at the feet of Augustus, praying for mercy; the emperor interceded with his master on his behalf, but when he could not prevail upon Pollio to pardon him, he dismissed the slave of his own accord, and commanded all Pollio's crystal goblets to be broken and the fish-pond to be filled up. Pollio died A.D. 15, leaving a large part of his property to Augustus. (Dion Cass. liv. 28; Senec. de Ira, iii. 40; de Clem. i. 18; Plin. Hist. Nat. iix. 23. s. 59, 53, 78; Tac. Ann. i. 10, xix. 60.) This Pollio appears to be the same as the one among whom Augustus wrote fescuvesian verses. (Suidas, s. v. Πολλίον.)

PO'LLIO, VESPA'SIUS, a native of Nursia, was thrice tribune of the soldiers and likewise prefect of the camp. His son obtained the dignity of praetor, and his daughter Vespania Polla became the mother of the emperor Vespasian. (Suet. Vespi. 1.)

PO'LLIO, VITRA'SIUS. 1. The praefectus or governor of Egypt in the reign of Tiberius, died A.D. 32. (Dion Cass. livii. 19.)

2. Probably the son of the preceding, was the procurator of the emperor in Egypt in the reign of Claudius. (Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxvi. 7, s. 11.)

3. The legatus Lugdunensis, in the reign of the emperor Hadrian, may have been a son of No. 2 and a grandson of No. 1. (Dig. tit. 1. s. 15. § 17.)

4. Lived in the reign of M. Aurelius, and was consul the second time in A.D. 176 with M. Plavius Aper. The year of his first consulship is not recorded. (Lamprid. Commod. 2; Fasti.) The Senatusconsultum Vitriusianum, of which mention is made in the Digest (40. tit. 5. s. 30. § 6), was probably passed during one of the consulsiphs of Vitrius Pollio. This Pollio was perhaps the great-grandson of No. 1. The Vitrius Faustina slain by Commodus was probably his daughter. (Lamprid. Commod. 4.)

POLLIIS (Πολλίς), is first mentioned in B.C. 390 as εὐπολιός, or second in command of the Lacedaemonian fleet (Xen. Hell. iv. 8. § 31). In B.C. 376 he was appointed nauticus or commander-in-chief of a Lacedaemonian fleet of sixty ships in order to cut off from Athens her supplies of corn. His want of success and defeat by Chabrias are related in the life of the latter [Vol. I. p. 676, a.] (Xen. Hell. v. 4. §§ 60, 61; Diod. xv. 34; Polyaen. iii. 11. § 17.) In several MSS. of the above-mentioned authors, his name is written Πόλλις, but Πολλίς is the preferable form.

POLLIS, an architect, who wrote on the rules of the orders of architecture, praecepta symmetriæ. (Vitruv. vii. praef. § 14.) [P. S.]

PO'LUX. [DOSCU'LLIUS.]

PO'LUX, JU'LIUS (Ἰουλίος Πολύδευτος), of Naucratia in Egypt, was a Greek sophist and grammarian. He received instruction in criticism from his father, and afterwards went to Athens, where he studied rhetoric under the sophist Adrian. He opened a private school at Athens, where he gave instruction in grammar and rhetoric, and was subsequently appointed by the emperor Commodus to the chair of rhetoric at Athens. He died during the reign of Commodus at the age of fifty-eight, leaving a young son behind him. We may therefore assign A.D. 183 as the year in which he flourished. (Suidas, s. v. Πολύδευτος; Philostr. Vit. Soph. ii. 12.) Philostratus praises his critical skill, but speaks unfavourably of his rhetorical powers, and implies that he gained his professor's chair from Commodus simply by his mellifluous voice. He seems to have been attacked by many of his contemporaries on account of the inferior character of his oratory, and especially by Lucian in his Πυρόφων διδάσκαλος, as was supposed by the ancients and has been maintained by many modern writers (see especially C. F. Ranke, Comment. de Polluse et Lucano, Neddinburgh, 1831), though Hemsterhuis, from the natural partiality of an editor to his author, stoutly denies this supposition, and believes that Lucian intended to satirize a certain Dioscorides. It has also been conjectured that Lucian attacks Pollux in his Lexiphanes, and that he alludes to him with contempt in a passage of the De Saltatione (c. 33, p. 287, ed. Reitz), Athenodorus, who taught at Athens at the same time as Pollux, was likewise one of his detractors, (Philos. Vit. Soph. ii. 14.) We know nothing more of the life of Pollux, except that he was the teacher of the sophist Antipater, who taught in the reign of Alexander Severus, (Philos. Ibid. ii. 24.)

Pollix was the author of several works, of which Suida has preserved the titles of the following. 1. Οὐσιωτακόν εἰς βιβλίον ἵνα, an Onomasticon in ten books. 2. Διαλέξεις ἤτοι καλλιά, Dissertations. 3. Μελέται, Declarations. 4. Εἰς Κύριον Καώρας ἐπιστάσεως, an oration on the marriage of the Caesar Commodus. 5. Ρωμαίων λόγων, a panegyric on Rome. 6. Σαλπτυκίτης ἢ ἄγων μούσικός, a Trumpeter, or a musical contest. 7. Κατὰ Σωκράτους, a speech against Socrates. 8. Κατὰ Ἰουνιωτακόν, against the Sinopians. 9. Παυλελίποιος, a speech delivered before the assembled Greeks. 10. Αρκαδίος, a speech addressed to the Arcadians or in praise of the Arcadians.

All these works have perished with the exception of the Onomasticon, which has come down to us. The latter is divided into ten books, each of which contains a short dedication to Caesar Commodus, and the work was therefore published before A.D. 177, since Commodus became Augustus in that year. Each book forms a separate treatise by itself, containing the most important words relating to certain subjects, with short explanations of the meanings of the words, which are frequently illustrated by quotations from the ancient writers. The alphabetical arrangement is not adopted, but the words are given according to the subjects treated of in each book. The object of the work was to present youths with a kind of store-house, from which they could borrow all the words of which they had need, and could at the same time learn their usage in the best writers. The contents of each book will give the best idea of the nature of the work. 1. The first treatise of the gods and their worship, of kings, of speed and slowness, of dying, of commerce and manufactures, of fairs and the contrary, of time and the divisions of the year, of houses, of war, of work, of horses, agriculture, of the parts of the plough and the wagon, and of bees. 2. The second treatises of man, his eye, the parts of his body and the like. 3. Of relations, of political life, of friends, of the love of country, of love, of the relation between masters and slaves, of money, of travelling, and numerous other subjects. 4. Of the various branches of knowledge and science. 5. Of hunting, animals, &c. 6. Of meals, the names of crimes, &c. 7. Of the different trades, &c. 8. Of the courts, the administration of justice, &c. 9. Of towns, buildings, coins, games, &c. 10. Of various vessels, &c. In consequence of the loss of the great number of lexicographical works from which Pollux compiled his Onomasticon, this book has become one of the greatest value for acquiring a knowledge of Greek antiquity, and explains many subjects which are not found in any other source. It has also preserved many fragments of lost writers, and the great number of authors quoted in the work may be seen by a glance at the long list given in Fabricius. (Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 145, &c.)

The first three editions of the Onomasticon contain simply the Greek text, without a Latin translation and with numerous errors: they are by Aldus, Venice, 1502, fol., by B. Junta, Florence, 1520, fol., by S. Grynaeus, Basel, 1536, 4to. The first Greek and Latin edition was by Wolfgang Seber, Frankfurt, 1608, 4to., with the text corrected from manuscripts; the Latin translation given in this edition had been previously published by Walther at Basel, 1541, 8vo. The next edition is the very valuable one in Greek and Latin by J. H. Lederlin and Tib, Hemsterhuis, Amsterdam, 1706, fol.; it contains copious notes by Goth, Jungermann, Joach. Kühm, and the two editors. This was followed by the edition of W. Dindorf, Leipzig, 1824, 5 vols. 8vo., containing the works of the previous commentators. The last edition is by Imm. Bekker, Berlin, 1846, which gives only the Greek text.

POLLYX. JULIUS, a Byzantine writer, is the author of a chronicle, which treats at large of the creation of the world, and is therefore entitled ταυτοπ οισικ. Like most other Byzantine histories, it is an universal history, beginning with the creation of the world and coming down to the time of the writer. The two manuscripts from which this work is published end with the reign of Valens, but the Paris manuscript is said to come down as low as the death of Romanus, A.D. 963, and also to contain what is wanting at the conclusion of the anonymous continuation of Constantinus Porphyrogenitus. The whole work is made up of extracts from Simeon Logotheta, Theophanes, and the continuation of Constantius, and relates chiefly ecclesiastical events. It was first published from a manuscript at Milan by J. B. Bianconi, under the title of Anonymi Scriptoris Historia Sacra, Dononine, 1779, fo. Ign. Haurt found the work in a more perfect state, and with the name of the author prefixed to it in a manuscript at Munich, and believed that it had not yet been printed, published it at Munich, 1792, 8vo., under the title of Iulii Polluci Historia Physica, nunc primum Gr. et Lat. ed. &c. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 144; Vossius, De Hist. Graecis, p. 278, ed. Westermann; Schöll, Geschichte der griechischen Literatur, vol. iii. p. 257.)

POLLYUS (Πωλίυς). 1. A sophist and rhetorician, a native of Agrigentum. He was a disciple of Gorgias (as, according to other authorities, of Lyceus, Schol. ad Plat. Phaedr. p. 812), and wrote a work on rhetoric, called by Suidas Θερητ, as also a genealogy of the Greeks and barbarians who were engaged in the Trojan war, with an account of their several fates; a catalogue of the ships, and a work Περὶ Λέγεων. He is introduced by Plato as an interlocutor in the Gorgias. (Suidas, s. v.; Philostr. Vit. Sophist. i. 13, with the note of Oecarius; Fest. s. v.; Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 801.)

2. A Pythagorean, a native of Lucania. A fragment from a work by him on Justice is preserved by Stobaeus. (Schol. 9.)

3. A celebrated tragic actor, the son of Charicles of Sunitum, and a disciple of Archias of Thurii. It is related of him that at the age of 70, shortly before his death, he acted in eight tragedies on four successive days. (Plut. Dem. p. 653, An seii ger. sit Resp. 3. p. 783, b; Lucian. Néagom. vol. i. p. 479, ed. Hemst.)

[C. P. M.]

POLYAIENUS (Πολλαίανος), historical. 1. One of the leading men at Syracuse, b. c. 214. (Liv. xxiv. 22.)

2. Of Corcyra, was in the company of Philopoemen, when the latter killed Machamidas in b. c. 207. (Polyb. xi. 18. § 2.)
3. An Achaeus, belonged to the party of Archon, Polybius, and the more moderate patriots, who thought that the Achaeans ought not to oppose theRomans in their war against Perseus, B.C. 171. (Polyb. xxviii. 6. § 9.)

4. CLAUDIUS POLYÆNUS, probably a freedman of the emperor Claudius, bequeathed a house to this emperor at Prusa. (Plin. Ep. x. 23, s. 75.)

POLYÆNUS (Πολυαένος), literary. 1. Of Atheni, an historical writer, mentioned by Eusebius. (Chron. i. p. 25.)

2. Of Lampaeus, the son of Athenodorus, a mathematician and a friend of Epicurus, adopted the philosophical system of his friend, and, although he had previously acquired great reputation as a mathematician, he now maintained with Epicurus the worthlessness of geometry. (Cic. de Fin. i. 6, Acad. ii. 33; Diog. Laërt. x. 24, ii. 105, with the note of Menagius.) It has been supposed that it was against this Polyænus that the treatise was written, a fragment of which has been discovered at Herculanum under the title of Διμετριον πρὸς τὰς Πολυαένου ἄπορας. (Scholl, Geschichte d. Griech. Literatur, vol. ii. p. 209.)

3. JULIUS POLYÆNUS, the author of four epigrams in the Greek Anthology (ix. 1, 7, 8, 9, Tauchnitz), in one of which he is called Polyænus of Sardis, and in the other three Julius Polyænus. He must be the same as Polyænus of Sardis, the sophist, spoken of by Suidas, who says (s. v. Πολυαένος), that he lived in the time of the first Caesar, Caius, that is, in the time of Julius Caesar, and wrote λόγια διωκαλικοὶ καὶ δικαία ἡγία συμφοραίας ὑποτύπωσες, and Ὑρμόφων Παρισικοὶ βιβλία γ. The latter work probably referred to the victories over the Parthians gained by Ventidius.

4. The Macedonian, the author of the work on Stratagems in war (Στραταργήματα), which is still extant, lived about the middle of the second century of the Christian era. Suidas (s. v.) calls him a rhetorician, and we learn from Polyænus himself that he was accustomed to plead causes before the emperor. (Præf. lib. ii. and lib. viii.) He dedicated his work to M. Aurelius and Verus, while they were engaged in the Parthian war, about A.D. 163, at which time, he says, he was too old to accompany them in their campaigns. (Præf. lib. i.) This work is divided into eight books, of which the first six contain an account of the stratagems of the most celebrated Greek generals, the seventh of those of barbarous or foreign people, and the eighth of the Romans, and illustrious women. Parts, however, of the sixth and seventh books are lost, so that of the 900 stratagems which Polyænus described, only 833 have come down to us. The work is written in a clear and pleasing style, though somewhat tinged with the artificial rhetoric of the age. It contains a vast number of anecdotes respecting many of the most celebrated men in antiquity, and has preserved many historical facts of which we should otherwise have been ignorant; but its value as an historical authority is very much diminished by the little judgment which the author evidently possessed, and by our ignorance of the sources from which he took his statements. There is an abridgment of this work in a Greek manuscript in the king's library at Paris, containing only fifty-five chapters, but which serves to elucidate and explain many passages of the original.

Polyænus also wrote several other works, all of which have perished. Suidas has preserved the titles of two, Πρὸς Ἰουνίους and Τακτικὰ βιβλία γ, and Stobæus makes a quotation from a work of Polyænus, Ταχρὸν τοῦ κοινοῦ τῶν Μακεδών (Florileg. xliii. (or xliii.) § 53), and from another entitled Ταχρὸν τοῦ Σωμηρίου (Ibid. § 41). Polyænus likewise mentions his intention of writing a work on the memorable actions (Ἀξιομακρύνετα) of M. Aurelius and L. Verus (Præf. lib. vi.).

Polyænus was first printed in a Latin translation, executed by Justus Vulteius, at Basel, 1549, 8vo. The first edition of the Greek text was published by Casaubon, Lyon, 1593, 12mo.; the next by Panckrates Manavičius, Leyden, 1690, 8vo.; the latter by Thomas Graecus, London, 1756, 12mo.; and the last by Coray, Paris, 1809, 8vo. The work has been translated into English by R. Shepherd, London, 1793, 4to.; into German by Seybold, Frankfort, 2 vols. 8vo. 1793 and 1794, and by Blume, Stuttgart, 1834, 16mo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 321, &c.; Schöll, Geschichte der Griech. Literatur, vol. ii. p. 716; Kronbiegel, De Dictionis Polyæniæ Virtutibus et Vitiis, Lipsiae, 1770; Droysen, Geschichte des Hel lenismus, vol. i. p. 685.)

5. Of Sardis. [See No. 3.]

POLYANTHES (Πολυάνθης), a Corinthian, who commanded a Peloponnesian fleet, with which he fought an indecisive battle against the Athenian fleet under Diphilius in the gulf of Corinth in a.c. 413. (Thuc. vii. 34.) He is again mentioned in n.c. 395, as one of the leading men in Corinth, who received money from Timocrates the Rhodian, whom the satrap Tithraustes sent into Greece in order to allure the Athenians to make war upon Sparta, and thus necessitate the recall of Agesilaus from his victorious career in Asia (Xen. Hell. iii. 5, § 1; Paus. iii. 9, § 8).

POLYARATUS (Πολυάρατος), a Rhodian, one of the leaders of the party in that state favourable to Perseus, during the second Macedonian War. According to Polybius he was a man of an ostentatious and extravagant character, and had, in consequence, become loaded with debts, which he hoped to pay off by the king's assistance. At the commencement of the war (n.c. 171) he united with Deimon in endeavouuring, though unsuccessfully, to induce the Rhodians to refuse the assistance of their ships to the Roman praetor C. Lucretius; but shortly afterwards he supported with success the proposition made to allow Perseus to ransom the Macedonian captives who had fallen into the hands of the Rhodians (Polyb. xxvii. 6, 7, 11). He continued throughout the war an active correspondence with Perseus; and in the third year of the contest (n.c. 169), matters having apparently taken a turn more favourable to the king, the Rhodians were induced, by his efforts and those of Deimon, to give a favourable audience to the ambassadors of Perseus and Gentius, and to interpose their influence at Rome to put an end to the war (Liv. xlv. 23, 29). But this step gave great offence to the Romans, and after the defeat of Perseus, Polyaratus hastened to provide for his safety by flight. He took refuge at the court of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, but his surrender being demanded by the Roman legate Popilius, the king, in order to evade compliance, sent him away secretly to Rhodes. Polyartus, however, made his escape on the voyage, and took refuge, first at Phaselis, and afterwards at Cibyra, but the inhabitants of both these cities were unwilling to incur the enmity of the Roman senate, by affording him protection, and he was ultimately conveyed to Rhodes, from whence he was sent a prisoner to Rome. (Polyb. xxix. 11, xxx. 7) [E. II. 13]

POLYARCHUS. [Polemarciius.]

POLYARCHUS (Πολυαρχος), a Greek physician, who is mentioned by Celsus (De Med. v. 18, § 5 of viii. 9, § 1, pp. 86, 177), and must, therefore, have lived in or before the first century after Christ. He appears to have written a pharma-cutical work, as some of his prescriptions are several times quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medi-cum. sec. Loc. viii. 5, vol. xii. pp. 184, 185, 186, De Compos. Medicum. sec. Gen. vii. 7, vol. xiii. p. 981), Aëtius (ii. 47, 57, iii. 1.34, iii. 2.14, pp. 415, 481, 530), Marcellus (De Medicinæ c. 20, p. 339), and Paulus Aegineta (De Re Med. iii. 63, 70, 74, viii. 17, pp. 456, 487, 489, 681); but of his writings only these extracts remain. [W. A. G.]

POLYBLADES (Πολυβλαδης), a Lacedaemonian general, succeeded Agesipolis in the command of the army against Olynthus, and compelled the city to surrender in B.C. 379. (Xen. Hell. v. 3. §§ 20, 26; Diod. xv. 23.)

POLYBIUS (Πολυβιος), historical. 1. Of Megalopolis, fought under Philopoemen at the battle of Mantinea against Machanidas, tyrant of Lacedaemon, B.C. 207. (Polyb. xi. 15, § 5.) It has been usually supposed that this Polybius was a relation of the historian, probably either his uncle or grandfather; but this is opposed to the statement of the historian himself in one of the Vatican fragments (p. 448, ed. Mai), “that no one, as far as he knew, had borne the same name as his, up to his time.” Now though Polybius, when he wrote the passage quoted above, might possibly have forgotten his namesake who fought at the battle of Mantinea, still he certainly would not have escaped his memory if any one of his family had borne this name. It is, however, even improbable that he should have forgotten this namesake, especially since he was a native of Megalopolis, and we therefore think that the conjecture of Louch in his edition of the Vati-fican Fragments is correct, that the true reading in xi. 15, is Πολυβιος and not Πολυβλαδης. (Comp. Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. viii. p. 273, note 2.)

2. A freedman of the emperor Augustus, read in the senate the will of the emperor after his decease. (Dion Cass. i. 46; Suet. Aug. 101.)

3. A freedman of the emperor Claudius, was so highly favoured by this emperor that he was allowed to walk between the two consuls. He was the companion of the studies of Claudius; and on the death of his brother Seneca addressed to him a Consolatio, in which he bestows the highest praises upon his literary attainments. Polybius was put to death through the intrigues of Messalina, although he was supposed to be her paramour. (Dion Cass. ix. 29. 31; Suet. Claud. 29.)

POLYBIUS (Πολυβιος), literary. 1. The historian, was the son of Lyortos, and a native of Megalopola, a city in Arcadia. The year in which he was born is uncertain. Suidas (s. v.) places his birth in the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes, who died in B.C. 222. It is certain, however, that Polybius could not have been born so early as that year; for he tells us himself (xxx. 7) that he was appointed ambassador to Egypt along with his father and the younger Antus in B.C. 161, at which time he had not yet attained the legal age, which he himself tells us (xxix. 9), was thirty among the Achaenae. But if he was born, according to Suidas, before the death of Ptolemy Euergetes, he must then have been forty years of age. In addition to which, if any other proof were needed, it is impossible to believe that he could have taken the active part in public affairs which he did after the fall of Corinth in B.C. 146, if he was born so early as Suidas alleges. We may therefore, without much improbability, suppose that Casaubon that he was born about B.C. 204, since he would in that case have been about twenty-five at the time of his appointment to the Egyptian embassy.

Lycortas, the father of Polybius, was one of the most distinguished men of the Achaean league; and his son therefore received the advantages of his training in political knowledge and the military art. He must also have reaped great benefit from his intercourse with Philopoemen, who was a friend of his father’s, and on whose death, in B.C. 182, Lycortas was appointed general of the league. At the funeral of Philopoemen in this year Polybius carried the urn in which his ashes were deposited. (Plut. Phil. 21, An sent gerundia sit respedul. p. 790, &c.) In the following year, as we have already seen, Polybius was appointed one of the ambassadors to Egypt, but he did not leave Greece, as the intention of sending an embassy was abandonned. From this time he probably began to take part in public affairs, and he appears to have soon obtained great influence among his countrymen. When the war broke out between the Romans and Perseus king of Macedonia, it became a grave question with the Achaenae what line of policy they should adopt. The Roman party in the league was headed by Callicrates, an unprincipled time-serving sycophant, who recognised no law but the will of Rome. He was opposed by Lycortas and his friends: and the Roman ambassadors, Popilius and Octavius, who came into Peloponnesus at the beginning of B.C. 169, had complained that some of the most influential men in the league were unfavourable to the Roman cause and had denounced by name Lycortas, Archon, and Polybius. The more moderate party, who did not wish to sacrifice their national independence, and who yet dreaded a contest with the Romans from the consciousness of their inability to resist the power of the latter, were divided in opinion as to the course of action. Lycortas strongly recommended them to preserve a strict neutrality, since they could hope to gain nothing from either party; but Archon and Polybius thought it more advisable not to adopt such a resolution, but to be guided by circumstances, and if necessary to offer assistance to the Romans. These views met with the approval of the majority of the party; and accordingly, in B.C. 169, Archon was appointed strategus of the league, and Polybius strategus of the cavalry, to carry these views into execution. The Achaenae shortly after passed a decree, placing all their forces at the disposal of the Roman consul, Q. Marcus Philippus; and Polybius was sent into Macedonia to learn the pleasure of the consul. Marcus, however, denied their assistance for the present. (Polyb. xxviii. 3, 6.) In the following year, in B.C. 168, the two Ptolemies, Philometor and his brother Euergetes II., sent to the Achaean, to request succour against Antiochus Epiphanes, and, if this were refused, to beg that Lycortas and Polibius might come to them, in order to aid them with their advice in the conduct of the war. But as Antiochus was shortly after compelled by the Romans to relinquish his attempts against the Ptolemies, neither of these measures was necessary, and Polibius accordingly remained at home (xxix. 8).

After the fall of Perseus and the conquest of Macedonia, two Roman commissioners, C. Claudius and Cn. Dolabella, visited Peloponnesus, for the purpose of advancing the Roman interests in the south of Greece. At the instigation of Calliocrates, they commanded that 1000 Achaean should be carried to Rome, to answer the charge of not having assisted the Romans against Perseus. This number included all the best and noblest part of the nation, and among them was Polibius. They arrived in Italy in n. c. 167, but, instead of being put upon their trial, they were distributed among the Etruscan towns. Polibius was more fortunate than his other companions in misfortune. He had probably become acquainted in Macedonia with Acilius Paulus, or his sons Fabius and Scipio, and the two young men now obtained permission from the pmctor for Polibius to reside at Rome in the house of their father Paulus. Scipio was then eighteen years of age, and soon became warmly attached to the illustrious exile, and availed himself of his advice and assistance, both in his private studies and his public life. The friendship thus formed between the young Roman noble and the Greek exile was of great advantage to both parties: Scipio was accompanied by his friend in all his military expeditions, and received much advantage from the experience and knowledge of the latter; while Polibius, besides finding a liberal patron and protector in his exile, was able by his means to obtain access to public documents, and accumulate materials for his great historical work (Polib. xxxix. 9, &c.; Paus. vii. 10).

The Achaean exiles remained in Italy seventeen years. The Achaean had frequently sent embassies to the senate supplicating the trial or release of their countrymen, but always without success. Even their earnest entreaty, that Polibius and Stratus alone might be set at liberty, had been refused. At length, in n. c. 151, Scipio exerted his influence with Cato the Censor to get him to support the restoration of the exiles, and the authority of the latter carried the point, though not without a hard struggle and a protracted debate in the senate. After their restoration had been decreed, Polibius was anxious to obtain from the senate on behalf of himself and his countrymen the additional favour of being reinstated in the honours which they had formerly enjoyed; but upon consulting Cato, the old man bade him, with a smile, beware of returning, like Ulysses, to the Cyclop's den, to fetch away any trifles he had left behind him. (Polib. xxxiv. 6; Plut. Cat. Maj. 9; Paus. vii. 10.) Polibius returned to Peloponnesus in this year with the other Achaean exiles, who had been reduced during their banishment from 1000 to 300. During his stay in Greece, which was, however, not long, he exhorted his countrymen to peace and unanimity, and endeavoured to counteract the mad projects of the party who were using every effort to hurry the Achaean into a hopeless struggle with the Roman power. When it was too late, the Achaean saw and recognised the wisdom of his advice; and a statue erected to his honour bore on its pedestal the inscription, “that Hellas would have been saved, if the advice of Polibius had been followed” (Paus. viii. 37. § 2). In the first year of the third Punic war, B. C. 149, the consul M. Manlius sent for Polibius to attend him at Lilybaeum, but upon reaching Corea, he heard from the consuls that the Carthaginians had given hostages, and thinking, therefore, that the war was at an end, and that his presence was no longer needed, he returned to Peloponnesus (Polib. Exc. Vatian. p. 447). But he was to be soon left again in order to join Scipio. His Roman connections probably made him an object of suspicion with what was called the independent party; and his residence in his native country may therefore have been not very pleasant to him. In addition to which he was no doubt anxious to be a spectator of the final struggle which was now going on between Rome and Carthage, and the history of which he intended to write.

Polidius was present with Scipio at the destruction of Carthage, B. C. 146 (Appian, Pun. 132); and immediately after that event he hurried to Greece, where the Achaean were waging a mad and hopeless war against the Romans. Whether he was present at the capture of Corinth may well be questioned, and it is probable, as Thirlwall (Hist. of Greece, vol. viii. p. 435, note 3) has remarked, that he would not have hastened to Peloponnesus till the struggle was over. He must, however, have arrived there soon afterwards, and he exerted all his influence to alleviate the misfortunes of his countrymen, and to procure favourable terms for them. As a friend of Scipio, the conqueror of Carthage, he was received with marked distinction; and the want of patriotism with which his enemies had charged him, enabled him now to render his country far more effectual service than he could otherwise have done. The statues of Philopoemen and Aratus, which the Roman commissioners had ordered to be conveyed to Italy, were allowed, at his intercession, to remain in Peloponnesus. So much respect did the commissioners pay him, that when they quitted the country in the spring of B. C. 145, after arranging its affairs, and reducing it to the form of a Roman province, they ordered him to visit the various cities, and explain the new laws and constitution. In the execution of this duty, Polibius spared no pains or trouble. He traversed the whole country, and with indefatigable zeal he drew up laws and political institutions for the different cities, and decided disputes that had arisen between them. He further obtained from the Romans a relaxation of some of the most severe enactments which had been made against the conquered Achaean. His grateful fellow-countrymen acknowledged the great services he had rendered them, and statues were erected to his honour at Megalopolis, Mantinea, Pallantium, Tegae, and other places. (Polfib. xl. 8—10; Paus. viii. 9, 30, 37, 44, 48.)

Polidius seems now to have devoted himself to the composition of the great historical work, for which he had long been collecting materials. At what period of his life he made the journeys in foreign countries for the purpose of visiting the places which he had to describe in his history, it is impossible to determine. He tells us (iii. 59) that he undertook long and dangerous journeys into Africa, Spain, Gaul, and even as far as the Atlantic, on account of the ignorance which prevailed respecting those parts. Some of these countries he visited while serving under Scipio, who afforded him every facility for the prosecution of his design. Thus we learn from Pliny (H. N. v. 1), that Scipio, during the third Punic war, placed a fleet at the disposal of his friend, in order that he might explore the African coast. At a later period of his life he visited Egypt likewise; and this journey must have been taken after the fall of Corinth, since he was in that country in the reign of Ptolemy Physcon, who did not ascend the throne till a.c. 146 (Strab. xvii. p. 797). It has been conjectured that Polybius accompanied Scipio to Spain in n. c. 134, and was present at the fall of Numantia in the following year, since Cicero states (ad Fam. v. 12) that Polybius wrote a history of the Numantine war. The year of his death is uncertain. We have only the testimony of Lucian (Macrob. 23.), that he died at the age of 82, in consequence of a fall from his horse, as he was returning from the country. If we are correct in placing his birth in n. c. 204, his death would fall in a.c. 122.

The history of Polybius consisted of forty books. It began n. c. 220, where the history of Aratus left off, and ended at n. c. 146, in which year Corinth was destroyed, and the independence of Greece perished. It consisted of two distinct parts, which were probably published at different times and afterwards united into one work. The first part comprised a period of fifty-three years, beginning with the second Punic war, the Social War, the war between Antiochus and Ptolemy Philopator in Asia, and ending with the conquest of Perseus and the downfall of the Macedonian kingdom, in n. c. 168. This was in fact the main portion of his work, and its great object was to show how the Romans had in this brief period of fifty-three years conquered the greater part of the world; but since the Greeks were ignorant for the most part of the early history of Rome, he gives a survey of Roman history from the taking of the city by the Gauls to the commencement of the second Punic war, in the first two books, which thus form an introduction to the body of the work. With the fall of the Macedonian kingdom the supremacy of the Roman dominion was decided, and nothing more remained for the other nations of the world than to receive laws from the republic, and to yield submission to its sway. But, Polybius says, Polybius was not the only one of the manner in which wars are terminated can never lead us into a complete and perfect knowledge, either of the conquerors or the conquered nations, since, in many instances, the most eminent and signal victories, through an injudicious use and application of them, have proved fatal and pernicious; as, on the other hand, the heaviest ills of fortune, when supported with constancy and courage, are frequently converted into great advantage. On this account it will be useful, likewise, to review the policy which the Romans afterwards observed, in governing the countries that were subdued, and to consider also, what were the sentiments of the conquered states with respect to the conduct of their masters: at the same time describing the various characters and inclinations of particular men, and laying open their tempers and designs, as well in private life as in the affairs of government. To render, therefore, this history complete and perfect, it will be necessary to lay open and explain the circumstances and condition of each several people, from the time that the contest was decided which gave to the Romans the sovereignty of the world, to the rise of new commotions and disorders. And as these too were of great importance, and attended with many uncommon incidents, and as I was myself engaged in the execution of some of them, in the conduct and contrivance of others, and was an eye-witness of almost all, I shall undertake the task of relating them at large, and begin, as it were, a new history.

This second part, which formed a kind of supplement, comprised the period from the conquest of Perseus in n. c. 168, to the fall of Corinth in n. c. 146. The history of the conquest of Greece seems to have been completed in the thirty-ninth book; and the fortieth book probably contained a chronological summary of the whole work. (Comp. Clinton, F. H. ad ann. 146.)

The subjects contained in each of these parts are related circumstantially by Polybius in the following passage, which will give the reader the best idea of the contents of the work.

"Having first explained the causes of the war between the Carthaginians and the Romans, which is most frequently called the war of Hannibal, we shall show in what manner this general entered Italy, and gave so great a shock to the empire of the Romans, that they began to fear that they should soon be dispossessed even of their proper country and seat of government: while their enemies, elate with a success which had exceeded all their hopes, were persuaded that they could not be checked, as so soon as they should once appear before it. We shall then speak of the alliance that was made by Philip with the Carthaginians as soon as he had ended his war with the Aetolians, and settled the affairs of Greece. Next will follow the disputes between Antiochus and Ptolemy Philopator, and the war that ensued between them for the sovereignty of Coele-Syria; together with the war which Prusias and the Rhodians made upon the people of Byzantium; with design to force them to desist from exacting certain duties, which they were accused to demand from all vessels that sailed into the Pontus. In this place we shall pause awhile, to take a view of the form and constitution of the Roman government; and, in the course of our inquiry, shall endeavour to demonstrate, that the peculiar temperament and spirit of their republic supplied the chief and most vital means by which this people were enabled, not only to acquire the sovereignty of Italy and Sicily, and to reduce the Gauls and Spaniards to their yoke, but to subdue the Carthaginians also, and when they had completed this great conquest, to form the project of obtaining universal empire. We shall add, likewise, a short digression concerning the fate of Hiero's kingdom in Sicily; and afterwards go on to speak of those commotions that were raised in Egypt, after the death of Ptolemy, by Philip and Antiochus: the wicked arts by which those princes attempted to share between themselves the dominions of the infant king; and the manner in which the former of them invaded Egypt, Samos, and Caria; and the latter Coele-Syria and Phoenicia. We then shall make a general recapitulation of all that was transacted.
by the Carthaginians and the Romans, in Spain, Sicily, and Africa; and from thence shall again remove the history to Greece, which now became the scene of new disorders. And having first run through the naval battles of Attalus and the Rhodians against king Philip, we shall next describe the war that followed between the Romans and this prince; together with the causes, circumstances, and conclusion of it. After these events, we shall relate in what manner the Aetolians, urged by their resentment, called Antiochus from Asia, and gave occasion to the war between the Achaeans and the Romans. And having explained the causes of that war, and seen the entrance of Antiochus into Europe, we shall then show the manner in which he fled back again from Greece; and afterwards, when he had suffered an entire defeat, was forced to abandon all the country on this side of mount Taurus. Next will follow the victories by which the Romans gave an effectual check to the insolvency of the Gauls; secured to themselves the sovereignty of nearer Asia; and delivered the people of that country from the dread of being again exposed to the violence and savage fury of those barbarians. We shall then give some account of the misfortunes in which the Aetolians and Cephallenians were involved, and of the war which Eumenes sustained against Prusias and the Gauls of Greece; together with that of Arianthes against Pharnaces. And after some discourse concerning the union and form of government of the confederate cities of Peloponnesus, which will be attended also with some remarks upon the growth and flourishing conditions of the republic of the Rhodians, we shall, in the last place, take a short review of all that has been before related; and conclude the whole with the expedition of Antiochus Epiphanes into Egypt, and the war with Perseus, which was followed by the entire subversion of the Macedonian empire." (iii. 2, 3.)

He then proceeds to relate the subjects contained in the second part of his history. "The chief of these transactions were, the expeditions of the Romans against the Celtiberians and Vaeceans; the war which the Carthaginians made against Massinissa, a sovereign prince of Africa; and that between Attalus and Prusias in Asia. We shall also see the manner in which Arianthes, king of Cappadocia, was driven from his dominions by Orofernes, assisted by Demetrius, and again by his own address recovered his paternal rights. We shall see Demetrius, the son of Scelucus, after he had reigned twelve years in Syria, deprived of his kingdom and his life, by the conspiracy of the other kings. About the same time, the Romans absolved those Greeks that were accused of having secretly excited the wars of Perseus, and permitted them to return to their own country. And not long afterwards the same Romans made war again upon the Carthaginians; at first immediately to them to remove the seat of their republic; but afterwards with design to exterminate both their name and government, for reasons which I shall there endeavour to explain. And lastly, when the Macedonians had, about this time, broken their alliance with the Romans, and the Lacedaemonians were also separated from the Peloponnesian league, the ill fate of Greece received at once both its beginning and full accomplishment, in the loss of the common liberty." (iii. 5.) dary importance; they formed only the text of the political and moral discourses which it was the province of the historian to deliver. The reflections of Polybius are, it is true, characterised by deep wisdom; and no one can read them without admiring the solidity of the historian's judgment, and deriving from them at the same time both instruction and improvement. Still, it must be admitted, that, excellent as they are, they materially detract from the merits of the history as a work of art; their frequent occurrence interrupts the continuity of the narrative, and destroys, to a great extent, the interest of the reader in the scenes which are described. Instead of narrating the events in such a manner that they should convey their own moral, and throwing in, as it were by the way, the reflections to which the narrative should give rise, he pauses in the midst of the most interesting scenes to impress upon the reader the lessons which these events ought to teach, and he thus imparts to his work a kind of moralising tone, which frequently mars the enjoyment of the reader, and, in some cases, becomes absolutely repulsive. There can be no doubt that some of the most striking faults in the history of Polybius arise from his pushing too far the principle, which is doubtless a sound one to a certain extent, that history is written for instruction and not for amusement. Hence he omits, or relates in a very brief manner, certain important events, because they did not convey, in his opinion, lessons of practical wisdom; and, on the other hand, he frequently inserts long episodes, which have little connection with the main subject of his work, because they have a didactic tendency. Thus we find that one whole book (the sixth) was devoted to a history of the Roman constitution; and in the same manner episodes were introduced even on subjects which did not teach any political or moral truths, but simply because his countrymen entertained erroneous opinions on those subjects. The thirty-fourth book, for example, seems to have been exclusively a treatise on geography. Although Polybius was thus enabled to impart much important information, of which we, in modern times, especially reap the benefits, still it cannot be denied that such episodes are no improvements to the history considered as a work of art.

Still, after making these deductions, the great merits of Polybius remain unimpaired. His strict impartiality, to which he frequently lays claim, has been generally admitted both by ancient and modern writers. And it is surprising that he displays such great impartiality in his judgment of the Romans, especially when we consider his intimate friendship with Scipio, and the strong admiration which he evidently entertained of that extraordinary people. Thus we find him, for example, characterising the occupation of Sardinia by the Romans in the interval between the first and second Punic wars, as a violation of all justice (ii. 28. § 2), and denouncing the general corruption of the Roman generals from the time of their foreign conquests, with a few exceptions (xviii. 18). But, at the same time, he does not make any equal impartiality in the history of the Achaean league; and perhaps we could hardly expect from him that he should forget that he was an Achaean. He no doubt thought that the extension of the Achaean league was essential to the liberties of Greece; and he is thus unconsciously led to exaggerate equally the merits of its friends and the faults of its enemies. He describes in far too glowing colours the character of Aratus, the great hero of the Achaean league, and ascribes to him the work (ii. 40) to the historical work of this statesman a degree of impartiality, to which it certainly was not entitled. On the same principle, he gives quite a false impression of the political life of Cleomenes, one of the greatest men of the latter days of Greece, simply because this king was the great opponent of Aratus and the league. He was likewise guilty of injustice in the views which he gives of the Aetolians, of which Brandstätter has quoted some striking instances in the work referred to below, although it must be confessed that the modern writer is in some cases equally unjust to the ancient historian, from the partiality which he displays for the Aetolians. Not only does Polybius exhibit a partiality for the Achaenians, but he cannot forget that he was an Arcadian, and is equally zealous for the honour of his native land. Thus he considers it strange that the Achaean league derived its name from the Achaean people, and not rather from the Arcadians, whom he classes with the Lacedaemonians (ii. 38); and many other instances might be quoted in which he displays an equal partiality towards his own people.

The style of Polybius will not bear comparison with the great masters of Greek literature; nor is it to be expected that it should. He lived at a time when the Greek language had lost much of its purity by an intermixture of foreign elements, and he did not attempt to imitate the language of the great Attic writers. He wrote as he spoke, and had too great a contempt for rhetorical embellishments to avail himself of them in the composition of his work. The style of such a man naturally bore the impress of his mind; and, as instruction and not amusement was the great object for which he wrote, he did not seek to please his readers by the choice of his phrases or the composition of his sentences. Hence the later Greek critics were severe in their condemnations of his style, and Dionysius classes his work with those of Phylarchus and Duris, which it was impossible to read through to the end. (Dionys. De Compos. Verb. c. 4.) But the most striking fault in the style of Polybius arises from his want of imagination. No historian can present to his readers a striking picture of events, unless he has at first vividly conceived them in his own mind; and Polybius, with his cool, calm, calculating judgment, was not only destitute of all imaginative powers, but evidently despised it when he saw it exercised by others. It is no doubt certain that an historian must keep his imagination under a strong control; but it is equally certain that he will always fail in producing any striking impression upon the mind of his readers, unless he has, to some extent, called his imagination into exercise. It is for this reason that the geographical descriptions of Polybius are so vague and indistinct; and the following remarks of Dr. Arnold, upon the character of Polybius as a geographer, completely in accordance with the general views we have expressed: — "Nothing shows more clearly the great purity of geographical talent, than the praise which has been commonly bestowed upon Polybius as a good geographer. He seems indeed to have been aware of the importance of geography to history, and to have taken considerable pains to gain information on the subject: but this very cir-
The greater part of the history of Polybius has perished. We possess the first five books entire, but the rest we have only fragments and extracts, of which some, however, are of considerable length, such as the account of the Roman army, which belonged to the sixth book. The first five books were first printed in a Latin translation executed by Nic. Perotti, and issued from the celebrated press of Sweynheym and Pannartz, Rome, 1475, fol. The first part of the work of Polybius, which was printed in Greek, was the treatise on the Roman army, which was published by Ant. de Sabio, Venice, 1529, 4to, with a Latin translation by Lascaris; and in the following year, 1530, the Greek text of the first five books, with the translation of Perotti, appeared at Hagenen, edited by Obopoeus (Koch), but without the treatise on the Roman army, which had probably not yet found its way across the Alps. A few years afterwards a discovery was made of some extracts from the other books of Polybius; but the nature of the compilation, and the time at which it was drawn up, are so unknown, and the contents are so hazy, and are so vaguely mentioned, that they can hardly believe with Casaubon that it was the Epitome which was made by M. Brutus, and of which both Plutarch (Brut. c. 4) and Suidas (s. v. Βυθότος) speak. These extracts, which must be distinguished from those of the emperor Constantinus Porphyrogenitus mentioned below, contain the greater part of the sixth book, and portions of the following eleven (vii.—xvii.). The manuscript containing them was brought from Corfu, and they were published, together with the first five books which had already appeared at Basel, 1549, fol, from the press of Herragius. The Latin translation of these extracts was executed by Wolfgang Musculus, who also corrected Perotti's version of the other books, and the editing of the Greek text was superintended by Arnold Paraxylus Arliensis. A portion of these extracts, namely a description of the naval battle fought between Philippus and Attalus, and the Rhodians, was first, in the sixteenth book, had been previously published by Dayf in his De Re Navali Veterum, Paris, 1556, reprinted at Basel, 1537. In 1562 Ursinus published at Antwerp, in 4to, a second collection of Extracts from Polybius, entitled Excerpta de Legationibus ('Ἐξολογια περὶ Προσεβίων'), which were made in the tenth century of the Christian era by order of the Emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus. These Excerpta are taken from various authors, but the most important of them came from Polybius. In 1589 is Casabon published at Paris, in folio, his excellent edition of Polybius, in which he incorporated all the Excerpta and fragments that had hitherto been discovered, and added a new Latin version. He intended likewise to write a commentary upon the author, but he did not proceed further than the 20th chapter of the first book; this portion of his commentary was published after his death at Paris, 1617, 8vo. A further addition was made to the fragments of Polybius by Valesius, who published, in 1634, another portion of the Excerpta of Constantinus, entitled Excerpta de Virtutibus et Vitis (περὶ δρεπηίσ kal καλείσ), containing extracts from Polybius, Diodorus Siculius, and other writers; and to this collection Valesius added several other fragments of Polybius, gathered together from various writers. Jacobis Gronovius undertook a new edition of Polybius, which appeared at Amsterdam in 1670, in 3 vols. 8vo.; the text of this edition is taken almost verbatim from Casabon's, but the editor added, with the exception of the commentary of Casaubon on the first twenty chapters of the first book, many additional notes by Casaubon, which had been collected from his papers by his son Mericus Casaubon, and likewise notes by Gronovius himself. The edition of Gronovius was reprinted under the care of J. A. Erneste at Leipzig, 1763—1764, 3 vols. 8vo. The next edition is that of Schweigaeus, which surpasses all the preceding ones. It was published at Leipzig, 1749—1795 in 8 vols. 8vo., of which the first four contained the Greek text with a Latin translation, and the other volumes a commentary, an historical and geographical index, and a copious "Lexicon Polybianum," which is almost indispensable to the student. Schweigaeus's edition was reprinted at Oxford in 1823, in 5 vols. 8vo., without the commentary, but with the Lexicon. From the time of Valesius no new additions were made to the fragments of Polybius, with the exception of a fragment described as a part of a manuscript reprinted in the second volume of Gronovius's Lycy, until Angelo Mai discovered in the Vatican library at Rome the third section of the Excerpta of Constantinus Porphyrogenitus, entitled Excerpta de Sententìis (περὶ γραμμις), which, among other extracts, contained a considerable number from the history of Polybius. These excerpts were published by Mai in the second volume of his Scriptorum veterum Nova Collectio, Rome, 1837, but in consequence of the mutilated state of the manuscript from which they were taken, many of them are unintelligible. Some of the errors in Mai's edition are corrected in the reprints of the Excerpta, published by Geel at Leyden in 1829, and by Lucht at Atona in 1830; but these Excerpta appear in a far more correct form in the edition of Heyse, Berlin, 1846, since Heyse collated the manuscript after the great catalogue of the Vatican. The best portion of Polybius is by Immanuel Bekker (Berlin, 1844, 2 vols. 8vo.), who has added the Vatican fragments. Of the translations of Polybius into modern languages, those most worthy of notice are the French, by Thuillier, chiefly remarkable on account of the military commentary appended to it by Po- lard, Amsterdam, 1759, 7 vols. 4to.; the German,

by Seybold, Lemgo, 1779—1873, 4 vols. 8vo.; and the English by Hampton, 1772, 2 vols. 4to.; the latter is upon the whole a faithful version, and we have availed ourselves of it in the quotations which we have made above.

I do not use Polybius till he came to the second Punic war, but from that time he followed him very closely, and his history of the events after the termination of that war appears to be but little more than a translation of his Greek predecessor. Cicero likewise seems to have chiefly followed Polybius in the account which he gives of the Roman constitution in his De Republica. The history of Polybius was continued by Poseidonius and Strabo. [PROSEIDONIUS; STRABO.]

Besides the great historical work of which we have been speaking, Polybius wrote, 2. The Life of Philopomen in three books, to which he himself refers (x. 24). 3. A treatise on Tactics (?a per τας Ταξις ὑπομνήσατα), which he also quotes (ix. 20), and to which Arrian (Tactici, init.) and Aetolian (Tactici. cc. 1, 3) allude; 4. A History of the following, according to the statement of Cicero (ad Fam. v. 12); and 5, a small treatise De Habituatione sub Aquatore (?εν την οὐρανώδεις ἔσχοιν), quoted by Geminius (c. 13, in Petavius, Uralogium, vol. iii. p. 31, &c.), but it is not improbable that this formed part of the 34th book of the History, which was entirely devoted to geography.

The reader will find some valuable information respecting the character of Polybius as an historian in the following works:—Lucus, Über Polybius. Durststellungen des Aetolischen Bundes, Königsberg, 1827; Merleker, Die Geschichte des Aetolisch-Achaeeichen Bundesgenossen-Krieges, Königsberg, 1831; K. W. Nitsch, Polybius: zur Geschichte antiker Politik und Historiographie, Kieler, 1842; Brandstetter, Die Geschichte des Aetolischen Landes, Völker und Bundes, nebst einer historiographischen Abhandlung über Polybius, Berlin, 1844.

2. Of Sardis, a Greek grammarian of unknown date, some of whose works have been printed by Iriarte (Catal. Cod. MSS. Biblioth. Matrit. vol. i. pp. 117, &c., 379, &c.) and Walz (Rhetares Graeci, vol. viii.).

POLYBOEA (Πολυβοε, the name of two of the mythical personages, one a sister of Hyacinthus (Paus. iii. 19. § 4), and the other the wife of Actor. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 321.)

[LS.]

POLYBOTES (Πολυβότης), a giant, who in the contest between the gods and giants was pursued by Poseidon across the sea as far as the island of Cos. There Poseidon tore away a part of the island, which was afterwards called Nyssa, and throwing it upon the giant buried him under it. (Apollod. i. 6. § 2; Paus. i. 2. § 4; Strab. x. p. 489.)

POLYBYS (Πολυβύς). 1. A Trojan, a son of Antenor, mentioned in the Iliad. (xi. 59.)

2. An Ithacan, father of the suitor Eurymachus, was slain by the swine-herd Eumaeus. (Hom. Od. i. 399, xxii. 294.)

3. The son of Acalia, at Thebes in Egypt; he was connected with Menelaus by ties of hospitality. (Hom. Od. iv. 126.)

4. One of the Philaeans. (Hom. Od. viii. 373.)

5. The king of Corinth, by whom Oedipus was brought up. He was the husband of Periboea or Merope. (Soph. Oed. Rer. 770; Apollod. iii. 5. vol. iii.

§ 7.) Pausanias (ii. 6. § 3), makes him king of Sicyon, and describes him as a son of Hermes and Chthonophyle, and as the father of Lydamass, whom he gave in marriage to Talaus, king of the Argives. (Comp. Ov. Pers.)

6. The father of Glaucon by Euboea. (Athen. vii. p. 296.)

POLYBYS* (Πολυβύς), one of the pupils of Hippocrates, who was also his son-in-law, and lived in the island of Cos, in the fourth century B.C. Nothing is known of the events of his life, except that, with his brothers-in-law, Thessalus and Draco, he was one of the founders of the ancient medical sect of the dogmati); that he was sent abroad by Hippocrates, with his fellow-pupils, during the time of the plague, to assist different cities with his medical skill (Thessal. Orol. p. 843), and that he afterwards remained in his native country (Galen, Comment. in Hippocr. "De Nat. Hom." i. praef. vol. xvi. p. 12). According to Galen (i.e.), he followed implicitly the opinions and mode of practice of Hippocrates; but the story of his death (p. 1779—1783, pub.) as an insult has been suspected, both by ancient and modern critics, to be the author of several treatises in the Hippocratic collection. Choulant (Handb. der Bücherkunde fü die Ältere Medicin) specifies the following:—1. Περὶ Φυσιὸς Ἀνθρώπου, De Naturae Hominis; 2. Περὶ Γονίων, De Genitura; 3. Περὶ Φυσιὸς Παιδίων, De Natura Pueri; 4. Περὶ Δαίμονες Τεταρταί, De Salutari Victus Ratione; 5. Περὶ Παιδίων, De Affectionibus; and 6. Περὶ τῶν Ἐντός Παιδίων, De Internis Affectionibus: Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. vi. p. 290) attributes to him the treatise, Περὶ Ἐρμηνευσιον, De Septimiae Partu, and Plutarch (De Philos. Plac. v. 18) quotes him as the author of that Περὶ Ἑρμηνευσιον, De Septimiae Partu. Of these, however, M. Littre (Oeuvres d’Hippocr. vol. i. p. 345, &c.) considers that only the first, and perhaps the fourth, are to be attributed to Polybus (Hippocrates, p. 487), although Galen says that the treatise De Naturae Hominis was the work of Hippocrates himself (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Nat. Hom." i. praef. vol. xvi. pp. 11, 12). Polybus is several times mentioned by Galen, chiefly in connection with different works in the Hippocratic Collection (De Foet. Format. c. 1. iv. p. 653, De Hippocr. et Plat. Descr. vi. 3, vol. v. p. 529, De Diffic. Respir. iii. 1, 13, vol. vii. pp. 391, 960, Comment. in Hippocr. "De Nat. Hom." ii. 19, vol. xv. p. 164, Comment. in Hippocr. "De Sal. Vict. Rati." praef. and c. 33, vol. xv. pp. 175, 223, Comment. in Hippocr. "De Humor." i. praef. vol. xvi. p. 3, Comment. in Hippocr. "Aphor." vi. 1. xviii. p. i. p. 8): his name also occurs in Celus (Plut. De Nat. Nat. vi. 20. § 22, § 23, vol. vii. § 3, pp. 101, 127, Celsus Animalium De Mort. Aenit. iii. 9, 15, 218, 227), and Pliny (H. N. xxix. in fine). A collection of the treatises attributed to Polybus was published in a Latin translation, 1544, 4to, Basill in J. Oporinum; and in Italian by P. Lauro, 1545, 4to, Venice. A Latin translation of the treatise De Salubri Victus Ratione was published in a separate form by J. Placotomus (Bretschneider). 1561, 12mo, Antwerp, and is to be found appended to the Regimen Sanitatis Saleritanae (in numerous editions), and to three or four other works. [W. A. G.] POLYCARPUS (Πολύκαρπος). 1. A son of Lelex, brother of Myles, and husband of Messena, the daughter of Triops of Argos. He emigrated from Laconia to Messenia, which country he thus called after his wife. He was the first king of Messenia. (Paus. iii. 1. § 1. iv. 1. § 1.) 2. A son of Butes, was married to Eusachem, the daughter of Hyllus. (Paus. iv. 2. § 1.) [L. S.] POLYCARPUS (Πολύκαρπος). 1. ASCETA. There is extant in Greek a life of the female saint Synelatica, which has been ascribed to various persons. Some MSS. and the Greek ecclesiastical historian, Nicephorus Callistii (II. E. viii. 40), ascribe it to Athanasius, but Montfaucon, though he gives the piece with a Latin version in his edition of the works of Athanasius (vol. i. p. 681, &c.), classes it among the spurious works, and declares that the difference of style, and the absence of any external testimony for five or six centuries after Athanasius, leave no room to doubt its spuriousness. A copy, which was among the papers of Combés, contains a clause, stating that the disconnected passages of the Synelatica were ascribed to "the blessed Arsenius of Pegaeus;" but this does not seem to describe him as the compiler of the narrative, but only as the author from whom part of the materials were derived. It is then most reasonable to follow the very ancient MS. in the Vatican library, which ascribes the biography to Polycarp the Ascetic or Monk, but where or when this Polycarp lived cannot be determined. The biography was first published in the Latin version of David Colvillus in the Acta Sanctorum Januarii, vol. i. p. 242, &c. The original Greek text is said to have been published with some other pieces, 4to, Ingolstadt, 1603; it is given with a new Latin version and notes in the Ecclesiae Graecae Monumenta of Cotelerius, vol. i. p. 201, &c., 4to, Paris, 1677. The MS. used by Cotelerius contained neither the author's name nor the final clause about Arsenius of Pegaeus. The title of the piece is Βίος καὶ Δόξα Πολύκαρπου (in Montfaucon's edition, B. K. Π. τίγς δόξα καὶ μνημεῖα τοῦ δοκοῦ, I. S. Πολύκαρπου) (or according to Montfaucon, sancatae celebriusque maiors nostrae (as recorded in Montfaucon, sancatae beatique magistriæ) Synelaticæ, (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. x. p. 329.) 2. MARTYR. [No. 3.] 3. Of Smyrna, a Christian writer of the age immediately succeeding that of the Apostles. Of the early history of this eminent father we have no trustworthy account. The time of his birth is not known, and we can only determine it by approximation. At the time of his martyrdom, to which various dates are assigned, he had been a Christian eighty-six years. Now if we adopt for the present Tillemon's date of his martyrdom, A. D. 166, and suppose Polycarp to have been of Christian parents, or at least educated from childhood in the Christian faith, and so interpret the eighty-six years, as several eminent critics do, of the term of his natural life, his birth will fall in A. D. 80; but if with other critics we suppose him to have been converted at a riper age, and compute the eighty-six years from the time of his conversion, his birth must be placed at a considerably earlier period. A vague passage in the Latin text of Polycarp's epistle to the Philippians (c. xi.), which we think merely indicates that the church at Smyrna was not in existence when the Apostle Paul wrote his epistle to the Philippians, has been adduced to prove that Polycarp was born before that time; but the words are too indefinite to bear out any such inference. An ancient life, or rather a fragment of a life of Polycarp, ascribed by Bollandus to a certain Pionius of unknown date, and given by him in a Latin version in the Acta Sanctorum Januarii (a. d. 26), vol. ii. p. 695, &c., dwells much on the early history of Polycarp, but the record (if indeed it be the work of Pionius) is some centuries later than its subject, and is evidently false in several particulars. We are inclined to think, however, that it embodies some genuine traditions of Polycarp's history. According to this account, the Apostle Paul visited Smyrna in his way from Galatia, through the prosconsular Asia to Jerusalem (the writer apparently confounding two journeys recorded in Acts, xvii. 18—22, and 23, &c.), and having collected the believers, instructed them in the proper time of keeping Easter. After Paul's departure, his host, Strataeas, the brother of Timothens, became bishop of the infant church; or, for the passage is not clear, Strataeas became an elder and Deuotertius was bishop. It was during the episcopate of Bucolus (whether he was the contemporary or the successor of Strataeas) that Callisto, a female member of the church, eminent for riches and works of charity, was warned of God in a dream to go to the gate of the city, called the Ephesian gate, where she would find a little boy (puerulum) named Polycarp, of Eastern origin, who had been reduced to slavery, and was in the hands of two men, from whom she was to redeem him. Callisto, obedient to the vision, rose, went to the gate, found the two men with the child, as it had been revealed to her; and having redeemed the boy, brought him home, educated him with maternal affection in the Christian faith, and, when he attained to manhood, first made him ruler over her house, then adopted him as her son, and finally left him heir to all her wealth. Polycarp had been from childhood distinguished by his benevolence, piety, and submission to the gravity of his deportment, and his diligence in the study of the Holy Scriptures. These qualities early attracted the notice and regard of the bishop, Bucolus, who loved Polycarp with fatherly affection, and was in return regarded by him with filial love. By Bucolus he was ordained first to the office of deacon, in which he laboured diligently, confuting heathens, Jews, and heretics; delivering catechetical homilies in the church, and writing epistles of which that to the Philippians is the only extant specimen. He was subsequently when of mature age (his hair was already turning gray) and still maturer conduct, ordained presbyter by Bucolus, on whose death he was elected and consecrated bishop. We omit to notice the various miracles said to be wrought by Polycarp, or to have occurred on different occasions in his life, which are the leading facts recorded in this ancient narrative, which has, we think, been too lightly estimated by Tillemont. That it has been interpolated with many fabulous admixtures of a later date, is clear; but we think there are some things in it which indicate that it embodies earlier and truer elements. The difficulty is to discover and separate these from later corruptions. The chief ground for rejecting the narrative altogether is the supposed difficulty of reconciling them with the more trustworthy statements of Irenaeus, who, in his boyhood, had known, perhaps lived with Polycarp (Iren. Epistola ad Floriam, apud Euseb. H. E. v. 20), and of other writers. According to Irenaeus (Epist. ad Victor. Popau, apud Euseb. H. E. v. 24), Polycarp had intercourse with "John and others of the Apostles:" or still more expressly (Adv. Haer. iii. 3, et apud Euseb. H. E. iv. 14), he was instructed (perhaps converted, μαθητηρευθησει) by the Apostles, and conversed familiarly with many who had seen Christ; was by the Apostles appointed (κατασταθησει) bishop of the church at Smyrna; and always taught what he had learned from the Apostles. Tertullian (De Præcæptioribus Haœ.— scie, c. 32), and Jerome (De Viris Illustribus, c. 17), distinctly mention John as the Apostle by whom Polycarp was ordained. But we question if the expressions of Irenaeus, when critically examined and stripped of the rhetorical exaggeration with which his natural reverence for Polycarp has invested them, will prove more than that Polycarp had enjoyed opportunities of hearing some of the Apostles; and was, with their sanction, appointed bishop by the church at Smyrna. That John was one of the Apostles referred to by Irenaeus, there is not the slightest reason to doubt; and we are disposed, with Tillemont, to regard Philip, whom Polycrates of Ephesus (apud Euseb. H. E. v. 24) states to have ended his days in the Phrygian Hierapolis, as another of those with whom Polycarp had intercourse. We believe that intercourse with these apostles, and perhaps with some other old disciples who had seen Jesus Christ, is sufficient to bear out the statements of Irenaeus, and is not inconsistent with the general truth of the ancient narrative given by Bollandus. His statement of the ordination of Polycarp by the Apostles, may perhaps be reduced to the fact that John, of whom alone Tertullian (l. c.) makes mention, was among "the bishops of the neighbouring churches," who came, according to the narrative, to the consecration of Polycarp. This circumstance enables us to fix that consecration in or before A. D. 104, the latest date assigned to the death of the venerable Apostle, and which is not inconsistent with the narrative. It must be borne in mind, too, that the whole subject of the ordination of these early bishops is perplexed by ecclesiastical writers utterly neglecting the circumstance, that in some of the larger churches there was in the Apostolic age a plurality of bishops (comp. Philip. i. 1), not to speak of the grave and much disputed question of the identity of bishops and presbyters. The Apostolic ordination mentioned by Irenaeus and Tertullian may, therefore, have taken place during the lifetime of Boculias, and have been antecedent to the precedence which, on his death, Polycarp obtained. We are the more disposed to admit the early origin and the truth of the leading statements embodied in the narrative, as the natural tendency of a former of a later age would have been to exaggerate the opportunities of Apostolic intercourse, and the sanctions of Apostolic authority, which Polycarp certainly possessed.

Polycarp was bishop of Smyrna at the time when Ignatius of Antioch passed through that city on his way to suffer death at Rome, some time between A. D. 107 and 116. [Ignatius, No. 1.] Ignatius seems to have enjoyed much this intercourse with Polycarp, whom he had known, appa-
OFFICER INTO WHOSE CUSTODY HE WAS DELIVERED, WITH THE USUAL LAXITY OF PAGANISM, WOULD HAVE PERSUaded HIM, APPARENTLY THROUGH PITY, TO OFFER DIVINE HONOURS AND SACRIFICE TO THE EMPEROR; BUT HIS STEADY REFUSAL CHANGED THEIR PITY INTO ANGER, AND THEY VIOLENTLY THREW HIM DOWN FROM THE CARRiAGE IN WHICH THEY WERE CONVEYING HIM. ON ENTERING THE AMPHITHEATRE WHERE THE PROCONSL, STRATIUS QUADRATUS, WAS, A VOICE WHICH THE EXCITED FEELINGS OF THE OLD MAN AND HIS COMPANIONS LED THEM TO REGARD AS FROM HEAVEN, EXCLAIMED, "BE STRONG, O POLYCARP! AND QUIT YOU LIKE A MAN." THE PROCONSL WAS, LIKE OTHERS, MOVED BY HIS APPEARANCE, AND EXHORTED HIM TO CONSIDER HIS ADVANCED AGE, AND COMPLY WITH THE REQUIREMENTS OF GOVERNMENT: "SWEAR BY THE FORTUNE OF CAESAR, RECENT, AND CRY 'AWAY WITH THE GODLESS (TOUS ĐÉÓSΩS)!' LOOKING FIRST ROUND UPON THE HEATHEN MULTIITUDE, AND THEN UP TO HEAVEN, THE OLD MAN SIGHED AND SAID, "AWAY WITH THE GODLESS." THEIR RAGE AGAIN URGED HIS "SWEAR BY CAESAR'S FORTUNE, AND I WILL RELEASE THEE." RE- VIVE CHRIST." "EIGHTY AND SIX YEARS HAVE I SERVED HIM," WAS THE REPLY, "AND HE NEVER DID ME WRONG: HOW THEN CAN I REVEIL MY KING AND MY SAVIOUR?" THREATS OF BEING TORMENTED WITH WILD BASTARDS, AND OF BEING COMMITTED TO THE FLAMES, FAILED TO MOVE HIM; AND HIS BOLD AVOIWE THAT HE WAS A CHRISTIAN PROVOKED THE WRATH OF THE ASSEMBLED MULTIITUDE. "THIS MAN," THEY SHOUTED, "IS THE TEACHER OF IMPIETY, THE FATHER OF THE CHRISTIANS, THE MAN THAT DOES AWAY WITH OUR GODS (6 TΩΝ ΜΗΣΤΕΡΩΝ ΘΕΩΝ ΚΑΘΑ-ΡΕΤΤΩΝ) WHO TEACHES MANY NOT TO SACRIFICE TO NOR TO WORSHIP THE GODS." THEY DEMANDED THAT HE SHOULD BE CAST INTO WILD BASTARDS, AND WHEN THE ASIARCH, PHILIP OF TRALLES, WHO PRESIDED OVER THE GAMES WHICH WERE GOING ON, EVADED THE COMMAND, ON THE PRETEXT THAT THE COMBATS WITH WILD BASTARDS WERE ENDED, THEY DEMANDED THAT HE SHOULD BE BURNED ALIVE. THE DEMAND WAS COMPLIED WITH; AND THE POPULATION, THAT HAD COLLECTED FROM THE BATHS AND WORKSHOPS, LACED AND FAGGOTS FOR THE FUEL. THE OLD MAN UNGIRDING HIMSELF, LAID ASIDE HIS GARMENTS, AND TOOK HIS PLACE IN THE MIDST OF THE FUEL; AND WHEN THEY WOULD HAVE SECURED HIM WITH NAILS TO THE STAKE, SAID, "LET ME REMAIN AS I AM; FOR HE THAT HAS ENABLED ME TO BRAVE THE FIRE WILL SO STRENGTHEN ME THAT, WITHOUT YOUR FASTENING ME WITH NAILS, I SHALL, UNMOVED, ENDURE ITS FIERCENESS." AFTER HE HAD OFFERED A SHORT BUT BEAUTIFUL PRAYER, THE FIRE WAS KINDLED, BUT A HIGH WIND DREW THE FLAMES ON ONE SIDE, SO THAT HE WAS ROASTED RATHER THAN BURNED; AND THE EXECUTIONER WAS ORDERED TO DESPATCH HIM WITH A SWORD. ON STRIKING HIM WITH IT SO GREAT A QUANTITY OF BLOOD FLOWED FROM THE WOUND AS TO QUENCH THE FLAMES, WHICH WERE, HOWEVER, RESUSCITATED, IN ORDER TO CONSUME HIS LIFELESS BODY. HIS ASHES WERE COLLECTED BY THE PIOUS CARE OF THE CHRISTIANS OF HIS DIOCESE, AND DEPOSITED IN A SUITABLE PLACE OF INTERMENT. THE DAY AND YEAR OF POLYCARP'S MARTYRDOM ARE INVOLVED IN CONSIDERABLE DOUBT. SAMUEL PETIT PLACES HIM IN A.D. 175; Usher, Pagi, AND BOLLANDUS, IN A.D. 169; EUSEBIUS (CHRONICON) PLACES IT EARLIER, IN THE SEVENTH YEAR OF MARCUS AURELIUS, WHO ACCESSED TO THE THRONE, 7TH MARCH, A.D. 161; Scaliger, Le MOYNE, AND CAVÉ, PLACE IT IN A.D. 167; TILMONT IN 166; THE CHRONICON PASCHALE IN THE CHRONICLE OF AELIANUS AND PASTOR, A.D. 163; AND PEARSON, WHO DIFFERS WIDELY FROM OTHER CRITICS IN A.D. 147, IN THE REIGN OF TITUS ANTONIANUS PIUS. PEARSON BRINGS VARIOUS REASONS IN SUPPORT OF HIS OPINION, WHICH REASONS ARE EXAMINED BY TILMONT IN ONE OF HIS CAREFUL AND ELABORATE NOTES. POLYCARP IS REFERENCED AS A SAINT BOTH BY THE GREEK AND ROMISH CHURCHES; BY THE FORMER ON THE 23RD OF FEBRUARY, BY THE LATTER ON THE 26TH OF JANUARY, OR (AT PARIS) ON THE 27TH OF APRIL. THE GREEKS OF Smyrna, ON HIS FESTIVAL, USED FORMERLY TO VISIT DEVOUTLY WHAT IS SHOWN AS HIS TOMB, NEAR THE RUINS OF AN ANCIENT CHURCH OR CHAPEL, ON A HILL SIDE TO THE S.E. OF THE CITY. MR. ARNDEL (DISCOVERIES IN ASIA MINOR, VOL. II. P. 397) IS DISPOSED TO THINK THAT THE TRADITION AS TO HIS PLACE OF INTERMENT IS CORRECT.

THE CHIEF AUTHORITIES FOR THE HISTORY OF POLYCARP HAVE BEEN CITED. THE ACCOUNT OF EUSEBIUS (H. E. IV. 14, 15, AND V. 20) IS CHIEFLY TAKEN FROM IRENÆUS (II. EC.), AND FROM THE LETTER OF THE CHURCH AT SYMRYNA, GIVING AN ACCOUNT OF HIS MARTYRDOM, WHICH WILL BE NOTICED BELOW. HALLOIX (ILLUSTR. ECLOGES, ORIENTALIS SCRIPTORUM VITA), APPOINTED THE LIVES (MEMOIRES, VOL. II.), HAVE COLLECTED THE CHIEF NOTICES OF THE ANCESTORS, AND EMBODIED THEM IN THEIR NARRATIVE. SEE ALSO CEILLIER, AUTEURS SAVETS, VOL. I. P. 672, &C. THE ENGLISH READER MAY CONSULT (BESIDE CAVE'S WORK JUST NOTICED) LARDNER (CREDIBILITY, &C. PART II. CH. 6, 7); NEANDER (CHURCH HIST. TRANS. WE HAVE REMAINING ONLY ONE SHORT PIECE OF THIS FATHER: HIS ΠΡΟΣ ΦΑΠΠΗΣΕΝΤΙΟΝ ΕΠΙΤΟΛΗ, AD PHILIPPENSES EPISTOLA. THAT HE WROTE SUCH AN EPISTLE, AND THAT IT WAS EXTANT IN THEIR TIME, IS ATTESTED BY IRENÆUS (ADV. HAE. I. 3, AND EPISTOL. AD FLORINUM), APUD USEBIUS (H. E. IV. 14, AND V. 20), EUSEBIUS (H. E. I. 36, IV. 14), JEROME (DE VIRIS ILLUST. C. 17), AND LATER WRITERS WHO IT IS NECESSARY TO ENUMERATE; AND, NOTWITHSTANDING THE OBJECTIONS OF THE MAGDEBURG CENTURIORES (CENT. II. C. 10); OF DAILLÉ (A. SCRIPT. IGNAT. C. 52), WHOever however, denies the genuineness of a part of MATTHIEU DE LA ROCHE; AND, AT A LATER PERIOD, OF SEMLER, OUR PRESENT COPY HAS BEEN RECEIVED BY THE GREAT MAJORITY OF CRITICS AS SUBSTANTIALLY GENUINE. SOME HAVE SUSPECTED THE TEXT TO BE INTERPOLATED; AND THE SUSPICION IS PERHAPS SOMewhat STRENGTHENED BY THE EVIDENCE AFFORDED BY THE SYRIAC VERSION OF THE EPISTLES OF IGNATIUS, LATELY PUBLISHED BY MR. CURTONT (IGNATIUS, NO. 1), OF THE EXTENSIVE INTERPOLATION OF THOSE CONTEMPORARY AND KINDRED PRODUCTIONS.

THE EPISTOLA AD PHILIPPENSES IS EXTANT IN THE GREEK ORIGINAL, AND IN AN ANCIENT LATIN VERSION; THE LATTER OF WHICH CONTAINS, TOWARD THE CONCLUSION, SEVERAL CHAPTERS, OF WHICH ONLY SOME FRAGMENTS PRESERVED BY EUSEBIUS ARE FOUND IN THE GREEK. THE LETTER PARTAKES OF THE SIMPLICITY WHICH CHARACTERIZES THE WRITINGS OF THE APOSTOLIC FATHERS, BEING HORTATORY RATHER THAN ARGUMENTATIVE; AND IS VALUABLE FOR THE INSIGHT IT PROVIDES INTO THE NEW TESTAMENT, ESPECIALLY THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PETER AND THE EPISTLES OF PAUL, WHICH ARE INCORPORATED IN IT, AND FOR THE TESTIMONY WHICH IT CONSEQUENTLY AFFORDS TO THE EARLY EXISTENCE AND WIDE CIRCULATION OF THE SACRED WRITINGS. IT WAS FIRST PUBLISHED IN BLACK LETTER IN THE LATIN VERSION, BY JE. FABER STAPULANSIS, WITH THE WORKS OF THE PROTO-DIONYSIUS AREOPAGITUS AND OF IGNATIUS (DIONYSIUS; IGNATIUS, NO. 1), FOL. PARIS, 1498, UNDER THE TITLE OF THEOLOGIA VIVIFICANS; AND WAS REPRINTED AT STRASBOURG, A.D. 1503; AT PARIS, 1515; AT BASEL, 1520; AT COLOGNE, 1536; AT INGOLSTADT, WITH THE
Clementina [Clemens, Romanus], 410. 1546; at Cologne, with the Latin version of the writings of the pseudo-Dionysius, 1557; and with the Clementina and the Latin version of the Epistola of Ignatius, fol. A.D. 1569. It appeared also in the following collections: the Microprostyticon, Basel, 1550; the Orthodoxographia of Heroldus, Basel, 1555; in the Orthodoxographa of Gryneus, Basel, 1569; in the Milla Patrum of Francis Rous, 8vo, London, 1659; and in the various editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum, from its first publication by De la Bigne, a.d. 1575. The Greek text was first published by Halloix, subjoined to the life of Polycarp, in his Illustrum Ecclesiæ Orientalis Scribarum Vitae et Documenta, vol. i. fol. Donui, 1633; and was again published by Usher, with the Epistola of Ignatius, 4to. Oxford, 1644, not in the Appendix Ignatiana (which came out in 1647) as incorrectly stated by Fabricius; by Maderus, 4to. Heimstadt, 1653; and in the Patres Apostolici of Cotelierus, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1672; and Amsterdam, 1724; of Iitigius, 8vo. Leipzig, 1699; of Frey, Basel, 1742, and of Russel, 2 vols. 1vo. 1746. It is contained also in the editions of Ignatius, by Aldrich, 8vo. Oxon. 1706, and Smith, 4to. Oxon. 1709. It is contained also in the Varia Sacra of Le Moyne, vol. i. 4to. Leyden, 1685; and in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. i. fol. Venice, 1765. Of more recent editions may be mentioned those of Hornemann, Seripta Genesis Graecæ Patrum Apostolicon, 4to. Copenhagen, 1828; Routh, Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Opuscula Praeipua quaedam, vol. i. 8vo. Oxford, 1632; Jacobson, Patrum Apostolicon quæ supersunt, vol. ii. 8vo. Oxford, 1838; and Habel, Patrum Apostolicon Opera, 8vo. Tubingen, 1829. There are English versions of this Epistle by Wake and Clementson [Ignatius, No. 1], and one in Cave's Apostolici, or Lives of the Primitive Fathers.

That Polycarp wrote other Epistles is attested by Irenæus (Epistol. ad Florin.): one Pròs Αθνηναίων, Ad Athenienes, is quoted by St. Maximus in his Prologus ad Libros Dionysii Areopagitaï [Maximus Confessor], and by Joannes Maxentius [Maxentius, Joannes], but is supposed to be spurious; at any rate it is now lost: another, Pròs Δωρείαν τῶν Ἀποστόλων, Ad Dionysium Areopagiain, mentioned by Suidas (s. v. Πολυκαρπος), is supposed to be spurious also. The life of Polycarp, ascribed to Pionius, states that he wrote various Tractatus [Homiliae, and Epistola. and especially a book De Oblativa S. Joanete; of which, according to Halloix (l. c.), some extracts from a MS. said to be extant in an abbey in Northern Italy, had been given in a Concio de S. Joanne Evangelista by Franciscus Hublot; but even Halloix evidently doubted their genuineness. Some fragments ascribed to Polycarp, cited, in a Latin version, in a Catena in Quattuor Evangelistas by Victor of Capua, were published by Franciscus Feudertinus subjoined to Lib. iii. c. 3, of his Annotationes ad Irenæum, and were subsequently reprinted by Halloix (l. c.), Usher (Appendix Ignatiana, p. 31, &c.), Maderus (l. c.), Cotelierus (l. c.), Itigius (l. c.), and Galland (l. c.), under the title of Fragmenta Quinque o Reriposirionum Capita- tiis S. Polycarphi adspersa, but their genuineness is very doubtful. (Cave, Hist. Ed. ii. p. 44, &c. fol. Oxon. 1740; Itigius, De Biblioth. Patrum; passim; Fabric. Bibl. Græca. vol. vii. p. 47, &c.; Cellier, Aureus Saceris, l. c.; Lardner, Credibility, pt. ii. b. c. 6, &c.; Gallandus, Bibliotheca Patrum, proleg. ad vol. i. c. ix.; Jacobson, l. c. proleg. pp. l. &c. lxx.)

The Τῆς Σιμώνιας ἐκκλησίας περί μαρτυρίου τοῦ ἀγίου Πολυκαρποῦ ἐπιστολὴ ἐγκυκλικὸς is almost entirely incorporated in the Historia Ecclesiastica of Eusebius (iv. 15); it is also extant in its original form, in which it was first published by Archbishop Usher, in his Appendix Ignatiana, 4to. London, 1647; and was reprinted in the Acta Martyrum Sinææ et Selectæ of Ruyrart, 4to. Paris, 1659, in the Patres Apostolici of Cotelierus, vol. ii. fol. Paris, 1672, Antwerp (or rather Amsterdam, 1698, and Amsterdam, 1724; it was also reprinted by Maderus, in his edition of the Epistola Polycarphi, already mentioned; by Itigius, in his Bibliotheca Patrum Apostolicon, 8vo. Leipzig, 1699; by Smith, in his edition of the Epistolas of Ignatius (reprinted at Basel, by Frey, 8vo. 1742); by Hessel, in his Patres Apostolici, vol. ii. 8vo. London, 1746; and by Gallandus, in his Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. i. fol. Venice, 1765; and by Jacobson, in his Patrum Apostolicon quæ supersunt, vol. ii. 8vo. Oxford, 1838. There is an ancient Latin version, which is given with the Greek text by Usher; and there are modern Latin versions given by other editors of the Greek text, or in the Acta Sanctorum Januarii (ad d. xxvi.) vol. ii. p. 702, &c. There are English versions by Archbishop Wake, 8vo. London, 1693 (often reprinted); and lately revised by Chevallier, 8vo. Cambridge, 1833; and by Dalrymple, in his Remains of Christian Antiquity, 8vo. Edinburgh, 1776. (Cave, l. c. p. 65; Fabric. l. c. p. 51; Lardner, l. c. c. 7; Cellier, l. c. p. 695; Iitigius, Galland, and Jacobson, l. l. c.)

POLYCASTE (Πολυκάστη). 1. A daughter of Nestor and Anaxibia (Hom. Od. iii. 464; Apollod. i. 9, § 9), became by Telemachus the mother of Persepolis. (Eustath. ad Hom. l. c.)

2. A daughter of Lygaeus, was married to Icarius, by whom she became the mother of Penelope. (Strab. x. p. 461.)

POLYCHARES (Πολυχάρης), a Messenian, and the conqueror in the 4th Olympiad (b.c. 764), is celebrated as the immediate cause of the first Messenian war, b. c. 743. Having been wronged by the Lacedaemonian Eueusphen, he took revenge by aggressions upon other Lacedaemonians; and as the Messenians would not deliver him up to the Spartans, war was eventually declared by the latter against Messenia. (Paus. iv. 4. § 5, &c.)

POLYCHARMUS (Πολυχάρμος), wrote a work upon Lycia (Λυκία), which is referred to by Athenaeus (viii. p. 333, &c.), and Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Ἀδρίας, Σωρᾶς, Φιλάδ. It is doubtful whether he is the same as the Polycharmus of Naucratis, who wrote a work on Aphrodite (Περὶ Ἀφροδίτης), from which Athenaeus makes an extract (pp. 675, f—676, c.).

POLYCHARMUS (Πολυχάρμος), a sculptor, two of whose works stood in Pliny's time in the portico of Octavia at Rome (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. § 10). One of these works was Venus washing herself; but what the other was is doubtful, on account of the corrupt state of the passage in Pliny. As it stands in the common editions, it is, Venerem lavantem esse, Daedalum stamtem Polycharmus, which is the reading of the inferior MSS., and seems to be only a conjectural emendation of the

There are several beautiful statues of Venna, stooping on one knee, in the attitude of washing herself, which are supposed to be copies of the work of Polycharmus. The finest is in the Vatican, and the next best in the Museum at Paris. (Mus. Pto-Chim. vol. i. pl. 10; Clarac, pl. 343, No. 698; Müller, Archaiol. d. Kunst, § 377, n. 5; Lentzälder d. Alten Kunst, vol. ii. pl. xxvi. fig. 279.)

POLYCLEITUS (Πολύκλειτος), historical. I. An officer appointed by Ptolemy to command the fleet sent under Menelaus to Cyprus in b. c. 315. From hence Polycleitus was detached with a fleet of fifty ships to support the partisans of Ptolemy and Cassander in the Peloponnesian war, but, finding on his arrival there that there was no longer occasion for his services, he returned with his fleet to Cilicia. Here he received intelligence that a fleet under Theodotus, and a land force under Perilus, were advancing to the support of Antigonus, and hastened to intercept them. Both one and the other were surprised and totally defeated; the two commanders and the whole fleet fell into the hands of Polycleitus, who returned with them to Egypt, where he was received with the utmost distinction by Ptolemy, and received the title of their subject. 2. One of the officers left by Epicydes in the command of the garrison of Syracuse when he himself quitted the city. (Epicydes.) They were all put to death in a sedition of the citizens shortly afterwards. (Liv. xxv. 28.) [E. H. B.]

POLYCLEITUS (Πολύκλειτος), literary. I. Of Larissa, a Greek historian, and one of the numerous writers of the history of Alexander the Great, Athenaeus quotes from the eighth book of his histories (xii. p. 539, a,); and there are several other quotations from him in Strabo (xi. p. 509, d., xv. pp. 728, a. d., 753, a., xvi, 742, a), and other writers (Plut. Alex. 40; Athen. N. A. xvi. 41). There are some other passages in which the name of Polycleitus is erroneously put for that of Polyeritus of Mende (Diod. xiii. 53; Ath. v. p. 206, e.; Plin. H. N. xxxi. 2. 4.) He may, perhaps, have been the same person as Polycleitus of Larissa, the father of Olympias, mother of Antigonus Doson. Most of the extracts from his histories refer to the geography of the countries which Alexander invaded. They are collected, with a notice of the author, by C. Müller, in his Scriptores Rerum Alexandr. Magni, (pp. 129—133), in Didot's Scriptorum Graecorum Bibliotheca, Paris, 1846. (See also Vossius, de Hist. Graec, p. 489, ed. Westermann; Fabric. Bibl. Graec, vol. iii. p. 49.)

2. An epigrammatic poet, who is mentioned by Meleneer (Proem. 40), as one of those included in his Gariaiud. None of his epigrams are extant. (Jacobs, Ath. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 941.) [P. S.]

POLYCLEITUS (Πολύκλειτος), a physician of Messina in Sicily, to whom some of the epistles of Phalaris are addressed, and who, therefore (if he be a real personage), may be supposed to have lived in the sixth century n. c. Having cured the tyrant of a dangerous disease, he received from him some valuable presents, and also succeeded in persuading him to pardon a conspirator against his life (Phalar. Epist. 106, 109). [W. A. G.]

POLYCLEITUS (Πολύκλειτος), in Latin writers, Polycleitus and Polycleitus, artists. Some difficulty has arisen from the mention of two statuaries of this name, whom Pausanias expressly distinguishes from one another, who seem both to have lived about the same period, and who are both said to have been of Argos. (Paus. vi. 6. § 1.) Moreover, Pliny speaks of the great Polycleitus as a Sicyanian, though several other writers, as well as Pausanias, call him an Argive. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19.) The question which thus arises, as to the number of artists of this name, is very fully discussed by Thiersch, but with more ingenuity than sound judgment. (Epoech. pp. 150, 203, &c.) He distinguishes three statuaries of the name (besides a fourth, of Thasos); namely, first, Polycleitus of Sicyon, the pupil of Agesalas, an artist of the beginning of the period of the perfection of art, and whose works partook much of the old conventional style; secondly, Polycleitus the elder, of Argos, maker of the celebrated statue in the Heneum at Argos; and, thirdly, Polycleitus, the younger, of Argos, the pupil of Naucydes. But the common opinion of other writers is both simpler and sounder, namely that, on account of the close connection between the schools of Argos and Sicyon, the elder Polycleitus might easily have been assigned to both, and, if a more precise explanation be required, that he was a native of Sicyon, and that his pupil of Argos was the same as the Polycleitus of Sicyon was then subject, probably as an honour well earned by his statue in the Heneum. We know the same thing to have happened with other artists; and we think that Thiersch himself could hardly have failed to accept this explanation, but for his perverse theory respecting the early date of Pheidias (Φθείδιας), which imposed upon him the necessity of placing that artist's chief contemporaries also higher than their true dates. The questions which arise, respecting the assignment of particular works to either of the two Polycei of Argos, will be considered in their proper places. 1. Polycleitus, the elder, of Argos, probably by citizenship, and of Sicyon, probably by birth, was one of the most celebrated statuaries of the ancient world; and was also a sculptor, an architect, and an artist in toto. He was the pupil of the great Argive statuary Agesalas, under whom he had Pheidias and Myron for his fellow-disciples. He was succeeded by a younger brother of Pheidias, and about the same age as Myron. He is placed by Pliny at the 87th Olympiad, b. c. 431, with Agesalas, Callon, Phradata, Gorgias, Lacoon, Myron, Pylagorma, Scopas, and Parellus (H. N. xxxiv. 8. § 19). An important indication of his date is derived from his great statue in the Heneum near Argos; for the old temple of Hera was burnt in Ol. 89, 2, b. c. 423 (Thuc. iv. 133; Clinton, F. H. s. a.); and, including the time required to rebuild the temple of the goddess, the statue by Polycleitus in the new temple could scarcely have been finished in less than ten years; which brings his life down to about b. c. 413. Comparing this conclusion with the date given by Pliny, and with the fact that he was a pupil of Agesalas, Polycleitus may be safely said to have flourished from POLYCLEITUS. about Ol. 82 to 92, or B.C. 452—412. A further confirmation of this date is furnished by Plato's mention of the sons of Polycleitus, as being of about the same age as the sons of Periclea. (Protag. p. 328, c.)

Of his personal history we know nothing further. As an artist, he stood at the head of the schools of Argos and Sicyon, and approached more nearly than any other to an equality with the great head of the Athenian school, whom he was even judged to have surpassed on one occasion, in the celebrated competition of the Amazons. (See below, and Phidias.) The essential difference between these artists was that Phidias was unsurpassed, nay perfect, in making the images of the gods, Polycleitus in those of men. The one embodied in his Athena and Olympian Zeus, for all subsequent ages, the ideal standard of divine majesty; the other expressed, in his Doryphorus, the ideal perfection of human beauty. It is not, however, surprising that, in the estimation of many, the beauty of Polycleitus should even have been preferred to the more unapproachable majesty of Phidias, in an age when art, having reached its climax, was on the point of beginning to degenerate. Nay, even Polycleitus himself was, by some, placed below Myron in some respects (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 5); and his forms were thought by the artists of the age of Alexander susceptible of greater grace. If, therefore, we find, in writers of a still later period, expressions which appear to refer to the works of Polycleitus as retaining something of the stiffness of an early period of art, we must not at once conclude that such passages, even if they are rightly interpreted, refer to some earlier artist of the same name.

Among the statements of P. V. respecting Polycleitus is the following (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 2):— "Propria ejus est, ut nos esse insinenter signa, exoequisse; quadrata tamen ea esse tradit Varro et paene ad unum exemplum." (The word quadrata, which Sillig formerly suspected, is confirmed by the authority of the Bamberg MS.) This passage has exercised the critical skill of most of the writers on art. Thiersch regards it as obviously characterising the style of one of the early improvers of the art; and he therefore supposes that the artist of whom Varro made this statement was the oldest artist of the name, Polycleitus of Sicyon, whom, according to him, Pliny has confounded with the more celebrated Polycleitus of Argos. But the language of Varro, properly understood, neither requires nor sustains any such hypothesis. It is more reasonable to assign its weight on one leg, may have been, and probably had been, overcome before the time of Polycleitus; but it was, as we understand Varro, a distinguishing feature of his works, that he did this without in any way interfering with those proportions and that repose, which constituted the perfection of his art. It was not, of course, for an artist like Phidias to poise his divinities upon one leg; but Polycleitus, the inventor of the perfect canon of the human form, would naturally devote careful study to an attitude, which adds so much to the life-like expression of a figure, while, on the other hand, he refrained from any tampering with his own established proportions, and avoided the dangers into which the free use of this attitude might lead an artist too eager for variety. Some writers think that Varro intended to censure Polycleitus 'on the ground that he adhered so strictly to his own canon that it detracted too much uniformity into his works; but the passage (to say nothing of its only referring to those statues of Polycleitus which rested on one leg) does not appear to be in the tone of censure, and if it were, we should rather suspect the soundness of Varro's judgment, than of Polycleitus's practice on such a point. In fact, this appears to be the very point in which Myron was inferior to Polycleitus; that the former, in his eagerness for variety, transgressed, in his choice of subjects, in his proportions, and in his attitudes, those high principles of art to which Polycleitus always adhered.

The word quadrata, in the above passage, demands further explanation. It is clearly meant to describe a certain proportion of the human figure, and may be roughly explained as expressing a robust middle stature, in opposition to a tall and slender stature. The meaning is clearly shown by Pliny's description (l. e. § 6) of the style of proportion practised by Lysippos, who, he says, made the heads smaller than the ancients made them, the bodies more slender and less fleshy, and thus the whole statue apparently taller "quadratas veterum staturas permutando." Vitruvius gives a canon of proportion, according to which the length of the outstretched arms is equal to the height of the statue, so that the whole figure may be enclosed in a square; but it does not seem that there is any precise reference to this canon in the term quadrata, as used by Pliny. (Böttiger, Andeutungen, p. 120; Schorn, Studien, p. 300.)

The praises which the ancients heap upon Polycleitus are numerous and of the highest order. According to Pliny (l. c.), he was considered to have brought the art of statuary to perfection; and the same judgment is passed upon his works by Cicero, who expressly gives him the preference over Myron (Brut. 19; comp. de Orat. iii. 7, Acad. ii. 47, De Fin. ii. 34, Tuse. i. 2, Parados, v. 2). Dionysius of Halicarnassus praises him, in conjunction with Phidias, for those qualities which he expresses by the phrase κατὰ τὸ σωμάτω καὶ μεγαλεύθερον καὶ δυσματικόν. (De Isocr. p. 95, Sylburg.) Quintilian (xii. 10) tells us that his works were distinguished by accurate execution (diligentia) and beauty (decor) above those of all others; but that he was thought to be deficient in grandeur (pondos). But even this fault is mentioned with the qualification "ne nihil detrahatur;" and the critic proceeds to explain that it applies to his preference for human subjects over divine, and that it is the character of the former, for youthful figures, and that the deficiency is ascribed to him chiefly in comparison with Phidias and Alcamenes:— "Nam ut humane formae decorum addiderit supra verum, ita non expeluisse deorum auctoritatem videtur. Quin aetatem quoque gra viorem dictur refugisse, nihil ausus ultra leves genas. At quae Polyceto defuerunt, Phidiae atque Alcameni dantur." The breasts of his statues were especially admired. (Rhet. ad Herenn. iv. 6.) Several other passages might be added

* Perhaps, however, this censure may be implied in another passage of Varro, in which he says "Neque enim Lysippus artificem priorum potius est rutilo secuus quam arium," de L. L. ix. 18, ed. Müller.
from Lucian, the poets of the Anthology, and other writers. Even while he lived Polycleitus was ranked among the very first artists: Xenophon makes Socrates place him on a level, as a statutory, with Homer, Sophocles, and Zeuxis in their respective arts. (Mem. i. 4. § 3.) The Socrates of Plato also speaks of him in terms which imply an equality with Pheidias. (Protag. p. 311, c.)

Of the artists who succeeded him, Lysippus especially admired him, and declared that his Doryphorus was his own teacher (Cic. Brut. 86). In fact Lysippus stood in much the same relation to the Argive school of Polycleitus as Praxiteles to the Attic school of Phidias and Alcamenes.

An interesting anecdote is told by Aelian (V. H. xiv. 6), respecting the manner in which Polycleitus proved the superiority of the rules of art to popular opinion. He made two statues, one of which he finished to his own mind, and the other he exposed to public view, and altered it according to the opinions expressed by the spectators. He then exhibited the statues together. One of them was universally admired; the other was derided. "You yourselves," exclaimed the artist, "made the statue you abuse; I made the one you admire." Plutarch relates a saying of Polycleitus, that the work was the most difficult when the clay model had been brought to apparent perfection. (Quaest. Conv. ii. 3. p. 636, c.)

The disciples of Polycleitus were Argius, Asopodorus, Alexis, Aristeides, Phrynion, Dison, Athenodorus, Demas Citorius, Canxchus II., and Pericleitus. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19; Pauf. vi. 13. § 4; see the articles.)

Plato refers to the two sons of Polycleitus, as being also statuaries, but of no reputation in comparison with their father: he does not, however, mention their names. (Protag. p. 326, c.)

Polycleitus was not only celebrated as a statutory in bronze, but also as a sculptor in marble, as an architect, and as an artist in toretic. His works in these departments will be mentioned presently. His fame as a toretic artist was so great that he was considered, according to Pliny, to have perfected the art, which Phedias had commenced, but had left incomplete: — "toreuticon sic erudisse [judicature], ut Phedidas aperuisse." (H. N. l.c. 2.) There are a few passages in which Polycleitus seems to be spoken of as a painter; but they are insufficient to establish the fact. (See Sillig, Catal. Artif. s. v.)

Polycleitus wrote a treatise on the proportions of the human body, which bore the same name as the statue in which he exemplified his own laws, namely, Kouv (Galen, tepi t outrage Xtvounkev kal Parantov, iv. 2, vol. iv. p. 449, ed. Kühn). The following were the chief works of Polycleitus in bronze. The kind of bronze which he chiefly used was the Aeginetan; whereas his contemporary Myron preferred the Delian. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 2. s. 5; Dict. of Ant. s. v. Aes.)

1. The Spear Bearer (Doryphorus), a youthful figure, but with the full proportions of a man (viriliter pauper, Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 2). There can be no doubt that this was the statue which became known by the name of Canon, because in it the artist had embodied a perfect representation of the ideal of the human figure, and had thus, as Pliny says, exhibited art itself in a work of art. Pliny, indeed, appears to speak of this Canon as something different from the Doryphorus; but that it really was this statue is plain from the statement already quoted from Cicero respecting Lysippus, and from other passages in the ancient writers (Cic. Orat. 2; Quintil. v. 12. § 21; Galen, vol. i. p. 568, vol. iv. p. 606). Lucian describes the proportions of the human figure, as exhibited in the Canon of Polycleitus, in terms which completely confirm the explanation given above of the term quadrata, as applied to his works, and which amount to this; that the figure should be moderate both in height and stoutness. (Lucian, de Salt. 75, vol. ii. p. 309.) Quintilian describes the figure as alike fit for war or for athletic games (l. c.).

2. A youth of tender age, binding his head with a fillet, the sign of victory in an athletic contest (diadumenon molitor juvenem, Plin. l. c.; Lucian, Philop. 18). The portion of a similar group this work was valued at a hundred talents (Plin. l. c.). The beautiful statue in the Villa Farnese is no doubt a copy of it (Gerhard, Anti. Denkmiiller, Cent. i. pl. 69; Müller, Denkiiiler d. alt. Kunst, vol. i. pl. 31, fig. 136).

3. An athlete, scraping himself with a strigil (destringentem se, Plin. l. c.).

4. A naked figure, described by Pliny as talo incozentem; an obscure phrase, which is explained by some to mean challenging to the game of tali (Harduin, ad loc.), by others, trampling down, or spurting away, an opponent in the pancratium. (Jacobs, ad Philolst. p. 435; Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, § 120, n. 3.)

5. A group of two naked boys playing at tali, known by the name of Astragalizontes. In Pliny’s time this group stood in the Atrium of Titus, and was esteemed by many as one of the most perfect works of statutory. The British Museum contains the group of a similar kind in marble, which was found in the baths of Titus in the pontifical of Urban VIII., and which was probably copied, but with some alterations, from the work of Polycleitus. (Townley Marbles, vol. i. p. 304.)

6. A Mercury, at Lysimachin. (Plin. l. c.)

7. A Hercules Ageter, arming himself, which was at Rome in Pliny’s time (Plin. l. c.; but the reading is somewhat doubtful). Cicero also mentions a Hercules by Polycleitus; but this seems to have been a different work, in which the hero was represented as killing the hydra (de Orat. ii. 16).

8. A portrait statue of Artemon, surnamed Periphoretos, the military engineer employed by Pericles in the war against Samos (Plin. l. c.; Plut. Per. 27).

9. An Amazon, which gained the first prize, above Phidias, Ctesilas, Cydon, and Phraadmon, in the celebrated contest at Ephesus (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 2). To the above list must be added some other works, which are not mentioned by Pliny.

10. A pair of small but very beautiful Canephoros (Cic. in Ferr. iv. 3; Symmach. Ep. 1. 23; Amatthaea, vol. iii. p. 164).

11. A statue of Zeus Phlius at Megapolis, the dress and ornaments of which were similar to those appropriate to Dionysus (Paus. viii. 31. § 2. s. 4).

12. Several statues of Olympic victors (Paus. vi. § 4, 4. § 6, 6. § 3, 9. § 13, 3. § 4). But it cannot be determined whether these should be ascribed to the elder or the younger Polycleitus. (See below, No. 2.)
Of his works in marble, the only ones which are mentioned are his statue of Zeus Milichius at Argos (Paus. ii. 20. § 1), and those of Apollo, Leto, and Artemis, in the temple of Artemis Orthia, on the summit of Mt. Lycone in Argolis. (Paus. ii. 24. § 5.)

But that which he probably designed to be the greatest of all his works was his ivory and gold statue of Hera in her temple between Argos and Mycenae. This work was executed by the artist in his old age (see above), and was doubtless intended by him to rival Pheidias’s chryselephantine statues of Athena and of Zeus, which, in the judgment of Strabo (viii. p. 372), it equalled in beauty, though it was surpassed by them in costliness and size.

According to the description of Pausanias (ii. 17. § 4), the goddess was seated on a throne, her head crowned with a garland, on which were worked the Graces and the Hours, the one hand holding the symbolical pomegranate, and the other a sceptre, surmounted by a cuckoo, a bird sacred to Hera, on account of her having been once changed into that form by Zeus. From an epigram by Parmenion (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 202, No. 5) it would seem that the figure of the goddess was robed from the waist downwards. Maximus Tyrius, who compares the statue with the Athena of Pheidias, describes the Hera of Polycleitus as the white-armed goddess of Homer, having ivory arms, beautiful eyes, a splendid robe, a queenlike figure, seated on a golden throne. (Desert. iv. 6, vol. i. p. 260, Reiske.) In this description we clearly see the Homeric ideal of Hera, the white-armed, large-eyed (ανωτάτεροι, βοηθεῖς), which Polycleitus took for the model of his Hera, just as Pheidias followed the Homeric ideal of Zeus in his statue at Olympia. The character expressed by the epithet βοηθεῖς must have been that of the whole countenance, an expression of open and imposing majesty; and accordingly, in a most laudatory epigram on the statue, Martial says (x. 89):

"Ore nitet tanto, quanto superasset in Ida Judice convictus non dubitante desa."

This statue remained always the ideal model of Hera, as Pheidias’s of the Olympian Zeus. Thus Herodes Atticus, when he set up at Caesarea the statues of Augustus and Rome, had them made on the model of these two statues respectively. (Joseph. Ant. Jud. xvi. 13.) Praxiteles, however, ventured to make some minor alterations in Polycleitus’s type of Hera. [PRAXITELES.] There is an excellent essay on this statue, with an explanation of the allegorical significance of its parts, by Böttiger. (Anleitung, pp. 122—128; comp. Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 352.) It is impossible to determine which of all the existing figures and busts of Hera or Juno, and of Roman empresses in the character of Juno, may be considered as copies of the Hera of Polycleitus; but in all probability we have the type on a coin of Argos, which is engraved in Müller’s Denkmäler (vol. i. pl. 50. fig. 132; comp. Böttiger, L.c. p. 127).

In the department of toilet, the fame of Polycleitus does not rest chiefly on the golden ornaments of his statue of Hera; but he also made small bronzes (σιγίλτα), and drinking-vessels (phialeis) (Martial, viii. 51; Juvenal, viii. 102). Muschion mentions a celebrated lamp, which he made for the king of Persia (ap. Ath. v. p. 206, e.)

As an architect Polycleitus obtained great celebrity by the theatre, and the circular building (θυλος), which he built in the sacred enclosure of Asclepius at Epidaurus: the former Pausanias thought the best worth seeing of all the theatres, whether of the Greeks or the Romans. (Paus. ii. 27. §§ 2, 5.)

2. Of the younger Polycleitus of Argos very little is known, doubtless because his fame was eclipsed by that of his more celebrated namesake, and, in part, contemporary. The chief testimony respecting him is a passage of Pausanias, who says that the statue of Agenor of Thebae, an Olympic victor in the boys’ wrestling, was made by "Polycleitus of Argos, not the one who made the statue of Hera, but the pupil of Naucydes" (Paus. vi. 6. § 1. s. 2). Now Naucydes flourished between B.C. 420 and 400; so that Polycleitus must be placed about B.C. 400. With this agrees the statement of Pausanias, that Polycleitus made the bronze tripod and statue of Aphrodite, at Amyclae, which the Lacedaemonians dedicated out of the spoils of the victory of Aegospotami (Paus. iii. 18. § 5. s. 8); for the age of the elder Polycleitus cannot be brought down so low as this. Mention has been made above of the statue of Zeus Philius, at Megalopolis, among the works of the elder Polycleitus. Some, however, refer it to the younger, and take it as a proof that he was still alive after the building of Megalopolis, in B.C. 379; but this argument is in no way decisive, for it is natural to suppose that many of the statues which adorned Megalopolis were carried thither by the first settlers. To this there is an artist also we should probably refer the passage of Pausanias (ii. 22. § 8), in which mention is made of a bronze statue of Heate by him at Argos, and from which we learn too that Polycleitus was the brother of his instructor Naucydes. [NAUCYDES.] He also was probably the maker of the mutilated statue of Alcibiades, mentioned by Dio Chrysostom (Orat. 37, vol. ii. p. 122, Reiske). It would seem from the passage of Pausanias first quoted (vi. 6. § 1), that the younger Polycleitus was famous for his statues of Olympic victors; and, therefore, it is exceedingly probable that some, if not all, of the statues of this class, mentioned above under the name of the elder Polycleitus, ought to be referred to him. Whatever else was once known of him is now hopelessly merged in the statements respecting the elder artist.

Thiersch makes still a third (according to him, a fourth) statue or sculptor of this name, Polycleitus of Thasos, on the authority of an epigram of Geminus (Anth. Plan. iii. 30; Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 279):—

Χειρ με πολυκειτον Θασου καιμν, ειδι 1 έκκειοι Συλλοβεν, βροτατ η Δης ανεμάνη, κ.τ.λ.

where Gotritis proposed to read ΠΟΛΥΚΕΙΤΟΥ for ΠΟΛΥΚΕΙΤΟΝ, an emendation which is almost certainly correct, notwithstanding Heyne’s objection, that the phrase χειρ καιμν is more appropriate to a sculpture than a painting. There is no other mention of a Thasian Polycleitus; but it is well known that Polygnotus was a Thasian. The error is just one of a kind often met with, and of which we have a precisely parallel example in another epigram, which ascribes to Polycleitus a painting of Polycleitus (Anth. Plan. iv. 156; Brunck, Anal, POLYCLES.

vol. ii. p. 440). It is not, however, certain that Polycleitos is the right rendering in this second case; the blunder is very probably that of the author of the epigram. (Jacobs, Animadw. in Athc. Græc. ad loc.)

Lastly, there are gems bearing the name of Polycleitus, respecting which it is doubtful whether the engraver was the same person as the great Argive statuary; but it is more probable that he was a different person. (Bracci, tab. 96; Stosch, de Gemm. 76; Lewezow, über den Rubel des Palladium, pp. 31, &c.; Sillig, Catal. Artif. s. v.) [P.S.]

POVCYTUS (ΠΟΛΥΚΕΤΟΣ), a favourite freedman of Nero, was sent by that emperor into Britain to inspect the state of the island. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 39, Hist. i. 57, ii. 93; Dion Cass. xiii. 12.)

POLYCLES (ΠΟΛΥΚΛΗΣ). 1. A Macedonian general who was left in the command of Thessaly by Antipater, when the latter crossed over into Asia to the support of Craterus, b.c. 321. The Aetolians took advantage of the absence of Antipater to invade Locris, and laid siege to Amphissa; whereupon Polyclestes hastened to its relief, but was totally defeated, his army utterly destroyed, and he himself slain. (Diod. xviii. 38.)

2. One of the partisans and counsellors of Eurycle, who shared in her defeat by Olympias (b.c. 317), and accompanied her on her flight to Amphipolis, where she was soon after taken prisoner. (Id. xix. 11.) [E. H. B.]

POLYCLES (ΠΟΛΥΚΛΗΣ), artists. 1. 2. Two statues of this name are mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19); one, as flourishing in the 102d Olympiad (b.c. 370), contemporary with Cephisodotus, Leochares, and Hypatodorus; the other, as one of a number of statues, who flourished at the revival of the art in the 156th Olympiad (b.c. 155), and who, though far inferior to those who lived from the time of Pheidias down to the 120th Olympiad (b.c. 200), were nevertheless artists of reputation. In this list the name of Polyclestes of the school of the younger Athenaeus, which is usually taken for the name of another artist, but which may perhaps, as Sillig has observed, indicate the city to which Polyclestes belonged; for it is not at all improbable that Pliny would copy the words Palakles, 'Athnwnis, which he found in his Greek authority, either through carelessness, or because he mistook the second for the name of a person. It is also extremely probable that the elder Polyclestes was an Athenian, and that he was, in fact, one of the artists of the later Athenian school, who obtained great celebrity by the sensual charms exhibited in their works. For not only does Pliny mention Polyclestes I. in connection with Cephisodotus I. and Leochares, whom we know to have been two of the most distinguished artists of that school; but he also ascribes to Polyclestes (without, however, specifying which of the two) a celebrated statue of an Hermaphroditic, a work precisely in keeping with the character of the school which produced the Ganymede of Leochares. (Plin. li. c. § 20.) From the comparison, then, of these two statements, the inference is highly probable that the Hermaphrodite was the work of the elder Polyclestes, who was an artist of the later Athenian school of statuary. Müller strongly confirms this view by the ingenious observation, that, in Pliny's alphabetical lists of artists, the names under each letter come pretty much in the order of time; and in the present instance, the name of Polyclestes comes before those of Pheidias and of Phoenices, the pupil of Lyssipus. (Archäol. d. Kunst, § 128, n. 2.)

Respecting the Hermaphroditic of Polyclestes, it cannot be determined with certainty which of the extant works of this class represents its type, or whether it was a standing or a recumbent figure. The prevailing opinion among archaeologists is that the celebrated recumbent Hermaphroditic, of which we have two slightly different examples, in marble, the one in the Florentine Gallery, the other in the Louvre (formerly in the Villa Borghese), is copied from the bronze statue of Polyclestes. (Meyer, Kunstgeschichte, vol. i. pp. 98, 99, and plate 9; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 392, n. 2; Osann, Ueber eine in Pompeii Ausgegrabene Hermaphroditenstatue; and Böttiger, Ueber die Hermaphroditischen-Fibel und Bildung, in the Amphilale, vol. i. pp. 342—366.)

The younger Polyclestes, from the date assigned to him by Pliny, and from the mention of a statue of Juno by Polyclestes in the Parthenon of Olympia at Rome (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4. s. 5. § 10), would seem to have been one of the Greek artists who flourished at Rome about the time of the original erection of that portico by Metellus Macedonicus. But it is evident, on a careful examination of the latter passage of Pliny, and it is probable, from the nature of the case, that many, if not most of the works of art, with which Metellus decorated his portico, were not the original productions of living artists, but either the works of former masters, transported from Greece, or marble copies taken from such works. It contained, for example, works by Praxiteles, one of which stood in the very part of the edifice in which the statue by Polyclestes was placed. Hence arises the suspicion that this Polyclestes may be no other than the great Athenian artist already mentioned; that, like other staturists of that era (Praxiteles, for instance), he wrought in marble as well as in bronze, or else that this Polyclestes was a very distinguished Athenian artist, and the context seems to show that he flourished between the times of Pheidias and Lyssipus, and nearer to the latter. If, therefore, there were two artists of the name, he is probably the same as the elder. In another passage he mentions the statue of the Olympic victor Age-sarchus, as the work of the sons of Polyclestes, whose names he does not give, but of whom he promises to say more in a subsequent part of his work (vi. 12. § 3. s. 9). Accordingly, at the end of the chapter in which he describes Elateia in Phocis, after mentioning the temple of Asclepius, with the bearded statue of the god in it, made by Timocles and Timarchides, who were of Athenian birth, he proceeds to give an account of the temple of Athena Craanea, in which was a statue of the goddess, equipped as if for battle, and with works of art upon the shield in imitation of the shield of the Athena of the Parthenon; "and this statue also," he says, "was made by the sons of Polycles." (Paus. x. 34. § 3. s. 6—8.) From this passage, taken in its connection, it is evident that the sons of Polycles were no other than Timocles and Timarchides, and that these were Athenian artists of considerable reputation. Now, reverting to Pliny, we find in the same list of statuaries at the revival of the art in Ol. 150, in which the name of Polycles occurs, the name of Timocles; and in the passage respecting the works in the portico of Octavia, immediately after the mention of the statue of Juno by Polycles, he mentions that of Jupiter by the sons of Timarchides, in the adjacent temple. It follows that, if there be no mistake in Pliny, the Polycles of the two latter passages of Pausanias (and perhaps, therefore, of the first) was the younger Polycles. At all events, we establish the existence of a family of Athenian statuaries, Polycles, his sons Timocles and Timarchides, and the sons of Timarchides, who either belonged (supposing Pliny to have made the mistake above suggested) to the later Attic school of the times of Scopas and Praxiteles, or (if Pliny be Pliny) to the earlier, and left the elder Polycles. In either case, the power of Polycrates now became greater than ever. The great works which Herodotus saw and admired at Samos were probably executed by him. He lived in great pomp and luxury, and like some of the other Greek tyrants was a patron of literature and the arts. The most eminent artists and poets found a ready welcome at his court; and his friendship for Anacreon is particularly celebrated. But in the midst of all his prosperity he fell by the most ignominious fate. Oroetes, the satrap of Sardis, had for some reason, which is quite unknown, formed a deadly hatred against Polycrates. By false pretences, the satrap contrived to allure him to the mainland, where he was arrested soon after his arrival, and crucified, n. c. 522. (Herod. iii. 39—47, 54—56, 120—125; Thuc. i. 13; Athena. xii. p. 54.)

2. An Athenian, a loco-ban in the army of the Cyrean Greeks, is mentioned several times by Xenophon, whom he defended on one occasion. (Xen. Anab. iv. 5. § 24, v. 1. § 16, vii. 2. §§ 17, 29, vii. 6. § 41.)

3. An Argive, the son of Mnasides, descended from an illustrious family at Argo, came over to the court of the Egyptian monarch Ptolemy Philopator, just before his campaign against Antiochus III., in n. c. 217. Polycrates was of great service in drilling and encouraging the Egyptian troops, and he commanded the cavalry on the left wing at the battle of Raphia, in n. c. 217, in which Antiochus was defeated, and which secured to Ptolemy the provinces of Cœle-Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine. Although Polycrates was still young he was second, to one, says Polybius, in the king's court, and was accordingly appointed by Ptolemy governor of Cyprus. The duties of this office he discharged with the utmost fidelity and integrity;
he secured the island for Ptolemy Epiphanes, the infant son and successor of Philopator, and on his return to Alexandria about B.C. 196, he brought with him a considerable sum of money for the use of the monarch. He was received at Alexandria with great applause, and forthwith obtained great power in the kingdom; but as he advanced in years, his character changed for the worse, and he indulged in every kind of vice and wickedness.
We are ignorant of his subsequent career, in consequence of the loss of the later books of Polyb-us;
but we learn from a fragment of the historian that it was through his evil advice that Ptolemy took no part in military affairs, although he had reached the age of twenty-five. (Polyb. v. 64, 65, 92, 84, xxiii. 38, xxiii. 16.)

POLYCRATES (Πολυκράτης), an Athenian rhetorician and sophist of some repute, a contemporary of Socrates and Isocrates, taught first at Athens and afterwards in Cyprus. He is mentioned as the teacher of Zeno. He is named along with some of the most distinguished orators of his time by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (de Isaeo, c. 8, de Dem.
Eloc. c. 20), who, however, finds great fault with his style. He wrote, 1. An accusation of Socrates (κατηγορία Σωκράτους), which is said by some writers to have been delivered by Melitus at the trial of Socrates; but as it contained allusion to an event which occurred six years after the death of the philosopher, it would seem to have been simply a declamation on the subject composed at a subsequent period. (Diog. Laert. ii. 38, 39, with the note of Menagius; Attian, V. H. xi. 10, with the note of Perizonius; Isocr. Buisiris, § 4, &c.; Quintil. ii. 17. § 1, i. i. 11; Suidas, s. v.
Πολυκράτης.) 2. Βουσιφόδως Ἀπολογία. The oration of Isocrates, entitled Buisiris, is addressed to Polycrates, and points out the faults which the latter had committed in his oration on this subject.
3. Έγκυμον Θρασυβόλου (Schol. ad Arist. Hier.
p. 48). 4. Περὶ Ἀρφοδίουσιν, an obscene poem on love, which he published under the name of the poetess Philaenis, for the purpose of injuring her reputation (Athen. viii. p. 335, c. d.). It is doubtful whether the above-mentioned Polycrates is the same as the Polycrates who wrote a work on Laconia (Δακωνικός) referred to by Athenaeus (iv.
p. 139, d.). Spengel supposes that the rhetorician Polycrates is the author of the Panegyric on Helen, which has come down to us as the work of POLYCRATES (Πολυκράτης). 1. A statuary, whom Pliny mentions among those who made athletas et armatos et venatores sacrificantes (H.

N. xxivv. 8. s. 19, § 34). There is a fragment of a Hermes in the Villa Mattei, bearing the mutilated inscription,

ΤΙΜΟΘΕΟΣ ΑΘΙω....
ΠΟΛΥΚΡ....

on which slight basis Visconti rests the hypothesis that Polycrates was an Athenian artist, contemporary with Timotheus, and that the Hermes in question was a copy of a bronze statue of Timo-theus by Polycrates. A simpler hypothesis would be to complete the inscription thus, ΤΙΜΟΘΕΟΣ ΑΘΗναῖος ἁγνός, ΠΟΛΥΚΡΑΤΗΣ ἐποίησε. (Monum. Matteii, vol. iii. n. 118; Visconti, Icon. Graecae, vol. i.
p. 150, n.; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp.
389—390.)

2. An engraver of precious stones, known by an inscription on a gem representing Eros and Psyche.
(Mariette, Traité, 4e. vol. i. p. 421; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 149.)

POLYCRITUS (Πολυκρίτως), of Mendae in Sicily, wrote a work on Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse, which is referred to by Diogenes Laertius
(ii. 63). Aristotle likewise quotes a work by Polycritus on Sicilian affairs, in poetry (Mirab. Aus-cult. 115), which is probably the same work as the one referred to by Diogenes. It is doubtful whether this Polycritus is the same person as the Polycritus who wrote on the East, and whose work is referred to by Stobus (v. p. 735), Plutarch (Alex. 46), Antigonus of Carystus (c. 150, or 135, ed. Westermann), and as one of the writers from whom Pliny compiled the 11th and 12th books of his Natural History.

POLYCRITUS (Πολυκρίτως), a physician at the court of Artaxerxes M摩mon, king of Persia, in the fourth century B.C. (Plut. Artax. 21). He was a native of Mende in Macedonia, and not a "son of Mendeaus," as Fabricius states (Bibl.
Gr. vol. xiii. p. 376, ed. vet.).

POLYCRITUS (Πολυκρίτως), a mythical architect, mentioned by the Pseudo-Plutarch, in connection with the story of Poemander. (Quaes.
Graec. 37, p. 299, c.)

POLYCTOR (Πολυκτόρ), 1. A son of Ae-gyptus and Caliande. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 3.)

2. A son of Pterelaus, prince of Ithaca. A place in Ithaca, Polyctorium, was believed to have derived its name from him. (Hom. Od, xvi. 207; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1815.)

There is one more mythical personage of this name. (Hom. Od. xviii. 293.)

POLYDAMAS (Πολυδάμας), a son of Pan-thous and Phrontis, a Trojan hero, a friend of Hector, and brother of Euphorbus. (Hom. Il. ii.
xv. 535, xvii. 40.)

POLYDAMAS (Πολυδάμας). 1. Of Sco-tussa in Thessaly, son of Nicias, conquered in the Pancratium at the Olympic games, in Ol. 93, n. c.
406. His size was immense, and the most marvellous stories are related of his strength, how he killed without arms a huge and fierce lion on mount Olympus, how he stopped a chariot at full gallop, &c. His reputation led the Persian king, Darius Ochus, to invite him to his court, where he performed similar feats. (Euseb, 'Ελλ. δ. p. 41;
Paus. vi. 5, vii. 37. § 6, who calls him Πολυδάμας;
Lucian, Quomodo Hist. conscrib. 35, et alibi; Suidas, s. v. Πολυδάμας; Krause, Olympia, p. 360.)

2. Of Pharsalus in Thessaly, was entrusted by his fellow-citizens about B.C. 375, with the supreme government of their native town. Polydamas formed an alliance with Sparta, with which state his family had long been connected by the bonds of public hospitality; but he soon after entered into a treaty with Jason of Pherae. The history of this treaty is related elsewhere [Vol. II. p. 554, b.]. On the murder of Jason in B.C. 370, his brother Polyphon, who succeeded to his power, pulled to death Polydamas and eight other most distinguished citizens of Pharsalus. (Xen. Hell. vi.
1. § 2, &c. vi. 4. § 34.)

POLYDAMNA (Πολυδάμνα), the wife of king Thon in Egypt; she gave Helen a remedy by POLYDORUS.

which she could soothe any grief or anger. (Hom. Od. iv. 226.)

POLYDECTES (Πολυδέκτης), a son of Magnus and king of the island of Seriphos, is called a brother of Dictys. (Pind. Pyth. xii. 14; Apollod. i. 9, § 6; Strab. x. p. 487; Zenob. i. 41; Paus. ii. 22, § 6.)

POLYDECTES (Πολυδέκτης), the sixth or seventh king of Sparta in the Procid line, was the eldest son of Eanomus, the brother of Lycurgus the lawgiver, and the father of Charilaus, who succeeded him. Herodotus, contrary to the other authorities, makes Polydectes the father of Eanomus. (Plut. Lyc. 2; Paus. iii. 7, § 2; Herod. viii. 131.) [Eratosthen. Hymn.]

POLYDECTES, a sculptor who lived at Rome under the earlier emperors, and wrought in conjunction with Hermolaus. These two were among the artists who “filled the palace of the Caesars on the Palatine with most approved works.” (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 11.) [P. S.]

POLYDEGMON or POLYDECTES (Πολυδεγμόν or Πολυδέκτης), that is, “the one who receives many,” occurs as a surname of Hades (Hom. Πηγέν. in Cer. 431; Aeschy. Prom. 153.)

POLYDEUCES (Πολυδευκής), one of the Dioscuri, is commonly called Polux and the twin-brother of Castor. (Hom. H. ii. 237; Apollod. iii. 11, § 1; comp. Dioscuri.) [L. S.]

POLYDEUCES. Literary. [POLLYNX.]

POLYDORUS (Πολυδόρος). 1. A daughter of Oceanus and Thetys. (Hes. Theog. 934.)

2. The mother of Idas and Lynceus. (SchoI. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 151.)

3. A daughter of Danaus and the wife of Peleus, by whom she became the mother of Dryops. (SchoI. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1212; Anton. Lib. 32.)

4. The daughter of Melogon and Cleopatra, was married to Protessilas, after whose death she was so much afflicted by grief that she made away with herself. (Paus. iv. 2, § 5.)

5. A daughter of Peleus and Polymela, was a sister of Achilles, and married to Sparches and Borus, by whom she became the mother of Menestheus. (Hom. H. xvi. 176; Apollod. iii. 13, § 4; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 321.) [L. S.]

POLYDORUS (Πολυδόρος). 1. A son of Cadmus and Harmonia, was king of Thebes, and husband of Nycteus, by whom he became the father of Labdacus. (Hes. Theog. 970; Apollod. iii. 4, § 2, § 5; Paus. ii. 6, § 2, ix. 3, § 1, &c.; Herod. v. 59, § 1.)

2. The youngest among the sons of Priam and Laocoön, was slain by Achilles. (Hom. H. xx. 406, &c., xxii. 46, &c.) The tragic poets (see Eurip. Hec. 3) call him a son of Priam and Hecabe. When Ilion was on the point of falling into the hands of the Greeks, Priam entrusted his son Polydorus and a large sum of money to Polymestor or Polymnestor, king of the Thracian Chersonesians; but after the destruction of Troy, Polymestor killed Polydorus for the purpose of getting possession of his treasures, and cast his body into the sea. His body was afterwards washed upon the coast, where it was found and recognised by his mother Hecabe, who together with other Trojan captives took revenge upon Polymestor by killing his two children, and putting out his eyes. (Eurip. Hec. i. 1059; Virg. Aen. iii. 49, &c.;

Ov. Met. xiii. 432, &c.; 536; Plut. Parall. min. 24.) Another tradition states that Polydorus was entrusted to his sister Iliona, who was married to Polymestor, and who was to educate him. She accordingly brought him up as her own son, while she made every one else believe that her own son Deiphilus or Deipylus was Polydorus. The Greeks determined to destroy the race of Priam sent to Polymestor, promising him Electra for his wife, and a large amount of gold, if he would kill Polydorus. Polymestor was prevailed upon, and he accordingly slew his own son instead of Polydorus. The true Polydorus having afterwards learnt the real intention of Polymestor persuaded his wife to help him kill Polymestor. (Hygin. Fab. 109, 240; Horn. Oxyrh. xxxvi. 5; 61. [Ovid. Met. 14, 44, Aen. ii. 27.] According to a third tradition, lastly, Polymestor, who was attacked by the Greeks, delivered up Polydorus to them in order to secure their leaving him in peace. The Greeks wanted to get possession of Helen in his stead, but as the Trojans refused to make the exchange, the Greeks Stoned Polydorus to death under the very walls of Troy, and his body was delivered up to Helen. ( Dict. Cret. ii. 18, 22, 27.)

3. One of the Epigoni, a son of Hippomedom. (Paus. ii. 20, § 4; comp. Aprodastus.) [L. S.]

POLYDORUS (Πολυδόρος). 1. The tenth or eleventh king of Sparta in the Eurystheus line, was the son of Alcamenes and the father of Evryctares, who succeeded him. This king lived in the time of the first Messenian war, and assisted in bringing it to a conclusion, n. c. 724. He was murdered by Polydorus, a Spartan of high family; but his name was handed down among his people on account of his justice and kindness. They purchased his house of his widow; and the magistrates in future sealed all public documents with his image. Several constitutional changes were introduced by him and his colleague Teopompos; and Plutarch says that Polydorus increased the number of the Spartan lots. It is further stated that Crotona and the Epizephyrian Locri were founded in his reign. (Herod. vii. 204; Paus. iii. 3, §§ 1—3, 11. §§ 10, 11. 12. § 7, iv. 7, § 7, viii. 52, § 1; Plut. Lyc. 6, 6.)

2. The brother of Jason of Phœaeæ, Tagus of Thessaly, obtained the supreme power along with his brother Polyphron, on the death of Jason in n. c. 570. But shortly afterwards as the two brothers were on a journey to Larissa, Polydorus died suddenly in the night, assassinated, as it was supposed, by Polypron (Xen. Hell. vi. 4, § 53). Diochares makes a mistake in stating (xx. 61) that Polydorus was killed by another brother Alexander, who afterwards became tyrant of Pherae; for this Alexander was the nephew, and not the brother of Polydorus and Polyphron. (Plut. Ptol. c. 29.) [See Vol. I. p. 124.]

POLYDORUS (Πολυδόρος), a distinguished sculptor of Rhodes, was one of the associates of Agesander, in the execution of the celebrated group of the Laocoon; and was not improbably the son of Agesander, since there is a tradition that Agesander made the figure of Laocoon in the group, and his sons those of the sons of Laocoon. The age of Polydorus depends of course on the date assigned to the Laocoon; if Thiersch be right he lived at Rome under Titus (Plin. H. N. xxiii. 3, § 4, 61, &c.; 61.; C. A. Roman.) He is also mentioned by Pliny, unless an earlier artist of the same name be intended, among POLYGNOTUS (Πολυγνωτός), a Greek painter who must have lived in or before the first century after Christ, as he is quoted by Celsus* (De Med. v. 20. § 2. 26. § 23, vi. 7. § 3, pp. 91, 110, 127) and Andromachus (ap. Plin. Nat. Hist. viii. p. 834). He appears to have written a pharmaceutical work, as his medical formulae are several times referred to by Galen (De Med. Meth. v. 6, vi. 3, vol. x. p. 330, 495, Ad Graec. de Med. Meth. ii. 3, 11, vol. xi. pp. 87, 137, De Simplici, Medicin. Temper. de Facult. x. 2. § 13, vol. xii. p. 276, De Compos. Medicin. Medicin. sec. Gen. iii. 3, vol. xiii. p. 613), Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Aeg. iii. 3, 5, pp. 186, 198), Paulus Aegineta (iv. 25, vi. 711, 194), Aetiæus (iii. 1.48, iv. 2. 50, 53, iv. 4. 64, pp. 504, 715, 725, 809), Oribasius (Ad Evrop. iv. 128, p. 674), and Nicolaus Myrepsus (De Compos. Medicin. xii. 44, p. 786). [W. A. G.]

POLYEIDES. [Πολυείδης]

POLYEUS (Πολύευς), 1. An Athenian orator, delivered the speech against Socrates at his trial, which, however, was composed by some one else (Diog. Laërt. ii. 39). Antiphon wrote a speech against this Polyesus (Bekker, Ausz. Gr. vol. i. p. 92.).

2. An Athenian orator of the demus Sphettus, was a political friend of Demosthenes, with whom he worked in resisting the Macedonian party and in urging the people to make war against Philip. Hence we find him accused along with Demosthenes of receiving bribes from Harpalus (Dinarch. c. Dem. p. 129). Polyesus was very corpulent, at which his adversary Phocion made himself merry (Plut. Phoc. 9), and his love of luxury was attacked by the comic poet Anaxandrides (Athen. iv. p. 166, d.).

POLYEUCTS (Πολύευκτος), an Athenian statesman, who made the statue of Demosthenes which the Athenians set up in the Agora, after the orator's death. (Pseudo-Plut. Vit. X. Oraut. p. 847, n.)

POLYGNOTUS (Πολυγνωτός), one of the most celebrated Greek painters, was a native of the island of Thasos, and was honoured with the citizenship of Athens, on which account he is sometimes called an Athenian. He belonged to a family of artists, who had their origin in Thasos, but came to Athens, and there practised their art. They probably derived their art, like most of the painters in the islands of the Aegean, from the Ionian school. His father, Aglaophon, was also his instructor in his art; he had a brother, named Aristophon; and there was, very probably, a younger Aglaophon, the son of Aristophon, who was contemporary with Alcibiades; so that we have the following genealogy:—

Aristophon.

Polygnotus.

Aglaophon, about B.C. 415.

* The objection against this view, derived from a story told about Elpinice, would scarcely deserve attention, were it not for the importance which has been attached to it by such critics as Lessing, Büttiger, and others of less note. Polygnotus, we are told, fell in love with Cimon's sister, Elpinice, and placed her portrait among the Trojan women, in his picture in the Pioeli (Plut. Cim. 4). Now, not only does it appear that Elpinice must at this time have been nearly forty years old (not, certainly, a very formidable objection in itself), but it is also related that, only two years later (B.C. 461), Pericles answered an appeal which Elpinice made to him on behalf of her brother Cimon, by calling her an old woman! (Plut. Cim. 14, Per. 10.) The whole story is suspicious, for Plutarch tells it again as having happened twenty-two years later, when, certainly, the appellation would be far more appropriate (Per. 28). But, even if the story were true, it is absurd to take the sarcasm of Pericles as an actual fact, and to rest upon it the argument that Polygnotus must have been in love with Elpinice when she was younger, and therefore must have flourished at an earlier period than that at which all other indications, direct and indirect, lead us to place him. Besides, Plutarch only mentions the story of his love for Elpinice as a rumour, and he even hints that it was a malicious rumour. The known connection of Polygnotus with Cimon is quite enough to account for his honouring his patron's sister with a place in one of his great paintings.

* In some editions of Celsus he is called Polybus, or Polybius; but upon comparison of these passages with the other authors who mention him, it appears most probable that the true reading is Polygnotus.
ing to this view, Polygnotus came to Athens in Ol. 79, 2, n. c. 463, at which time he must have been already an artist of some reputation, since Cimon thought him worthy of his patronage. He may, therefore, have been between twenty-five and thirty-five years old, or even older; and this agrees perfectly with the slight indications we have of the length of time during which he flourished at Athens. For we learn from Pausanias (i. 22. § 6) that there was a series of paintings by Polygnotus in a chamber attached to the Propylaea of the Acropolis; and although it is possible, as these were probably panel pictures, that they might have been painted before the erection of the building in which they were placed yet, from the description of Pausanias, and from all that we know of the usual practice in the decoration of public buildings at this period, it is far more probable that they were painted expressly for the building. Now the Propylaea were commenced in B.C. 437, and completed in B.c. 432, so that the age of Polygnotus is brought down almost to the beginning of the Peloponnesian war. Again, in the Gorgias of Plato, "Aristophon, the son of Aglaophon, and his brother," are referred to in a way which implies that they were two of the most distinguished painters then living (Gorg. p. 448, b. comp. Schol.*). Now the probable date of the Gorgias is about Ol. 68. 2, n. c. 427—426, which is within six years of the date assigned by Pliny as that before which Polygnotus flourished. Hence we may conclude that the period during which Polygnotus lived at Athens, was from n. c. 463 to about 426; and assuming his age, at his death, to have been about 65, the date of his birth would just about coincide with that of the battle of Marathon; or he may have been somewhat older, as we can hardly suppose him to have been much less than thirty at the time of his migration to Athens. At all events, his birth may be safely placed very near the beginning of the fifth century B.c. The period of his greatest artistic activity at Athens seems to have been that which elapsed from his removal to Athens (n. c. 463) to the death of Cimon (n. c. 449), who employed him in the pictorial decoration of the public buildings with which he began to adorn the city, such as the temple of Theseus, the Anaeum, and the Poesile. The reason why we have no mention of him in connection with the still more magnificent works which were erected in the subsequent period, under the administration of Pericles and the superintendence of Pheidias, is probably because he had left Athens during this period, with the other artists who had undertaken the decoration of the buildings connected with the great temple at Delphi; for there we know that some of his greatest works were executed. It appears, however, from the passage of Pausanias already cited, that he returned to Athens about n. c. 433, to execute his paintings in the Propylaea. He also worked at Plateaeae and at Thebesiae (see below).

The above considerations respecting the date of Polygnotus lead to the very interesting result, that he was exactly contemporaneous with Pheidias, having been born about the same time, having survived him only a few years, and having commenced his artistic career about the same period; for, not to insist on the probability that Pheidias had some share in the works at the temple of Theseus, we know that both artists worked at about the same time for the temple of Athena Areia at Plateaeae, where Polygnotus (in conjunction with Onatas) painted the walls of the portico, and Pheidias made the acrolith statue of the goddess: the date of these works may be assumed to have been about n. c. 460, or a little later. Again, about the end of their career, we find, at the Propylaea, the paintings of Polygnotus decorating the latest edifices which were erected under the superintendence of Pheidias. Thus, it appears that the causes which produced that sudden advance in the formative art of statuary, of which Pheidias was the leader, produced also a similar advance in the representative art of painting, as practised by Polygnotus. The periods of the essential development of each art were identical, under the effect of the same influences. What those influences were, has been very fully explained under Pheidias. But, it may be said, from all that we know of the style of Polygnotus, the advance of the one art does not seem to have corresponded precisely to that of the other, for Pheidias brought his art to perfection; but no one supposes that the works of Polygnotus exhibited the art of painting in any thing like perfection. This has, in fact, been added by eminent archaeologists, such as Büttiger, as a reason for placing Polygnotus about ten years earlier. The reply is, that the objection rests on a confusion between two very different things, the art of painting, as developed by all the accessory refinements and illusions of perspective and foreshortening, elaborate and dramatic composition, varied effects of light and shade, and great diversities of tone and colouring, and, on the other hand, the mere representation on a flat surface, with the addition of colours, of figures similar to those which the statuary produces in their actual form in a solid substance: in one word, it is a confusion between the art of Apelles and the art of Polygnotus, which differed even more from one another than the latter did from such sculptures as the bas-reliefs of Phigalea or the Parthenon. The painting of Polygnotus was essentially statuæœ; and this sort of painting it is probable that he brought nearly, if not quite, to perfection, by the ideal expression, the accurate drawing, and the improved colouring which characterised his works, though he made no attempt to avail himself of the higher accessories of the art, the discovery of which was reserved for a later period. The difference is clearly indicated by Cicero, when he says that Polygnotus, and Timanthes, and other artists who used but few colours, were admired for their forms and outlines, but that in Echion, Nicomachus, Protagenes, and Apelles, every thing had reached perfection. (Brut. 10.)

So fully did the ancients recognise the position of Polygnotus, as the head of this perfected style of statuæœ painting, that Theophrastus ascribed to him the invention of the whole art. (Plin. H. N. vii. 56. s. 57.) In how far this statement is incorrect, and what steps had been taken in the art before the time of Polygnotus, may be seen in the article Painting in the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities.

The improvements which Polygnotus effected in painting are described by Pliny very briefly and unsatisfactorily. (H.N.xxxv. 9, p. 35) Among these improvements were, opening the mouth, showing the teeth, and varying the expression of the countenance from its ancient stiffness. He was the first who painted women with brilliant (or transparent) drapery (lucida vestis); and with variegated head-dresses (matris versicoloribus); and, generally, he was the first who contributed much to the advancement of painting (plurimumque pictorum prius contulit). Lucian also selects his figures as models of excellence for the beauty of the eye-brows, the blush upon the cheeks (as in his Cassandra in the Lesche at Delphi), and the gracefulness of the draperies. (De Imag. 7, vol. ii. p. 465.)

These statements of Pliny amount to saying that Polygnotus gave great expression to both face and figure, and great elegance and variety to the drapery. How these matters were treated before his time we may judge from many of the ancient vases. "‘Could the most varied attitudes, the faces high profiles, with closed lips and fixed eyes, often looking sideways, and the draperies standing, rather than hanging, in rigid parallel lines. That the expression which Polygnotus gave to his figures was something more, however, than a successful imitation of real life, and that it had an ideal character, may be inferred from the manner in which Aristotle speaks of the artist. Thus he calls him an ethic painter (γραφεὺς ἔθος), a good ethographer (ἀγάθος θεόγραφος), terms which denote his power of expressing, not passion and emotion only, but also ideal character. (Polit. viii. 5. p. 267, ed. Götting, Polit. vi. 5, ed. Herm., 11, ed. Ritter.)" In the second of these passages he contrasts him with Zeuxis, whose painting, he says, has no ἔθος at all; and his meaning is further shown by what he says on the subject, of which these allusions to painting are in illustration, namely ἔθος in poetry. "Tragedy," he says, "could not exist without action, but it could not without ideal characters (ἕθος); for the tragedies of most of the recent poets are without character (ἄθροιας); and, in general, there are many poets of this kind:" words thoroughly exemplified in some of the tragedies of Euripides, and in the account we have of others of the later tragedians and dithyrambic poets, where the expression of ideal character is sacrificed to the exhibition of mere emotion, to the energy and complication of dramatic action, or even to lower sources of interest. In another well-known passage, which forms a sort of landmark in the history of art (Polit. 2), he says: "But since those who imitate, imitate men in action, and it is necessary that these be either good or bad (for characters, ἔθος, almost always follow these distinctions alone: for all men differ in their characters by vice and virtue), they imitate persons either better than (ἐξελέφθαι, or worse, or such as men really are, just as the painters do: for Polygnotus represented men as better than they are; Παῦσον worse than they are; and Dionysius like ordinary men." And so, in the passage respecting ἔθος, first quoted from the Politic (where the whole context deserves careful reading), he says that "the young ought not to study the works of Pauson, but those of Polygnotus, and whoever else of the painters or statuaries is ethic." In the Poetic, Aristotle goes on to explain his distinction by reference to various imitative arts, and especially poetry, in which, he says, "Homer represented characters better than ordinary men, but Cleophas like ordinary men, but Hegemon, who first composed parodies, and Nicocles, the author of the Delias, worse;" he then quotes Timotheus and Philoxenus as examples of the same thing in the dithyramb, and adds the very important remark that "this is the very difference which makes the distinction between tragedy and comedy; for the one purposes to imitate men worse, but the other better, than men as they now actually are." (Comp. Herrmann’s Notes, and Lessing’s Hamburghische Dramaturgie.)

The parallel which Aristotle thus draws between Polygnotus and Homer (and the poets of Homer’s spirit) seems, from all we know of Polygnotus, to be an exact illustration, both of his subjects and of his mode of treating them. It should never be forgotten that Greek art was founded upon Greek poetry, and took from it both its subjects and its spirit. Phidias and Polygnotus were the Homers of their respective arts; they imitated the personages and the subjects of the old mythology, and they treated them in an epic spirit, while Lysippus and Apelles were essentially dramatic; the former artists strove to express character and repose, the latter action and emotion; the former exhibited ideal personages, the latter real ones; the men of the former are godlike, the gods of the latter are ordinary men; Phidias derived the image of his Zeus from the sublimest verses of Homer, Apelles painted his Venus from a courtezan, and Zeuxis could find no higher model for the queen of Olympus than a selection from real and living beauties. The limits of this article do not permit any further exposition of this essential and fundamental point of aesthetic science. We must not, however, omit to state a fact, in illustration of the parallel between Homer and Polygnotus, namely, that the painter’s works in the Lesche at Delphi are compared to Homer’s Iliad and Odyssey of Polygnotus; though it must be admitted that most of those who used that phrase were thinking of the subjects of the paintings, and little or nothing of their character, and that very few had any notion of the sense in which Polygnotus is placed beside Homer by the great philosoper, who is rightly regarded as the father of aesthetic science. The subjects of the pictures of Polygnotus were almost invariably taken from Homer and the other poets of the epic cycle.

With respect to the more technical and mechanical improvements which Polygnotus introduced into painting, the statement of Pliny concerning his female draperies is admirably illustrated by Büttiger, to whose section on Polygnotus, in his Ideen zur Geschichte der Archäologie der Mäler, we here refer once for all, as one of the chief authorities for the present subject, and as one of the most valuable contributions to the history of ancient art. Büttiger (pp. 263—265) remarks that the descriptions of Polygnotus’s paintings prove that female figures were introduced by him far more freely than we have any reason to suppose them to have appeared in earlier works of art; and that he thus gained the opportunity of enlivening his pictures with the varied and brilliant colours, which we know to have prevailed in the dress of the Greek women. His draperies are described by Lucian as having the appearance of thinness of substance, part adhering to the limbs so as to cover the figure without hiding it, and the greater part arranged in flowing masses as if moved by the wind. (Lucian. de Imag. 7, vol. ii. p. 465.) Respecting the utras versicosores, see Bottiger, p. 265.

Concerning his principles of composition, we know but little; but from that little it would seem that his pictures had nothing of that elaborate and yet natural grouping, aided by the powers of perspective, which is so much admired in modern works of art. The figures seem to have been grouped in regular lines, as in the bas-reliefs upon a frieze; and when it was desired to introduce other sets of figures nearer to, or more remote from the spectator, this was effected by placing them in other parallel lines below or above the first. A sort of principle of architectural symmetry governed the whole composition, the figures on each side of the centre of the picture being made to correspond with each other.

Such an advance as painting made in the age of Polygonus could not have taken place without some new appliances in colouring; and accordingly we are told by Pliny that Polygonus and his contemporary Micon were the first to use the red or yellow ocher which was found in the Attic silver mines; and that the same artists made a black (atramentum) from the husks of pressed grapes, which was therefore called tyrrhon, τρύρων. (Plin. H.N. xxxiii. 12. s. 56, xxxv. 6. s. 25.) Bottiger supposes that they used the yellow ocher to a great extent for draperies and head-dresses.

Polygonus is one of those artists whom Cicero mentions as having used no more than four colours. (Brut. 18; but respecting the error in this statement see Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, § 319, and Dict. of Ant. art. Colores.)

The instrument with which Polygonus usually worked was the pencil, as we learn from a passage in Pliny, which also furnishes another proof of the excellence of the artist. The great painter Pausias, who was a pupil of Pamphilus, the master of Apelles, restored certain paintings of Polygonus at Thespiae, and was considered to have fallen far short of the excellence of the original paintings, because "non suo genere certasse," that is, he used the pencil, as Polygonus had done in the original pictures, instead of painting, as he was accustomed to do, in encaustic with the cinnabar. (Plin. H.N.xxxv. 11. s. 40.) Polygonus, however, sometimes painted in encaustic, and he is mentioned as one of the earliest artists who did so. (Plin. H.N. xxxv. 11. s. 39.)

As to the form of his pictures, it may be assumed that he generally followed what we know to have been the usual practice with the Greek artists, namely, to paint on panels, which were afterwards let into the walls where they were to remain. (Dict. of Ant. art. Painting; Bottiger, Arch. d. Kunst.) In Pliny's list of his works, one of them is expressly mentioned as a panel picture (adulata); but, on the other hand, the pictures at Thespiae, just referred to, are said to have been on walls (varietes). Indeed, the common opinion, that panel pictures were the form almost invariably used by the early Greek artists, should be received with some caution.
referring to the paintings of Evanthes in the opisthodomus of the temple of Jupiter Casius, mentioned by Achilles Tatius (iii. 6), not a very good authority (see Evanthes). It may also be objected that the name of Polygnotus is not mentioned in the extant inscription respecting the works of this temple. But it is perhaps enough to say that the conjecture is too violent to be admitted by itself; especially when it is contrasted with the explanation of Hesicles, who, for εν τῷ θυσιαστήριον would read εν τῷ θυσιαστηρίον ιερό. Now, the temple of Theseus was built during the administration of Cimon, after the translation of the hero's remains from Seyros to Athens in B.C. 469. If, therefore, as is almost certain, Cimon brought Polygnotus with him from Thasos in B.C. 463, it would almost certainly be partly with a view to the decoration of this very temple. Pausanias, indeed, in his description of the temple (i. 17. § 2), ascribes the paintings in it to Micon, but this is rather a confirmation of the argument than otherwise, for these two artists more than once assisted in decorating the same building. It is an obvious conjecture, from a comparison of the dates, that Micon was already employed upon the painting of the temple before the arrival of Polygnotus, who was then appointed to assist him. [Comp. Miller, i. 15; Müller, Phid. 6; Böttiger, p. 275.]

2. Paintings in the Stoa Poecile at Athens.—Among the works which Cimon undertook for the improvement of the city, after the final termination of the Persian wars, the spoils of which furnished him with the means, one of the first was the decoration of the places of public resort, such as the Agora and the Academy, the former of which he planted with plane-trees (Plut. Cimon. 2). He also enlarged and improved the portico which ran along one side of the Agora, and which was called at first the Portico of Peisianax (ἡ Πεισιανική στοά), but afterwards received the name of the Poecile or Painted Porico (ἡ πωείλη στοά), from the paintings with which it was decorated. (Paus. i. 15; Müller, Phid. 6; Böttiger, p. 275.) Cimon executed this work soon after his return from Thasos (Plut. l. c.), and employed Polygnotus and Micon to decorate the portico with those paintings, from which it afterwards obtained its name. The portico itself was a long colonnade, formed by a row of columns on one side and a wall on the other; and against this wall were placed the paintings, which were on panels. These paintings, as they appeared in the time of Pausanias, represented four subjects:—(1) The battle of Oenoa, fought between the Athenians and Lacedaemonians, the painter of which was unknown; (2) The battle of Theseus and the Athenians with the Amazons, by Micon; (3) The Greeks, after the taking of Troy, assembling to judge the case of Cassandra's violation by Ajax; this painting was by Polygnotus; (4) The battle of Marathon, by Panaeus; also ascribed to Micon and to Polygnotus, who may have assisted in the work. (Paus. l. c.; Böttiger, pp. 274—290; Micon, Pan. 9.) From the description of Pausanias, it would seem that, in the picture of Polygnotus, the Greek chiefains, sitting in judgment, formed the centre of the composition, with the Greek army grouped on the one side, and, on the other, the Trojan captives, among whom Cassandra was conspicuous. Böttiger supposes that, in his treatment of the subject, the artist followed the Ἴλιον ἔρωτας of the cyclic poet Archilus. Böttiger also supposes that there were two or three panels representing different stages of the event; a supposition for which there does not seem to be sufficient reason. The subject, as representing the first great victory of the united Greeks, was appropriately connected with the celebration of the Olympic games.

3. In the Anaeceum, or Temple of the Diosaui, at Athens, which was perhaps more ancient than the time of Cimon, who seems to have repaired and beautified it, Polygnotus painted the marriage of the daughters of Leucippus, as connected with the mythology of the Diosaui (Πολυγνώτου μὲν ἔρωτα ἐς αὐτούς ἔργα ἱδίω τῶν ἡγεμόνων τῶν Λευκίππον, Paus. i. 18. § 1), and Micon painted the Argonautic expedition. The subject of Polygnotus was evidently that favourite subject of ancient poetry and art, the rape of Phoebe and Hilara on their marriage-day, by Castor and Pollux: the ancient form of the legend, which was followed by Polygnotus, is supposed by Böttiger to have been contained in the cyclic poem entitled Κυρία, which related to the events before the Iliad. We still possess, in bas-reliefs on ancient sarcophagi, three if not four representations of the story, which we may safely assume to have been taken either from the picture of Polygnotus, and which strikingly display that uniform sympathy with which we know to have been one characteristic of his works, in contradistinction to the more natural grouping of a later period. In modern times, Rubens has painted the story of Phoebe and Hilara in a picture, now at Munich, which would doubtless present a most interesting contrast to the treatment of the same subject by Polygnotus, if we had but the opportunity of comparing them. The sculptures also, which are presumed to have been taken after the painting of Polygnotus, have furnished David with some ideas for his Rape of the Sabine women. (Böttiger, pp. 291—295.)

4. In the temple of Athena Areia at Plateaean, Polygnotus and Onatas painted the walls of the front portico (that is, probably, the wall on each side of the principal entrance); Polygnotus represented Ulysses just after he had slain the suitors. (Paus. ix. 4. § 1; Hom. Od. xxii.)

5. His paintings on the walls of the temple of Theseus have been already mentioned. Nothing is known of their subject.

6. Paintings in the Leche of the Cnidians at Delphi.—Some of the same causes which led to the sudden development of art at Athens, in the age following that of the Persian wars, gave a similar impulse to its advancement about the same time in other places, especially at those two centres of the Greek union and religion, Olympia and Delphi. The great works at the former place have been spoken of under Phidias; those at the latter appear to have been executed not only about the same time (or rather, perhaps, a little earlier), but also by Athenian artists chiefly. We know, for example, that the statues in the pediments of the temple at Delphi were made by Phraixus of Athens, the disciple of Calamis, and finished, after his death, by Androsthenes, the disciple of Euclides, but his, x. 19. § 9.) These artists must have been contemporaneous with Phidias and Polygnotus; and there are some other indications of the employment of Athenian artists at Delphi about the same period (Müller, Phid. p. 28, n. 5.).
Taking, then, these facts in connection with the absence of any mention of Polygnotus's having been engaged on the great works of Pericles and Phidias (except the Propylæa, at a later period), it may fairly be supposed that, after the death of his patron, Cimon, he was glad to accept the invitation, which the fame of his works at Athens caused him to receive, to unite with other Athenian artists in the decoration of the temple at Delphi.

The people who gave him the commission were the Cnidians. It was customary for the different Greek cities to show their piety and patriotism, not only by enriching the temple at Delphi with valuable gifts, but by embellishing its precincts with edifices, chiefly treasuries to contain their gifts. Among the rest, the Cnidians had built at Delphi both a treasury, and one of those enclosed courts, or halls, which were called ἄσγχαι (places for conversation), which existed in considerable numbers in various Greek cities, and which were especially attached to the temples of Apollo. The most famous of all of them was this Lesche of the Cnidians at Delphi, which seems to have been a quadrangular or oblong court or peristyle, surrounded by colonnades, very much like our cloisters. It was the walls of the two principal colonnades of this building (those on the right and left of a person entering) that Polygnotus was employed by the Cnidians to paint: and it is very interesting to preserve the parallel between the most renowned works of the early stages of the art in ancient Greece and modern Italy,—the paintings of Polygnotus in the Lesche at Delphi, and those ascribed to Andrea Ovacina, in the Campo Santo at Pisa.

Polygnotus took his subjects from the whole cycle of the epic poetry which described the wars of Troy, and the return of the Greek chieftains. There were two paintings, or rather series of paintings; the one upon the wall on the right hand; the other opposite to this, upon the wall on the left hand. The former represented, according to Pausanias (x. 25 § 2), the taking of Troy, and the Grecian fleet loosing from the shores of Ilium to return home; the latter, the descent of Ulysses into the lower world, which subject seems to have been treated with especial reference to the mysteries. In both pictures the figures seem to have been arranged in successive groups and the groups, again, in two or more lines above each other, without any attempt at perspective, and with names affixed to the several figures. To the picture on the right hand was affixed the following epigram, which was ascribed to Simonides:

Γράφει Πολυγνώτως, θάνατος γένος, Ἀγαλλοφώτως
Τίς, περιβάλει τ' ἔλεος αἰχμόλω.

Pausanias devotes seven chapters to the description of these paintings (x. 25—31); from which, however, we gain little more than a catalogue of names. The numerous and difficult questions which arise, respecting the succession and grouping of the figures, the manner in which each of them was represented, the aesthetic and symbolic significations of the pictures, and so forth, have furnished a wide field of discussion for artists and archaeologists. The most important works upon the subject are the following—Diderot, Correspond., vol. iii. pp. 270, ed. 1831; Riepenhausen, F. et J., Peintures de Polygnot à Delphes, dessinées et gravées d'après la Descr. de Pausanias, 1826, 1829, comp. Göttling. Göt. Anzeig., 1827, p. 1809; Göthe, Werke, vol. xlv. pp. 97, f., old ed., vol. xxxi. p. 118, ed. 1840; Böttiger, pp. 296, f.; Otto Jahn, Die Gemälde des Polygnotos in der Lesche zu Delphi, Kiel, 1841; and, concerning the general subject of the Greek representations of the lower world, on ancient vases, compared with the description of Polygnotus's second picture, see Gerhard's Archäologische Zeitung, 1843, 1844, Nos. xi.—xv. and Plates 11—15.

7. His picture in the chamber adjoining to the Promenade of the Aeropagus were probably the last of his great works. The subjects were all from Homer and the epic cycle (Paus. i. 22; Böttiger, pp. 290, 291).

8. The panel-picture mentioned by Pliny as being at Rome in his time, shows that Polygnotus sometimes painted single figures, but Pliny's description of the work is perfectly unintelligible.

"in qua dubdubatur ascendentem cum elpeo pinxit, an descendentem." (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 9. s. 35.)

[POLYGNOTUS (Πολύγνωτος), a son of Proteus, a grandson of Poseidon and brother of Telegrus. The two brothers were killed by Heracles at Tro-rane, when they challenged him in a contest in wrestling. (Apollod. ii. 5 § 9.)

POLYHYMNIA. [POLYMHNIA.]

POLYIDUS (Πολυίδος), 1. A son of Ceanus, a grandson of Abas and a great-grandson of Melampus. It was, like his ancestor, a well-known soothsayer at Corinth, and is described as the father of Enchonos, Astyareia, and Manto. (Pind. Ol. xiii. 104; Hom. Il. xiii. 663, &c.; Paus. i. 43. § 5; Apollod. iii. 3. § 1.) When Alcaeus had murdered his own son Callipolis at Megara, he was purified by Polyidus, who erected at Megara a sanctuary to Dicynus, and a statue of the god, which was covered all over except the face. (Paus., Apollod. ii. 26. § 1; Hygin. Fab. 136.)

2. A son of the Trojan Eurydamas, and a brother of Abas, was slain by Diomedes. (Hom. II. v. 148.)

POLYIDUS (Πολύειδος, Πολύδος, Πολυδάς, Πολυείδης, all these forms occur, but the most usual is Πολύδος), a dithyrambic poet of the most flourishing period of the later Athenian dithyramb, and also skilful as a painter, was contemporary with Philoxenus, Timotheus, and Telestes, about OL. 9. and 10. (see Diod. ii. 46.) The notices of him are very scanty; but he seems to have been esteemed almost as highly as Timo-theus, whom indeed one of his pupils, Philotis, once conquered. It is related that, as Polyidus was boasting of this victory, Stratonicus, the musician, rebuked him by saying, "I wonder you do not understand that you make ψφηληκατα, but Timotheus νφιομος," an untranslatable witticism, intimating that Timotheus had been conquered by the voice of the people, and not by the merit of his opponent. (Ath. viii. p. 592. b.) It seems from a passage of Plutarch (De Mus. 21, p. 1138. b.), that Polyidus went beyond Timotheus in those intricate variations, for the introduction of which the musicians of this period are so frequently attacked. A remarkable testimony to his popularity throughout Greece is still extant in the form of a decree of the Cossians, commending Meneicles of Teos for having played on the harp at Cossus "after the manner of Timotheus and Polyidus and the ancient Cretan poets, as becomes an accomplished man." (Böckh, Corp. Inscriptionum Graecarum, vol. ii. p. 641, No. 3053.)

One of his pieces was entitled "Atlas," and in it he represented Atlas as a Libyan shepherd, whom Persuus turned into stone by showing him the Gorgon's head; a remarkable example of the total want of ideal art, and of any poetical conception of the early mythology, which characterised the dithyrambic poets of that period. (Tzetzes, Schol. ad Lyoph. 873, Evg. IIad. p. 132. 18; Ethym. Mag. p. 104. 20; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Græc. p. 289, n.)

There are also two remarkable references in the Poetic (16. 17) of Aristotle to the Iphigenia of Polyidus, where Aristotle is mentioning examples of dithyrambics. But here it seems from the context that only a name is referred to, besides which it is improbable, Müller argues, that Aristotle would speak of the celebrated dithyrambic poet, as he does in the first of these passages, by the name of Polymela to Sophocles. On the other hand, there is the critical canon, which forbids us to assume an unknown person of the same name as one well known, if any other probable explanation can be suggested. Perhaps, in this case, the best solution of the difficulty is the conjecture of Welcker, that Polyidus was a sophist, who took a pride in cultivating several different branches of art and literature, and who thus was at once a painter, a dithyrambic poet, and a tragedian. There are three iambic trimeter lines in Stobaeus (Serm. xxiii.) which appear at first sight to settle the point as to there having been a tragic poet of this name; but it is even shown that these lines are a quotation, not from a poet named Polyidus, but from the Polyidus of Euripides. (Müller, Gesch. d. Griech. Litt. vol. ii. p. 287, or vol. ii. p. 59, Eng. trans.; Ulrici, Gesch. d. Hell. Dichtk. vol. ii. pp. 610, fol.; Bode, Gesch. d. Hell. Dichtk. vol. ii. pt. 2. p. 323, vol. iii. pt. 1, p. 562; Schmidt, Diatrib. in Dithyramb. pp. 121—124; Kayser, Hist. Crit. Trag. Græc. pp. 318—322; Welcker, die Griech. Trag. pp. 1043, 1044; Bartsch, de Chaeremon. p. 14; Bernhardy, Granatiss d. Gesch. d. Griech. Litt. vol. ii. pp. 554, 555.)

POLYIDUS, artists. 1. Besides the painter and dithyrambic poet (see above), Vitruvius mentions the two following artists of this name, who may, however, very possibly have been one and the same person, since military engineers were often also architects.

2. Of Thessaly, a military engineer, who made improvements in the covered battering-ram (testudo arietaria) during Philip's siege of Byzantium, b. c. 340. His pupils were Diades and Chaerones, who served in the campaigns of Alexander. (Vitruv. x. 19. s. 13, § 3, Schneider.)

3. An architect, who wrote on the proportions of the orders (prospecta symmetrion), Vitruv. vii. Praef. § 14.)

POLYMEDE (Πολυμήδη), a daughter of Autolycus, was married to Aeson, and by him became the mother of Jason. (Apollod. i. 9. § 16; Tzetz. ad Lyce. 175.) Apollonius Rhodius (i. 283) calls her Alcimede. (Comp. Iason.)

POLYME'LA (Πολυμέλα). 1. A daughter of Peleus, and the wife of Menoeceus, by whom she became the mother of Patroclus. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 6.) In some traditions she is called Philyra. (Patrioc.)

2. Daughter of Phyllus, was married to Echecles, but became by Hermes the mother of Eudorus. (Hom. ii. xvi. 180, &c.)

POLYPEMON.

3. A daughter of Aecolus, was beloved by Olympeus, but afterwards married her brother Diöres. (Parthen. Erot. 2.)

POLYMESTOR or POLYMNESTOR. [Po-

LDORUS.]

POLYMESTUS (Πολυμέστους), the father of Batus, the founder of Cyrene. [Battus, p. 476, a.]

POLYMESTUS, or POLYMNESTUS (Πολυμέστους), the son of Meles of Colophon, whom was an epic, elegiac, and lyric poet, and a musician. He flourished not long after Thales, in honour of whom he made a poem at the request of the Spartan Persuus. (Paus. i. 14, § 5; Alcman, and other theocritans, who mentioned him (Plut. Mus. p. 1133, a.), it seems, therefore, that he was in part contemporary with both these poets, and the period during which he flourished may be roughly stated at b. c. 675—644. He belongs to the school of Dorian music, which flourished at this time at Sparta, where he carried on the improvements of Thales. He cultivated the orithan names, and invented a new kind of aulodic name, which was named after him, Polyvmestous (Plut. de Mus. pp. 1132—1135; Suid. s. v.; Hesych. s. v. Polemestoros ἀδέλφες). The Attic comedians attacked his poems for their erotic character. (Aristoph. Equit. 1287; Cratinus, ap. Schol. Iobid.) As an elegiac poet, he may be regarded as the predecessor of his fellow-countryman, Mimnermus. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. p. 135; Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtk. vol. ii. pt. 1, passim; Ulrici, Gesch. d. Hell. Dichtk. vol. ii. pp. 291, 292, et alib.; Clinton, F. H. I. vol. i. s. a. 653, 657, 644, and p. 363.)

POLYMESTUS, a statuary, whose name was first made known by the discovery of an inscription on a base in the Acropolis at Athens, in 1810, by Ross, who has thus restored it, [ΠΩΤΑ-

MHNΣΤΟΣ ΚΕΝ [ΧΑΜΙΣΕ] ΕΠΟΙΗΒΑΝ. From the form of the letters, Ross supposes the inscription to be of about the time of Praxiteles or Lyssipus. The only reason for the restoration of the name of the second of these artists, is the mention in Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 27) of a statuary named Cenchrus, among those who made comedians and athletes. (Racoul-Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 390.)

POLYMINIA or POLYHYMINIA (Πολυμίηνα), a daughter of Zeus, and one of the nine Muses. She presided over lyric poetry, and was believed to have invented the lyre. (Hes. Theog. 72; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1.) By Oenomaus she became the mother of Orpheus. (Schol. s. v. i. 23.) In works of art she was usually represented in a pensive attitude. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 209; comp. Musae.)

POLYNICLES (Πολυνίκης), the son of Odipus and Iocaste, and brother of Eteocles and Antigone. (Hom. II. iv. 377; Adrastus.)

POLYPHANTI (Πολυφάντας), a general in the service of Philip V. king of Macedonia, during the war against the Romans and Aeolians. In b. c. 208 he was left together with Menippus in the Peloponnesus to support the Aeneipus with a force of 2500 men; and the following year (b. c. 207) was sent with a small force to the assistance of the Boeotians and Phocians. (Liv. xxvii. 32, xxviii. 3; Polyb. x. 43.)

POLYPIE'VON (Πολυπιέων), the name of three mythical personages. (Hom. Od. xxiv. 305; Apollod. iii. 16, § 2; Paus. i. 38, § 5.)
POLYPHEMUS (Πολύφημος). 1. The celebrated Cyclops in the island of Thrinacia, was a son of Poseidon, and the nymph Thoosa. For an account of him see the article CYCLOPS.

2. A son of Elateion Poseidon and Hippaea, was one of the L sophai at Larissa in Thessaly. He was married to Leonome, a sister of Heracles, with whom he was connected by friendship. He was also one of the Argonauts, but being left behind by them in Mysia, he founded Cios, and fell against the Chalybes. (Hom. II. ii. 264; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 40, 1241, iv. 1470; Val. Flacc. i. 457; Apollod. i. 9, §§ 16, 19.)

POLYPHIION (Πολύφιον), the brother of Jason of Pherae, Tagus of Thessaly, succeeded to the supreme power along with his brother Polydorus on the death of Jason, in B.C. 370. Shortly afterwards he murdered Polydorus [POLYDORUS], and thus became sole Tagus. He exercised his power with great cruelty, and converted his office into a tyranny. He murdered Polydamas of Pharsalus [POLYDAMAS], but was murdered in his turn, B.C. 369, by his nephew Alexander, who proved, however, still a greater tyrant. [ALEXANDER OF PHERAE. (Xen. Hell. vi. 4, §§ 33, 34; Plut. Ptole. c. 29.)

POLYPOTES (Πολυπότης). 1. A son of Apollo and Pthia. (Apollod. i. 7, § 6; comp. AETOLUS.)

2. A son of Peirichus and Hippodameia, was one of the Lapithae, who joined the Greeks in the Trojan war, commanding the men of Argissa, Gyrtone, Orthe, Elone and Olooson. (Hom. II. ii. 736, &c., comp. vi. 29, xii. 129.) At the funeral games of Ptolemaus, he gained the victory in throwing the iron ball. (II. xxiii. 336, &c.) After the fall of Troy, Polypoetes and Leonteus are said to have founded the town of Aspendus in Pamphylia. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 334.) [L.S.]

POLYSYPERHON (Πολυσπέρχων). 1. Son of Simmias, a Macedonian of the province of Stymphaeus, and a distinguished officer in the service of Alexander the Great. Of his earlier services we know nothing, but it is certain that he was already a veteran and experienced warrior in B.C. 332, when he was appointed to succeed Ptolemy the son of Seleucus in the command of one of the divisions of the phalanx. We afterwards find him occupying the same post in the battle of Arbela, and lending the weight of his authority and experience to support the proposition of Parmenion before the action to attack the Persian camp by night. (Arr. Anab. ii. 12, iii. 11; Diod. xvii. 57; Curt. iv. 13, §§ 7, 26, who inaccurately calls him "Dux peregrini militis.") In the subsequent campaigns in the upper provinces of Asia and India, he bore an important part, and his name is frequently mentioned. Thus we find him associated with Coenus and Philotas at the passage of the Pylae Persicæ, and afterwards detached under Craterus against the revolted chiefs in Paratacæne, accompanying Alexander on his expedition against the Assaceni, and reducing with his own division only the strong fortress of Nora. His name occurs again at the passage of the Hydaspe, as well as in the descent of that river, on both which occasions he served under Craterus; and in B.C. 323 he was once more associated with that general as second in command of the army of invalids and veterans, which the latter was appointed to conduct home to Macedonia. (Arr. Anab. iv. 16, 22, 25, v. 11, 18, vi. 5, vii. 12; Curt. v. 4, § 20, viii. 5, §§ 2, 11, § 1; Justin. xii. 10, 12.)

In consequence of his absence from Babylon on this service at the time of Alexander's death, he appears to have been passed over in the arrangements which followed that event, nor do we find any mention of his name for some time afterwards, but it seems certain that he must have returned with Craterus to Europe, and probably took part with him and Antipater in the Laman war. In B.C. 321, when the dissensions between Antipater and Perdiccas had broken out into actual hostilities, and the former was preparing to follow Craterus into Asia, he entrusted to Polysperchon the chief command in Macedonia and Greece during his absence. The veteran general proved himself worthy of the charge; he repulsed the Aetolians who had invaded Thessaly, and cut to pieces a Macedonian force under Polycetes, defeated Menon of Pharsalus, and recovered the whole of Thessaly. (Diod. xviii. 30; Justin. xiii. 6.) Though we do not learn that he obtained any reward for these services during the lifetime of Antipater, it is evident that he enjoyed the highest place in the confidence of the regent, of which the latter gave a striking proof on his deathbed, B.C. 319, by appointing Polysperchon to succeed him as regent and guardian of the king, while he assigned to his own son Cassander the subordinate station of Chlorich (Id. ib. 48.)

Polysperchon was at this time one of the oldest of the surviving generals of Alexander, and enjoyed in consequence the highest favour and popularity among the Macedonians; but he was aware that both Cassander and Antigonus were jealous of his elevation, and were beginning to form secret designs for the overthrow of his power. In order to strengthen himself against them he now made overtures to Olympias, who had been driven from Macedonia by Antipater, as well as to Eumenes, but did not forget that he had obtained any reward for these services during the lifetime of Antipater. Nor were these measures unsuccessful; Olympias, though she still remained in Epeirus, lent all the support of her name and influence to Polysperchon, while Eumenes, who had escaped from his mountain fastness at Nora, and put himself at the head of the Argyraspids, prepared to contend with Antigonus for the possession of Asia. While his most formidable rival was thus occupied in the East, it remained for Polysperchon himself to contend with Cassander in Greece. The restoration of the democracy at Athens had attached that city to the cause of the regent, but Nicomete held possession of the fortresses of Munychia and the Peiraeus for Cassander, and refused to give them up notwithstanding the repeated orders of Olympias. Hereupon Polysperchon sent forward an army under his son Alexander into Attica, while he himself followed with the royal family. They had already advanced into Phocis when they were met by deputies from Athens, as well as by Phocion and others of the oligarchical party who had fled from the city. Both parties obtained a public hearing in the presence of the king, which ended in Phocion and his companions being given up to the opposite party by the express order of Poly-POLYSPERCHON, and sent to Athens to undergo the form of a trial. (Diod. xviii. 49, 54—58, 62, 64—66; Plut. Hosp. 31—34. For a more detailed account of these transactions see Phocion.)

By the destruction of Phocion and his friends, the regent hoped to have secured the adherents of the Athenians; but he was still in Phocis with the king (a. c. 318), Cassander himself unexpectedly arrived in Attica with a considerable fleet and army, and established himself in the Peiraeus. Hereupon Polysperchon advanced into Attica and laid siege to the Peiraeus, but finding that he made little progress, he left his son Alexander to continue the blockade, while he himself advanced into the Peloponnese with a large army. Here he at first met with little opposition: almost all the cities obeyed his mandates and expelled or put to death the leaders of their respective oligarchies: Megalopolis alone refused submission, and was immediately besieged by the regent himself with his whole army. Polysperchon had apparently expected an easy victory, but the valour of the citizens frustrated his calculations: all his attacks were repulsed, and after some time he found himself compelled to raise the siege and withdraw from the Peloponnese. Shortly afterwards his admiral Cleitus, who had been despatched with a fleet to the Hellespont, was totally defeated by that of Cassander under Nicarnor, and his forces utterly destroyed. (Diod. xviii. 68—72.)

These reverses quickly produced an unfavourable turn in the disposition of the Greek states towards Polysperchon: and Athens in particular again abandoned his alliance for that of Cassander, who established an oligarchical government in the city under the presidency of Demetrius of Phalerus. (Id. i. 65, 74, 75.) At the same time Eurydice, the active and intriguing wife of the unhappy king Arrhidaeus, conceived the project of throwing off the yoke of the regent, and concluded an alliance with Cassander, while she herself assembled an army with which she obtained for a time the complete possession of Macedonia. But in the spring of 317 Polysperchon having united his forces with those of Antigonus king of Epirus, who had invaded Macedonia, accompanied by Olympias, whose presence alone quickly determined the contest. (Olympias.) During the subsequent events Polysperchon plays but a subordinate part. We do not learn that he interposed to prevent the cruelties of Olympias, or to save the life of the unhappy king, of whom he was the nominal guardian: and though he afterwards occupied the passes of Perrhaebia with an army, he was unable to prevent the advance of Cassander into Macedonia, or to avert the fall of Pydna, which fell into the hands of the enemy, while Polysperchon was still shut up in Perrhaebia. Here he was reduced to great straits by Cassander’s general Callas, and was besieged in the town of Azorus, when the news of the death of Olympias (a. c. 316) caused him to despair of recovering his footing in Macedonia, and he withdrew with a small force into Aetolia. (Diod. xiv. 11, 35, 36, 52.)

From thence he appears to have joined his son Alexander in the Peloponnese, where we find him in a. c. 315, when the altered position of affairs having united Cassander with Lysimachus, Ptolemy, and Seleucus in a general coalition against Antigonus, the latter sought to attach the aged Polysperchon to his cause, by offering him the chief command in the Peloponnese. The bribe was accepted, and for a short time Polysperchon and his son conjointly carried on the war in the Peloponnese against Cassander and the generals of Ptolemy. But before the end of the same year Alexander was gained over by Cassander; and Polysperchon, though he did not follow the example of his son, and coalesce with his old enemy, at least assumed a position hostile to Antigonus, as we find him in 313 defending Sicyon and Corinth against Telesphorus, the lieutenant of that general. (Id. xii. 60, 62, 64, 74.) From this time we lose sight of him till a. c. 310, when he again assumed an important part by reviving the long-forgotten pretensions of Heracles the son of Barsine (now the only surviving son of Alexander) to the throne of Macedonia. Having induced the unhappy youth to quit his retirement at Pergamus, and join him in the Peloponnese, he persuaded the Aetolians to espouse his cause, and with their assistance raised a large army, with which he advanced towards Macedonia. He was met at Trampyae in Stymphaea by Cassander, but the latter, distrusting the fidelity of his own troops, instead of risking an engagement, entered into secret negotiations with Polysperchon, and endeavoured by promises and flatteries to induce him to abandon the pretender whom he had himself set up. Polysperchon had the weakness to give way, and the meanness to serve the purposes of Cassander by the assassination of Heracles at a banquet. (Diod. xx. 20—28. For further details and authorities, see Heracles.) It is satisfactory to know that Polysperchon did not reap the expected reward of his crime: Cassander had promised him the chief command of the Peloponnese, but this he certainly never obtained, though we find him at a later period possessing a certain footing in that country: he seems to have occupied a subordinate and inglorious position. The last occasion on which his name occurs in history is in b. c. 303, when we find him co-operating with Cassander and Prepe-laus against Demetrius (Diod. xx. 106), but no notice of his subsequent fortunes or the period of his death has been transmitted to us.*

Polysperchon appears to have been a soldier of considerable merit, and to have been regarded by the Macedonians with favour as belonging to the older race of Alexander’s generals; but he was altogether unequal to the position in which he found himself placed on the death of Antipater, and his weakness degenerated into the basest villany in such instances as the surrender of Phocion, and the assassination of Heracles.

POLYSTE'PHANUS (Πολυστέφανος), a Greek writer, possessed no small reputation, but his writings were full of incredible tales. (Gell. ix. 4.) Harpocration (ς. τ. λαντροφόρος) quotes a work of his πες κρανων.

POLYSTRATUS. 1. An eminent Epicurean philosopher, who succeeded Hermarchus as head of

* Justin, by some inconceivable error, represents Polysperchon as killed in the war against Eumenes, before the death of Antipater (xiii. 8): and again (xv. 1, init.) alludes to him as dead before the murder of Heracles the son of Barsine.
POLYXENA.

POLYXENIDAS (Πολυξενίδας), a Rhodian, who was exiled from his native country, and entered the service of Antiochus III., king of Syria. We first find him mentioned in b.c. 209, when he commanded a body of Cretan mercenaries during the expedition of Antiochus into Illyricum (Polyb. x. 20). But in b.c. 192, when the Syrian king had determined upon war with Rome, and crossed over into Greece to commence it, Polyxenidas obtained the chief command of his fleet. After co-operating with Menippus in the reduction of Chalcis, he was sent back to Asia to assemble additional forces during the winter. We do not hear anything of his operations in the ensuing campaign, b.c. 191, but when Antiochus, after his defeat at Thermopylae, withdrew to Asia, Polyxenidas was again appointed to command the king's main fleet on the Ionian coast. Having learnt that the prae tor C. Livius was arrived at Delos with the Roman fleet, he strongly urged upon the king the expediency of giving him battle without delay, before he could unite his forces with those of Eumenes and the Rhodians. Though his advice was followed, it was too late to prevent the junction of Eumenes with Livius, but Pek, the king's captain, engaged the combined fleets off Corycus. The superiority of numbers, however, decided the victory in favour of the allies; thirteen ships of the Syrian fleet were taken and ten sunk, while Polyxenidas himself, with the remainder, took refuge in the port of Ephesus (Liv. xxxv. 50, xxxvi. 8, 41, 43–45; Appian, Syr. 14, 21, 22, 23). Here he spent the winter in active preparations for a renewal of the contest; and early in the next spring (b.c. 190), having learnt that Pausistratus, with the Rhodian fleet, had already put to sea, he conceived the idea of surprising him before he could unite his forces with those of Livius. For this purpose he pretended to enter into negotiations with him for the betrayal into his hands of the Syrian fleet, and having by this means deluded him into a fancied security, suddenly attacked him, and destroyed almost his whole fleet. After the loss of Samos to give battle to the fleet of the Roman admiral and Eumenes, but a storm prevented the engagement, and Polyxenidas withdrew to Ephesus. Soon after, Livius, having been reinforced by a fresh squadron of twenty Rhodian ships under Eumenes, proceeded in his turn to offer battle to Polyxenidas, but this the latter now declined. L. Aemilius Regillus, who soon after succeeded Livius in the command of the Roman fleet, also attempted without effect to draw Polyxenidas forth from the port of Ephesus: but at a later period in the season Eumenes, with his fleet, having been detached to the Hellespont while a considerable part of the Roman forces were detained in Lydia, the Syrian admiral seized the opportunity and sailed out to attack the Roman fleet. The action took place near My Waters near Teos, but terminated in the total defeat of Polyxenidas, who lost forty-two of his ships, and made a hasty retreat with the remainder to Ephesus. Here he remained until he received the tidings of the fatal battle of Magnesia, on which he sailed to Patara in Lydia, and from whence proceeded by land to join Antiochus in Syria. (Liv. xxxvii. 8, 10, 11, 13, 16, 26, 28—30, 45; Appian, Syr. 24, 25, 27.) After this his name is not again mentioned.

[E. H. B.]

POLYXENUS (Πολύξενος), a son of Agasthenes, grandson of Augens, and father of Ambichus, was the commander of the Epeians in the war against Troy. (Hom. II. ii. 623; Paus. v. 3. § 4.) There are three other mythical personages of this name, one a king of Eleusis (Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 154), the second a king of Elis (Apollod. ii. 4. § 6), and the third a son of Jason and Medea. (Paus. iii. 21. § 7.)

POLYXENUS (Πολύξενος). 1. A Symmacean of noble birth, whose sister was married to the illustrious Hermocrates. When Dionysius, after his elevation to the despotism of his native country b. c. 406, became desirous to strengthen himself by connection with noble families, he gave his sister in marriage to Polyxenus at the same time that he himself married the daughter of Hermocrates (Diod. xiii. 96). From this time we find Polyxenus closely attached to the fortunes of the tyrant. During the rebellion of the Symmaceans in b. c. 404, which threatened to overthrow the power of Dionysius, his brother-in-law was one of those who assisted him with their counsels; and again, in b. c. 395, when the Carthaginians were preparing to form the siege of Syracuse, Polyxenus was despatched to implore assistance from the Italian Greeks, as well as from the Corinthians and Lacedaemonians. This object was achieved, and returned to Sicily with a fleet of thirty ships furnished by the allies, and commanded by the Lacedaemonian Pharridas; a reinforcement which contributed essentially to the liberation of Syracuse. (Id. xiv. 8, 62, 63.)

2. A native of Taorminen in Sicily, who was sent as ambassador by his fellow-citizens to Nico- demus, the tyrant of Centoripe. (Timaeus, ap. Athen. xi. p. 471, l.) [E. H. B.]

POLYXO (Πολύξω). 1. A nymph married to Danaus. (Apollod. ii. § 5.)

2. The wife of Nycteus and mother of Antiope. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1.)

3. One of the Hyades. (Hygin. Fab. 162.)

4. The nurse of queen Hypsiyle in Lemnos, who was celebrated as a prophetess. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 608; Val. Flacc. iii. 316; Hygin. Fab. 15.)

5. An Argive woman, who was married to Telephorus. (Paus. iii. 16. § 10.) [L. S.]

POMPEIA.

(De L. L. vii. 45) that a special priest, under the name of flamen Pomonalis, was appointed to attend to her service (comp. Plin. H. N. xxii. 1). It is not impossible that Pomona may in reality be nothing but the personification of one of the attributes of Venus. (Hartung, Die Relig. d. Röm. vol. iii. p. 159, &c.)

POMPAE/DIUS SILO. [Silo.]

POMPEIA. 1. The daughter of Q. Pompeius, consul b.c. 141 [Pompeius, No. 3], married C. Siciiobus. (Cic. Brut. 76.)

2. The daughter of Q. Pompeius Rufus, son of the consul of b.c. 88 [Pompeius, No. 8], and of Cornelia, the daughter of the dictator Sulla. She married C. Caesar, subsequently the dictator, in b.c. 67, but was divorced by him in b.c. 61, because she was suspected of intriguing with Clodius, who stealthily introduced himself into her husband's house while she was celebrating the mysteries of the Bona Dea. (Suet. Caes. 6; Plut. Caes. 5, 10; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 45.)

3. The sister of the triumvir, married C. Memmius, who commanded in Sicily under her brother, in b.c. 61, and went as his quaeceptor into Spain, in the war against Sertorius, in which he was killed, b.c. 75. (Plut. Pomp. 11, Sert. 21; Cic. pro Balb. 2; Oros. v. 23.)

4. Daughter of the triumvir by his third wife Mnacia. When her father, in b.c. 59, married Julia, the daughter of Julius Caesar, she was promised to Servilius Caepio, to whom Julia had been already betrothed. She did not, however, marry Caepio, but Faustus Sulla, the son of the dictator, to whom she had likewise been previously betrothed. Her husband perished in the African war, b.c. 46, and she and her children fell into the hands of Caesar, who, however, dismissed them in safety. (Plut. Caes. 14, Pomp. 47; Dion Cass. xiii. 13; Auct. Bell. Afric. 85.) She subsequently married L. Cornelius Cinna, and her son by this marriage, Cn. Cinna Magnus, entered into a conspiracy against Augustus (Dion Cass. iv. 14; Senee. de Caem. i. 9.) She was with her brother Sextus in Sicily for some time, and she there made presents to the young Tiberius, subsequently emperor, when his parents fled for refuge to the island. (Suet. Tib. 6.) As her brother Sextus survived her, she must have died before b.c. 35. (Senee. Consol. ad Poilg. 34.)

5. Daughter of Sex. Pompeius Magnus, the son of the triumvir and of Scribonia. At the peace of Misenum in b.c. 39 she was betrothed to M. Claudius Marcellus, the son of Octavia, the sister of Octavian, but was never married to him. She accompanied her father in his flight to Asia, b.c. 36. (Appian, B. C. v. 73; Dion Cass. xlvii. 38, xlix. 11.) She is not mentioned after this time, but it has been conjectured by commentators, with much probability, that she may have married Scribonius Libo, and had by him a son, Scribonius Libo Drusus; since Tacitus (Ann. ii. 27) calls Pompeius, the triumvir, the praeuros of Libo Drusus; Scribonia, the wife of Augustus, his anita; and the two young Caesars his consobrini. The descent of Libo Drusus would then be, 1. Cn. Pompeius, the triumvir, praeuros. 2. Sex. Pompeius, anitas. 3. Pompeia, mater. 4. Libo Drusus.

6. Of uncertain origin, the wife of P. Vatinius, who was tribune, b.c. 59. She was still alive in b.c. 45. (Cic. ad Fam. v. 11.)

POMPEIA CELE.RINA, the mother-in-law of the younger Pliny, to whom one of his letters is addressed. (Ep. i. 4.)

POMPEIA MACRINA, descended from Pompeius Theophranes, was the daughter of Pompeius Macer, and was exiled by Tiberius a.d. 33. (Tac. Ann. vi. 18.)

POMPEIA PAULINA. [Paulina, No. 3.]

POMPEIA GENS, plebeian, is not mentioned till the second century before the Christian aera: the first member of it who obtained the consulship, Q. Pompeius, in b.c. 141, is described as a man of a humble and obscure origin (Cic. Ver. v. 70, pro Maren. 7, Brut. 25). It is expressly stated that there were two or three distinct families of the Pompei under the republic (Vell. Pat. ii. 21); and we can trace two, one of which was brought into celebrity by Q. Pompeius, the consul of b.c. 141, and the other is still better known as that to which the triumvir belonged. In the former family we find the surname of Refusia; in the latter, the father of the triumvir was distinguished by the personal cognomen of Strabo, and the triumvir himself gained that of Magnus, which he handed down to his children as an hereditary surname. Beside these cognomens we have the cognoment Faustulus as a surname of Sex. Pompeius, who is otherwise unknown, and Pius as a surname of Sextus, the son of Cn. Pompeius Magnus, to designate him as the avenger of his father and brother. (Eckel, vol. v. p. 230, &c.) But as all the members of these families are usually spoken of under their gentile name, and not under their cognomems, they are given below under POMPEIIUS. In addition to the cognomens already mentioned, we find many others, borne for the most part by freedmen or provincials, who had received the Roman franchise from the Pompeii: of these an alphabetical list is given below.

POMPEIANUS, son of Lucilia and Claudius Pompeianus. We are told by Spartianus that he was employed by Caracalla in the conduct of the most important wars, and was twice raised to the consulship, but his name does not appear in the Fasti. The same authority adds that he was put to death by the emperor, but in such a manner that he appeared to have perished by the hands of robbers. (Spartian. Caracall. 3.) [W. R.]

POMPEIANUS, TIB. CLAUDIUS, the son of a Roman knight originally from Antioch, rose to the highest dignities under M. Aurelius. He was one of the legates despatched to oppose the barbarian Ketls from beyond the Rhine, when they threatened to burst into Italy [PERTINAX]: he stands in the Fasti as consul for a.d. 173, was consequently probably in a.d. 176, and received in marriage Lucilla, the daughter of the emperor, before the regular period of mourning for her first husband L. Verus had expired. He was one of the trusty counsellors to whose charge the youthful Commodus was consigned, and one of the few who escaped the cruel persecution of that brutal savage, although he openly refused to countenance his follies, or to pander to his vices. During this unhappy period he passed his time chiefly in the country, excusing himself from appearing in public on account of age and weakness of sight. Pertinax, who had served under his command, treated him with the greatest kindness, and Didius Julianus is said to have invited him to quit his retirement at Tarracon, and to ascend the throne. Lampridius would lead us to suppose that he actually fell a victim to the cruelties of Commodus, but more trustworthy authorities represent him as having lived on to the reign of Severus. (Dion Cass. lxxi. 3, 20, lxxiii. 3; Herod. i. 8. § 6; Cap-

POMPEIANUS, CLAUDIUS QUINTIA-NUS, a young senator, husband of the daughter of Lucilla, was persuaded by his mother-in-law to tempt the life of Commodus, with whom he lived on terms of familiar intimacy, and having failed was put to death. (Dion Cass. lxxiv. 4, and note of Reimarus; Herod. i. 8; Lamprid. Commod. 4; Anm. Marc. xxix. 4.)

POMPEIUS. In the following account we give first the family of Q. Pompeius, consul b. c. 141, and next that of the triumvir. The lives of the various persons mentioned below are treated at length by Drumm (Geschichte Roms, vol. iv.
p. 306, &c.), to whom we refer our readers once for all. The Stemma on the opposite page is taken from Drumm, and is in some parts conjectural.

1. L. POMPEIUS, tribune of the soldiers, b. c.
171, in the army of the consul P. Crassus, when the latter was carrying on war against Perseus, king of Macedonia (Liv. xiii. 66).

2. A. POMPEIUS, is said to have been a flute-player, a report probably invented by the aristoctracy for the purpose of degrading his son, a novus

3. Q. POMPEIUS, A. F., the son of the preceding [No. 2], was of humble origin; but we know nothing of his early career, nor of the means by which he first came into public notice. Since, however, Cicero speaks of him (Brut. 25) as no mean orator, distinction in oratory may have paved the road to it for so many other Romans leading to the higher offices of the state. He was consul
b. c. 141 with Cn. Servilius Caepio, and gained his election in opposition to Lælius by assuring Scipio that he did not intend to become a candidate for the office, and then entering upon a vigorous canvas after he had thus thrown the friends of Lælius off their guard. Scipio had previously been on friendly terms with Pompeius, but now renounced all further connection with him. (Plut.
l. c.; Cic. Lael. 21.) Pompeius in his consulship was sent into nearer Spain as the successor of Q.
Metellus (Val. Max. ix. 3. § 7), and not of Fabius Maximus Servilianus, who commanded in further Spain (Appian, Hisp. 63). Pompeius was unsuccessful in Spain: he experienced several defeats from the enemy, and in vain laid siege to Nu-manita. His troops, which he kept encamped before the walls of this town during the winter, perished in great numbers through the cold and disease; and, accordingly, fearing that the aristocracy would call him to account on his return to Rome, he proposed to the Numantines terms of peace. He required from them publicly an unconditional surrender; but in private only demanded from them hostages, the captives and desters, and also thirty talents. The Numantines, who were weary of the war, gladly purchased peace on these conditions, and immediately paid part of the money; but on the arrival of M. Popil-lus Laenas in Spain shortly afterwards (b. c. 139), as the successor of Pompeius, the latter, who was now released from the responsibility of the war, had the effrontery to disown the treaty, although it had been witnessed by the officers of his own army.

Laenas referred the matter to the senate, to which the Numantine legates accordingly repaired.
Pompeius persisted in the same lie; the senate declared the treaty invalid; and the war was accordingly renewed. Pompeius escaped all punishment for this conduct in relation to the treaty: he was, however, accused shortly afterwards of extortion in his province, but was fortunate enough to obtain an acquittal, although some of the most eminent men at Rome, such as Q. Metellus Macedonicus and L. Metellus Calvis, bore witness against him.
(Val. Max. viii. 5. § 1; Cic. pro Font. 7.) His wants of success in Spain did not lose him the favour of the people, for he was elected censor in
b. c. 121 with Q. Metellus Macedonicus, the first time that he had carried his candidature from the plebs.
(Appian, Hisp. 76—79; Liv. Epit. 54, 59; Oros.
iv. 4; Cic. de Off. iii. 30, de Fin. ii. 17.)

4. POMPEIUS, is mentioned as one of the Opponents of Tit. Gracchus in b. c. 133: he stated that, as he lived near Gracchus, he knew that Eudemus of Pergamus had given a diadem out of the royal treasures and a purple robe to Gracchus, and he also promised to accuse the latter as soon as his year of office as tribune had expired. (Plint.
Tib. Gracch. 14; Oros. v. 8.) Drumm makes this Pompeius the son of No. 3, and likewise tribune of the plebs for b. c. 132; but although neither of these suppositions is impossible, there is still no authority for them. It is not impossible that this Pompeius is the same as the preceding;
and as the latter very likely possessed public land,
he would be ready enough to oppose Gracchus,
although he had previously belonged to the popular party. We have likewise seen from his conduct in the Numantine war that he had no great regard for the consulship.

5. POMPEIA, daughter of No. 3, married C.
Sicinius. [Pompeia, No. 1.]

6. Q. POMPEIUS Q. F. RUFUS, either son or grandson of No. 3, was a zealous supporter of the aristocratical party. In his tribunate of the plebs,
b. c. 100, he brought forward a bill, in conjunction with his colleague L. Cato, for the recall of Metellus Macedonicus from banishment (Oros. v. 17.)
He was prætor b. c. 91 (Cic. de Oraf. i. 37), and senatus, b. c. 88, with L. Sulla. In the latter year the civil war broke out between Marius and Sulla respecting the command of the Mithridatic war.
The history of these events is related in the life of Marius [p. 957]; and it is only necessary to mention here that the tribune P. Sulpicius Rufus, who was the great agent of Marius, had previously been the personal friend of Pompeius; but such was the exasperation of political feeling, that Sulpicius had recourse to arms against his former friend in order to carry his measure for incorporating the new citizens among the old tribes. In the riots which ensued, the young son of Pompeius was murdered.
Pompeius himself was deprived of his consulship and fled to Nola, where Sulla had a powerful army.
At the head of these troops the two consuls speedily returned to Rome, and proscribed Marius and his leading partizans. Sulla them set out for the East to conduct the war against Mithridates, leaving Italy in charge of Pompeius.
To the latter was assigned the army of Cn.
Pompeius Strabo, who was still engaged in carrying on war against the Marsi; but Strabo, who was unwilling to be deprived of the command, caused Pompeius Rufus to be murdered by the soldiers.

shortly after his arrival in the camp, having previously received him without opposition. [See below, No. 21.] Cicero mentions Pompeius Rufus among the orators whom he had heard in his youth; his orations were written or corrected by L. Aelius. (Appian, B. C. i. 55—57, 63; Vell. Pat. ii. 20; Liv. Epit. 77; Plut. Sull. 8; Cic. Lael. i. pro Cluent. 5, Brut. 56, 89.)

7. A Pompeius, tribune of the plebs, n. c. 102, may perhaps have been a younger son of No. 4. (Plut. Mar. 17.)

8. Q. Pompeius Rufus, son of No. 6, married Sulla’s daughter, and was murdered by the party of Sulpius and Marius in the forum in b. c. 60 (Appian, B. C. i. 56; Plut. Sull. 6).

9. Q. Pompeius Rufus, son of No. 8, and grand-son of the dictator Sulla, first appears in public in b. c. 54 as the accuser of M. Messalla, because he had gained his election to the censorship by bribery. [MessALLA, No. 7.] b. c. 52, and not b. c. 53, as Dion Cassius states (xl. 45). In his tribuniship he distinguished himself as the great partisan of the triumvir Pompey. The latter londered for the dictatorship, and therefore secretly fomented the disturbances at Rome, in hopes that all parties tired of anarchy would willingly throw themselves into his arms. Rufus supported his views, and to increase the confusion would not allow any of the elections to be held. There seemed an end of all government. The senate apprehended Rufus and cast him into prison, notwithstanding his sacred character as tribune; but this act of violence only strengthened his power and influence. He retaliated by throwing into prison one of the most active supporters of the senatorial party, the aedile Favonius. The murder of Clodius by Milo on the 20th of January still further favoured the views of the triumvir; Rufus and his colleague Munatius Plancus added fuel to the fire, and omitted no means for increasing the wrath of the people. Pompey was appointed sole consul; the laws which he proposed were supported by Rufus and his party, and Milo was condemned. But he had no sooner laid down his office of tribune, on the 10th of December in this year, than he was accused by one of his late colleagues, M. Caecilius, of violating the very law De Vi, which he had taken so active a part in passing. He was condemned, and lived in exile at Baal in Campania. Here he was in great pecuniary difficulties, till M. Caecilius, who had accused him, generously compelled his mother Cornelia to surrender to him his paternal property. The last time that Rufus is mentioned is in b. c. 51, when his enemies spread the false report that he had murdered Cicero on his journey to Cilicia. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. iii. 2. § 3, ad Att. iv. 16. § 9; Dion Cass. xl. 45, 49, 55; Ascon. in Cic. Milon. passim; Caecilius, ad Fam. viii. 1. § 4; Val. Max. iv. 2. § 8.)

10. Pompeia, daughter of No. 8. [Pompeia, No. 2.]

11. Q. Pompeius Bithynicus, probably son of No. 7. [Bithynicus, No. 1.]

12. A. Pompeius Bithynicus, son of No. 11. [Bithynicus, No. 2.]

13. Q. Pompeius Rufus, prætor b. c. 63. His cognomens show that he belonged to the preceding family, but his descent is quite uncertain. In his praetorship he was sent to Capua, where he remained part of the following year, because it was feared that the slaves in Campania and Apulia might rise in support of Catiline. In b. c. 61 he obtained the province of Africa, with the title of proconsul, which he governed with great integrity, according to Cicero. He did not, however, succeed in obtaining the consulship, although he was alive some years afterwards, for we find him bearing witness in b. c. 56 in behalf of M. Caecilius, who had been with him in Africa. (Sull. Cat. 30; Cic. pro Caet. 30.)

14. CN. Pompeius, only known from the Fasti Capitolini, as the grandfather of No. 21.

15. Sex. Pompeius, son of the preceding, married Lucullia, a sister of the poet C. Lucilius, who was therefore the grandmother, and not the mother of the triumvir, as is stated by Velleius Paterculus (ii. 29), and many modern writers.

16. Sex. Pompeius Sex. f. Cn. n., was the son of No. 15, and we may conclude from his praenomen that he was the son of the b. c. 56 Pompeius. He never obtained any of the higher offices of the state, but acquired great reputation as a man of learning, and is praised by Cicero for his accurate knowledge of jurisprudence, geometry, and the Stoic philosophy. He was present on one occasion in the camp of his brother Strabo during the Social war, b. c. 89, but this is the only time in which his name occurs in public affairs. (Cic. Brut. 47, Philipp. xii, 11; De Orat. i. 15, iii. 21, De Off. i. 6.)

17. Sex. Pompeius, son of No. 16, only known as the father of No. 19.

18. Q. Pompeius Sex. f., probably younger son of No. 16, is recommended by Cicero in a letter, of which we do not know the date, to one Curius, proconsul of some province (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 49).

19. Sex. Pompeius Sex. f., son of No. 17, was consul b. c. 53, with L. Cornificius, in which year Sex. Pompeius, the son of the triumvir, was killed (Dion Cass. lxi. 29; Tac. Ann. 117; Vell. Pat. ii. 123). Sex Pompeius seems to have been a patron of literature. Ovid addressed him several letters during his exile (ex Pont. iv. 1. 4, 5, 15); and it was probably this same Sex. Pompeius, whom the writer Valerius Maximus accompanied to Asia, and of whom he speaks as his Alexander. (Val. Max. ii. 6. § 3, iv. 7. extern. § 2.)

20. Sex. Pompeius Sex. f., son of No. 19, was consul b. c. 14, with Sex. Appuleius, in which year the emperor Augustus died. These consuls were the first to render homage to Tiberius (Dion Cass. lxi. 29; Tac. Ann. i. 7; Suet. Aug. 100; Vell. Pat. ii. 123). Sex Pompeius seems to have been a patron of literature. Ovid addressed him several letters during his exile (ex Pont. iv. 1. 4, 5, 15); and it was probably this same Sex. Pompeius, whom the writer Valerius Maximus accompanied to Asia, and of whom he speaks as his Alexander. (Val. Max. ii. 6. § 3, iv. 7. extern. § 2.)

21. CN. Pompeius Sex. f. CN. n. Strabo, younger son of No. 15, and father of the triumvir. His surname Strabo, which signifies one who squints, and which occurs in several other Roman gentes, is said to have been first given to his cook, Menogenes, and then to have been applied to Pompeius himself, from his likeness to his slave (Plin. H. N. vii. 10. s. 12; Val. Max. ix. 14. § 2). Whether this be true or false, Pompeius at all events adopted the name; and it appears on his coins, and in the Fasti. All the ancient writers agree in giving this Pompeius a thoroughly bad character. His name is first mentioned in connection with a discreditable matter. He had been quaestor in Sardinia in b. c. 103, under the proconsul T. Albucius, against whom he collected materials for an accusation, although the Romans regarded the relation between praetor and quaestor as a sacred one, like that between father and...

son. For that reason he was not allowed to conduct the accusation, which was assigned to C. Caesar instead (Cic. Div. in Cam. 19). He was probably praetor in B.C. 94, and obtained in the following year the government of Sicily (Cic. Verr. iii. 16, v. 66). On the breaking out of the Social or Marseis war, in B.C. 90, Pompeius served as legate under the consul P. Rutulius Lupus. Pompeius was at first defeated, and obliged to take refuge at Firmum, where he was besieged by Afranius, one of the Italian generals. But when Sulpicius came to his assistance, Afranius was attacked at once by the two Roman armies, and lost his life in the battle; his troops fled in confusion to Asculum. To this town Pompeius proceeded to lay siege; and as he seems to have been regarded as a general of no mean abilities, he was elected to the consulship, B.C. 89, with L. Poppicius Cato. Soon after entering upon his consulsip, he defeated the Italians on the east coast, who, ignorant that the Etruscans had made terms with the Romans, were marching to their assistance. He followed up this victory by others, and defeated, in succession, the Marsi, Marrucini, and Vestini. He at length took Asculum, and subdued the Picentes, and returned to Rome at the end of the year, which he entered in triumph on the 27th of December. Before he laid down his consulsip, he probably brought forward the law (lex Pompeia), which gave to all the towns of the Transpadane the Jus Latini or Latinitas.

In the following year, B.C. 95, occurred the dreadful struggle between Marius and Sulla for the command of the Mithridatic war, which ended in the proscription of Marius, and his flight from Italy. Strabo had returned to his army, and was engaged in southern Italy in completing the subjugation of the Italians, when he learnt that the senate had deprived him of the command, and had assigned his army to the consul Q. Pompeius Rufus, to whom the care of Italy was entrusted, while his colleague Sulla was engaged in the Mithridatic war. But Strabo, who was excessively fond of power, was indignant at this decision. He however concealed his resentment and handed over the army to Rufus; but at the same time he secretly instigated the soldiers to murder their new commander, which they accordingly did shortly afterwards. He affected great horror of the crime, but took no steps to bring the perpetrators to justice; and Sulla, who was on the point of starting for the East, was obliged to overlook the murder.

Next year, B.C. 87, the Marian party obtained the upper hand. L. Cinna, who had been driven out of the city by his colleague Cn. Octavius, had collected a formidable army, and being joined by Marius, advanced against Rome. The aristocracy summoned Pompeius Strabo to their aid; but as he commanded against their wish, and had been refused a second consulsip this year, he was unwilling to espouse their side. Still, not being prepared to join the other party, he advanced by slow marches to the relief of the city, and, contrary to his wishes, was obliged to fight near the Colline Gate with Cinna and Sertorius. The battle was not decisive, but Strabo was unable to play any longer a neutral part. Cinna attempted to remove him from the command, but he, on the contrary, made the energy and prudence of his son, who also quelled a dangerous mutiny among the soldiers. Shortly after these events, and in the course of the same year, B.C. 87, Strabo was killed by lightning. His avarice and cruelty had made him hated by the soldiers to such a degree, that they tore his corpse from the bier and dragged it through the streets. Cicero describes him (Brut. 47) as "worthy of hatred on account of his cruelty, avarice, and perfidy." He possessed some reputation as an orator, and still more as a general. He left behind him a considerable property, especially in Picenum; and his anxiety to protect his estates probably led him to make that neighbourhood one of the principal seats of the war against the Italians (Appian, B.C. i. 40, 47, 52, 66—68, 80; Liv. Epit. 74—79; Vell. Pat. ii. 20, 21; Flor. iii. 18; Oros. vi. 18; Plut. Pomp. 1, 3; Cic. Philipp. xii. 11.)

22. Cn. POMPEIUS MAGNUS, the son of No. 21, and afterwards the triumvir, was born on the 30th of September, B.C. 106, in the consulsip of Attius Serranus and Servilius Caepio. He was consequently a few months younger than Cicero, who was born on the 3d of January in this year, and six years older than Caesar. He had scarcely left school before he was summoned to serve under his father in the Social war. He fought under him in B.C. 89 against the Italians, when he was only seventeen years of age, and continued with him till his death two years afterwards. He was present at the battle of the Colline Gate, in B.C. 97, and, as has been already related, he saved the life of his father, and quelled an insurrection of the soldiers by his courage and activity. The death of his father soon after this event left Pompey his own master at the age of nineteen. The aristocratical party were no longer able to offer any opposition to Marius and Cinna, who accordingly entered Rome shortly afterwards, and took a bloody revenge on their opponents. Pompey's house was plundered; and he did not venture to appear in public till after the death of Marius in the following year, B.C. 86. His enemies, however, immediately accused him of having shared with his father in the plunder of Asculum. Not trusting either to the justice of his cause, or to the eloquence of his advocates, L. Marciius Philippus and Q. Hortensius, he agreed to marry the daughter of the praetor Antistius, who presided at the trial, and was in consequence acquitted.

In B.C. 84, the Marian party made great preparations to oppose Sulla, who had now finished the Mithridatic war, and was on his way to Italy. Pompey, though so young, was fired with the ambition of distinguishing himself above all the other leaders of the aristocracy; and while the rest were content to wait quietly for Sulla's arrival in Italy to deliver them from their enemies, Pompey resolved to share with Sulla the glory of crushing the Marian party. He accordingly fled from the camp of Cinna shortly before the latter was murdered, and hastened to Picenum, where he proceeded to levy troops without holding any public office, and without any authority from the senate or people. The influence which he possessed by his large estates in Picenum, and by his personal popularity, enabled him to raise an army of three legions by the beginning of the following year, B.C. 83. He assembled the command at Auxinum, a town in the north of Picenum, not far from Arona; and while the rest of the aristocracy hastened to join Sulla, who had landed at Brundisium, Pompey was anxious to distinguish himself by some brilliant success over the enemy. The faults of the Marian generals gave him the wished-for opportunity; he was surrounded by three armies, commanded respectively by M. Brutus, C. Caecilius Calenus, and C. Cærinas, whose great object seems to have been to prevent his escape to Sulla. Pompey now displayed for the first time the great military abilities for which he became afterwards so conspicuous; he concentrated all his forces in one spot, and then fell upon M. Brutus at a time when he could receive no assistance from the other generals, and completely defeated him. Pompey also distinguished himself by his personal bravery in this engagement, charging at the head of his cavalry, and striking down a Celtic horseman with his own hand. The Marian generals, after the loss of this battle, quarrelled among themselves, and withdrew from the country. Pompey, who had no longer an enemy to oppose him, set out to join Sulla, and was hailed as a deliverer by the towns of Picenum, who had now no other alternative but submission. He was proscripted by the senate, but his troops proved faithful to him, and he joined Sulla in safety, having already gained for himself a brilliant reputation. He was received by Sulla with still greater distinction than he had anticipated; for when he leapt down from his horse, and saluted Sulla by the title of Imperator, the latter returned the compliment by addressing him by the same title. Pompey was only twenty-three, and had not held any public office when he received this unprecedented mark of honour.

Next year, b.c. 82, the war was prosecuted with vigour against the Marian party. Pompey took a prominent part in it as one of Sulla's legates, and by his success gained still further distinction. The younger Marius, who was now consul, was blockaded in Praeneste, and his colleague, Carbo, was making every effort to relieve him. Sulla himself fought an indecisive battle against Carbo; but his legates, Marius and Cærinus, were defeated by Pompey. Carbo then retreated to Ariminum, and sent Marius to the relief of Praeneste; but Pompey overtook the latter again in the Apennines, and compelled him to retire. Despairing of success, Carbo then abandoned Marius to his fate, and set sail for Africa. Praeneste shortly afterwards surrendered. Sulla thus became the master of Italy, and was proclaimed dictator. He then proceeded to reward his partisans, and to take vengeance on his enemies; and in order to connect Pompey more closely with himself, he compelled him to marry his step-daughter Aemilia, the daughter of his wife Caecilia Metella, by her former husband Aemilius Scaurus. To effect this marriage two divorces had to take place: Pompey was obliged to put away his wife Antiata, though her father had been murdered by Marius as a partizan of Sulla, simply on account of his connexion with Pompey; and Aemilia was obliged to leave her husband M. Glabrio, although she was pregnant at the time. Aemilia died shortly afterwards in child-birth.

But although the war in Italy was brought to a close, the Marian party still held out in other parts of Europe; and Pompey, who was now regarded as one of the principal leaders of the aristocracy, was sent against them by Sulla. He first proceeded to Sicily, to which island Carbo had crossed over from Africa, but here met with no opposition; as soon as he landed, Carbo fled from the island, intending to take refuge in Egypt, but he was seized and brought in chains to Pompey, at Lilybaeum, who put him to death, and sent his head to Sulla. He likewise executed several others of the Marian party; but he can scarcely be reproached with cruelty for so doing, as he had no other alternative, even if he had wished to save them; and he treated the cities which had espoused the popular side with greater leniency than might have been expected. Next year, b.c. 81, Pompey left Sicily, and passed over to Africa, in order to oppose Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, the son-in-law of Cinna, who, with the assistance of Hiætâs, had collected a formidable army. But his troops, chiefly consisting of Numidians, were no match for the veterans who had conquered the well-disciplined Italian allies. Still they fought with great bravery, and out of 20,000 only 3000 are said to have survived the decisive battle. Their camp was taken, and Domitius fell. In a few months Pompey reduced the whole of Numidia; Hiætâs was taken prisoner and put to death, and his throne was given to Himætæ. But it was not only his military achievements that gained him great renown at Rome; unlike other Roman governors, he abstained from plundering the province, which seemed the more extraordinary, since the disturbed state of the country afforded him particular facilities for doing so. Intent upon triumphing, he collected a great number of elephants and lions in Numidia, and returned to Rome, in the same year, covered with glory. As he approached Rome, numbers flocked out of the city to meet him; and the dictator himself, who formed one of the crowd, greeted him with the surname of Magnus, which he bore ever afterwards, and handed down to his children.* But Pompey did not find it easy to obtain his wished-for triumph. Hitherto no one but a dictator, consul, or praetor, had enjoyed this distinction, and it seemed a monstrous thing for a simple equus, who had not yet obtained a place in the senate, to covet this honour. Sulla at first tried to dissuade Pompey from pressing his request; and as he would not relinquish his design, the matter was referred to the senate, and there Sulla positively opposed it. Pompey was not, however, to be cowed, and uttered a threat about the rising and the setting sun; whereupon Sulla, indignant at his impudence, shouted out contemptuously, "Let him triumph then!" It is true that Sulla's dominion was too firmly established to be overthrown by Pompey; but he probably could not have put him down without a struggle, and therefore thought it better to let him have his own way. Pompey therefore entered Rome in triumph as a simple equus in the month of September b.c. 81, and before he had completed his twenty-fifth year. Pompey's conduct in insisting upon a triumph on this occasion has been represented by many modern writers as vain and childish; but it should be recollected that it was a vanity which all distinguished Romans shared, and that to enter Rome drawn in

* There can be little doubt that this surname was given to Pompey on this occasion, though many writers assign it to a different time. The question is discussed at length by Drummæ, vol. iv. p. 335. Pompey did not use it himself till he was appointed to the command of the war against Sertorius (Plut. Pompe. 13).

Having thus succeeded in carrying his point against the dictator Pompey again exhibited his power in promoting in B.C. 79 the election of M. Aemilius Lepidus to the consularship, in opposition to the wishes of Sulla. Through Pompey's influence Lepidus was not only elected, but obtained a greater number of votes than his colleague Q. Catulus, who was supported by Sulla. The latter had now retired from public affairs, and would not relinquish his Epicurean enjoyments for the purpose of defeating Pompey's plans, but contented himself with warning the latter, as he met him returning from the comitia in triumph, "Young man, it is time for you not to slumber, for you have strengthened your rival against yourself."

The words of Sulla were prophetic; for upon his death, which happened in the course of the same year, Lepidus attempted to repeal the laws of Sulla, and to destroy the aristocratic constitution which he had established. He seems to have reckoned upon the support of Pompey; but in this he was disappointed, for Pompey remained faithful to the aristocracy, and thus saved his party. During the year of the consulsipship of Lepidus and Catulus, B.C. 79, a small war with Africa preserved [LEPIDUS, No. 13]; but at the beginning of the following year B.C. 77, Lepidus, who had been ordered by the senate to repair to his province of Further Gaul, marched against Rome at the head of an army, which he had collected in Etruria. Here Pompey and Catulus were ready to receive him; and in the battle which followed under the walls of the city, Lepidus was defeated and obliged to take to flight. While Catulus followed him into Etruria, Pompey marched into Cisalpine Gaul, where M. Brutus, the father of the so-called tyrannicide, commanded a body of troops on behalf of Lepidus. On Pompey's approach Brutus threw himself into Mutina, which he defended for some time, but at length surrendered the town to Pompey, on condition that his life should be spared. This was granted by Pompey; but next day he was murdered, by Pompey's orders, at Rhegium, a small town on the Po, which he had retired after the surrender of Mutina. Pompey was much blamed for this cruel and perfidious act, which was however more in accordance with the spirit of his party than his own general conduct. But he seems to have acted now in accordance with Sulla's principles; for he likewise put to death Cornelsus Scipio Aemilianus, the son of Lepidus, whom he took prisoner at Alba in Liguria. The war in Italy was now at an end; for Lepidus, despairing of holding his ground in Etruria, had sailed with the remainder of his forces to Sardinia, where he died shortly afterwards.

The senate, who now began to dread Pompey, ordered him to disband his army; but he found various excuses for evading this command, as he was anxious to obtain the command of the war against Sertorius in Spain. Sertorius was the only surviving general of the Marian party, who still continued to hold out against the aristocracy. By his extraordinary genius and abilities he had won the hearts of the Spaniards, and had for the last three years successfully opposed Metellus Pius, one of the ablest of Sulla's generals [SERTORIUS]. The misfortunes of Metellus only increased Pompey's eagerness to gain laurels, where a veteran general had met with nothing but disasters; and he therefore still continued at the head of his army in the neighbourhood of Rome. The senate, however, hesitated to give him this opportunity for gaining fresh distinction and additional power; but as Sertorius was now joined by Perperna, and was daily becoming more formidable, it became necessary to prepare to strengthen Metellus; and as they had no general except Pompey, who was either competent or willing to conduct the war against Sertorius, they at length unwillingly determined to send him to Spain, with the title of Proconsul, and with equal powers to Metellus. In the debate in the senate which ended in his appointment, it was urged that no private man ought to receive the title of Proconsul, whereupon L. Philippus replied with bitter scorn, in allusion to the insignificance of the existing consuls, "Non ego illum men sententia pro consule, sed pro consulibus mittor."

In forty days Pompey completed his preparations, and left Italy with an army of 30,000 foot and 1000 horse, at the beginning of B.C. 76, being then thirty years of age. He crossed the Alps between the sources of the Rhone and the Po, and advanced towards the southern coast of Spain. The Spanish tribes, through which he marched, did not offer him much resistance, and the town of Lauron (not far from Valencia) declared in his favour. But the approach of Sertorius quickly changed the face of matters, and taught Pompey that he had a more formidable enemy to deal with than any he had yet encountered. His army was suddenly surprised by Sertorius, and he was obliged to retreat with the loss of a legion. Sertorius followed up his victory by taking the town of Lauron, which he committed to the flames, almost before Pompey's face. Thus his first campaign in Spain ended ingloriously. He passed the winter in the Nearer Province, and at the beginning of B.C. 75 crossed the Iberus, and again marched southward against C. Herennius and Perperna, the legates of Sertorius. These he defeated, with great loss, near Valencia; and elated with his success, and anxious to wipe off the disgrace of the preceding year, he hastened to attack the tributaries, hoping to crush him entirely before Metellus arrived to share the glory with him. Sertorius, who had advanced from the west, was equally eager to fight before the junction of the two Roman armies. The battle, thus eagerly desired by both generals, was fought on the banks of the Sucro (Xucar). It was obstinately contested, but was not decisive. The right wing, where Pompey commanded in person, was put to flight by Sertorius, and Pompey himself was nearly killed in the pursuit; his left wing, however, which was under the command of his legate L. Afranius, drove the right wing of Sertorius's army off the field, and took his camp. Night put an end to the battle; and the approach of Metellus on the following day obliged Sertorius to retire. Pompey and Metellus then continued together for a time, but were reduced to great straits for want of provisions, and were frequently obliged to separate in order to obtain food and fodder. On one of these occasions they were attacked at the same time, Pompey by Sertorius, and Metellus by Perperna; Metellus defeated the latter with a loss of 5000 men, but Pompey was routed by Sertorius, and lost 6000 of his troops. Shortly after this Pompey retired, for the winter, to the country of the Vaeclaei, whence he wrote to the senate, in the most earnest terms, for a further supply of troops and corn, threatening to quit Spain if he did not receive them, as he was resolved to continue the war no longer at his own expense. His demands were complied with, and two legions were sent to his assistance; for the consul L. Lucullus, who then had great influence with the senate, feared that Pompey might execute his threat of returning to Italy, and then deprive him of the command of the Mithridatic war.

Of the campaigns of the next three years (B.C. 74-72) we have little information; but Sertorius, who had lost some of his influence by the Spanish tribune's law, could not prevent an object of jealousy of Pompey being given to M. Perperna and his principal Roman officers, was unable to prosecute the war with the same vigour as he had done during the two preceding years. Pompey accordingly gained some advantages over him, but the war was still far from a close; and the genius of Sertorius would probably have soon given a very different aspect to affairs, had he not been assassinated by Perperna in B.C. 72. [SERTORIUS.] Perperna had flattered himself that he should succeed to the power of Sertorius; but he soon found that he had murdered the only man who was able to save him from ruin and death. In his first battle with Pompey, he was completely defeated, his principal officers slain, and himself taken prisoner. Anxious to save his life he offered to deliver up to Pompey the papers of Sertorius, which contained letters from many of the leading men at Rome, inviting "Sertorius to Italy, and expressing a desire to change the constitution on which Sulla had established." But Pompey refused to see him, and commanded him to be put to death, and the letters to be burnt; the latter was an act of prudence for which Pompey deserves no small praise. The war was now virtually at an end; and the remainder of the year was employed in subduing the towns which had compromised themselves too far to hope for forgiveness, and which accordingly still held out against Pompey. By the winter the greater part of Spain was reduced to obedience; and some of the Spaniards, who had distinguished themselves by their support of the troops of the republic, were rewarded by Pompey with the Roman franchise. Among those who received this honour was L. Cornelius Balbus, whose cause Cicero subsequently pleaded in an oration that has come down to us. [BALBUS.] Metellus had taken no part in the final struggle with Perperna, and returned to Italy before Pompey. The latter obtained the credit of bringing the war to a conclusion, and of making, in conjunction with commissioners from the senate, the final arrangements for settling the affairs of the conquered country. His reputation, which had been a little dimmed by the long continuance of the war, now burst forth more brightly than ever; and the people longed for his return, that he might deliver Italy from Spartacus and his horde of gladiators, who had defeated the consuls, and were in possession of a great part of the country.

In B.C. 71 Pompey returned to Italy at the head of his army. Crassus, who had now the conduct of the war against Spartacus, hastened to bring it to a conclusion before the arrival of Pompey, who feared might rob him of the laurels of the campaign. He accordingly fought a decisive battle with Spartacus in Lucania, in which the latter perished with a great part of his troops; but Pompey was fortunate enough to fall in with six thousand of the fugitives, who had rallied again, and whom he cut to pieces, and thereupon he wrote to the senate, "Crassus, indeed, has defeated the enemy, but I have extirpated the war by the roots." Thus he claimed for himself, in addition to all his other exploits, the glory of finishing the Servile war; and the people, who now idolized him, were only too willing to admit his claims. Crassus deeply felt the injustice that was done him, but he dared not show his resentment, as he was anxious for the advice of his colleague, and was reconciled with the emperor in obtaining it. Pompey himself had also declared himself a candidate for the same honour; and although he was ineligible by law, inasmuch as he was absent from Rome, had not yet reached the legal age, and had not held any of the lower offices of the state, still his election was certain. He had always been a personal favourite with the people; and during his long absence from Italy, they seemed to have forgotten that he had been one of Sulla's principal generals, and only looked upon him as the great general, who had delivered Italy from an invasion of Spanish barbarians. In their eyes he no longer belonged to the aristocratic party, whose corruption and venality both as magistrates and judges had become intolerable. Pompey likewise was not ignorant that he was an object of jealousy and dislike to the leading members of the aristocracy, and that they would be ready enough to throw him on one side whenever an opportunity presented. He accordingly resolved to meet their expectations which the people had formed respecting him, and declared himself in favour of a restoration of the tribunician power, which had been abolished by Sulla. The senate dared not offer any resistance to his election; at the head of a powerful army, and backed by the popular enthusiasm, he could have played the part of Sulla, if he had chosen. The senate, therefore, thought it more prudent to release him from the laws, which disqualified him from the consulship; and he was accordingly elected without any open opposition along with M. Crassus, whom he had recommended to the people as his colleague. A triumph, of course, could not be refused him on account of his victories in Spain; and accordingly, on the 31st of December, B.C. 71, he entered the city a second time in his triumphal car, a simple eques.

On the 1st of January, B.C. 70, Pompey entered on the consulship with M. Crassus. One of his first acts was to redeem the pledge he had given to the people, by bringing forward a law for the restoration of the tribunician power. Sulla had allowed the tribunical office to continue, but had deprived it of the greater part of its power; and there was no object for which the people were so eager as its restoration in its former authority and with its ancient privileges. Modern writers have disputed whether its restoration was an injury or a benefit to the state; but such speculations are of little use, since it is certain, that the measure was inevitable, and that it was quite impossible to maintain the aristocratic constitution in the form in which it had been left by Sulla. It is probable enough that Pompey was chiefly induced by his love of popular favour to propose the law, but he may also have had the good sense to see, what the short-sightedness of the majority of the aristocracy blinded them to, that further opposition to the people would have been injurious to the interests of the aris-tocracj itself. The law was passed with little opposition; for the senate felt that it was worse than useless to contend against Pompey, supported as he was by the popular enthusiasm and by his troops, which were still in the immediate neighborhood of the city. Later in the same year Pompey also struck another blow at the aristocracy by lending his all-powerful aid to the repeal of another of Sulla's laws. From the time of C. Gracchus (b.c. 123) to that of Sulla (b.c. 80), the judices had been taken exclusively from the equestrian order; but by one of Sulla's laws they had been chosen during the last ten years from the senate. The corruption and venality of the latter in the administration of justice had excited such general indignation that some change was clamorously demanded by the people. Accordingly, the praetor L. Aurelius Cotta, with the approbation of Pompey, proposed a law by which the judices were to be taken in future from the senatus, equites, and tribuni aerarii, the latter probably representing the wealthier members of the third order in the state. (Comp. Madvig, De Tribunis aerariis, in Opuscula, vol. ii, p. 242, &c.) This law was likewise carried; but it did not improve the purity of the administration of justice, since corruption was not confined to the senators, but pervaded all classes of the community alike. In carrying both these measures Pompey was strongly supported by Caesar, with whom he was thus brought into close connection, and who, though he was rapidly rising in popular favour, could as yet only hope to weaken the power of the aristocracy through Pompey's means.

Pompey had thus broken with the aristocracy, and his power was now the great popular hero. On the expiration of his consulship he dismissed his army, which he no longer needed for the purpose of overawing the senate, and for the next two years (b.c. 69 and 68) he remained in Rome, as he had previously declared that he would not accept a province. Having had little or no experience in civil affairs, he prudently kept aloof during this time from all public matters, and appeared seldom in public, and then never without a large retinue, in order to keep up among the people the feelings of resp ectful admiration with which they had hitherto regarded him. Pompey did not possess the diversified talents of Caesar: he was only a soldier, but he showed no small good sense in abstaining from meddling with matters which he did not understand. But the ambition of the rich and presumptuous, which Pompey's means did not allow him to remain long in inactivity. The Mediterranean sea was at this time swarming with pirates. From the earliest times down to the present day piracy has more or less prevailed in this sea, which, lying as it does between three continents, and abounding with numerous creeks and islands, presents at the same time both the greatest temptations and the greatest facilities for piratical pursuits. Moreover, in consequence of the civil wars in which the Romans had been engaged, and the absence of any fleet to preserve order upon the sea, piracy had reached an alarming height. The pirates possessed fleets in all parts of the Mediterranean, were in the habit of plundering the most wealthy cities on the coasts, not only of Greece and of the islands, but even of Italy itself, and had at length carried their audacity so far as to make descents upon the Apulian road, and carry off Roman magistrates, with all their attendants and lictors. All communication between Rome and the provinces was cut off, or at least rendered extremely dangerous; the fleets of corn-vessels, upon which Rome to a great extent depended for its subsistence, could not reach the city, and the price of provisions in consequence rose enormously. Such a state of things had become intolerable, and all eyes were now directed to Pompey. He, however, was not willing to take any ordinary command, and the scarcity of provisions made the people ready to grant him any power he might ask. Still he was prudent enough not to ask in person for such extraordinary powers as he desired, and to appear only to yield to the earnest desires of the people. Accordingly, at the beginning of the year b.c. 67, he got the tribune A. Gabinius, a man of abandoned character, and whose services he had probably purchased, to bring forward a bill, which was intended to give Pompey almost absolute authority over the greater part of the Roman world. It proposed that the people should elect a man with consular rank, who should possess unlimited and irresponsible power for three years over the whole of the Mediterranean, and to a distance of fifty miles inland from its coasts,— who should have fifteen legates from the senate, a fleet of 200 ships, with as many soldiers and sailors as he thought necessary, and 6000 Attic talents. The bill did not name Pompey, but it was clear who was meant. The aristocracy were in the utmost alarm, for not only did they dread the ambition of Pompey, but they feared that he might interfere with many of their friends and relatives, who held provinces which would come under his imperium, and probably spoil their plans for making their fortunes by the plunder of the provincials. Accordingly, they resolved to offer the most vigorous opposition to the bill. In the senate Caesar was almost the only member of the senate who came forward in its support. Party-spirit ran to such a height that the most serious riots ensued. The aristocracy, headed by the consul C. Piso, made an attack upon Gabinius, who, in danger of his life, fled for refuge to the people; and they, in turn, led on by Gabinius, assaulted the senate-house, and would probably have sacrificed the consuls to their fury, had not Gabinius effected his rescue, dreading the odium which such a catastrophe would have occasioned. Even Pompey himself was threatened by the consul, "If you emulate Romulus, you will be the first of the Romulean race." With the day come for putting the bill to the vote, Pompey affected to be anxious for a little rest, and entreated the people to appoint another to the command, but this piece of hypocrisy deceived no one. Q. Catu-lus and Q. Hortensius spoke against the bill with great eloquence, but with no effect. Thereupon the tribune L. Trebellius, whom the aristocracy had gained over, placed his veto upon the voting; and as no threats nor entreaties could induce him to withdraw his opposition, Gabinius proposed that he should be deprived of his tribuneship.

Even then it was not till seventeen out of the thirty-five tribes had voted for its degradation, that Trebellius gave way, and withdrew his veto. It was now too late in the day to come to any decision, but on the following morning the bill was passed, and became a law. When Pompey appeared before the people and accepted the command, he was received with shouts of joy; and upon his asking for still greater means in order to bring the war to a conclusion, his requests were readily complied with. He now obtained 500 vessels, 120,000 sailors and foot-soldiers, 5000 horse-soldiers, 24 legates, and the power of taking such sums of money as he might think fit out of the public treasury. On the day that the bill was passed the price of provisions at Rome immediately fell: this was the people the most conclusive and decisive test given to the opinions of the aristocracy, and showed, at all events, the immense confidence which all parties placed in the military abilities of Pompey.

Pompey completed all his preparations by the end of the winter, and was ready to commence operations early in the spring. His plans were formed with great skill and judgment and were crowned with complete success. He stationed his legates with different squadrons in various parts of the Mediterranean to prevent the pirates from uniting, and to hunt them out of the various bays and creeks in which they concealed themselves; while, at the same time, he swept the middle of the sea with the main body of his fleet, and drove them eastwards. In forty days he cleared the western sea of pirates, and restored communication between Spain, Africa, and Italy. After then remaining a short time in Italy, he sailed from Brundisium; and on his way towards Cilicia, where the pirates had gathered in large numbers, he stopped at Athens, where he was received with divine honours. With the assistance of his legates he cleared the seas as he went along; and, in consequence of his treating mercifully the crews which fell into his power, numbers surrendered themselves to him, and it was chiefly through their means that he was able to track out the lurking places of those who still lay in concealment. The main body of the pirates had deposited their families and property in the heights of Mount Taurus, and with their ships awaited Pompey's approach off the promontory of Coracesium in Cilicia. Here the decisive battle was fought; the pirates were defeated, and fled for refuge into the town, which they shortly afterwards surrendered with all their property, and promised to evacuate all their strong places. The humanity with which Pompey had acted during the whole of the war, contributed very much to this result, and saved him a tedious and difficult campaign among the fastnesses of Mount Taurus. More than 20,000 prisoners fell into his hands; and as it would have been dangerous to turn them loose upon society without creating some provision for them, he settled them in various towns, where it would be difficult for them to resume their former habits of life. Those on whom most reliance could be placed were distributed among the small and somewhat depopulated cities of Cilicia, and a large number was settled at Soli, which had been lately deprived of its inhabitants by the Armenian king Tigranes, and which was henceforward called Pompeipolis. The worst class were removed to Dyme in Achaia, or to Calabria. The second part of this campaign, reckoning from the time that Pompey sailed from Brundisium, occupied only forty-nine days, and the whole war was brought to a conclusion in the course of three months; so that, to adopt the panegyric of Cicero (pro Leg. Mon. 12) "Pompey made his preparations for the war at the end of the winter, entered upon it at the commencement of spring, and finished it in the middle of the summer." Pompey, however, did not immediately return to Rome, but was employed during the remainder of this year and the beginning of the following (b. c. 66) in visiting the cities of Cilicia and Pamphylia, and providing for the government of the newly-conquered districts. It was during this time that he received ambassadors from the Cretans, and endeavoured to obtain the rid of the pacification of the island when its conquest had been completed by Q. Metellus. The history of this event is related elsewhere. [METELLUS, No. 25.]

Pompey was now anxious to obtain the command of the war against Mithridates. The rapidity with which he had crushed the pirates, whose power had been so long an object of dread, formed a striking contrast to the long-continued struggle which Lucullus had been carrying on ever since the year b. c. 74 with the king of Pontus. Nay more, the victories which Lucullus had gained at first had been forgotten in the disasters, which the Roman armies had lately experienced, and in consequence of which Mithridates was now once more in possession of his hereditary dominions. The end of the war seemed more distant than ever. The people demanded again the invincible arm of Pompey. Accordingly, the tribune C. Manilius, who had been secured by Pompey and his friends, brought forward a bill at the beginning of b. c. 66, giving to Pompey the command of the war against Mithridates, with unlimited power over the army and the fleet in the East, and with the rights of a proconsul in the whole of Asia as far as Armenia. As his proconsular power already extended over all the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean in virtue of the Gabinius law, this new measure virtually placed almost the whole of the Roman dominions in his hands. But there was no power, however excessive, which the people were not ready to intrust to their favourite hero; and the bill was accordingly passed, notwithstanding the opposition of Hortensius, Catulus, and the aristocratical party. Cicero advocated the measure in an oration which has come down to us (Pro Lege Manilia), and Caesar likewise supported it with his growing popularity and influence. On receiving intelligence of this new appointment, Pompey, who was then in Cilicia, complained that his enemies would not let him rest in peace; and that they were employing him to new dangers in hopes of getting rid of him. This piece of hypocrisy, however, deceived no one, and Pompey himself exhibited no unwillingness to take the command which had been given him. He immediately crossed the Taurus, and received the army from Lucullus, whom he treated with marked contempt, repealing all his measures and disparaging his exploits.

The power of Mithridates had been broken by the previous victories of Lucullus, and the successes which the king had gained lately were only of a temporary nature, and were mainly owing to the disorganisation of the Roman army. The most difficult part of the war had already been finished before Pompey was appointed to the command, and it was therefore only left to him to bring it to a conclusion. For this purpose he had a more numerous army and a more powerful fleet than Lucullus had ever possessed. The plan of his campaign, how-however, was characterised by great military skill, and fully justified the confidence which the Roman people reposed in him. One of his first measures was to secure the friendship and alliance of the Parthian king, Phraates III., a step by which he not only deprived Mithridates of all hopes of the co-operation of that monarch, but likewise cut him off from all assistance from the Armenian king Tigranes, who was now obliged to look to the safety of his own dominions. Pompey next station-toned his fleet in different squadrons around the coasts of Asia Minor, in order to deprive Mithridates of all communication from the sea, and he then proceeded in person at the head of his land forces against the king. Thus thrown back upon his own resources, Mithridates sued for peace, but as Pompey would hear of nothing but unconditional submission, the negotiation was broken off. The king was still at the head of an army of 30,000 foot and 2000 horse, but he knew too well the strength of a Roman army to venture an engagement with these forces, and accordingly withdrew gradually to the frontiers of Armenia. For a long time he succeeded in avoiding a battle, but he was at length surprised by Pompey in Lesser Armenia, as he was marching through a narrow pass, and was obliged to fight. The battle was soon decided; the king lost the greater number of his troops, and escaped with only a few horsemen to the fortress of Synnion, on the borders of the Greater Armenia. Here he collected again a considerable force; but as Tigranes refused to admit him into his dominions, because he suspected him of fomenting the intrigues of his son against him, Mithridates had no alternative but to take refuge in his own distant dominions in the Cim-merian Bosporus. To reach them he had to march through Colchis, and to fight his way through the wild and barbarous tribes that occupied the country between the Caucasus and the Euxine. He, however, succeeded eventually in his arduous attempt, and reached the Bosporus in safety in the course of next year. Pompey abandoned at present all thoughts of following the fugitive king, and resolved at once to attack the king of Armenia, who was now the more formidable of the two monarchs. But before commencing his march he founded the city of Nicopolis in Lesser Armenia as a memorial of his victory over Mithridates.
On entering Armenia Pompey met with no opposition. He was joined by the young Tigranes, who had revolted against his father, and all the cities submitted to them on their approach. When the Romans drew near to Artaxata, the king, deserted by his army and his court, had no alternative but submission, and accordingly went out to meet Pompey, and threw himself before him as a suppliant. Pompey received him with kindness, acknowledged him as king of Armenia, and demanded only the payment of 6000 talents. His foreign possessions, however, in Syria, Phoenicia, Cilicia, Galatia, and Cappadocia, which had been conquered by Lucullus, were to belong to the Romans.
To his son Tigranes Sophene and Gor-dyene were given as an independent kingdom; but as the young prince was discontented with this arrangement, and had ventured to utter threats, Pompey had him arrested, and kept him in chains to grace his triumph.

After thus settling the affairs of Armenia, fleet to cruise in the Euxine, and seize all vessels that attempted to carry provisions to the king in the Bosphorus.

In the spring of B.C. 64 Pompey left his winter-quarters in Pontus, and set out for Syria. In his march he passed the field of battle near Zela, where Valerius Triarius, the legate of Lucullus, had been defeated by Mithridates three years before, with a loss of more than 7000 men. Pompey collected their bones which still lay upon the field, and buried them with due honours. On his arrival in Syria he defeated Aristobulus I. [Antiquities X, xiii], whom Lucullus had allowed to take possession of the throne, after the defeat of Tigranes, and made the country a Roman province. He likewise compelled the neighbouring princes, who had established independent kingdoms on the ruins of the Syrian empire, to submit to the Roman dominion. The whole of this year was occupied with the settlement of Syria, and the adjacent countries.

Next year, B.C. 63, Pompey advanced further south, in order to establish the Roman supremacy in Phoenicia, Coele-Syria and Palestine. In the latter country, however, a severe struggle awaited it. The country was at the time distracted by a civil war between Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, the two sons of Aristobulus I., who died B.C. 105. Pompey espoused the side of Hyrcanus; and Aristobulus, who at first had made preparations for resistance, surrendered himself to Pompey, when the latter had advanced near to Jerusalem. But the Jews themselves refused to follow the example of their king; the more patriotic and fanatical took refuge in the fortress of the temple, broke down the bridge which connected it with the city, and prepared to hold out to the last. They refused to listen to any overtures for a surrender; and it was not till after a siege of three months that the place was taken. Pompey entered the Holy of Holies, the first time that any human being, except the high-priest, had dared to penetrate into this sacred spot. He reinstated Hyrcanus in the high-priesthood, and left the government in his hands, but at the same time compelled him to recognise the authority of Rome by the payment of an annual tribute: Aristobulus he took with him as a prisoner. It was during this war in Palestine that Pompey received intelligence of the death of Mithridates. [Mithridates, VI.] Pompey now led his troops back into Pontus for the winter, and began to make preparations for his return to Italy. He confirmed Pharmaces, the son and murderer of Mithridates, in the possession of the kingdom of Bosphorus; Deiotarus, tetrarch of Galatia, who had supported the Romans in their war with Mithridates, was rewarded with an extension of territory, and Aristobuzanes, king of Cappadocia, was restored to his kingdom. After making all the arrangements necessary to secure the Roman supremacy in the East, Pompey set out for Italy, which he reached at the end of B.C. 62. His arrival had been long looked for by all parties with various feelings of hope and fear. The aristocracy dreaded that he would come as their master; the popular party, and especially the enemies of Cicero, hoped that he would punish the latter for his unconstitutional proceedings in the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy; and both parties felt that at the head of his victorious army he might seize upon the supreme power, and play the part of Sulla. Pompey, however, soon calmed these apprehensions. He disbanded his army almost immediately after landing at Brundisium; but he did not proceed straightforward to Rome, as he was anxious to learn somewhat more accurately the state of parties before he made his appearance in the city. When he at length set out, he was received by all the cities through which he passed with an enthusiasm which knew no bounds; and as he approached the city, the population flocked out to meet him, and greeted him with the wildest acclamations of joy. After remaining in the neighbourhood of the city for some months, he at length entered it in triumph, on his birth-day, the 30th of September, B.C. 61. Pompey had just completed his forty-fifth year, and this was the third time that he had enjoyed the honour of a triumph. His admirers represented him as celebrating now his victory over the third continent, just as his first triumph had been gained over Africa, and his second over Europe. This triumph, however, was not only the greatest of the three, but the most splendid that the Romans had ever yet seen. It lasted for two days, although there was no army to lengthen out the procession. In front, large tablets were carried, specifying the nations and kings he had conquered, and proclaiming that he had taken 1000 strong fortresses, and nearly 500 towns and 800 ships; that he had founded 30 cities, that he had raised the revenue of the Roman people from 50 millions to 85 millions; and that he had brought into the treasury 20,000 talents, in addition to 16,000 that he had distributed among his troops at Ephesus. Next followed an endless train of waggons loaded with the treasures of the East. On the second day Pompey himself entered the city in his triumphal car, preceded by the princes and chiefs whom he had taken prisoners, or received as hostages, 324 in number, and followed by his legates and military tribunes, who concluded the procession. After the triumph, he displayed his clemency by sparing the lives of his prisoners, and dismissing them to their various states, with the exception of Aristobulus and Tigranes, who, he feared, might excite commotions in Judaea and Armenia respectively, if they were set at liberty.

With this triumph the first and most glorious part of Pompey's life may be said to have ended. Hitherto he had been employed almost exclusively in war, and his whole life had been an almost uninterrupted succession of military glory. But now he was called upon to play a prominent part in the civil commotions of the commonwealth, a part for which neither his natural talents nor his previous habits had in the least fitted him. From the death of Sulla to the present time, a period of nearly twenty years, he had been unquestionably the first man in the Roman world, but he did not retain much longer this proud position, and eventually discovered that the genius of Caesar had reduced him to a second place in the state. It would seem as if Pompey on his return to Rome hardly knew himself what part to take in the politics of the city. He had been appointed to the command against the pirates and Mithridates in opposition to the aristocracy, and they still regarded him with jealousy and distrust. He could not therefore ally himself to them, especially too as some of their most influential leaders, such as M. Crassus, L. Lucullus, and Metellus Creticus, were his personal enemies. At the same time he does not seem to have been disposed to unite himself to the popular party, which had risen into importance during his absence in the East, and over which Caesar possessed unbounded influence. The object, however, which engaged the immediate attention of Pompey was to obtain from the senate a ratification for all his acts in Asia, and an assignment of lands which he had promised to his veterans. In order to secure this object the more certainly, he had purchased the consulsip for one of his creatures, L. Afranius, who accordingly was elected with Q. Metellus for the year B.C. 60. But he was cruelly disappointed; L. Afranius was a man of slender ability and little courage, and did hardly any thing to promote the views of his patron: the senate, glad of an opportunity to put an affront upon a man whom they both feared and hated, resolutely refused to sanction Pompey's measures in Asia. This was the unwisest thing the senate could have done. If they had known their real interests, they would have yielded to all Pompey's wishes, and have sought by every means to win him over to their side, as a counterpoise to the growing and more dangerous influence of Caesar. But their shortsighted policy threw Pompey into Caesar's arms, and thus sealed the downfall of their party. Pompey was resolved to fulfil the promises he had made to his Asiatic clients and his veteran troops; his honour and reputation were pledged; and the refusal of the senate to redeem his pledge was an insult that he could not brook, more especially as he might have entered Rome at the head of his army, and have obtained his wishes with his sword. With these feelings Pompey broke off all connection with the aristocracy, and devoted himself to Caesar, who promised to obtain for him the ratification of his acts. Pompey, on his side, agreed to support Caesar in all his measures; and that they might be more sure of carrying their plans into execution, Caesar prevailed upon Pompey to become reconciled to Crassus, who by his connections, as well as by his immense wealth, had great influence at Rome. Pompey, Caesar, and Crassus, accordingly agreed to assist one another against their mutual enemies; and thus was first formed the first triumvirate.

This union of the three most powerful men at Rome crushed the aristocracy for the time. Supported by Pompey and Crassus, Caesar was able in his consulship, B.C. 59, to carry all his measures. An account of these is given elsewhere. [CAESAR, p. 543.] It is only necessary to mention here, that by Caesar's agrarian law, which divided the rich Campanian land among the poorer citizens, Pompey was able to fulfil the promises he had made to his veterans; and that Caesar likewise obtained from the people a ratification of all Pompey's acts in Asia. In order to cement their union more closely, Caesar gave to Pompey his daughter Julia in marriage, Pompey having shortly before divorced his wife Mucia.

At the beginning of the following year, B.C. 58, Gabinius and Piso entered upon the consulship, and Caesar went to his province in Gaul. Pompey retired with his wife Julia to his villa of Albanum near Rome, and took hardly any part in public affairs during this year. He quietly allowed Clodius to ruin Cicero, whom the triumvirs had determined to leave to his fate. Cicero therefore went into banishment; but after Clodius had once gained from the triumvirs the great object he had desired, he did not care any longer to consult their views. He restored Tigranes to liberty whom Pompey had kept in confinement, ridiculed the great Emperor before the people, and was accused of making an attempt on Pompey's life. Pompey in revenge resolved to procure the recall of Cicero from banishment, and was thus brought again into some friendly connections with the aristocratical party. With Pompey's support the bill for Cicero's return was passed in B.C. 57, and the orator arrived at Rome in the month of September. To show his gratitude, Cicero proposed that Pompey should have the superintendence of the cornmarket throughout the whole republic for a period of five years, since there was a scarcity of corn at Rome, and serious riots had ensued in consequence. A bill was accordingly passed, by which Pompey was made the Praefectus Annonae for five years. In this capacity he went to Sicily, and sent his legates to various parts of the Mediterranean, to collect corn for the capital; and the price in consequence soon fell. About the same time, and to many discussions in the senate respecting the restoration of Ptolemy Aureus to Egypt. Ptolemy had come to Rome, and been received by Pompey in his villa at Albanum, and it was generally believed that Pompey himself wished to be sent to the East at the head of an army for the purpose of restoring the Egyptian monarch. The senate, however, dreaded to let him return to the scene of his former triumphs, where he possessed unbounded influence; and accordingly they discovered, when he was in Sicily and Ptolemy in Ephesus, that the Sibylline books forbade the employment of force. Pompey returned to Rome early in B.C. 56; and though he could not obtain for himself the mission to the East, he used all his influence in order that the late consul, Lentulus Spinther, who had obtained the province of Cilicia, should restore Ptolemy to his kingdom. Clodius, who was now curule aedile, accused Milo at the beginning of February; and when Pompey spoke in his favour, he was abused by Milo in the foulest manner, and held up to laughter and scorn. At the same time he was attacked in the senate by the tribune C. Cato, who openly charged him with treachery towards Cicero. The evident delight with which the senate listened to the attack inflamed Pompey's anger to the highest pitch; he spoke openly of conspiracies against his life, denounced Crassus as the author of them, and threatened to take measures for his security. He had now lost the confidence of all parties; the senate hated and feared him; the people had deserted him for their favourite Clodius; and he had no other resource left but to strengthen his connection with Caesar, and to avail himself of the popularity of the conqueror of Gaul for the purpose of maintaining his own power and influence. This was a bitter quarrel for the conqueror of the East to swallow: he was already compelled to confess that he was only the second man in the state. But as he had no alternative, he repaired to Caesar's winter-quarters at Lucus, whither Crassus had already gone before him. Caesar reconciled Pompey and Crassus to one another, and concluded a secret agreement with them, in virtue of which they were to be consuls for the next year, and obtain provinces and armies, while he was to have his government prolonged for an other five years, and to receive pay for his troops. This arrangement took place about the middle of April. Pompey now hastened to Sardinia and Africa in order to have plenty of corn to distribute among the people, which was always one of the surest means of securing popularity with the rabble of the city. Pompey and Crassus, however, experienced more opposition to their election than they had anticipated. It is true that all the other candidates gave way with the exception of L. Domitius Ahenobarbus; but, supported by M. Cato and the tribunes, he offered a most determined opposition. The consul Lentulus Marcellinus likewise was resolved to use every means to prevent their election; and Pompey and Crassus, finding it impossible to carry their election while Marcellinus was in office, availed themselves of the veto of the tribunes Nonius Sufenas and C. Cato to prevent the consular comitia from being held this year. The elections therefore did not take place till the beginning of b. c. 55, under the presidency of an interrex. Even then Ahenobarbus and Cato did not relax in their opposition, and it was not till the armed bands of Pompey and Crassus had cleared the Campus Martius of their adversaries that they were declared consuls.

Thus, in b. c. 55, Pompey and Crassus were consuls the second time. They forthwith proceeded to carry into effect the compact that had been made at Luca. They got the tribune C. Trebatius to bring forward a resolution, which was passed, of giving the province of the two Spaniards to Pompey, and that of Syria to Crassus, and the other prolonged Caesar's government for five years more, namely from the 1st of January, b. c. 53, to the end of the year 49. Pompey was now at the head of the state, and at the expiration of his year of office, would no longer be a private man, but at the head of an army, and in the possession of the imperium. With an army he felt sure of regaining his former influence; and he did not see that Caesar had only used him as his tool to promote his own ends, and that sooner or later he must succumb to the superior genius of his colleague. Pompey had now completed the theatre which he had been some time building; and, as a means of regaining the popular favour, he resolved to open it with an exhibition of games unparalleled splendour and magnificence. The theatre itself was worthy of the conqueror of the East. It was the first stone theatre that had been erected at Rome, and was sufficiently large to accommodate 40,000 spectators. It was situate in the Campus Martius, and was built on the model of one which Pompey had seen at Mytilene, in the year 62. The games exhibited by Pompey lasted many days, and consisted of scenic representations, in which the actor Aesopus appeared for the last time, gymnastic contests, gladiatorial combats, and fights of wild beasts. Five hundred African lions were killed, and eighteen elephants were attacked and most of them put to death by Gaetulan huntsmen. A rhinoceros was likewise exhibited on this occasion for the first time. The splendour of these games charmed the people for the moment, but were not sufficient to regain him his lost popularity. Of this he had a striking proof almost immediately afterwards; for the people began to express their discontent when he levied troops in Italy and Cisalpine Gaul and sent them into Spain under the command of his legates, L. Afranius and M. Petreius, while he himself remained in the neighbourhood of the city. Pompey's object now was to obtain the dictatorship, and to make himself the undisputed master of the Roman world. Caesar's continued successes in Gaul and Britain, and his increasing power and influence, at length made it clear to Pompey that a struggle must take place between them, sooner or later; but down to the breaking out of the civil war, he seems to have thought that Caesar would never venture to draw the sword against him, and that as long as he could rule the senate and the comitia, his rival would likewise be obliged to submit to his sway. The death of his wife Julia, in b. c. 54, to whom he tenderly attached, broke one link which still connected him with Caesar; and the fall of Crassus in the following year (b. c. 53), in the Parthian expedition, removed the only person who had the least chance of contesting the supremacy with them. In order to obtain the dictatorship, Pompey secretly encouraged the civil discord with which the state was torn asunder, hoping that the senate and the people, tired of a state of anarchy, would at length throw themselves into his arms for the purpose of regaining peace and order. In consequence of the riots, which he secretly abetted, the consular comitia could not be held in b. c. 54, and it was not till the middle of b. c. 53 that Domitius Calvinus and Valerius Messalla were chosen consuls, and that the other magistrates were elected. But new tumults had broken out for the consulate, and Clodius for the praetorship; each was attended by a band of hired ruffians; battles took place almost every day between them in the forum and the streets; all order and government were at an end. In such a state of things no elections could be held; and the confusion at length became downright anarchy, when Milo murdered Clodius on the 20th of January in the following year (b. c. 52). [Vol. I. p. 774.] The senate, unable to restore order, had now no alternative but calling in the assistance of Pompey. They therefore commissioned him to collect troops and put an end to the disturbances. Pompey, who had at length obtained the great object of his desires, obeyed with alacrity; he was invested with the supreme power of the state by being elected sole consul on the 25th of February; and in order to deliver the city from Milo and his myrmidons, he brought forward laws against violence (De foed.) and bribery at elections. Milo was put up for trial; the court was surrounded with soldiers, and the accused went into exile. Others also were condemned, and peace was once more restored to the state. Having thus established order, he made Metellus Scipio, whose daughter Cornelia he had married since Julia's death, his colleague on the 1st of August, and then held the comitia for the election of the consuls for the ensuing year. He next proceeded to strike a blow at Caesar. He brought forward an old law, which had fallen into disuse that no one should become a candidate for a public office in his absence, in order that Caesar might be obliged to resign his command, and to place himself in the power of his enemies at Rome, if he wished to obtain the consulship a second time. But the renewal of this enactment was so manifestly aimed at Caesar that his friends insisted he should be specially exempted from it; and as Pompey was not yet prepared to break openly with him, he thought it more expedient to yield. Pompey at the same time provided that he should continue in possession of an army after his rival had ceased to have one, by obtaining a senatorial commission, by which his government of the Spanish provinces was prolonged for another five years. And, in case Caesar should obtain the consulship, he caused a law to be enacted, in virtue of which no one should have a province till five years had elapsed from the time of his holding a public office. Such were the precautions adopted against his great rival, the uselessness of which time soon showed.

The history of the next four years (B.C. 51—48) is related at length in the life of Cæsar [Vol. I. pp. 549—552]; and it is, therefore, only necessary to give here a brief outline of the remaining events of Pompey's life. In B.C. 51 Pompey became reconciled to the aristocracy, and was now regarded as their acknowledged head, though it appears that he never obtained the full confidence of the party. In the following year (B.C. 50) the struggle between Caesar and the aristocracy came to a crisis. The latter demanded that Caesar should resign his province and come to Rome as a private man in order to sue for the consulship; but it would have been madness in Caesar to place himself in the power of his enemies, who had an army in the neighbourhood of the city under the command of Pompey. There was no doubt that he would immediately have been brought to trial, and his condemnation would have been certain, since Pompey would have overawed the judges by his soldiers as he had done at the trial of Milo. Caesar, however, agreed to resign his provinces, and disband his army, provided Pompey would do the same. This proposition, however, was rejected, and Caesar prepared for war. He had now consumed the subjuga tion of Gaul, and could confidently rely on the fidelity of his veteran troops, whom he had so often led to victory and glory. At the same time he lost no opportunity of strengthening his interest at Rome; the immense wealth he had acquired by the conquest of Gaul was lavishly spent in gaining over many of the most influential men in the city; the services of the consuls Aemilius Paulus and of the tribune Curio, who were reckoned devoted partizans of Pompey, were purchased by enormous bribes. Pompey, on the other hand, neglected to prepare for the coming contest; he was firmly convinced, as we have already remarked, that Caesar would never venture to march against the constituted authorities of the state; and if he were mad enough to draw the sword, Pompey believed that his troops would desert him in the desperate enterprise, while his own fame and the cause of the republic would attract to his standard a multitude of soldiers from all parts of Italy. So confident was he of success that he did not attempt to levy troops; and when some of his friends remonstrated with him, and pointed out the defenceless condition of their party, if Caesar advanced against the city, Pompey replied that he had only to stamp with his foot in any part of Italy, and numbers of troops would immediately spring up. He was confirmed in the conviction of his own popularity by the interest expressed on his behalf during a dangerous illness by which he was attacked this year at Neapolis. Many cities offered sacrifices for his restoration to health; and on his recovery public rejoicings took place in numerous towns of Italy. But he was soon cruelly undeceived. At the beginning of B.C. 49 the senate decreed that Caesar should disband his army by a certain day, or otherwise he be regarded as an enemy of the state. Two of the tribunes put their veto upon the decree, but their opposition was set at nought, their lives were threatened, and they fled for refuge to Caesar's camp. Caesar hesitated no longer; he crossed the Rubicon, which separated his province from Italy, and at the head of a single legion marched upon Rome. He was received with enthusiasm by the Italian towns; his march was like a triumphal progress; city after city threw open their gates to him; the troops of the aristocracy went over to his side; and Pompey, after all his confident boasting, found himself unable to defend the capital. He fled, with all the leading senators, first to Capua, where he remained for a short time, and subsequently to Brundisium. Caesar, however, gave him no rest; by the 8th of March he was under the walls of Brundisium; and as Pompey despaired of holding out in that city, he embarked on the 15th of the month, and crossed over to Greece. As Caesar had no ships he could not follow him for the present, and therefore marched against Pompey's legates in Spain, whom he conquered in the course of the same year.

In the next year (B.C. 48) the war was decided. Early in January Caesar arrived in Greece, and forthwith commenced active operations. Pompey meantime had collected a numerous army in Greece, Egypt, and the East, the scene of his former glories. But although his troops far outnumbered Caesar's, he well knew that they were no match for them in the field, and therefore prudently resolved to decline a battle. His superiority in cavalry enabled him to outflank Caesar's supplies, and gave him the complete command of all the provisions of the country. The utmost scarcity began to prevail in Caesar's camp; since not only could he obtain nothing from the country, but he was likewise unable to receive any supplies from Italy, in consequence of the fleet of Pompey, which had the entire command of the sea. But Pompey was prevented from carrying out the prudent plan which he had formed for conducting the campaign. His camp was filled with a multitude of Roman nobles, unacquainted with war, and anxious to return to their estates in Italy and to the luxuries of the capital. Their superior numbers made them sure of victory; and Pompey's success at Dyrhacium, when he broke through Caesar's lines and compelled him to retire with considerable loss, rendered them still more confident of success. Pompey's unwillingness to fight, which only showed that he understood his profession far better than the vain and ignorant nobles who would school him, was set down to his love of power and his anxiety to keep the senate in subjection. Stung with the reproaches with which he was assailed, and likewise elated to some degree by his victory at Dyrhacium, he resolved to bring the contest to an issue. Accordingly, he offered battle to Caesar in the plain of Pharsalia in Thessaly, on the 9th of August, and the result justified his previous fears. His numerous army was completely defeated by Caesar's veterans. This defeat by his great rival seems at once to have driven Pompey to despair. He made no attempt to rally his forces, though he might still have collected a considerable army; but regarding every thing as lost, he hurried to the sea-coast with a few friends, only anxious to escape from the country. He embarked on board a merchant ship at the mouth of the river Penes, and first sailed to Lesbos, where he took up his wife Cornelia, who was staying in the island, and from thence made for the coast of Pamphylia, where he was joined by several vessels and many senators. His friends now advised him to seek refuge in Egypt, since he had been the means of restoring to his kingdom the art of the ancient Egyptian monarch and might, therefore, reckon upon the gratitude of the court. He accordingly set sail for Egypt, with a considerable fleet and about 2000 soldiers, and upon his arrival off the coast sent to beg for the protection of the king. The latter was only thirteen years of age, and the government was in the hands of Pothinus, an eunuch, Theodotus of Chios, and Achillas. These three men, dreading Caesar’s anger if they received Pompey, and likewise fearing the resentment of the latter if they forbade him to land, resolved to release themselves from their difficulties by putting him to death. They accordingly sent out a small boat, took Pompey on board with three or four attendants, and rowed for the shore. His wife and friends watched him from the ship, anxious to see in what manner he would be received by the king, who was standing on the edge of the sea with his troops; but just as the boat reached the shore, the head of a man who had risen from his seat, in order to step on land, was stabbed in the back by Septimius, who had formerly been one of his centurions, and was now in the service of the Egyptian monarch. Achillas and the rest then drew their swords; whereupon Pompey covered his face with his toga, without uttering a word, and calmly submitted to his fate. He was killed on the 29th of September, the day before his birth-day, B.C. 48, and had consequently just completed his 58th year. His head was cut off, and his body, which was thrown out naked on the shore, was buried by his freedman Philippus, who had accompanied him from the ship. The head was brought to Caesar when he arrived in Egypt soon afterwards, but he turned away from the sight, shed tears at the untimely end of his rival, and put his murderers to death.

The character of Pompey is not difficult to estimate. He was simply a soldier; his life from his seventeenth to his fortieth year was spent almost entirely in military service; and when he returned to Rome after the conquest of Mithridates, he did not possess any knowledge of civil affairs, and soon displayed his incompetence to take a leading part in the political commotions of the time. He had a high sense of his own importance, had been accustomed for years to the passive obedience which military discipline required, and expected to be treated at Rome with the same deference and respect which he had received in the camp. With an overweening sense of his own influence, he did not condescend to attach himself to any political party, and thus became an object of suspicion to both the aristocracy and the people. He soon found out, what Marius had discovered before him, that something more was required than military glory to retain the affections of the multitude; and he never learnt the way to win many friends. He was of a cold and phlegmatic temperament, and seems to have possessed scarcely any personal friends among the Roman nobles. He was both a proud and a vain man, faults which above all others make a man disliked by his associates and equals. At the same time his moral character was superior to that of the majority of his contemporaries; and he was free from most of the vices which pervaded all the higher ranks of society at the time. The ancient writers bear almost unanimous testimony to the purity of his marriage life, to his affection for his wife, to the simplicity and frugality of his mode of life, and to the control which he possessed over his passions and appetites. In his government of the provinces he also exhibited a striking contrast to most of the Roman nobles; justice was not to be purchased from him, nor did he enrich himself, according to the ordinary fashion, by plundering the subjects of Rome. His untimely death excites pity; but no one, who has well studied the state of parties at the downfall of the Roman commonwealth, can regret his fall. He had united himself to a party which was intent on its own aggrandizement and the ruin of its opponents; and there is abundant evidence to prove, that had that party gained the mastery, a proscription far more terrible than Sulla’s would have taken place, the lives of every distinguished man on the other side would have been sacrificed, their property confiscated, and Italy and the provinces divided among the pro vincial dictator. It is not improbable that Pompey and his companions might have enriched themselves at the expense of others.

Pompey was married several times. His wives and children are mentioned in the Stamma in p. 475, and an account of his two surviving sons is given below. Pompey never had his own portrait struck upon his coins; but it appears on the coins of Pompeipolis and on those of his sons Cneius and Sextus. [See below Nos. 24 and 25.]

(6) The principal ancient authorities for the life of Pompey are the biography of Plutarch, the histories of Dion Cassius, Appian, and Vallevius Paterculus, the Civil War of Caesar, and the Letters and Oration of Cicero. His life is related at length by Drummian, Geschichtle Roms, vol. iv.)

23. POMPEIA, sister of the triumvir. [POMPEIA, No. 3.]

24. CN. POMPEIUS MAGNUS, the eldest son of the triumvir [No. 22] by his third wife Mucia, was born in the years B.C. 80 and 75. He accompanied his father in the expedition against the pirates B.C. 67, but he must then have been too young to have taken any part in the war. On the breaking out of the civil war in B.C. 49, he was sent to Alexandria to obtain ships and troops for his father; and after procuring an Egyptian fleet of fifty ships he joined the squadron that was cruising in the Adriatic Sea in B.C. 48. Here he succeeded in taking several of Caesar’s vessels off Oricum, and he made an unsuccessful attack upon the town of Lissus. After the defeat of his father at Pharsalia, he was deserted by the Egyptian fleet which he commanded, and he then repaired to the island of Corcyra, where many of the Roman nobles, who had survived the battle, had taken refuge. Here he maintained that, possessing as they did the command of the sea, they ought not to despair of success; and he was very nearly killing Cicero, when the latter recommended submission to the conqueror. On his way to Africa, which his party had resolved to make the scene of the war, he learnt from his brother Sextus the death of his father. He did not, however, remain long in Africa, but in the course of B.C. 47 set sail for Spain, in order to secure that country for his party, and by means of his father's friends and dependents, to raise troops which might assist the aristocracy in Africa. But Cneius was some time in reaching Spain; after making an unsuccessful attack upon the town of Ascurum in Mauritania, he took possession of some of the islands off the Spanish coast, and appears not to have landed on the mainland till B.C. 46. He had not been here long before he was joined by his brother Sextus and others of his party, who had fled from Africa after their defeat at Thapsus. In a short time he was at the head of thirteen legions. Caesar sent his legate C. Didius against him, and towards the end of the year followed himself. The war was brought to a close by the battle of Munda, fought on the 17th of March, B.C. 45, in which Caesar entirely defeated the Pompeians. It was, however, the most bloody battle during the whole of the civil war: the Pompeians fought with the courage of despair; they drove back at first Caesar's troops, and it was only by Caesar's throwing himself into the front line of the battle, and exposing his person like a common soldier, that they were led back again to the charge. Cneius himself escaped with a severe wound, and fled to Carteia on the sea-coast. Here he embarked, and set sail with a squadron of twenty ships; but having been obliged to put to land again in consequence of neglecting to provide himself with water, he was surprised by Didius, who had sailed from Gades with a fleet, his ships were destroyed, and he himself obliged to take refuge in the interior of the country. But he could not remain concealed; the troops sent in pursuit of him overtook him near Lauron, and put him to death. His head was cut off, and carried to Caesar, who had it exposed to public view in the town of Hispalis, that there might be no doubt of his death. Cneius seems to have been by nature very calm and passionate; and the misfortunes of his family rendered him cruel and suspicious. He burned to take vengeance on his enemies, and Rome had nothing to expect from him, if he had conquered, but a terrible and bloody proscription. (Caes. B. C. iii. 5, 40; Dion Cass. xiii. 12, 56, xiii. 14, 20-40; Appian, B. C. ii. 87, 103-105; Cic. ad Fam. vi. 18, xv. 19; Hirt, B. Afr. 22, 23; Auctor, B. Hisp. 1-39.)

The annexed coin was probably struck by Cn. Pompey, when he was in Spain. It contains on the obverse the head of his father with CN. MAGN. IMP., and on the reverse a commander stepping out of a ship, and shaking hands with a woman, probably intended to represent Spain, with the legend M. MINAT. SADIN. FR. Q. Some writers suppose that this coin was struck by the triumvirs himself, but there is no reason to suppose that he ever had his own portrait struck upon his coins. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 292.)

25. Sex. Pompeius Magnus, the younger son of the triumvir [No. 22] by his third wife Mucia, was born B.C. 75, since he was forty at the time of his death in B.C. 35. (Appian, B. C. v. 144.) During the campaign of his father against Caesar in Greece, Sextus was with his mother at Mytilene; and after the loss of the battle of Pharsalus in B.C. 48, he and his mother accompanied the elder Pompey to Egypt, and saw him murdered before their eyes. From thence they fled to Cyprus, and shortly afterwards joined Cn. Pompey and Cat. Sextus remained in Africa, while his brother Cneius went to Spain; but after the battle of Thapsus B.C. 46, which ruined all the hopes of the Pompeians in Africa, Sextus quitted that country, and repaired to his brother in Spain, together with Labienus and others of their party. In Spain he kept possession of Corduba till the defeat of his brother at the battle of Munda in March, B.C. 45. As Sextus became the sole owner of the capital, he fled from Corduba, and lived for a time in one of the towns in the country of the Lacetani, between the Iberus and the Pyrenees. Here he supported himself by robbery, and gradually collected a considerable band of followers, with whom he penetrated into the province of Baetica. The governor of the province, C. Cerrinis, was unable to offer any effectual opposition to him; he was generally supported by the natives and the veterans of his father settled in the province; Carteia, and other towns, fell into his hands. The death of Caesar still further favoured his enterprises. Asinius Pollio, who had succeeded Cerrinis in the government of the province, did not possess much military talent, and was on one occasion surprised and defeated by Sextus. This victory gave Sextus the command of almost the whole of Baetica, and turned towards him the attention of the parties that were now struggling for the supremacy at Rome. But as nothing of importance was yet reported from Spain, Lepidus, who had the command of the Nearer Spain and of Narbonese Gaul, was commissioned to make terms with Sextus. The latter agreed to lay aside hostilities on condition of his being allowed to return to Rome, and of receiving his patrimonial inheritance. These terms were assented to, and the senate voted a large sum of money to Sextus as an indemnification for that portion of his property which had been sold. So far matters seemed quiet, but they did not long continue so.

Antony and the aristocratical party soon came to an open rupture; Antony marched into Cisalpine Gaul to oppose Dec. Brutus, and the senate used every effort to obtain assistance against Antony. For this purpose they applied not only to Lepidus, but also to Pompey, who had come to Masilla with a fleet and an army in order to be nearer the scene of action, and to determine what course he should adopt. The senate, on the proposition of Cicero, passed a laudatory decree in his honour, and likewise appointed him to the command of the republican fleet: he did not, however, advance to the relief of Mutina, but remained inactive. Shortly after this Octavian threw off the mask he had hitherto worn, wrested the consulsiphip from the senate in the month of August (B.C. 43), and obtained the enactment of the Lex Pedia, by which all the murderers of Caesar were outlawed. Pompey was hi-
Pompeius.

Included among these murderers, although he had no share in the deed, and on the establishment of the triumvirate in October was proscribed. His fleet secured him safety; but as the governors of Gaul and Spain had declared in favour of the triumvirs, he had no fixed station on the mainland. He therefore cruised about, plundering the coasts both for the sake of support and with the view of injuring the triumvirs. His numbers gradually increased, and he had been eluded by the triumvirs, and multitudes of slaves, flocked to him; and he at length felt himself strong enough to take possession of Sicily, which he made his head quarters. The towns of Mylne, Tyndaris, Messana, and Syracuse fell into his power, and the whole island eventually acknowledged his sway. A. Pompeius Bithynicus, who was proprietor of Sicily, had at first repulsed Sextus in his attempts upon Messana, but had afterwards allowed him to obtain possession of the town on condition that they should rule together over Sicily; but this condition was never observed, and Sextus became the real master of the island. Sextus likewise received support from Q. Cornificius, the governor of Africa. Rome now began to suffer from want of its usual supplies, which were cut off by Sextus; and according-ly Octavian sent against him a fleet commanded by his legate Q. Salvidienus Rufus (s.c. 42). The latter succeeded in protecting the coasts of Italy from further ravages of Pompey's ships, but was defeated in the straits of Sicily when he ventured upon a naval engagement against the main body of Pompey's fleet. This battle was fought under the eyes of Octavian, who departed immediately afterwards for Greece, in order to prosecute the war against Brutus and Cassius. Pompey had now become stronger than ever. His naval superiority was uncontestable; and in his arrogance he called himself the son of Neptune. About this time he put to death Pompeius Bithynicus under pretence of a conspiracy.

While the war was going on in Greece between the triumvirs and the republican party, Pompey remained inactive. This was a fatal mistake. He should either have attacked Italy and caused there a diversion in favour of Brutus and Cassius, or he should have supported the latter in Greece; for it was evident that if they fell, he must sooner or later fall likewise. But the fall of Pompey was delayed longer than might have been expected. Octavian on his return to Italy was engaged with the Perusian war (s.c. 41), and Pompey was thus enabled to continue his ravages upon the coasts of Italy without resistance. The continued misunderstandings between Octavian and Antony, which now threatened an open war, were still more favourable for Pompey. In the beginning of s. c. 40 Antony requested the assistance of Pompey against Octavian. Pompey forthwith sent troops into the south of Italy, but was obliged to withdraw them shortly afterwards, upon the reconciliation of the triumvirs at Brandision. The triumvirs now resolved to make war upon Pompey; but as he was in possession of Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica, and his fleets plundered all the supplies of corn which came from Egypt and the eastern provinces, the utmost scarcity prevailed at Rome, and a famine seemed inevitable. The Roman populace were not content to wait for the conquest of Pompey; they rose in open insurrection and demanded of their new rulers a reconciliation with the master of the sea. Octavian thought it more prudent to yield, and accordingly a peace was negotiated between the triumvirs and Pompey, through the mediation of Scribonius Libo, the father-in-law of the latter. By this peace, which was concluded at Misenum in s. c. 39, the triumvirs granted to Pompey the provinces of Sicily, Sardinia, Corsica, and Achaea, and promised him the consulship, the triumph, and an indemnification of seventeen and a half million dollars of private assess-ture: Pompey, on his part, promised to supply Italy with corn, to protect commerce in the Mediterranean, and to marry his daughter to M. Marcellus, the son of Octavia, the sister of the triumvir. But this peace was a mere farce. Antony refused to give up Achaea; and Pompey, therefore, recommenced his piratical excursions. A war was inevitable: the only thing that could save Pompey was a quarrel between Octavian and Antony. In s. c. 38 Pompey sustained a severe loss in the des-ertion of one of his principal legates, Menas or Menodorus, who surrendered to Octavian Sardinia and Corsica, together with a large naval and military force [MENAS]. This important accession determined Octavian to commence war immediately. He appointed C. Calvisius Sabinus to the command of his fleet, with Menas as his legate. This cam-paign was unfavourable to Octavian. His fleet was twice defeated, and he was allowed to roam the Cumaian seas, and Menodorus, who, however, perished in the battle, and next off Messana, where his fleet was likewise almost destroyed by a storm. Pompey, however, did not follow up his success; he remained inactive, and lost, as usual, the favourable moment for action. Octavian, on the contrary, made every effort to equip a new fleet. He saw that it was absolutely necessary for him to crush Pompey before he ventured to measure his strength against Antony and Lepidus. He accordingly spent the whole of next year (s. c. 37) in making preparations for the war, and obtained assistance from both his colleagues, Antony and Lepidus. He appointed M. Vipsanius Agrippa to the supreme command of the whole fleet. Just before the breaking out of hostilities, Menas again played the deserter and returned to his old master's service, dissatisfied at having merely a subordinate command assigned to him. By the summer of s. c. 36, all the preparations of Octavian were completed, and the war commenced. He had three large fleets at his disposal; his own, stationed in the Julian harbour, which he had constructed near Baiae; that of Antony, under the command of Statilius Taurus, in the harbour of Tarentum; and that of Lepidus, off the coast of Africa. His plan was for all three fleets to set sail on the same day, and make a descent upon three different parts of Sicily. But a fearful storm marred this project; Lepidus alone reached the coast of Sicily, and landed at Lilybaeum; Statilius Taurus was able to put back to Tarentum; but Octavian, who was surprised by the storm off the Lucanian promontory of Pali-nurum, lost a great number of his ships, and was obliged to remain in Italy to repair his shattered fleet. This was a reprise to Pompey, who offered sacrifices to Neptune for his timely assistance, but he still remained inactive. Menodorus, who had been already of considerable service to Pompey, again played the traitor and went over to Octavian. As soon as the fleet had been repaired, Octavian again set sail for Sicily. Agrippa defeated Pompey's.
POMPEIUS.

flee[t off Mylæ, destroying thirty of his ships; but the decisive battle was fought on the third of September (a. c. 36), off Nauiclus, a seaport between Mylæ and the promontory of Palæum. The Pompeian fleet was commanded by Demochares, and that of Octavian by Agrippa, each consisting of about 300 ships. Agrippa gained a brilliant victory; most of the Pompeian ships were destroyed or taken. Pompey himself fled first to Messana, where he straightway embarked togeter with his daughter, and set sail for the East with a squadron of seventeen ships. Octavian did not pursue him, as his attention was immediately called to the attempts of Lepidus to make himself independent of his colleague [Lepidus, p. 763, a.].
Pompey was thus enabled to reach Mytilene in safety, where he began to form schemes for seizing
the eastern provinces of Antony, who had just returned from his disastrous campaign against the Parthians, in which he had barely escaped with his life. For this purpose he entered into negotiations with the chief of Tharsus on the north-eastern coast of the Black Sea, and even opened a communication with the Parthians, thinking that they might, perhaps, trust him with an army, as they had done T. Labienus a few years previously. He gave out that he was making preparations to carry on the war against Octavian.

In b. c. 35 Pompey crossed over from Lesbos to Asia. Here he soon disclosed his real designs by seizing upon Lampascus. Thereupon C. Furnius, the legate of Antony, declared open war against him;
and Antony likewise sent Titius, with a fleet of 120 ships, to attack his naval forces. Unable to cope with so large a force, Pompey burnt his ships and united their crews to his army. His friends now recommended him to make terms with Antony;
but, as their advice was not attended to, most of them deserted him, among whom was his father-in-law, Scribonius Libo. Thereupon he attempted to fly to Armenia, but he was overtaken by the troops of Antony, deserted by his own soldiers, and obliged to surrender. He was carried as a prisoner to Miletus, where he was shortly afterwards put to death (a. c. 35) by order of Titius. Titius, undoubtedly, would not have put Pompey to death on his own responsibility. It is probable that Plancus, the governor of Syria, to whom the execution of Pompey was attributed by many, had received orders from Antony to instruct his legates to execute Pompey, if he were seized in arms; but,
as many persons lamented the death of Pompey,
the son of the great conqueror of Asia, Antony was willing enough to throw the blame upon Plancus or Titius.

Sextus did not possess any great abilities. He took up arms from necessity, as he was first deprived of every thing by Caesar, and then proscribed by the triumvirs. His success was owing more to circumstances than to his own merits: the war between the triumvirs and the republicans, and subsequently the misunderstandings between Octavin and Antony, enabled him to obtain and keep possession of Sicily. He seems never to have aspired to supreme power. He would have been contented if he could have returned in safety to Rome, and have recovered his patrimony, and he carried on war for that purpose, and not for dominion. He ought, however, to have seen that he could never have returned to Rome except as the conqueror of Octavian, and that his personal safety could only have been secured by his becoming the master of the Roman world. He was personally brave, but was deficient in refinement, and possessed scarcely any knowledge of literature. Velleius Paterculus says (ii. 73) that he could not speak correctly, but this is doubtless an exaggeration; for Cicerio saw little to alter in the letter which Sextus sent to him for correction before it was given to the consuls (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 4). Sextus assumed the surname of Pius, to show that he was an avenger of his father and brother. This surname appears on his coins [see below]. (Auct. B. Hisp. 3, &c.
32; Cic. ad Att. xii. 37, 44, xiv. 13, 21, 29, xv.
7, 20, 22, xvi. 1, Philipp. xiii. passim; Appian,
B. C. ii. 105, 122, iii. 4, iv. 84—117, v. 2—143; Dion
Cass. lib. xiv.—xix.; Vell. Pat. ii. 73, 87;
Liv. Epit. 123, 128, 129, 131.)

The coins of Sex. Pompey are numerous. On the obverse the head of his father is usually repres-tented; and writers on numismatics state that the head on the obverse of his coins is always that of the triumvir; but we are tempted to think that it is in some cases that of Sextus himself. We subjoin a few specimens of some of the most important coins.

COINS OF SEX. POMPEIUS, THE SON OF THE TRIUMVIR.

The head on the obverse of the first two coins is supposed to be that of the triumvir. On the obverse of the former of these we have the legend sex. mag.
phys. imp. sal. (the interpretation of which is douful), and on the reverse a female figure with the legend PIETAS. It has been already remarked that Sextus assumed the surname of Pius, to show that he wished to revenge the death of his father and brother; and for the same reason we find Piusas on the obverse of the coin. The obverse of the second coin has the legend MAGNVS IMP. ITER, with a litus before the head of the triumvir, and an aureus behind; and the reverse has the legend PRAEP. CLAS. ET ORAE.
MARIT. EX. S. C. He is called on this coin impeerator a second time (iterum), because his victory over Asinius Pullio in Spain first gave him a claim to this title, and his defeat of the fleet of Augustus off Sicily enabled him to assume it a second time. The legend on the obverse, praefectus classis et orae maritimae ex s. c., which appears on many of the coins of Sextus, has reference to the decree of the senate which conferred upon him the command of the fleet shortly after the death of Julius Caesar, as has been already related. The third coin is intended to indicate Pompey's command of the sea. It represents on the obverse a war-galley with a column, on which Neptune is standing, and on the reverse Sylla holding an owl in her two hands, and in the act of striking. (Eckhel, vol. vi. pp. 26—33.)

26. Pompeia, the daughter of the triumvir, married Faustus Sulla. [Pompeia, No. 4.]

27. Pompeia, the daughter of Sex. Pompeius, No. 25. [Pompeia, No. 5.]

28. Cn. Pompeius Magnus, was descended from the family of the triumvir, but his pedigree is not stated by the ancient writers. He was, most probably, a son of M. Licinius Crassus, Cos. a. d. 29, and Scribonia; the latter of whom was a daughter of Scribonius Libo and of Pompeia, the daughter of Sex. Pompey, who was a son of the triumvir. He would thus have been a great-grandson of Sex. Pompey, and great-great-grandson of the triumvir [see Stemma on p. 475]. It was not uncommon in the imperial period for personal names to drop their paternal names, and assume the names of their maternal ancestors. Caligula would not allow this Pompey to use the cognomen of Magnus; but it was restored to him by the emperor Claudius, whose daughter Antonia he married. He was sent by his father-in-law to the senate to proclaim his victory over Britain. He was subsequently put to death by Claudius, at the instigation of Messalina. (Dion Cass. lxx. 5, 21, 29; Zonar. xi. 9; Suet. Cal. 35, Claud. 27, 29; Senece. Apoc. Claud.)

29. M. Pompeius, the commander of the cavalry under Lucullus, in the third Mithridatic war. He was wounded and taken prisoner (Appian, Mithr. 79; Memmon, 45, ed. Orelli). Plutarch calls him Pompeonius (Lucull. 15), which Schweighäuser has introduced into the text of Appian, though all the MSS. of Appian have Pompeius.

30. Cn. Pompeius, served in Caesar's army in Gaul, under the legate Q. Titinius, in b. c. 54. (Cass. B. G. v. 36.)

31. Cn. Pompeius, consul suffectus from the 1st of October, b. c. 31 (Fasti).

Pompeius, a Latin grammarian of uncertain date, probably lived before Servius and Cassiodorus, as these writers appear to have made some use of his works. He wrote, 1. Commentum artis Donati, on the different parts of speech, in thirty-one sections, and 2. Commentariolus in librum Donati de Barbaris et Metaplasmis, in six sections. Both these works were published, for the first time, by Lindemann, Leipzig, 1821.

Pompeius Catuusa, an artist, whose name is found on a monument which he erected to his wife's memory, and which is now in the museum at Lyon. He is described in the inscription as a citizen of Sequana, and a tector, that is, one of those artists who decorated the interiors of houses with ornamental plastering, a sort of work of which there are numerous examples at Pompeii. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schora, p. 437.)

Pompeius Colle Ga. [Collega.]

Pompeia, the daughter of the triumvir, married Faustus Sulla. [Pompeia, No. 4.]

Pompeius Magnus, was descended from the family of the triumvir, but his pedigree is not stated by the ancient writers. He was, most probably, a son of M. Licinius Crassus, Cos. a. d. 29, and Scribonia; the latter of whom was a daughter of Scribonius Libo and of Pompeia, the daughter of Sex. Pompey, who was a son of the triumvir. He would thus have been a great-grandson of Sex. Pompey, and great-great-grandson of the triumvir [see Stemma on p. 475]. It was not uncommon in the imperial period for personal names to drop their paternal names, and assume the names of their maternal ancestors. Caligula would not allow this Pompey to use the cognomen of Magnus; but it was restored to him by the emperor Claudius, whose daughter Antonia he married. He was sent by his father-in-law to the senate to proclaim his victory over Britain. He was subsequently put to death by Claudius, at the instigation of Messalina. (Dion Cass. lxx. 5, 21, 29; Zonar. xi. 9; Suet. Cal. 35, Claud. 27, 29; Senece. Apoc. Claud.)

M. Pompeius Andronicus, was a Syrian by birth, and taught rhetoric at Rome in the former half of the first century before Christ, but in consequence of his indifferent habits he was eclipsed by Antonius Grpio and other grammarians, and accordingly retired to Cumea, where he composed many works. His most celebrated work was entitled Antalludum Ennius Elencheti, but the exact meaning of Elencheti is a disputed point. The elder Pliny used it to signify a list of contours to his work on Natural History. (Suet. de Ill. Gram. 8.)

Pomponia. 1. Wife of P. Cornelius Scipio, consul b. c. 218, and mother of P. Scipio Africanus the elder. (Sill. Itul. xiii. 615; comp. Gell. viii. 1.)

2. The sister of T. Pompeius Atticus, was married to Q. Cicero, the brother of the orator. The marriage was effected through the mediation of M. Cicero, the great friend of Atticus, b. c. 68, but it proved an extremely unhappy one. Pomponia seems to have been of a quarelsome disposition, and the husband and wife were on bad terms almost from the day of their marriage. Their matrimonial disputes gave Cicero great trouble and uneasiness. His letters to Atticus frequently contain allusions to the subject. His friend naturally thought his sister ill used, and besought Cicero to interpose on her behalf; but the latter as naturally advocated the cause of his brother, who really seems to have been the least in fault. In a letter which Cicero wrote to Atticus in b. c. 51 he gives an amusing account of one of their matrimonial squabbles, of which he was an eye-witness (ad Att. v. 1). When their son, young Quintus, grew up, he endeavoured to reconcile his parents, and was encouraged in his filial task by both his uncles; but he did not meet with much success; and Q. Cicero, after leading a miserable life with his wife for almost twenty-four years, at length divorced her at the end of B.c. 45, or in the beginning of the following year. (Corn. Nep. Att. 5; Cic. ad Att. i. 5, v. 1, vii. 1, 5, xiv. 10, et alibi, ad Q. Fr. iii. 1, &c.)

3. The daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus. She is also called Caecilia, because her father was adopted by Q. Caecilius, and likewise Atticus. She was born in B.c. 51, after Cicero had left Italy for Cilicia. She is frequently mentioned in Cicero's letters to Atticus, and seems at an early age to have given promise of future excellence. She was still quite young when she was married to M. Vipsanius Agrippa. The marriage was negotiated by M. Antony, the triumvir, probably in B.c. 36. She was afterwards suspected of improper intercourse with the grammarian Q. Caecilius Epictetus, a freedman of her father, who instructed her. Her subsequent history is not known. Her husband Agrippa married Marcella in B.c. 28, and accordingly she must either have died or been divorced from her husband before that year. Her daughter Vipsania Agrippina married Tiberius, the successor of Augustus. (Cic. ad Att. v. 19, vi. 1, 2, 5, vii. 2, et alibi; Corn. Nep. Att. 12; Suet. Tib. 7, de illustr. Gramm. 16.)

POMPONIA GRAECI'NA, the wife of A. Plautius, was accused in the reign of Claudius of practising religious worship unauthorised by the state; but her husband Plautius, who was allowed, on account of his victories in Britain, to judge her, in accordance with the old Roman law, declared her innocent. She was probably the daughter of P. Pomponius Graecinus, consul successus A.D. 16. She was related to Julius, the daughter of Drusus, and granddaughter of Pomponia, the daughter of Atticus; and she lived forty years after the death of Julius, who was executed by Claudius at the instigation of Messalina. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 32.)

POMPONIA RUFI'NA, a Vestal virgin in the reign of Caracalla, put to death for violation of her vow of chastity. (Dion Cass. lxxxv. 16.)

POMPONIA NENS, plebeian. Towards the end of the republic the Pomponii, like other Roman gentes, traced their origin to the remote times of the Roman state. They pretended to be descended from Pompo, one of the alleged sons of Numa (Plut. Num. 21); and they accordingly placed the image of this king upon their coins. In the earliest times the Pomponii were not distinguished by their surnames and the only family that rose to importance in the time of the republic was that of Matho; the first member of which who obtained the consulsip was M. Pompeius Matho in B.c. 253. On coins we also find the cognomens Molo, Musa and Rufus, but these surnames do not occur in ancient writers. The other cognomens in the time of the republic, such as Atticus, were not family names, but were rather descriptive of particular individuals. An alphabetical list of them is given below, as well as of the cognomens in the imperial period, which were rather numerous. (Comp. Drumm. Gesc. Röm. vol. v. p. 1, &c.)

POMPO NIIUS. 1. M. Pompeius, one of the tribunes of the plebs, elected at the abolition of the decemvirate, B.c. 449. (Liv. iii. 54.)

2. M. Pompeius, consul tribune, B.c. 399, perhaps either a son or grandson of the preceding. (Liv. v. 13.)

3. Q. Pompeius, perhaps a younger brother of the preceding, was tribune of the plebs, B.c. 395, in which year he supported the views of the senate by opposing, in conjunction with his colleague, A. Virginius, the proposition that a portion of the senate and people should settle at Veii. He and his colleague were, in consequence, accused two years afterwards, and compelled to pay a heavy fine. (Liv. v. 29, comp. cc. 24, 25.)

4. M. Pompeius, tribune of the plebs, B.c. 352, brought an accusation against L. Manlius Imperius, who had been dictator in the preceding year, but was compelled to drop the accusation by the son of Manlius, afterwards surnamed Torquatus, who obtained admittance into the tribune's house, and threatened him with immediate death if he did not swear that he would abjure his imputation of his father. (Liv. vii. 4, 5; Cic. de Off. iii. 30.; Val. Max. v. 4. § 3; Appian, Hann. 2.) [TORQUATUS.]

5. Sex. Pompeius, legatus of the consul T. Sempronius Longus in the first year of the first Punic war, B.c. 218. (Liv. xxii. 15.)

6. M. Pompeius, tribune of the plebs, B.c. 167, opposed, with his colleague M. Antonius, the proposition of the praetor M. Juventius Thaena, that war should be declared against the Rhodians. (Liv. xiv. 21.) Pompeius was praetor in B.c. 161, and in this year obtained a decree of the senate, by which philosophers and rhetoricians were forbidden to live in Rome. (Suet. de clar. Rhet. 1; Gell. xvi. 11.)

7. M. Pompeius, a Roman eques, was one of the most intimate friends of C. Gracchus, and distinguished himself by his fidelity to the latter on the day of his death, B.c. 121. When Gracchus, despairing of his life, had retired to the temple of Diana, and was going to kill himself there, Pompeius and Licinius took his sword, and induced him to fly. As they fled across the Sublician bridge, hotly pursued, Pompeius and Licinius turned round, in order to give their friend time for escape, and they allowed no one to pass till they fell pierced with wounds. This is the account of Plutarch; the details are related a little differently by other writers. (Plut. C. Gracch. 16, 17; Vell. Pat. ii. 6; Val. Max. iv. 7, § 2; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 65; comp. Cic. de Div. ii. 29.)

8. M. Pompeius, neditel B.c. 82, in the consulsip of the younger Marius. In the scenic games exhibited by him, the actress Licinia appeared, who was then a child of 12 years old, and who was again brought on the stage in A.D. 9, in her 104th year, in the venal games in honour of Augustus. (Plin. H. N. vii. 49, s. 48.)

9. Cn. Pompeius, who perished in the civil war between Marius and Sulla, was an orator of some repute, and is reckoned by Cicero as holding the next place to his two great contemporaries, C. Aurelius Cotta and P. Sulpicius Rufus. His oratory was characterised by great vehemence, and he did not express his meaning very clearly. (Cic. Brut. 57, 62, 69, 70, de Orat. iii. 13.)

10. M. Pompeius, as he is called by Plutarch (Lucull. 15), the commander of the cavalry of Launullus in the third Mithridatic war. His real name was Pompeius. [Pompeius, No. 29.]

11. M. Pompeius, one of the legates of Pompey in the war against the pirates, n. c. 67, to whom Pompey assigned the supervision of the gulf washing the south of Gaul and Liguria. (Appian, Mithr. 95.)

12. P. Pompeius, accompanied P. Clodius, when he was murdered by Milo, B. C. 52. (Ascon. in Mil. p. 33, ed. Orelli.)

13. M. Pompeius, commanded the fleet of Caesar at Messana, the greater part of which was burnt in B. C. 48, by C. Cassius Longinus (Caes. B. C. ii. 101.)

14. P. Pompeius, was proscribed by the triumvirs in B. C. 43. He was in Rome at the time, but escaped by assuming the insignia of a praetor, and accompanied by his slaves as lictors, left Rome, travelled through Italy as a public magis- trate, and eventually crossed over to Sicily. He was one of the extremist of the state. (Appian, B. C. iv. 45.) Valerius Maximus relates (vii. 3. § 9) this circumstance of Sentius Saturninus Vetulio or Vetulo.

POMPO'NIUS, SEXTUS. Some writers are of opinion that there was only one jurist of this name: some think that there were two. (See the references in Zimmern, Geschichte des Rösischen Privatrechts, vol. 1. p. 338, n. 6.)

Pomponius is often cited by Julianus (Dig. 3. tit. 5. s. 6. § 6—8; Dig. 17. tit. 2. s. 63. § 9), and also under the name of Sextus.

Puchta (Cursus der Institutionen, vol. 1. p. 444), says there is no reason for assuming that there were two Pompeii. As to the passage (Dig. 26. tit. 5. s. 41), at the head of which stands the name of Pompeius, he observes that the words "at refer Sextus Pompeius," at the end of the extract, merely show that the compiler did not take the extract immediately from the work of Sex. Pompey, but from some other work in which it was cited. He adds, that this kind of repetition is not unusual in the Digest; and he refers to another passage (Dig. 22. tit. 1. s. 26; Julianus, lib. vi. ex Minucio), in which the repetition is avoided, but in other respects it is exactly like Dig. 28. tit. 5. s. 41.

As to the passage (Dig. 30. s. 32), "tam Sextus quam Pompeius," he observes that the expression would be highly impest, if the name Pompeius belonged to both jurists. The weakest ground of all, as he considers it, for supposing that there were two Pompeii is that Julianus often cites Pompeius; and it is supposed that as Pompeus was a younger man than Julianus, and of less note, that Julianus would not have cited him.

Pomponius is the author of a long extract in the Digest (Dig. 1. tit. 1. s. 2), which is taken from a work of his in one book, entitled Enchiridion. His period may be approximately determined from the fact that Julianus is the last of the jurists whom he mentions, and the period of the activity of Julianus belongs to the reign of Hadrianus.

The number of extracts from Pompeius in the Digest is 585. He was a Cassianus (Gaius ii. 218), "sed Juliano et Sexto placuit." where Sextus means Sextus Pompeius. In another passage he alludes to C. Cassius under the name of Caius noster (Dig. 45. tit. 3. s. 39); for in this passage, and in a passage of Julianus (Dig. 24. tit. 3. s. 59), Caius or Gaius means C. Cassius, and not the later jurist, now known by the name of Gaius. The same remark applies to Dig. 46. tit. 3. s. 78, which is an extract from C. Cassius made by Javolenus.

The works of Pompeius are the Enchiridion, which is not mentioned in the Florintine Index; Variae Lectiones, of which the Index mentions only fifteen books, though the twenty-fifth, the thirty-fourth, and even the fortieth and forty-first books are cited in the Digest (Dig. 8. tit. 5. s. 8. § 6); twenty books of Epistolae; five books of Fideicommissa; libri lectionum ad Q. Mucium; libri ad Plautium; libri singularius regularum; libri ad Sabinum; libri V. Sctorum; and the two books of an Enchiridion, which is mentioned in the Index. Some other writings of Pompeius are cited. The extract from the single book of the Enchiridion, De Origine Juris, is our chief au- thority for the Roman jurists, to the time of Ju- lianus, and for our knowledge of the two sectae or Pompeian schools.

The question of the two Pompeii is discussed by W. Grotsch, Vitas Jurisconsultorum, which may be compared the works of Zimmern and Puchta, which have been already referred to. [G. L.]

POMPO'NIUS ATTICUS. [Atticus.]

POMPO'NIUS BASSUS. [Bassus.]

L. POMPO'NIUS BONO'NIENSIS, the most celebrated writer of Fabulae Attelanae, was a native of Bononia (Bologna) in northern Italy, as his surname shows, and flourished in n. c. 91. (Euseb. Chron.) The nature of the Fabulae Attelanae is described at length in the Dict. of Antiq.; and it is therefore only necessary to state here that these fables were originally not written, but produced by the ready fertility of the Italian improcensori; and that it is probable that Pompeius and his contemporary Novius [Novius] were the first to write regular dramas of this kind.

(Comp. Veil. Pat. ii. 9; Macrobr. Saturn. i. 10.)

There is a question of four lines, which Priscian attributes to Pompeius (p. 602, ed. Putschius); but in the passage of Varro (de L. L. vii. 28, ed. Müller), from which Priscian took it, the author of the epigram is called Papimus.

M. POMPO'NIUS DIONYSIUS, a freedman of T. Pompeius Atticus, received his nomen from Atticus, his former master, according to the usual custom, but had the prænomen Marcus given him in compliment to M. Tullius Cicero (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15, comp. iv. 6, 11, 18). It is erroneously stated in Pauly, vol. 1. p. 1039, a. init. that his full name was T. Pompeius Dionysius.

POMPO'NIUS FESTUS. [Festus.]

POMPO'NIUS FLACCUS. [Flaccus.]

P. POMPO'NIUS GRAECI'NUS, consul sufl- fectus, A. D. 16, was a friend and patron of Ovid, who addressed him to three of the epistles which were written by the poet from his place of banishment (ex Pont. i. 6, ii. 6, iv. 9). This Pompeius Graecinus was the brother of Pompeius Flaccus [Flaccus, Pompeius, No. 2], and probably also the father of the Pompeia Graecina, who lived in the reign of Claudius. [Pompeia Graecina.
PONTIA.

POMPO'NIUS LABEO. [LABEO.]  POMPO'NIUS MARCELLUS. [MARCEL-LUS.]

POMPO'NIUS MELA. [MELA.]  POMPO'NIUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.]

POMPO'NIUS SABI'NUS. [SABINIUS.]

POMPO'NIUS SECUNDUS. [SECUNDUS.]

POMPO'NIUS SILVA'NUS. [SILVANUS.]

T. POMPO'NIUS VEIANTA'NUS, commander of some of the allied troops in Southern Italy in B.C. 213, ventured to attack Hanno, the Carthaginian general, was defeated and taken prisoner. He had formerly been one of the publicani, and had earned a bad character by cheating both the state and the farmers of the revenue with whom he was in partnership. (Liv. xxv. 1, 3.)

POMPOSIA'NUS METTIUS. [METTIUS.]

C. POMPITI'NUS, is first mentioned in B.C.
71, when he served as legate under M. Crassus, in the Servile war. (Frontin. Strat. ii. 4. § 8.)

He was servus mercedis i. B.C. 61, in which year he rendered important service to Cicero in the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy, especially by the apprehension of the ambassadors of the Allobroges. He afterwards obtained the province of Gallia Narbonensis, and in B.C. 61 defeated the Allobroges, who had invaded the province. In consequence of this victory he sued for a triumph on his return to Rome; but as it was refused by the senate, he remained for some years beyond the pomerium, urging his claim. At length, in B.C. 54, his friends made a final attempt to procure him the long-desired honour. He was opposed by the praetors, M. Cato and P. Servilius Isaurnicus, and by the tribune Q. Mucius Scaevola, who urged that he was not entitled to the privilege,
because he had not received the imperium by a lex curiata; but he was supported by the consul Appius, and by most of the praetors and tribunes;
and as there was no hope of prevailing upon the senate to grant the favour, his former legate, Serv.
Sulpicius Galba, brought the matter before the people, and obtained from them a resolution, passed counter to law before daylight, in virtue of which Pomptinus at length entered the city in triumph. (Sall. Cat. 45; Cic. in Cat. iii. 2, de Prov. Cons.
13, in Pison. 14, ad Att. iv. 16, v. 1, 4, 5, 6, 8, 10, 14, ad Q. Fr. iii. 4. § 6; Dion Cass. xxxvii.
47, xxxix. 63; Liv. Epit. 103.)

In B.C. 51 Pomptinus accompanied Cicero as legate to Cilicia, but he did not remain there longer than a year, according to the stipulation he had previously made with Cicero. (Cic. ad Att.
v. 21. § 9, vi. 3, ad Fam. ii. 15. § 4, iii. 10. § 3, xv. § 8.) There is considerable variation in the orthography of the name. We find him called Pomptinus, Pontinus, Pontinus and Pontinensis, as well as Pomptinus, which seems the preferable form.

PO'MPYLUΣ (Πομπύλω), a slave of Theop-phantus, who also became celebrated as a philosopher. (Diog. Laërt. v. 36; Gell. ii. 18; Macrob.
Sat. i. 11.)

PONNA'NUS, the author of an epitaph in the Latin Anthology (No. 539, ed. Meyer) on a picture respecting the death of Cleopatra, but of whom nothing is known.

PO'NTIA. 1. A woman in the reign of Nero, who obtained an infamous notoriety as the mur-derer of her own children (Juv. vi. 638, &c.}; Martial, ii. 34, iv. 42. 5.) The scholast on Juvenal states that she was the wife of P. (C.? ) Petronius, who was condemned as one of the conspirators against Nero; that having been convicted,
after her husband's death, of destroying her own children by poison, she partook of a sumptuous banquet, and then put an end to her life by opening her veins. In an inscription published by Gruter (p. 921. 6), recording this act of villany, she is called the daughter of T. Pontius; but we may, with Heinrich (ad Juv. l. c.), question the genuineness of this inscription, as it was probably manufactured out of this passage of Juvenal.

2. PONTIA POSTUMIA, was slain by her lover, Octavius Sagitta, tribute of the plebs, A.D. 58, because she refused to marry him after promising to do so. Sagitta was accused by the father of Pontia, and condemned under the lex Cornelia de Sicariis to the severest form of banishment (de-portatio in insulam). In the civil wars following the death of Nero, Sagitta returned from banishment, and was again condemned by the senate, in A.D. 70, to his former punishment. (G. Ann. xiii.
44. Hist. iv. 44.)

PON'TIA GEN'S, plebeian, was originally Samnite. It never attained much eminence at Rome during the republic, but under the empire
some of its members were raised to the consulship.
During the republican period Aquila is the only cognomen borne by the Roman Pontii; but in the imperial times we find various surnames, of which an alphabetical list is given below, after Pontius, where the Samnite Pontii are also mentioned.

PONTIA'NUS. 1. Mentioned in one of Cicero's letters (ad Att. xii. 44. § 2), appears to have been a friend of Mustela, and to have been defended upon some occasion by Cicero.

2. P. AUFI'DIUS PONTI'ANUS, of Amiurnum, spoken of by Varro. (R. R. ii. § 8. § 6.)

3. SER. OCTAVI'US LAER'NUS PONTI'ANUS, consul
A.D. 131, with M. Antonius Rufinus.

4. PONTIANUS, consul suffectus in A.D. 135.

5. PROCULUS PONTI'ANUS, consul a.d. 233.

PON'TICUS, a Roman poet, and a contemporary of Ovid and Propertius, wrote an heroic poem on the Theban war, and hence is compared to Homer by Propertius (Ovid, Trist. iv. 10. 47; Propert. i. 7, i. 9. 26.)

PONT'DIA is mentioned twice in Cicero's letters (ad Att. v. 21. § 14. vi. 1. § 10), from which it appears that Cicero had entered into negotiations with her for the marriage of his daughter Tullia to her son.

PONT'I'DIUS. 1. C. PONTIDIUS, is mentioned by Velius Paterculus (ii. 16) as one of the leaders in the Social or Marsic war, B.C. 90. There may be no doubt that he is the same person as Amnia calls (R. C. i. 40) C. Pontilius; and as the name of Pontidius occurs elsewhere, the orthography in Vellius seems preferable.

2. M. PONTI'DIUS, of Aprium, was an orator of some distinction, speaking with fluency, and acute in the management of a case, but vehement and passionate (Cic. Brut. 70, comp. de Orat.
ii. 68.)

TI. PONTIFICI'CIUS, a tribune of the plebs,
B.C. 450, attempted to introduce an agrarian law.
(Liv. ii. 44.)

PONTI'LIIUS. [PONTIDIUS, No. 1.]

PONTI'IUS. [POMPTI'IUS.]

PON'TIUS. 1. A friend of Scipio Africanus PONTIUS.

minor, was mentioned by Cicero in his work De Pato. (Macrob. Sat. ii. 12, or Cic. Frag. p. 253, ed. Orelli.)

2. Detected in adultery, and dreadfully punished by the husband, P. Cernius. (Val. Max. vi. 1. § 13.)

3. T. PONTIUS, a centurion possessing great bodily strength, mentioned by Cicero (de Secend. 10), is perhaps the same as the Pontius of whom Lucilius speaks (ap. Cic. de Fin. i. 3).

4. Pontius, one of Caesar's soldiers, was taken prisoner by Scipio, the father-in-law of Pompey, but preferred death rather than deserting his old general. (Val. Max. iii. 8. § 7.)

5. Pontius, one of the companions of Antony in his revels. (Cic. Phil. xiii. 2. § 3.)

PO'NTIUS, a deacon of the African Church, the tried friend and constant companion of Cyprian, drew up a narrative of the life and sufferings of the martyred bishop, which is styled an excellent production (eprogrim volumem) by Jerome. If the piece extant under the name of Pontius, entitled De Vita et Passione S. Cypriani, be genuine, it certainly does not merit such high commendation, since it is composed in an ambitious declamatory style, full of affectation and rhetorical ornaments. Perhaps the original work may have formed the basis of what we now possess, which has probably been built up in its present form by the labour of various hands. It will be found attached to all the most important editions of Cyprian, and is contained also in the Acta Primorun Martyrum of Ruinart, 4to, Paris, 1690, and fol. Amst. 1713. The Acta Pontii are preserved in the Miscellanea of Baluze, 8vo. Par. 1678, vol. ii. p. 124, and in the Acta Sanctorum under 8th March, the day marked as his festival in the Roman Martyrologies. (Hieron. de Viris Ill. 68; Schönemann, Bibl. Pastorat Lat. vol. i. c. iii. § 6.) [W.R.]

PO'NTIUS AUFFIDIANUS, a Roman eques, killed his daughter when she had been guilty of a breach of chastity. (Val. Max. vi. i. § 3.)

PO'NTIUS COMWARDS. [COMWARDS.]

PO'NTIUS FREGEL'LANUS, was deprived of his rank as senator, a. d. 36, as one of the agents of the notorious Albucilla in her adulteries. (Tac. Ann. vi. 45.)

PO'NTIUS HER/E'NNIUS, the father of C. Pontius, was an old man living at Caudium, when his son defeated the Roman army in the neighbourhood of that town in b. c. 321. The Samnites sent to ask his advice how they should avail themselves of their extraordinary good fortune. The reply which he gave is related at length by Livy (ix. 1, 3; comp. Appian, Samn. iv. 3.) It would appear from Cicero (de Secend. 12), that there was a tradition which supposed Herennius Pontius and Archytas of Tarentum to have been friends; and Niebuhr supposes that Nearcinos had written a dialogue in which Archytas, the Samnite Pontius, and Plato were speakers. (Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. note 373.)

C. PO'NTIUS, son of HER/E'NNIUS, the general of the Samnites in b. c. 321, defeated the Roman army under the two consuls T. Veturius Calvinus and Sp. Postumius Albinus in one of the mountain passes in the neighbourhood of Caudium. The survivors, who were completely at the mercy of the Samnites, were dismissed unhurt by Pontius. They had to surrender their arms, and to pass under the yoke; and as the price of their deliverance, the consuls and the other commanders swore, in the name of the republic, to a humiliating peace. The Roman state however refused to ratify the treaty, and sent back the consuls and the other commanders to Pontius, who, however, refused to accept them. The name of Pontius does not occur again for nearly thirty years, but as Livy rarely mentions the names of the Samnite generals, it is not improbable that Pontius may have commanded them on many other occasions. At all events we find him again at the head of the Samnite forces in b. c. 292, in which year he defeated the Roman army under the command of the consul Q. Fabius Gurges. This disaster, when nothing but victory was expected, so greatly exasperated the people that Fabius would have been deprived of his imperium, had not his father, the celebrated Fabius Maximus, offered to serve as his legate during the remainder of the war. It was in the same year that the decisive battle was fought, which brought the war to a conclusion. The Samnites were entirely defeated, and Pontius was taken prisoner. In the triumph of the consul, Pontius was led in chains, and afterwards beheaded, an act which Niebuhr characterizes as "the greatest stain in the Roman annals," and for which the plea of custom can be offered as the only palliation. (Liv. iv. 10, 1, 11; Cic. de Or. iv. § 6; Hist. de Samn. iv. &c.; Cic. de Secend. 12, de Off. ii. 21; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. pp. 215, &c., 397, &c.)

M. PO'NTIUS LAE'LIUS, consul a. d. 163 with Pastor.

PO'NTIUS LUPUS, a Roman eques, who continued to plead in the courts after he had lost his sight. (Val. Max. viii. 7. § 5.)

PO'NTIUS NIGRI'NUS. [NIGRINUS.]

PO'NTIUS PAULI'NUS. [PAULINUS, p. 114.]

PO'NTIUS PILA'TUS, was the sixth procurator of Judaea, and the successor of Valerius Gratus. He held the office for ten years in the reign of Tiberius, and it was during his government that Christ taught, suffered, and died. By his tyrannical conduct he excited an insurrection at Jerusalem, and at a later period commotions in Samaria also, which were not put down without the loss of life. The Samnites, who gained the support of his conduct to Vitellius, the governor of Syria, who deprived him of his office, and sent him to Rome to answer before the emperor the accusations that were brought against him. As Pilatus reached Rome shortly after the death of Tiberius, which took place on the 16th of March, a. d. 37, he was probably deposed in the preceding year a. d. 36, and would therefore have entered upon his duties as procurator in a. d. 26. Eusebius states that Pilatus put an end to his own life at the commencement of the reign of Caligula, worn out by the many misfortunes he had experienced. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 44; Matthew, xxvi; Mark, xv; Luke, iii. 1, xxiii.; John, xviii. xix.; Joseph, Antiq. xviii. 3. § 1, &c., xviii. 4. § 1, &c.; B. Jud. ii. 9, § 2; Euseb. H. E. ii. 7.) The early Christian writers frequently refer to an official report, made by Pilatus to the emperor Tiberius, of the condemnation and death of Christ. (Just. Mart. Apol. i. pp. 76, 84; Tertull. Apol. 5; Euseb. H. E. ii. 32; Oros. vii. 4; Chrys. homil. VIII. in pass.) It is not at all improbable that such a report was made; but considering, on the one hand, the frequency of forgeries in the early Christian Church, and on the other, that it was no part of the policy of the imperial government to publish such reports, we may reasonably question the genuineness of the document. At all events there can be no doubt that the acts of Pilate, as they are called, which are extant in Greek (Fabric. Apocr. vol. i. pp. 237, 259, vol. iii. p. 456, &c.), as well as his two Latin letters to the emperor (Fabric. Apocr. vol. i. p. 298, &c.), are the productions of a later age. (Comp. Winer, Bibliothek Reale Vor- terbeek, art. Pilatus.

PONTIUS TELESI'NUS. 1. A Samnite, appears to have been appointed general of the Samnite forces in the Social war after the death of Pompeaias Silo. At all events he was at the head of the Samnite army in b. c. 62, in which year Carbo and the younger Marius were consuls. Marius and the brother of Telesinus were besieged in Preneste by Sulla. Telesinus himself, at the head of an army of 40,000 men, had marched to the neighbourhood of Preneste, apparently with the intention of relieving the town, but in reality with another object, which he kept a profound secret. In the dead of the night he broke up from his quarters, and marched straight upon Rome, which had been left without any army for its protection. The Samnites were upon the point of avenging the many years of oppression which they had experienced from the Romans. Sulla scarcely arrived in time to save the city. Near the Colline gate the battle was fought, the most desperate and bloody of all the contests during the civil war. Pontius fell in the fight; his head was cut off, and carried under the walls of Preneste, to let the younger Marius know that his last hope of succour was gone. (Appian, B. C. i. 90—93; Vell. Pat. ii. 27.)

2. A brother of the preceding, commanded the Samnite forces which had been sent to the assistance of the younger Marius, and shared in the defeat of the latter by Sulla, and with him took refuge in Preneste, where they were besieged by the conqueror, b. c. 62. After the defeat of the Samnites and the death of the elder Telesinus, which had been related above, Marius and the younger Telesinus attempted to escape by a subterraneous passage, which led from the town into the open country; but finding that the exit was guarded, they resolved to die by one another’s hands. Telesinus fell first, and Marius accordingly put an end to his own life, or was stabbed by his slave. (Liv. Epit. 88; Vell. Pat. ii. 27.)

PONTIUS TITI'NIA’NUS, the son of Q. Titinius, adopted by Pontius, joined Caesar through fear, in b. c. 49. (Cic. ad Att. ix. 19, § 2.)

PONTUS (Πόντος), a personification of the sea, is described in the ancient cosmogony as a son of Gaia, and as the father of Nereus, Thaumas, Phorcys, Ceto, and Eurybia, by his own mother. (Hes. Theog. 132, 233, &c.; Apollod. i. 2, § 6.) Hyginus (Fab. praef. p. 3, ed. Staveren) calls him a son of Aether and Gaia, and assigns to him seven or different descendants. [L.S.]

POPILLIA, was twice married, and had by her former husband Q. Lutatius Catulus, by her second C. Julius Caesar Strabo. Her son Catulus delivered a funeral oration over her grave, which was the first time that this honour had been paid to a female at Rome. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 11.)

POPILLIA GEN'S, plebeian. In manuscripts the name is sometimes written with one l, and sometimes with two; but as it always appears with a double l in the Capitoline Fasti, this form is to be preferred. There are no coins to decide the question; for those which Goltzius has published, are spurious. The Popillia gens is one of the great plebeian gentes that rose into eminence after the passing of the Licinian laws, which threw open the consulsiphip to the plebeian order. The first member of it who obtained the consulship was M. Popillius Laenas, in b. c. 538, and he was the first plebeian who obtained the honour of a triumph. The only family of the Popillii mentioned under the title, is that of Laenas: the majority of the few Popillii, who occur without a surname, and who are given below, may have belonged to the same family, and their cognomen is probably omitted through inadvertence.

POPIL'LIUS. 1. T. Popillius, a legatus in the Roman army engaged in the siege of Capua, b. c. 211. (Liv. xxvi. 6.)

2. P. Popillius, one of the three ambassadors sent to king Syphax in Africa, in b. c. 210. (Liv. xxvii. 4.)

3. C. Popillius, surnamed SABELLUS, a Roman eques, distinguished himself by his bravery in the campaign against the Istri in b. c. 178. (Liv. xii. 4.)

4. M. Popillius, one of the ambassadors sent to the Aetolians, in b. c. 174. (Liv. xii. 25.)

5. P. Popillius, the son of a freedman, is said by Cicero to have been condemned for bribery. (Cic. pro Cluent. 36, 47.)

POPL'ICOL'A. [Publilcola.]

POP'APAÉ SABI’NA. [Sabinia.]

POP'APAÉ SABI’NUS. [Sabinus.]

POP'APAÉ SECUNDUS. [Secundus.]

POP'APAÉ SILVANUS. [Silvanus.]

POP'APAÉ YOPISCUS. [Yopiscus.]

POP'ULON'IA, a surname of Juno among the Romans, by which she seems to have been characterized as the protectress of the whole Roman people. This opinion is confirmed by the fact that in her temple there was a small table, the symbol of political union. (Macrob. Sil. iii. 11.)

PO'RCIA. 1. The sister of Cato Uticensis, was brought up with her brother in the house of their uncle M. Livius Drusus, as they lost their parents in childhood. She married L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, who was consul in b. c. 54, and, like her brother, one of the leaders of the aristocratical party. We learn from Cicero that she was at Naples in b. c. 49, when her husband was besieged at Corinith by Caesar. (Cic. ad Att. ix. 3.) In the following year, b. c. 48, she lost her husband, who fell in the battle of Pharsalia. She herself died towards the end of b. c. 46, or the beginning of the next year, and her funeral panegyric was pronounced by Cicero, and likewise by M. Varro and Lollia. (Plut. Cat. 1, 41; Cic. ad Att. xiii. 37, 48.)

2. The daughter of Cato Uticensis by his first wife Atilla. She was married first to M. Bibulus, who was Caesar’s colleague in the consulship in b. c. 59, and to whom she bore three children. Bibulus died in b. c. 48; and in b. c. 45 she married M. Brutus, the assassin of Julius Caesar. She inherited all her father’s republican principles, and likewise his courage and firmness of will. She induced her husband on the night before the 15th of March to disclose to her the conspiracy against Caesar’s life, and she is reported to have wounded herself in the thigh in order to show that she had a courageous soul and could be trusted with the secret. At the same time her affection for her husband was stronger than her stoicism, and on the morning of the 15th, her anxiety for his safety was so great that she fainted away, and word was brought to Brutus in the senate-house that his wife was dying. She parted with Brutus at Velia in Lucania in the course of the same year, when he embarked for Greece. She then returned to Rome, where she continued to live unmolested by the triumvirs. But after she learnt the loss of the battle of Philippi and the death of Brutus in B.C. 42, she resolved not to survive the ruin of her party and the death of her husband, and accordingly put an end to her own life. The common tale was, that her friend, suspecting her design, had taken all weapons out of her way, and that she therefore destroyed herself by swallowing live coals. The real fact may have been that she suffocated herself by the vapour of a charcoal fire, which we know was a frequent means of self-destruction among the Romans. (Plut. Cat. 25, 73, Brut. 2, 13, 15, 23, 33; Dion Cass. xlv. 13, xlvi. 49; Appian, B. C. iv. 136; Val. Max. iii. 2. § 5, iv. 6. § 5; Polyaeon. viii. 32; Martial, i. 43.)

3. The daughter of Cato Uticensis by his second wife Marcia. She remained with her mother in Rome when her father left the city in B.C. 49 on Caesar's approach. (Plut. Cat. 52.) She probably died young.

PORCIA GENS, plebeian, is not mentioned till the middle of the third century before the Christian era; and the first member of the gens, who obtained conspicuous rank, was the celebrated M. Porcius Cato, in B.C. 195. The name was derived by the Romans from porcus, a pig, and was compared with Ovinus, Caprillus, and Taurus, all of which names indicated connection with the breeding or feeding of cattle. (Plut. Public. 1; Varro. de R. R. ii. 1.) The Porci were divided into three families under the republic, namely, those of Larca, Licinus, and Cato, all of which names appear on coins. In the imperial period we find two or three other cognomina, which are given below.

PORCINA, an agnomen of M. Aemilius Lepidus, consul B.C. 137.

PO'RCIUS FESTUS. [Festus.]

PO'RCIUS LATRO. [Latro.]

PO'RCIUS SEPTIMIUS. [Septimius.]

PORPHY'RIAN, POMPO'NIUS, the most valuable among the ancient commentators on Homer. His annotations, however, in common with those of all the earlier Latin scholars, have been so altered and interpolated by the transcribers of the middle ages, that it is extremely difficult, and, in many cases impossible, to separate the genuine matter from what is supposititious. We know nothing regarding the history of Porphyrio, nor the period when he flourished, except that he was, if we can trust Charisius (p. 196, ed. Lindemann), later than Festus, and that he must have been later than Acro also, whom he quotes (ad Hor. Sat. i. 8. 25, ii. 3. 33.) (See Suringar, 'Historia Crit. Scholast. Lat.') For the editions of Porphyrio, see the notice of the editions of Horatius. [W. R.]

PORPHY'RION (Porphyrias). I. One of the giants, a son of Uranus and Ge. During the fight between the giants and the gods, when Porphyrios intended to offer violence to Hera, or, according to others, attempted to throw the island of Delos against the gods, Zeus hurled a thunderbolt at him, and Heracles completed his destruction with his arrows. (Apollod. i. 6. § 1, &c.; Pind. Pyth. viii. 12; Horat. Carm. iii. 4. 54; Claudian, Gigantom. 114, &c.)

2. According to a tradition of the Athenians, the most ancient king in Attica; he is said to have reigned even before Actaeus, and to have introduced into Attica the worship of Aphrodite. (Paus. i. 2. § 5, 14, § 6.) [L. S.]

PORPHYRIUS (Porphyrius), the celebrated antagonist of Christianity, was a Greek philosopher of the Neo-Platonic school. Eunapius and Suidas (following no doubt, Porphyrius himself, Vit. Plat. p. 21, &c., p. 107), and other biographies call him a Tyrian; but both St. Jerome (Præf. Epist. ad Gal.) and St. Chrysostom (Homil. VI. in Is. ad Corinth., p. 58) term him Bartaneustes, a word on the fancied correction of which a good deal of ingenuity has been unnecessarily expended; some imagining that it is a corruption of some term of reproach (such as Bartaneutis, herb-eater, BobôvivâtoS, or Barlaneustes).

The more reasonable view is that the word is correct enough, and describes more accurately the birth-place of Porphyrios,—Batanea, the Bashan of Scripture. To account for his being called a Tyrian some have supposed that he was originally of Jewish origin, and having first embraced, and afterwards renounced Christianity, called himself a Tyrian to conceal his real origin. Heumann, making a slight alteration in the text of Chrysostom, supposed that Porphyrius falsely assumed the epithet Barlaneustes, to induce the belief that he was of Jewish origin, that his statement of a regard to the Jewish Scriptures might have the more weight. None of these conjectures seems in any degree probable. The least improbable view is that of Jonas, who is followed by Fabricius, Brucker, and others, that there was a Tyrian settlement in the district of Batanea, and that Porphyrius was born there, but, from the neighbourhood of the more important place, called himself, and was called by others, a Tyrian. (Brucker, Hist. Crit. Phil. vol. ii. p. 240; Harles, ad Fabr. Bibl. Gr. vol. v. p. 725.)

The original name of Porphyrios was Mâlos (Mâlos, the Greek form of the Syroheicen Melech), a word, as he himself tells us, which signified king. His father bore the same name, and was a man of distinguished family (Porph. Vit. Plat. c. 16). Aurelius, in dedicating a work to him, styled him Bartaneus. The more euphonic name Porphyrios (in allusion to the usual colour of royal robes), was subsequently devised for him by his preceptor Longinus (Eunap. Porph. p. 13; Suid. s. c.) Suidas states that he lived in the reign of Aurelian, and died in that of Diocletian. Eunapius says, more explicitly, that he lived in the reigns of Gallienus, Claudius, Tacitus, Aurelian, and Probus. Porphyrios himself tells us that he was thirty years of age when he first became a pupil of Plotinus, who was in the tenth year of the reign of Gallienus (Vit. Plot. c. 4. p. 99); the date of his birth was therefore, A. D. 233.

From Porphyrios himself, as quoted by Eusebius (H. E. iii. 19; comp. Proclus, in Tim. i. p. 20), it appears that when very young he was placed under the instruction of Origen. This could not have been, as some have imagined, in Alexandria, for about the time of the birth of Porphyrios Origen qultted Alexandria, and did not return to it. It was most likely at Caesarea that Porphyrius attended on the instructions of Origen. Eunapius has been charged with a gross blunder in making Origen the fellow-student of Porphyrius; but it does not seem necessary to suppose that he meant the celebrated Christian writer of that name.

Porphyrius next removed to Athens, where he studied under Apollonius (Porph. Quaest. Hom. 25) and the celebrated Longinus, by whose extensive learning, and rhetorical and grammatical skill, he profited so much as to attract the commendation of Longinus (Vit. Plot. c. 21, p. 133). At the age of twenty he went to Rome for the first time, to hear Plotinus; but as the latter had at that time intermitted his instructions, Porphyrius returned to the East, whether to the school of Longinus or not we do not know. Of the events of the next ten years we know nothing. At the age of thirty he came to Rome with Antonius of Rhodes, and applied himself to learn the philosophy of Plotinus, from Plotinus himself, and from his older disciple, Amelius. From Plotinus assigned the task of elucidating the difficulties in, the doctrine of their common master which might be felt by the younger disciple (Vit. Plot. c. 4). Porphyrius, having some doubts respecting a dogma of Plotinus, wrote a treatise, endeavouring to establish, in opposition to his master, ἄνεξ ἃτοῦ τοῦ ὑπάρξει τα τι γρηγοράν, hoping to induce Plotinus to reply. Plotinus, having read the treatise, handed it over to Amelius to answer, which he did, in a tolerably large book. To this Porphyrius replied in his turn, and was answered by Amelius in a rejoinder which satisfied him, upon which he wrote a recantation, and read it publicly in the school. He employed all his influence, however, to induce Plotinus to develop his doctrines in a more extended and articulate form. He also inspired Amelius with a greater zeal for writing. Porphyrius gained so thoroughly the approbation and confidence of Plotinus, that he was regarded by the latter as the ornament of his school, and was admitted by him to terms of close intimacy. He frequently had assigned to him the task of refuting opponents, and was entrusted with the still more difficult and delicate duty of correcting and arranging the writings of Plotinus (Vit. Plot. c. 13, p. 115; c. 15, p. 117; c. 7, p. 107; c. 24, p. 139). Though he had abandoned Longinus for Plotinus, he still kept up a friendly intercourse with the former (Vit. Plot. c. 20, comp. the letter which he received from Longinus while in Sicily, ib. c. 18). His connection with Plotinus continued for about six years, at the end of which period he went to Sicily; for a naturally hypochondriacal disposition, stimulated perhaps by his enthusiastic attachment to the doctrines of Plotinus, had induced in him a desire to get free from the shackles of the flesh, and he had in consequence begun to entertain the idea of suicide. But Plotinus, perceiving his state of mind, advised him to leave Rome and go to Sicily. Porphyrius took his advice, and went to visit a man of the name of Probus, who lived in the neighbourhood of Lilybaemum (Vit. Plot. c. 11, comp. Eunap. l.c. p. 14, whose account of the matter differs, and of course errs, in some particulars). Plotinus shortly after died in Campania. It was while in Sicily, according to Eusebius (Hist. Ecle. vi. 19) and Jerome (Catal. Script. illud.), that he wrote his treatise against the Christian religion, in 15 books, on which account Augustine (Retract. ii. 31) styles him Sceulum ilium eunius celebrissima fana est. The notion that this work was written in Bithynia is quite without foundation, being merely derived from a passage of Lactantius (v. 2), referring to somebody whose name is not mentioned, and who wrote against the Christians, and which was supposed by Baronius to refer to Porphyrius. But the account does not suit him in any respect. It was very likely about this period that Porphyrius took occasion to visit Carthage. That he also went to Athens after the death of Plotinus, has been inferred (by Holstenius) from a passage quoted by Eusebius, where, as the text stands, Porphyrius is made to speak of celebrating the birth-day of Plotinus at Athens with Longinus. There can be little doubt, however, that the reading should be, as Brucker (l. c. p. 218) suggests, Πατριάρχει, and that the incident refers to the earlier part of the life of Porphyrius, otherwise the allusion will not accord with the history of either Porphyrius or Longinus.

Of the remainder of the life of Porphyrius we know very little. According to Eunapius he returned to Rome, where he taught, and gave frequent public exhibitions of his acquirements and talents as a speaker, and was held in high honour by the senate and people till he died. A curious illustration of his excitable and enthusiastic temperament is afforded by what he says of himself (Vit. Plot. c. 23), that in the 68th year of his age he himself, like Plotinus, was favoured with an ecstatic vision of the Deity. When probably at a somewhat advanced period of life he married Marcella, the widow of one of his friends, and the mother of seven children (ad Marc. 1), with the view, as he avowed, of superintending their education. About ten months after his marriage he had occasion to leave her and go on a journey; and to console her during his absence he wrote to her an epistle, which is still extant. The date of his death cannot be fixed with any exactness; it was probably about A. D. 305 or 306.

It appears from the testimony even of antagonists, and from what we have left of his writings, that Porphyrius was a man of great abilities and very extensive learning. Eusebius speaks of him as one τῶν μάλιστα διαφημών καὶ πᾶι γνώμων, κλεός το ου μικρόν φιλοσοφία παγκ "Ελληνῶν ἀπεργηγημένων (Proepr. Ev. iii. 9); and Augustine styles him hominem non mediocri ingenio praeditum (de Cív. Dei. x. 32, comp. xix. 22). The philosophical doctrines of Porphyrius were in all essential respects the same as those of his master Plotinus. To that system he was ardently attached, and showed himself one of its most energetic defenders. His writings were all designed directly or indirectly to illustrate, commend, or establish it. His rhetorical training, extensive learning, and comparative clearness of style, no doubt did good service in the cause of his school. Nevertheless, he is charged with inconsistencies and contradictions; his later views being frequently at variance with his earlier ones. (Ennap. Vit. Porph. fin.; Euseb. Proepr. Ev. iv. 10; Lamb.-ap. Stobaeum. EcL. i. p. 866). The reason of this may probably be found in the vacillation of his views with respect to theology and philosophy, a vacillation which would doubtless attract the greater attention, as it was in opposition to the general tendencies of his age and schol that he ranked philosophy higher than the theurgic superstitions which were connected with the popular polytheism. With the latter, some features of his doctrines had considerable affinity. He insisted strongly on the contrast between the corporeal and the incorporeal, and the power of the latter over the former. The influence of the incorporeal was, in his view, unrestricted by the limits of space, and independent of the accident of contiguity. When free from intermixture with matter, it is omnipresent, and its power unlimited. His doctrine with regard to daemons pointed in the same direction. Over both them and the souls of the dead power could be obtained by enchantments (de Abst. ii. 38, 39, 41, 43, 47). Yet these notions seem to have been taken up by him rather in deference to the prevalent opinion of his times, than as forming an essential part of his philosophy. Though at first somewhat disposed to favour theurgy, he still ranked philosophy above it, considering, with Plotinus, that the true method of safety consisted in the purification of the soul, and the contemplation of the eternal deity. The increasing value set upon theurgy, and the endeavours to raise it above philosophy itself, probably produced something like a reaction in his mind, and strengthened the doubts which he entertained with regard to the popular superstition. These doubts he set forth in a letter to the Egyptian prophet Anoebo, in a series of questions. The distrust there expressed connecting the popular notions of the gods, divinations, incantations, and other theurgic arts, may have been, as Ritter believes (Gesch. der Phil. vol. iv. p. 678), the modified opinion of his later years, provoked, perhaps, by the progress of that superstition to which at an earlier period he had been less opposed. The observation of Augustine is, doubtless, in the main correct:—"Ut videos eum inter virium sacraliae curiositas et philosophiae professionem fluctuasse, et nunc hanc artem tamquam fallacem, et in ipsa actione periculosum, et legibus prohibitam, cavendum monere, nunc autem velut ejus laudatorius cedentem, utilem dicere esse mundanea partem animae, non quidem intellectuall qua rerum intelligibilium per-cipitur veritas, nulas habentiam similitudines corporum, sed spirituali, qua rerum corporalius exsanguatur imaginem." The letter to Anoebo called forth a reply, which is still extant, and known under the title Περὶ Μαρτυρίων, and is the production probably of Iamblichus. The worship of the national gods seems to have been upheld by Porphyrius only on the consideration that respect should be shown to the ancient religious usages of the nation. He, however, set but small store by it. (Βωύσι δὲ θεοῦ ἐρωτηματικοῖς μὲν οὖν βλάπτωσιν, ἐμφάνισιν δὲ οὐ οὐκ ἄρκει, ad Marc.) He acknowledged one absolute, supreme deity, who is to be worshipped with pure words and thoughts (ad Marc. 18). He also, however, distinguished two classes of visible and invisible gods, the former being composed of body and soul, and consequently neither eternal nor immutable (de Abst. ii. 34, 36, 37—39). He also distinguished between good and evil daemons, and held that the latter ought to be appeased, but that it should be the object of the philosopher to free himself as much as possible from everything placed under the power of evil daemons. For that reason, among others, he rejected all animal sacrifices (de Abst. ii. 38, 39, 43). The ascetic tendency of his philosophy, as connected with his exalted ideas of the power of reason, which is superior to nature and the influence of daemons, conducted to raise him above the superstitions tendencies of his age; the spirit of the philosopher being, in his view, superior to all impressions from without. The object of the philosopher should be to free himself as much as possible from all desires of, or dependence on, that which is external, such appetites being the most hateful tyrants, from which we should be glad to be set free, even with the loss of the whole body (ad Marc. 34). We should, therefore, restrain our sensibilities as much as possible. It was mainly in this point of view that he rejected all enjoyment of animal food. Though bad genii have some power over us, yet through abstinence and the steady resistance of all disturbing influences, we can pursue the good in spite of them. If we could abstain from vegetable as well as animal food, he thought we should become still more like the gods. (De Abst. iii. 27.) It is by means of reason only that we are exalted to the supreme God, to whom nothing material should be offered, for every thing material is unclear (de Abst. i. 39, 57, ii. 34, ad Marci. 15). He distinguishes four degrees of virtues, the lowest being political virtue, the virtue of a good man who moderates his passions. Su-ior to this is purifying virtue, which completely sets the soul free from affections. Its object is to make us resemble God, and by it we become daemonical men, or good daemons. In the higher grade, when entirely given up to knowledge and the soul, man becomes a god, till at last he lives only to reason, and so becomes the father of gods, one with the one supreme being. (Sent. 34.)

A great deal of discussion has taken place respecting the assertion of Socrates (H. E. iii. 29), that in his earlier years Porphyrius was a Christian, and that, having been treated with indignity by the Christians, he apostatized, and revenged himself by writing against them. The authority is so small, and the improbability of the story so great (for it does not appear that any of his antagonists charged him with apostacy, unless it was Eusebius), while it may so easily have arisen from the fact that in his early youth Porphyrius was instructed by Origen, that it may confidently be rejected. An able summary of the arguments on both sides is given by Brucker (ii. p. 231, &c.). Of the nature and merits of the work of Porphyrius against the Christians we are not able to judge, as it has not come down to us. It was publicly destroyed by order of the emperor Theodosius. The attack was, however, sufficiently vigorous to call down upon him the fiercest maladies and most virulent abuse. His name was employed as synonymous with everything silly, blasphemous, impudent and calumnious. Socrates (i. 9. p. 32) even adds an edict of Constantine the Great, ordaining that the Arians should be termed Porphyrian. A doubt has been raised as to the identity of the assailant of Christianity with the Neo-platonist philosopher; but it is totally without foundation. The attack upon Christianity is said to have called forth replies from above thirty different antagonists, the most distinguished of whom were Methodius, Apollinaris, and Eusebius.

As a writer Porphyrius deserves considerable praise. His style is tolerably clear, and not unfrequently exhibits both imagination and vigour. His learning was most extensive. Fabricius (Bibl., PORPHYRIUS.

Græc. vol. v. p. 748, &c.), has compiled a list of about 250 authors quoted by him in those portions of his writings which we still possess. A great degree of critical and philosophical acumen was not to be expected in one so ardently attached to the enthusiastic and somewhat fanatical system of Plotinus. His attempt to prove the identity of the Platonic and Aristotelian systems would alone be sufficient to show this. Nevertheless, his acquaintance with the authors whom he quotes was manifestly far from superficial; but his judgment in using the stores of learning which he possessed was but small. Cyril (Adv. Jul. vi. init.) quotes a passage from his history of philosophers, from which it appears that his account of Socrates was a mere farrago of the most absurd and calamitous stories respecting that philosopher. Indeed, his object would seem to have been to magnify Pythagoras at the expense of every other philosopher. Though far less confused and unintelligible than Plotinus, his statements of his own metaphysical views are often far from comprehensible. (See especially his Πρὸς τὰ νοητὰ διάφοραι.)

Of the very numerous writings of Porphyrius the following are extant:—1. Πιθυδαγόροος βίος; supposed by many to be a fragment of his larger history of philosophers. 2. Περὶ Πλωτίνου Βίου και τῆς τάξεως τῶν βιβλίων αὐτοῦ. [Plotinus]. 3. Περὶ αποψείς τῶν ἑμίψεως, in four books, dedicated to his friend and fellow-disciple Firmus Castricius. 4. Fragments of his epistle Πρὸς Ἀνέκδος τῶν Ἀρνίστων. Large quotations from this work are made by Eusebius in his Praeparatio Evangelica. 5. Πρὸς τὰ νοητὰ διάφορα, 6. Ὀρθριανὴ ἱστορία, addressed to Anatolius. 7. Περὶ τοῦ Ἀφόγου τῶν ἐν Ἡσύασι καὶ ἐν ὸρθοσίᾳ phaeno-graphic, allegorical interpretation of the description of the cave of the nymphs in the Odyssey, showing both the ingenuity and the recklessness with which Porphyrius and other writers of his stamp pressed writers and authorities of all kinds into their service, as holders of the doctrines of their school.

8. A fragment from a treatise Περὶ Στυγνὸς, preserved by Stobaeus. 9. Εἰσαγωγή, or Περὶ τῶν πέντε φωνῶν, addressed to Chrysolorus, and written by Porphyrius while in Sicily. It is commonly prefixed to the Organon of Aristotle. 10. A Commentary on the Categories of Aristotle, in questions and answers. 11. Some fragments of a Commentary on Aristotle's books Περὶ φυσικῆς ἀκροάσεως.

12. A Commentary on the Harmonica of Ptolemaeus, leaving off at the seventh chapter of the second book. 13. Περὶ προφασίας (see Villosio, Aneccl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 103—118). 14. Scholia on the Iliad, preserved among the books and papers of Is. Vossianus. A portion of them was published by Valckener, in an appendix to Ursinus's Virgil, with a copious account of the scholia generally. Other scholia on the Iliad, preserved in the Vatican library, were published by Villosio (Aneccl. Gr. ii. p. 266, &c.), and in his edition of the Iliad. 15. Portions of a Commentary, apparently on the Ethics of Aristotle, and of one on the Organon. 16. Two books on the philosophy of Plato were affirmed to be extant by Genzer. 17. An epistle to his wife Marcella. This piece was discovered by Angelo Mai, in the Ambrosian library, and published at Milan, in 1816. The letter is not quite complete, as the end of the MS. is mutilated. The contents of it are of a general philosophical character, designed to incite to the practice of virtue and self-restraint, and the study of philosophy. The sentiments are a little obscure here and there, but many of the maxims and remarks exhibit great wisdom, and a considerable depth of very pure religious feeling. He considers sorrow to be a more wholesome discipline for the mind than pleasures (c. 7). With great energy and some eloquence he urges the cultivation of the soul and the practice of virtue, in preference to attention to the body. His views of the Deity, of his operations, and the right mode of contemplating and worshiping him, are of a very exalted kind, some reminding the reader strongly of passages in the Scriptures. The laws under which man is placed he distinguishes into natural, civil, and divine, and marks out their respective provinces with considerable beauty and clearness. 18. A poetical fragment, from the tenth book of a work entitled Περὶ τῆς ἐκ λογίων φιλοσοφίας, is published at the end of the preceding work. 19. An introduction to the Tetrabiblos of Ptolemaeus is also attributed by some to Porphyrius, by others to Antiochus. The έξίωνυμοι δηηρίας εἰς τὰ καθ’ Οὐμήνα πλάνα τοῦ Ὀδυσσέως, the work of Nichephorus Gregoras, has also been attributed by some to Porphyrius.

Besides these we have mention of the following lost works of Porphyrius:—20. Περὶ φανερῶν (Euseb. Praep. Ev. iii. 7; Stob. Eccl. Phys. i. 25). 21. Περὶ ἀνδρὸς ψυχῆς (August. de Civ. Dei. x. 910, &c.). 22. Περὶ τοῦ μαίαν εἰς τὴν Πλάτωνα καὶ Ἀριστοτέλην ἀφειν. (Sud. s. v. Porph.).

31. A treatise against a spurious work attributed to Zoroaster (Porph. Vit. Pol. 15.). 32. Περὶ τῶν δυνάμων. (Sud.). 33. Εἰς τὸ θεοφράστου περὶ κατασφάσεως καὶ ἀποφάσεως. (Boethius in Arist. de Interv.). 34. Εἰς τὸ θεοφράστου πρὸς οἰκονομίαν, πρὸς Ἀριστερήν. (Sud.). 35. Εἰς Ἱονίους. (Porph. Vit. Pol. 20.). 36. Οἱ τῶν θεῷν γάμοι, a poem composed for the birth-day of Plato. (Ibid. 15.). 37. Εἰς τὴν τοῦ Ἡλίαν ἡλιακοῦν φιλοσοφικοῦ ἱστορίαν (Sud.). 38. Εἰς τὴν Μουσικανήν τέχνην. (Sud.). 39. Οἱ πρὸς Νεμέρτων λόγοι. (Cycl. c. Julianus. iii. p. 79, &c.). It appears to have been a treatise on the providence of God. 40. Ὑπερὶ τοῦ τοῦ ὁφηντὴ τῆς τούμημα. (Porph. Vit. Pol. 18.) 41. Περὶ τῆς Ὀμῆρου φιλοσοφίας. (Sud.). 42. Περὶ τῆς Ὀμηροῦ φύλετας τῶν βασιλέων, in ten books. 43. Περὶ παρακατεύμενῶν τῷ ποιητή ὑπομεναντίων. This and the two preceding were probably, only parts of a larger work. 44. Περὶ τῶν κατὰ Πιθανοῦ τοῦ Νεῖλου τήνυχα. (Sud.). 45. Commentaries on several of the works of Plotinus. (Eunap. Vit. Porph.). 46. Εἰς τὸν Σφαλτὸν τοῦ Πλατανοῦ. (Boethius, de Divis. Praet. 49.). 47. Comments on the Tetrabiblos of Ptolemaeus, in ten books. (Sud.). 48. Εἰς τὸν Τίμαιον ὑπομεναντίων, a commentary on the Timaeeus of Plato. (Macrobi. in Somn. Scip. ii. 3;
Porphyrius, in Timaeum.) 51. Peri ὑπότ, in 6 books. (Suid.) 52. Φιλόσωφος ἱστορία, in 5 books. (Suid.; Euseb. Praep. Ev. x. 3, who quotes a passage of some length from the first book.) 53. Φιλόσωφος ἱστορία, in 4 books, a work on the lives and doctrines of philosophers. (Socrates, Hist. E. iii. 39; Eunapi. Pr. p. 10.) 54. Περὶ τῶν ψυχῶν δυ&ναμῶν. (Suid. Eolag.) 56. Καρτ Χριστιανῶν, in 15 books. This celebrated work exhibited considerable acquaintance with both the Jewish and the Christian Scriptures. In the first book he treated of the discrepancies and contradictions in the Scriptures themselves, endeavouring in that way to show that they were of human, and not of divine origin. He seems to have laid considerable stress on the dispute between Paul and Peter. (Hieron, Comment. in Epist. ad Galat. praef.) In the third book he treated of the modes of interpreting the Scriptures, attacking the allegories of Origenes. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 19.) In the fourth book he treated of the Mosaic history and the antiquities of the Jews. (Euseb. l. c. i. f.) The 12th was one of the most celebrated books. In it he attacked the book of the prophecies of Daniel (Hieron. Comment. in Dom., maintaining that it was the production of a contemporary of Antiochus Epiphanes. On the refutation of this Eusebius, Apollinaris, and Methodius bestowed considerable labour. A good deal of the contents of this book is known from St. Jerome's commentary on the book of Daniel. The 13th book either entirely or in part treated of the same subject. A number of somewhat quibbling objections were also brought by Porphyrius against the history of the Gospels. (Hieron. Epist. C. ad Panorm., Ad. Polag. ii., Quest. Heb. in Gen. &c.) It seems that though he charged the Christians with having perverted the doctrines of Christ, he acknowledged the latter as an eminent sage. (Euseb. Dem. Evang. iii. 6. p. 134.) (Fabric. Bibl. Græca, vol. v. p. 725, &c.; Holsteinus, de Vita et Scriptis Porphyri; Ritter, Geschichte der Philosophie, xiii. c. 2, vol. iv. p. 606, &c.; Lardner, Credibility of the Gospel History, part 2. chap. xxvii.)

Porphyrius, Publius Optatianus, a Roman poet, who lived in the age of Constantine the Great. From his panegyric on this emperor, we learn that he had been banished for some reason; and Constantine was so pleased with the flattery of the poet, that he not only recalled him from exile, but honoured him with a letter. Hieronymus says that he was restored to his native country in A.D. 328; but the panegyric must have been presented to Constantine in A.D. 326, as in the manuscript it is said to have been composed in the Vicennalia of the emperor, which were celebrated in this year, and likewise from the fact that the poet praises Crispus, the son of Constantine, who was put to death by order of his father in A.D. 326. We may therefore conclude that the panegyric was written in the previous year, and was intended to celebrate the Vicennalia of the emperor. It is probable that Publius, after his return, was raised to offices of honour and trust, since Tillemont points out (Histoire des Empereurs, vol. iv. p. 364), from an ancient writer on the praefects of the city, that there was that a Publius Optatianus, praefect of the city in A.D. 329, and again in 333, and it is likely enough that he was the same person as the poet. This is all that we know for certain respecting his life. From the way in which he speaks of Africa, it has been conjectured that he was a native of that province; and this is not unlikely, as the name of Optatus and Optatianus was a common one in Africa.

The poems of Porphyrius are some of the worst specimens of a dying literature. The author has purposely made them exceedingly difficult to be understood; and their merit in his eyes, and in those of his contemporaries, seems to have consisted in the artificial manner in which he was able to represent, by lines of various lengths, different objects, such as an altar, an organ, &c. The poems which have come down to us are:

I. The Panegyric on Constantine, already mentioned, which consists properly of a series of short poems, all of them celebrating the praises of the emperor. There is prefixed a letter of Porphyrius to Constantine, and also a letter from the latter to the poet. This poem has been printed by Pithoecus, Poëmat. Vet. Paris, 1590, 12mo. and Genev. 1598, 8vo., and by Velserus, Augustae Vindel. 1595, fo.

II. Epithalamia, of which we have three, namely, I. Ara Pythia, 2. Syrius, 3. Organon, with the lines so arranged as to represent the form of these objects. These three poems are printed in Wernsdorff's Poëtae Latini Minores (vol. ii., pp. 365—413), who also discusses at length everything relating to the life and works of Porphyrius.

III. Epigrams, of which five are printed in the Latin Anthology (Nos. 236—240, ed. Meyer).

PORPHYROGENITUS, a surname of Constantius VII. [See Vol. I. p. 840.]

PorriMa. [Postverita.]

Porsena*, or Poirenna, Lars†, king of the Etruscan town of Clusium, plays a distinguished part in the legends of the Tarquins. According to the common tale, as related by Livy, Tarquinius Superbus, on his expulsion from Rome, applied first to Veii and Tarquinius for assistance; and when the people of these towns failed in restoring him to his kingdom, he next repaired to Lars Porsera, who willingly espoused his cause, and forthwith marched against Rome at

* The quantity of the penultimate is doubtful. We might infer from the form Porserena that the penultimate was long, but we sometimes find it short in the poets. Niebuhr indeed asserts that Martial (Epigr. xiv. 98) was guilty of a decided blunder in shortening the penultimate; but Mr. Macaulay points out (Laws of Ancient Rome, p. 45) that other Latin poets have committed the same decided blunder, as Horace's pure iambic line (Epod. xvi. 4),

"Minacis aut Etrusca Porserena manus," and Silius Italicus in several passages. The penultimate, however, is not short in all the Latin poets, as the line of Virgil proves (Aen. viii. 646),

"Nec non Tarquinium ejectum Porserena jubebat," and the Greek writers make it long, Πορσίφας, Plut. Pubb. 16, Πορσόνας, Dionys. v. 21, &c. It would, therefore, seem that the word was pronounced indifferently either Porşena or Porsena.

† Lars, Lar or Lorth, was a title of honour, given to almost all the Etruscan kings or chiefs. (Comp. Müller, Etruscur, vol. i. pp. 405, 408.)
the head of a vast army. The Romans could not meet him in the field; he took possession of the hill Janiculum, and would have entered the city by the bridge which connected Rome with the Janiculum, had it not been for the superhuman prowess of Horatius Cocles, who kept the whole Etruscan army at bay, while his comrades broke down the bridge behind him. [GOLDS.] The Etruscans resolved to lay siege to the city, which soon began to suffer from famine. Thereupon a young Roman, named C. Mucius, resolved to deliver his country by murdering the invading king. He accordingly went over to the Etruscan camp, but ignorant of the person of Porsona, killed the royal secretary instead. Seized, and threatened with torture, he thrust his right hand into the fire on the altar, and there let it burn, to show how little he heeded pain. Astonished at his courage, the king bade him depart in peace; and Scevola, as he was henceforward called, told him, out of gratitude, to make peace with Rome, since three hundred noble youths, he said, had sworn to take the life of the king, and he was the first upon whom the lot had fallen. The story then went on to relate that Porsona forthwith offered peace to the Romans, on condition of their restoring to the Veientines the land which they had taken from them: that these terms were accepted, and that Porsona withdrew his troops from the Janiculum after receiving twenty hostages from the Romans. It is further stated that he subsequently restored these hostages [compare CLOELIA], and also the land which had been given up to the Veientines. (Liv. ii. 9—15; comp. Dionys. v. 21—34; Plut. Public. 16—19.)

Such was the tale by which Roman vanity concealed one of the earliest and greatest disasters of the city. The real fact is, that Rome was completely conquered by Porsona. This is expressly stated by Tacitus (Hist. iii. 72), and is confirmed by other writers. Thus, Dionysius relates (v. 34) that the senate sent Porsona an ivory throne, a sceptre, a golden crown and a triumphal robe, which implies that they did homage to him as their sovereign lord; for we find that the Etruscan cities are represented to have sent the same honours to the Roman king Tarquinius Priscus as an acknowledgment of his supremacy. (Dionys. iii. 62.) So thorough was the subjection of the Romans that they were expressly prohibited from using iron for any other purpose but agriculture. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 14. s. 39.) Even the common story related, that they were deprived of the land which they had taken from the Veientines; and Niebuhr shows that they lost all the territory which the kings had gained on the right bank of the Tiber, and that they did not recover it till a long time afterwards. He remarks that we find the thirty tribes, which were established by Servius Tullius, reduced to twenty after the war with Porsona, and that it appears clear from the history of the subsequent war with the Veientines that the Roman territory did not then extend much beyond the Janiculum.

The Romans, however, did not long remain subject to the Etruscans. After the conquest of Rome, Aruns, the son of Porsona, proceeded to attack Aricia, but was defeated before the city by the united forces of the Latin cities, assisted by the Greeks of Cumae. (Liv. ii. 15; Dionys. v. 38, vii. 2—11.) The Etruscans appear, in consequence, to have been confined to their own territory on the right bank of the Tiber, and the Romans to have availed themselves of the opportunity to recover their independence. The Romans of a later age were constantly reminded of Porsona’s expedition against their city by the custom at all auctions of offering for sale first the goods of king Porsona. (Liv. ii. 14; Plut. Public. 10.) Niebuhr conjectures, with much probability, that this custom may have arisen from the circumstance that, when the Romans recovered their independence, they must have obtained possession of property within the city belonging to Porsona, which they probably sold by auction.

The object of Porsona’s expedition against Rome is said to have been the restoration of the Tarquins, and it is natural that such should have been the belief in later times, happening, as the war did, within a year or two of the establishment of the republic. But if such had been its real object, the Tarquins must have been restored to Rome on the conquest of the city. It is, therefore, more natural to believe that this war was in reality a great outbreak of the Etruscan nations, who meditated the conquest of Latium, and attacked Rome first, because it was the first city that lay in their way. K. O. Müller even goes so far in opposition to the old tale, as to conjecture that it was Porsona, who expelled the Tarquins from Rome. (Etrusk. vol. i. p. 122.)

The sepulchre of Porsona at Clusium is described at length by Pliny, who borrowed his account from Varro. (H. N. xxxvi. 19. § 4.) It was said to have been an enormous quadrilateral building, each side being three hundred feet long, and fifty feet high. Within was an extraordinary labyrinth, and over the labyrinth were five pyramids, one at each corner and one in the middle, each pyramid being seventy-five wide at the base, and a hundred and fifty feet high. There are other details given, which are still more wonderful, and it is evident that the building, as described by Varro, is a work of the imagination. It is not impossible that he may have seen some remains of a building, which was said to be the tomb of Porsona, and that he found in Etruscan books the description which he has given.

(Respecting the sepulchre of Porsona, see Müller, Etrusk. vol. ii. p. 224, &c., and Le- tronne, Annal. dell’ Instit. arch. 1829, p. 391; and respecting the history of Porsona in general, see Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. pp. 541—551, and Arnold, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. pp. 125—127.)

PORTHAI’ON (Πόρθαϊον). 1. A son of Agenor and Epicaste, was king of Pleuron and Calydon in Aetolia, and married to Euryte, by whom he became the father of Oeneus, Agrius, Alcathous, Melas, Leucoples, and Sterope. (Hom. H. xiv. 115, &c.; Apollod. i. 7. § 7, &c.; Paus. iv. 35. § 1, vi. 20. § 8, 21. § 7; Hygin. F. A. 175.) It should be observed that his name is sometimes written Porthous (Heyne ad Apollod. I. c.), and under this name he is mentioned by Antonius Liberalis (2) who calls him a son of Ares.

PORTICA’NUS. [OXYCANUS.]

PORTU’NUS or PORTUMNUS, the protecting genius of harbours among the Romans. He was invoked to grant a happy return from a voyage. Hence a temple was erected to him at PORUS.

the port of the Tiber, from whence the road descended to the port of Ostia. At his temple an annual festival, the Portunalia, was celebrated on the 17th of August. (Varro, De Ling. Lat. vi. 19; Arnob. iii. 23; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 26; Virg. Aen. v. 241.) He was represented with a key in his hand, portus as well as porta signifying a place which can be closed. At the time when the Romans became familiar with Greek mythology, Portunus was identified with the Greek Palaemon (Festus, s. v. Portunus, p. 242, ed. Müller; comp. Palaemon.) [L. S.]

PORUS (Πορος), the Greek form of the name of two Indian kings at the period of Alexander's invasion. Bohlen (Das ale Indien, vol. i. p. 91) considers it to be a corruption of the Sanscrit "Parusha," which signifies a hero.

1. King of the Indian provinces east of the river Hydaspes, which appears to have formed the boundary of his dominions on the west. It was here, accordingly, that he prepared to meet the invader, and, far from following the example of Taxilis and Abisesar, who had sent embassies of submission to Alexander, he assembled a large army, with which he occupied the left bank of the river. On the arrival of the king on the opposite side, the forces of Porus, and especially his elephants (more than 200 in number), presented so formidable an aspect that Alexander did not venture to attempt the passage in the face of them, but sought by delay, and by repeated feigned attempts at crossing, to lull the vigilance of the Indian monarch into security. These devices were partly successful, and at length Alexander, leaving Craterus with the main body of his army encamped opposite to Porus, effected the passage of the river himself, advanced on the higher side, with a force of 6000 foot and 5000 horse. Porus immediately despatched his son, with a select body of cavalry, to check the march of the invaders, while he himself followed with all his best troops. The battle that ensued was one of the most severely contested which occurred during the whole of Alexander's campaigns. Porus displayed much skill and judgment in the disposition of his forces, but his schemes were baffled by the superior generalship of his adversary, and his whole army at length thrown into confusion. Still the Indian king maintained his ground, and it was not till the troops around him were utterly routed, and he himself severely wounded in the shoulder, that he consented to quit the field. Alexander was struck with his courage, and sent emissaries in pursuit of him to assure him of safety. Hereupon Porus surrendered, and was conducted to the conqueror, of whom he proudly demanded to be treated in a manner worthy of a king. This magnanimity at once conciliated the favour of Alexander, who received him with the utmost honour, and not only restored to him his dominions, but increased them by large accessions of territory. (Arrian, Anab. v. 8, 9, 19, 20, 21; Curt. viii. 13, 14; Diod. xvii. 87—89; Plut. Alex. 60; Justin. xii. 8; Strab. xv. pp. 686, 691, 698.)

* It was fought, according to Arrian, in the month of Munychion, in the archonship of Hege- men, i.e. April or May, b.c. 326: but this date is subject to many difficulties. (See Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 138; Droysen, Gesch. Alex. p. 400, note; and Thirlwall's Greece, vol. vii. p. 22, note.)

POSEIDIPPOS.

From this time Porus became firmly attached to his generous conqueror. He accompanied Alexander on his expedition against the neighbouring Indian tribes; but after he had crossed the Acesines, was sent back to his own territory to raise an additional force, with which he rejoined the king at Sangala, and rendered him effective assistance against the Cathaenae, a tribe with whom he himself was previously on terms of hostility. He subsequently accompanied Alexander with an auxiliary force as far as the banks of the Hyphasis, and after his return contributed actively to the equipment of his fleet. For these services he was rewarded by the king with the government of the whole region from the Hydaspes to the Hyphasis, including, it is said, several thousand villages and above two thousand cities. (Arrian, Anab. v. 22, 24, 29, vi. 2; Curt. ix. 2, § 5, 3, § 22; Diod. xvii. 93.) These dominions he continued to hold unmolested until the death of Alexander, and was allowed to retain them (apparently with the title of king) in the division of the provinces after that event, as well as in the subsequent partition at Triparadeison, b.c. 321. Probably the generals were aware how difficult it would have been to dispossess him. Endemus, however, who had been left in command of the Macedonian troops in the adjacent province, was able to decy Porus into his power, and treacherously put him to death. (Diod. viii. 3, xix. 14; Curt. x. 1. § 20; Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 72, a.)

We are told that Porus was a man of gigantic stature—not less than five cubits in height; and his personal strength and prowess in war were not less conspicuous than his valor. 2. Another Porus, a Thracian, who, at the time of Alexander's expedition, ruled over the district termed Gandaris, east of the river Hydnetes. He was a cousin of the preceding, but on hostile terms with him, which led him on the approach of Alexander to court the alliance of the Macedonian king, and to send envoys with offers of submission to the invader, both before and after the defeat of Porus. But on learning the favour with which his kinsman had been treated by Alexander, he became alarmed for his own safety, and fled on the approach of the conqueror. His dominions were subdued by Hephaestion, and annexed to those of his kinsman. (Arrian. Anab. v. 20, 21; Strab. xv. p. 669.) [E. H. B.]

POSICA, M. PINAURIUS, praetor b.c. 181, obtained Sardina as his province. He crossed over to Corsica, and put down an insurrection in that island, and on his return to Sardina carried on war with successes against the Ilissenses, a people who had not hitherto been completely subdued. (Livy. xI. 13, 25, 34.) Cicero speaks of a M. Pinarus Rusca, who brought forward a lex annalis, which was opposed by M. Servilius (de Orat. ii. 65), but as this Pinarus Rusca is not mentioned elsewhere, it has been conjectured that we ought to read Posca instead.

POSEIDIPPUS or POSIDIPPUS (Ποσίδιππος, Pozidippus), both forms are found in MSS.; the inscription on the statue in the Vatican gives the former). 1. An Athenian comic poet of the New Comedy, was the son of Cynicus, and a native of Cassandreia in Macedonia. He is one of the six who are mentioned by the anonymous writer on Comedy (p. xxx.), as the most celebrated poets of the New Comedy. In time, he was the last, not only of these six, but of all the poets of the New Comedy. He began to exhibit dramas in the third year after the death of Menander, that is, in Ol. 122. 3, b.c. 289, so that his time falls just at the era in Greek literary history which is marked by the accession of Ptolemy Philadelphus. (Suid. s. v.; Clinton, F. II. vol. ii. s. a. and p. ii.)

Of the events of the poet’s life nothing is known; but his portrait is preserved to us in the beautiful sitting statue in the Vatican, which, with the accompanying statue of Menander, is esteemed by Winckelmann and others as among the finest works of Greek sculpture which have come down to us. (Visconti, Mus. Pio-Clem. vol. iii. pp. 16—21; Winckelmann, Vorlöffige Abhandlung, c. iv. § 126; see also the description by Schlegel, quoted under MENANDER, Vol. II. p. 1031, b.)

Athenaeus (xiv. p. 652, d.) mentions a letter of the comic poet and grammarian, Lyneus of Samos, to Poseidippus.

In his language, Meineke (p. 484) has detected some new words, and old words in new senses, totally unknown to the best Attic writers.

According to Suidas, he wrote forty plays, of which the following eighteen titles are preserved: Ἀργαλέων, Ἀττικελών, Γαλάτης, Δήμος, Ἐμμαθρίδης, Ἐνταστῷος, Εὔφρατης, Κάθων, Δορίδης, Μεταφόρμημα, Μόρις, Ὀμοιος, Παῦλος, Παιδώρια, Σύντροφος, Φιλόδορος, Φιλοτάτως, Χαριτούος. The extant fragments of these plays are not sufficient to enable us to form an accurate judgment of the poet’s style; but it seems, from the titles, that some of his plays were of a licentious character. Gellius (ii. 23) mentions him among the Greek comedians who some were imitated by the Latin poets. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 489; 490; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 482—484; vol. iv. pp. 513—523, ed. Minor, pp. 1141—1149.)

2. An epigrammatic poet, who was probably a different person from the comic poet, since he is mentioned with the appellation ὁ ἐπιγραμματογράφος (Schozl in Apoll. Rhod. i. 1289). He seems, however, to have lived about the same time as the comic poet, since Ζενο and Cleantus, who were contemporary with the latter, are mentioned in one of his epigrams (No. 11), and another epigram (No. 21) is upon the temple which Ptolemy Philadelphus erected in honour of his sister and wife Arsinoë. (ARSINOE.) He is several times referred to by Athenaeus, Stephanus Byzantinus, and the grammarians. His epigrams formed a part of the Gardejand of Melaerop, who appears to mention him as a Sicilian (Prooc. 45, 46); and twenty-two of them are preserved in the Greek Anthology; but some of these are also ascribed to Asclepiades and Callimachus. One of his epigrams, that on the statue of Opportunity by Lysippus (No. 13), is imitated by Ausonius (Epig. 12.)

Athenaeus (xiii. p. 596, c.) quotes the Ἀλνωία of Poseidippus, and elsewhere his Ἀκρωνία, which seem to have been epic poems, and which Schweighäuser is probably right in referring to the author of the epigrams. (Brunck, Anot. vol. ii. pp. 46, 51, 528; Jacobs, Athn. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 46—52; vol. xiii. pp. 942, 943; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 493.)

3. An historian, who wrote a work respecting Cnidus, which contained several particulars respecting the Venus of Praxiteles. ( Clem. Alex. Protrep. pp. 16, 17; Arnob. vi. 13.) He is also cited by Tzetzes, who concludes his quotation with an epigram by Poseidippus (Chil. vii. 144). From this and other circumstancées it appears very probable that this historian was the same person as the epigrammatist. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 491, ed. Westermann.)

POSEIDON.

POSEIDON (Ποσείδων), the god of the Mediterranean sea. His name seems to be connected with πότας, πόντος and ποταμός, according to which he is the god of the fluid element. (Müller, Proleg. p. 290.) He was a son of Kronos and Rea (whence he is called Ῥηγών and by Latin poets Sauromates, Find. ol. vi. 48; Virg. poet. v. 799.) He was accordingly a brother of Zeus, Hades, Hera, Hestia and Demeter, and it was determined by lot that he should rule over the sea. (Hom. II. xiv. 156, xv. 187, &c.; Hes. Theog. 456.) Like his brothers and sisters, he was, after his birth, swallowed by his father Cronus, but thrown up again. (Apollod. i. 1. § 5, 2.) According to others, he was concealed by Rea, after his birth, among a flock of lambs, and his mother pretended to have given birth to a young horse, which she gave to Cronus to devour. A well in the neighbourhood of Martinia, where this is said to have happened, was believed, from this circumstance, to have derived the name of the “Lamb’s Well,” or Arne. (Paus. viii. § 8.) According to Tzetzes (ad Lycop. 644) the nurse of Poseidon bore the name of Arne; when Cronus searched after his son, Arne is said to have declared that she knew not where he was, and from her the town of Arne was believed to have received its name. According to others, again, he was brought up by the Telchines at the request of Rea. (Diod. v. 55.) In the earliest poems, Poseidon is described as indeed equal to Zeus in dignity, but weaker. (Hom. II. viii. 210, xv. 165, 186, 209; comp. xiii. 355, Od. xii. 148.) Hence we find him angry when Zeus, by haughty words, attempts to intimidate him; nay, he even threatens his mightier brother, and once he conspired with Hera and Athena to put him into chains. (Hom. II. xv. 176, &c., 212, &c.; comp. i. 400.) But, on the other hand, we also find him yielding and submissive to Zeus (viii. 440). The palace of Poseidon was in the depth of the sea near Aegae in Euboea, beginning (xiii. 21; Od. v. 301), where he kept his horses with brazen hoofs and golden manes. With these horses he rides in a chariot over the waves of the sea, which become smooth as he approaches, and the monsters of the deep recognise him and play around his chariot. (Ili. xxii. 27; comp. Virg. Aen. v. 817, &c., i. 147; Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1240, &c.) Generally he himself put his horses to his chariot, but sometimes he was assisted by Amphitrite. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 1158, iv. 1225; Eurip. Androm. 1011; Virg. Aen. v. 817.) But although he generally dwelt in the sea, still he also appears in Olympus in the assembly of the gods. (Hom. II. viii. 440, xii. 34, 352, xx. 161, 190, xx. 13.) Poseidon in conjunction with Apollo is said to have built the walls of Troy for Laomedon (vii. 452; Eurip. Androm. 1014), whence Troy is called Ναυτικόν Περγαμόν (Neptunia Pergamen). (Virg. Aen. v. 810.) Accordingly, although he was otherwise well disposed towards the Greeks, yet he was jealous of the wall which the Greeks built around their own ships, and he lamented the inglorious manner in which the walls erected by himself fell by the hands of the Greeks. (Hom. II. xii. 17, 28, &c.) When Poseidon and Apollo had built the walls of Troy, Laomedon refused to give them the reward which had been stipulated, and even dismissed them with threats (xxi. 443); but Poseidon sent a marine monster, which was on the point of devouring Laomedon's daughter, when it was killed by Heracles. (Apollod. ii. 5 § 9.) For this reason Poseidon like Hera bore an implacable hatred against the Trojans, from which not even Aeneas was excepted (Hom. II. xx. 293, &c.; comp. Virg. Aen. v. 810; II. xii. 459, xxiv. 26, xx. 312, &c.), and took an active part in the war against Troy, in which he sided with the Greeks, sometimes witnessing the contest as a spectator from the heights of Thrace, and sometimes interfering in person, assuming the appearance of a mortal hero and encouraging the Greeks, while Zeus favoured the Trojans. (II. xiii. 12, &c., 44, &c., 200, 351, 357, 677, xiv. 136, 510.)

When Zeus permitted the gods to assist whichever party they pleased, Poseidon joining the Greeks, took part in the war, and caused the earth to tremble; he was opposed by Apollo, who, however, did not like to fight against his uncle. (II. xx. 23, 34, 57, 67, xxi. 436, &c.) In the Odyssey, Poseidon appears hostile to Odysseus, whom he prevents from returning home in consequence of his having blinded Polyphemus, a son of Poseidon by the nymph Thoosa. (Hom. Od. i. 29, 68, v. 286, &c., 306, &c., 423, xi. 101, &c., xiii. 125; Od. Trist. i. 2. 9.)

Being the ruler of the sea (the Mediterranean), he is described as gathering clouds and calling forth storms, but at the same time he has in his power to grant a successful voyage and save those who are in danger; and other marine divinities are subject to him. As the sea surrounds and holds the earth, he himself is described as the god who holds the earth (γαϊοχόης), and who has it in his power to shake the earth (σωτῆι δαίμων, κομπὰρ γαῖς). He was further regarded as the creator of the horse, and was accordingly believed to have taught men the art of managing horses by the bridle, and to have been the originator and protector of horse races. (Hom. II. xxii. 307, 584; Pind. Pyth. vi. 50; Soph. Oed. Col. 712, &c.) Hence he was also represented on horseback, or riding in a chariot drawn by two or four horses, and is designated by the epithets ἔπαινος, ἔπαινος, or ἔπαινος ἀνδρός. (Paus. i. 30. § 4, viii. 23. § 5, vi. 20. § 8, vii. 37. § 7; Eurip. Phoen. 1707; comp. Liv. i. 9, where he is called ἐπετήριος.) In consequence of his connection with the horse, he was regarded as the friend of charioteers (Pind. Od. i. 65, &c.; Tzetza ad Lyc. 150), and he even metamorphosed himself into a horse in order to escape of deceiving Demeter. The common tradition about Poseidon creating the horse is as follows: — when Poseidon and Athena disputed as to which of them should give the name to the capital of Attica, the gods decided, that it should receive its name from him who should bestow upon man the most useful gift. Poseidon then created the horse, and Athena called forth the olive tree, for which the honour was conferred upon her. (Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 12.) According to others, however, Poseidon did not create the horse in Attica, but in Thessaly, where he also gave the famous horses to Pelops. (Lucan, Phars. vi. 396, &c.; Hom. II. xxiii. 277; Apollod. iii. 13. § 5.)

The symbol of Poseidon's power was the trident, or a spear with three points, with which he used to shatter rocks, to call forth or subdue storms, to shake the earth, and the like. Herodotus (i. 50, i v. 188) states, that the name and worship of Poseidon was imported to the Greeks from Libya, but he was probably a divinity of Pelasgian origin, and originally a personification of the fertilizing power of water, from which the transition to regarding him as the god of the sea was not difficult. It is a remarkable circumstance that in the legends about this divinity there are many in which he is said to have disputed the possession of certain countries with other gods. Thus, in order to take possession of Attica, he thrust his trident into the ground on the acropolis, where a well of sea-water was thereby called forth; but Athena created the olive tree, and the two divinities disputed, until the gods assigned Attica to Athena. Poseidon, indignant at this, caused the country to be inundated. (Herod. viii. 55; Apollod. iii. 14. § 1; Paus. i. 24. § 3, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 164.) With Athena he also disputed the possession of Troezen; and at the command of Zeus he shared the place with her. (Paus. ii. 30. § 6.) With Helios he disputed the sovereignty of Corinth, which along with the isthmus was adjudged to him, while Helios received the acropolis. (i. 1 § 6.) With Hera he disputed the possession of Argolis, which was adjudged to the former by Inachus, Cepheus, and Asterion, in consequence of which Poseidon caused the rivers of these river-gods to be dried up. (ii. 15. § 5, 22. § 5; Apollod. ii. i. 4.) With Zeus, lastly, he disputed the possession of Aegina, and with Dionysus that of Naxos. (Plut. Sympos. ix. 6.) At one time Delphi belonged to him in common with Ge, but Apollo gave him Callanias as a compensation for this, (Paus. ii. 33. § 3, &c.; v. 3. § 5; Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1243, with the Schol.)

The following legends also deserve to be mentioned. In conjunction with Zeus he fought against Cronos and the Titans (Apollod. i. 2. 61), and in the contest with the Giants he pursued Polybotes across the sea as far as Cos, and there killed him by throwing the island upon him. (Apollod. i. 6 § 2; Paus. i. 2. § 4.) He further crushed the Centaurs when they were pursued by Heracles, under a mountain in Leucosia, the island of the Seirens. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 4.) He sued together with Zeus for the hand of Thetis, but he withdrew when Themis prophesied that the son of Thetis would be greater than his father. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 5; Tzetza. ad Lyc. 178.) When Ares had been caught in the wonderful net by Hephaestus, the latter set him free at the request of Poseidon (Hom. Od. viii. 344, &c.), but Poseidon afterwards brought a charge against the god before the Arciopagus, for having killed his son Halichrothus. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 2.) At the request of Minos, king of Crete, Poseidon caused a bull to rise from the sea, which the king promised to sacrifice; but when Minos treacherously concealed the animal among a herd of oxen, the god punished Minos by causing his daughter Pasiphaê to fall in love with the bull. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 3, &c.; Pericymeneus, who was either a son or a grandson of Poseidon, received from him the power of assuming various forms. (i. 3. § 9, iii. 6. § 8.) Poseidon was married to Amphitrite, by whom he had three children, Triton, Rhodé, and Benthysicyme (Her. Thesp. 930; Apollod. i. 4. § 6,}

ii. 15, § 4); but he had besides a vast number of children by other divinities and mortal women. He is mentioned by a variety of surnames, either in allusion to the many legends related about him, or to his nature as the god of the sea. His worship extended over all Greece and southern Italy, but he was more especially revered in Peloponnesus (which is hence called ὀκτύρπος Ποσειδώνος) and in the Ionic coast towns. The sacrifices offered to him generally consisted of black and white bulls (Hom. Od. iii. 6, II. xx. 404; Pind. Od. xiii. 98; Virg. Aen. v. 237); but wild boars and rams were also sacrificed to him. (Hom. Od. xi. 196, etc. xxi. 277; Virg. Aen. iii. 119.) In Argolis briddled horses were thrown into the well Deine as a sacrifice to him (Paus. vii. 7 § 2), and horse and chariot races were held in his honour on the Corinthian isthmus. (Pind. Nem. v. 66, &c.) The Panonia, or the festival of all the Ionians near Mycale, was celebrated in honour of Poseidon. (Herod. i. 148.) In works of art, Poseidon may be easily recognised by his attributes, the dolphin, the horse, or the trident (Paus. x. 36 § 4), and he was frequently represented in groups along with Amphitrite, Tritons, Nereids, dolphins, the Dioscuri, Palamon, Pegusus, Bellerophon, Thalassa, Ino, and Galene. (Paus. i. ii. § 7.) His figure does not present the majestic calm which characterises his brother Zeus; but as the state of the sea is varying, so also is the god represented sometimes in violent agitation, and sometimes in a state of repose. (Hirt. Mythol. Bildscr. i. p. 26.) It must be observed that the Romans identified Poseidon with their own Neptune, and that accordingly the attributes belonging to the former are constantly transferred by the Latin poets to the latter. [L. S.]

POSEIDO’NIUS (ΠΟΣΕΙΔΩΝΙΟΣ), a distinguished Stoic philosopher, was a native of Apamia in Syria (Strab. xiv. p. 968, xvi. p. 1093; Suidas, s. v. ΠΩΣΕΙΔΟΝΙΟΣ). He was called sometimes the Απαμεα, from his birthplace, sometimes the Ρηδοτας, from the place where he taught (Lucian, Macrobal. vol. iii. p. 223; Athen. vi. p. 252, e.) He was also known by the surname Αθλαμπρος (Suid. t. c.). The date of his birth is not known with any exactness; but he was a disciple of Panaetius and a contemporary of Pompeius and Cicero. Athenaeus (xii. p. 549, e.) says, as a great mistake, mentions Poseidonius instead of Panaetius as the companion of Scipio Africanus on his embassy to Egypt. Elsewhere (xiv. p. 657) he talks of him as a contemporary of Strabo, misunderstanding a passage of the latter (xvi. p. 1093), where the expression κατ’ ουδα, in an author who quotes from so many writers of different ages, may very well be understood of one who preceded him but a short time. Vossius supposes that the old age of Poseidonius may have coincided with the childhood of Strabo. The supposition is not necessary. As Panaetius died in b. c. 112, and Poseidonius came to Rome in the consulship of M. Marcellus (b. c. 51), and according to Lucian (t. c.) reached the age of 84 years, b. c. 135 is probably not far from the date of the birth of Poseidonius.

Poseidonius, leaving Syria, betook himself to Athens, and became the disciple of Panaetius, and never returned to his native country. (Suid. t. c.; Cic. de Off. iii. 2, Tusc. Disp. v. 37.) On the death of Panaetius he set out on his travels, and first visited Spain. At Gades he stayed thirty days, observing the setting of the sun, and by his observations confuting the ignorant story of the hissing sound made by the sun as it descended into the ocean. Having collected a variety of information on points of geography and natural history, he set out for Italy. Nor was he idle on the voyage, paying attention to the course of the winds, and examining the peculiarities of the coasts along which he passed. He visited Sicily and the neighbouring islands, and then proceeded to Dalmatia and Illyricum (Strab. iii. p. 165, iv. p. 197, xiii. p. 014; Vit. trav. de Archit. viii. 4). After visiting Massilia, Gallia Narbonensis, and Liguria, he returned to the East, and fixed his abode at Rhodes, where he became the president of the Stoic school. He also took a prominent part in the political affairs of the republic, influencing the course of legislation, and among other offices filling that of Pyrtania (Strab. iv. p. 655, vii. p. 316). He was sent as ambassador to Rome in b. c. 86. With Marius he became personally acquainted, andPlutarch in his life of Marius was considerably indebted to information derived from him (Plut. Mar. 45). Cicero, when he visited Rhodes, received instruction both from Molon and from Poseidonius (Cic. de Nat. Deor. 1. 3, de Fin. i. 2; Plut. Cic. 4). Pompey also had a great admiration for Poseidonius, and visited him twice, in b. c. 67 and 62. (Strab. xi. p. 492; Plut. Pomp. 42; Plin. H. N. vii. 31.) To the occasion of his first visit probably belongs the story that Poseidonius, to prevent the disappointment of his distinguished visitor, though severely afflicted with the gout, held a long discourse on the topic that pain is not an evil (Cic. Tuscul. Disp. ii. 25). He seems to have availed himself of his acquaintance with Pompey to gain such additions as he could to his geographical and historical knowledge (Strab. xi. p. 492). In b. c. 51 Poseidonius removed to Rome, and appears to have died soon after. He was succeeded in his school by his disciple and grand-son Jason. [Jason, p. 556.] Among his disciples were Phainias (Diog. Laërt. vii. 41), and Asclepiodotus (Senec. Quaest. Nat. ii. 26, vi. 17). Besides Cicero, he seems to have had among his hearers C. Velleius, C. Cotta, Q. Lucilius Balbus, and probably Brutus. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. l. 44; Plut. Brut. p. 984.) Of Pompey we have already spoken.

Poseidonius was a man of extensive and varied acquirements in almost all departments of human knowledge. Strabo (xvi. p. 733) calls him διόρ γε των κατ’ ημείς φιλόσοφον πολυμαθέστατος. Cicero thought so highly of his powers, that he requested him to write an account of his consulsip (ad Att. ii. 1). As a physical investigator he was greatly superior to the Stoics generally, attaching himself in this respect rather to Aristotle. His geographical and historical knowledge was very extensive. Though attached to the Stoic system, he was far less dogmatical and obstinate than the majority of that school, refusing to admit a dogma because it was one of the school, if it did not commend itself to him for its intrinsic merits. This scientific cast of his mind Galen attributes to his accurate acquaintance with geometry (De Plac. Hipp. et Plut. iv. p. 279, vi. p. 319). His style of composition also seems to have been far removed from the ungraceful stiffness which was frequently required by Stoic writers. (Strab. v. p. 147; comp. Galen, l. c. iv. p. 281, v. p. 296.) Poseidonius adhered to the division of philosophy usual among the ancients, into physics, ethics, and dialectics (Diog. Laërt. vii. 59), comparing the first to the blood and flesh of an animal, the second to the bones and nerves, the last to the soul. (Sextus Empir. adv. Math. vi. 19; Diog. Laërt. vi. 40.) He recognised two principles (δύoγολον) — passive (matter), and active (God). His physical doctrines were, in the main, those of the Stoics generally, though he differed from them in some particulars. He held that the vacuum beyond the universe was not infinite, but only large enough to allow of the dissolution of the universe (he discarded the doctrine of its destruction by fire, Phil. Jud. de Aet. Mundl. ii. p. 497, ed. Mang.). He considered the heaven as the governing principle (τὸ γενειονοικίον) of the universe (Diog. Laërt. vii. 139.) He cultivated astronomy with considerable diligence, and, unlike Panaetius, was a believer in astrology (Cic. de Div. ii. 42). Poseidonius also constructed a planetary machine, or revolving sphere, to exhibit the daily motions of the sun, moon and planets. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 34.) He inferred that the sun is larger than the earth, among other reasons because he was only exceeded by the earth in respect of the sun's diameter (Diog. Laërt. vii. 144; Macrobr. ad Somn. Scip. i. 20.) Its greater apparent magnitude as it sets attributed to its being seen through dense and misty air, and supposed that if we could see it through a solid wall we would appear larger still. (Cleomedes, Cyc. Theor. ii. p. 430.) He calculated the diameter of the sun to be 4,000,000 stadia, on the assumption that the orbit of the sun was 10,000 times the circumference of the earth, and that it is within a space of 400 stadia N. and S. that the sun casts no shadow. (Cleomedes, l. c. p. 452.) The distance between the earth and the sun he set down at above 502,000,000 stadia. (Plin. H. N. ii. 21.) The moon also he considered to be larger than the earth, and composed of transparent elements, though on account of its great size the rays of the sun do not pass through it in eclipses. (Stob. Ed. Phys. i. p. 59; Cleom. l. c. ii. p. 500.) He deduced this manner of the atmosphere, not so dense as stars, but more rare, and lighted, and intended to warm those parts of the universe which the sun's heat does not reach, was extensively adopted. (Macrobr. l. c. i. 15.) Poseidonius's calculation of the circumference of the earth differed widely from that of Eratosthenes. He made it only 100,000 stadia, and his measurement was pretty generally adopted. His calculation was founded on observations of the star Canopus made in Spain, not, as Cleomedes says, in Rhodes. (Strab. ii. p. 119; Cleom. l. c. i. 3.; comp. Mannert, Geogr. vol. i. p. 105, &c.) The shape of the habitable part of the earth he compared to that of a slung, the greatest extent being from E. to W. (Strab. p. 267; Aphantemus, ap. Hudson, Geogr. Min. vol. ii. p. 2.) Of the connection between the moon and the tides he was well aware. (Strab. iii. p. 172.) Strabo frequently refers to Poseidonius as one of the most distinguished geographers. A great number of passages, containing the views of Poseidonius on various other geographical and astronomical points, has been collected by Bake. As the basis of his ethical and mental philosophy Poseidonius took the Stoic system, though with considerable modifications, for he held it possible to amalgamate with it much of the systems of Plato and Aristotle. In some respects his views approximated to the Pythagorean doctrines. (Sext. Empir. Adv. Math. vii. 93; Galen. de Hipp. et Plat. Plur. v. p. 171.) It seems to have been his object as far as possible to banish contradiction from philosophy, and bring all the systems which had been propounded into harmony with each other, and to infuse into the decayed vitality of philosophical thought something of the vigour of past times. But that he could suppose the doctrines of Zeno, Aristotle and Plato capable of reconciliation with each other, shows that he could not have seized very distinctly the spirit of each. To give anything like plausibility to this attempt, it was of course necessary to introduce considerable modifications into the Stoic doctrines. In some points however in which he differed from Panaetius he rather returned to the views of the earlier Stoic philosophers. His fourfold division of virtue is apparently that followed by Cicero in his De Offic. He did not think virtue by itself sufficient for perfect happiness, unless accompanied by external, bodily good. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 129.) The triumph of his system was in his power of the contemplation of the truth and order of all things, and the fashioning oneself, as far as possible, in accordance therewith, being led aside as little as possible by the irrational part of the soul. (Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. p. 416.) In the classification of the faculties of the soul he returned to the system of Plato, dividing them into reason, emotion, and appetite (δεικτικας διοικουμενας ησαα οτι των δυναμεων, ἐπηθυμητικης τω και λογοειδεων και λογοτικης, Galen. l. c. viii. p. 319), with which division he considered questions of practical morality to be intimately connected (Galen. l. c. iv. p. 284, v. p. 291). It was apparently to keep up a bond of connection with the Stoic dogmas that he spoke of these δυναμεις as all belonging to one essence (Galen. l. c. vi p. 296), though other features of his system are not easily reconcilable with that view. But instead of regarding the παθος of the soul as being, or ensuing upon, judgments (σαρκες) of the reason, he deduced them from the irrational faculties of the soul, appealing to the fact that emotion and appetite manifest themselves in irrational beings. He connected affections and perturbations of the mind with external influences, the union of the soul with the body, and the influence of the latter upon the former, some conditions of man being predominantly bodily, others spiritual; some passing from the body to the soul, others from the soul to the body. This idea he carried out to the permanent modifications of characters produced by particular bodily organisations, founding thereon a sort of physiognomical system. (Galen. l. c. v. p. 290.) He sometimes spoke of appetite as corresponding to vegetable life, emotion to animal life, reason to the proper human (l. c. p. 170).

Note of the writings of Poseidonius has come down to us entire. We find mention of the following:—1. Peri θεων, consisting of at least thirteen books (Diog. Laërt. vii. 138). 2. Peri μαντικης, in five books. Poseidonius defended divination, and analysed its foundations. 3. Peri ειμαρμανης. 4. Peri Ήρων και δαιμωνων. 5. Πυθευδος λογος, consisting of at least fifteen books (Diog. Laërt. vii. 140). 6. Peri κοσμου, 7. Εξηγησι τω Πλατωνου Τιμιου, 8. Περι κενων, 9. Peri μεταφωνων: Diogenes Laërtius cites from the seventeenth book of jt. 10. Meteoro{lo}gicic Στουχείων. 11. Περι του ἄλος μεγέθους. 12. Περὶ Ακανοῦ. 13. Περὶ Ψυχῆς. 14. Περὶ Σήμων τοῦ Σιδωνίου, or at least a mathematical work in which his views were controverted. 15. Βιολικάς λόγος. 16. Προστρέψται, in defence of the position, that the study of philosophy ought not to be neglected on account of the discrepancies in the systems of different philosophers. 17. Περὶ καθίσσωνos (see Cic. ad Att. xvi. 11). 18. Περὶ παιδιῶν. 19. A treatise on the connection between virtues and the division of the faculties of the mind (Galen, l.c. viii. p. 319). 20. Περὶ κριτηρίων. 21. Εισαγωγή περὶ λέγων. A grammatical work. 22. An extensive historical work, in at least forty-nine or fifty books (Athen. iv. p. 168, d.), and apparently of very miscellaneous content, to judge by the tolerably numerous quotations of it in Athenaeus, and comprising events from the time of Alexander the Great to his own times.

Suidas, by a gross blunder, attributes to Poseidonius of Alexandria an historical work in fifty-two books, in continuation of the history of Polybius. Vossius (de Hist. Graec. p. 199, ed. Westermann) considers this work to be identical with the historical work of Poseidonius of Apameia. Bake dissent from this view, inasmuch as events were mentioned by Poseidonius earlier than those included in the history of Polybius, and assigns the work to Poseidonius of Oliopiapolis. His objection is not decisive, and Westermann coincides with Vossius. But the account which Suidas gives of the work is enormously wrong, as he says it ended with the Cyrenean war (n. c. 324), and yet was a continuation of the history of Polybius, which goes down to the destruction of Corinth by Mummia (v. c. 146). 23. A history of the life of Pompeius Magnus (Strab. xi. p. 753). This may possibly have been a part of his larger historical work. 24. Τέχνη ταυτική (de Aicio instruenda). 25. Various epistles.

All the reliefs which still remain of the writings of Poseidonius have been carefully collected and illustrated by Janus Bake, in a work entitled Poseidoni Rhodi Reliquiae Doctrinae, Lngsd. Bäud. 1810. (Fabric. Biol. Graec. vol. iii. p. 572; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 198, ed. Westermann; Ritter, Geschichte der Philosophie, bk. xi. c. 6, vol. iii. p. 700, &c.; Bake, l.c.).

There was an earlier Poseidonius, a native of Alexandria, and a disciple of Zeno, mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 38) and Suidas, who, besides the historical work above referred to mentions some writings, of which, however, he is more disposed to consider Poseidonius of Oliopiopolis the author. The latter he describes as a sophist and historian, and the author of the following works:—Περὶ τοῦ Σκευοῦ: Περὶ τῆς Τερυκῆς καλομενῆς χώρας: Αττικὰς ἱστοριας, in four books: Διομοι, in eleven books; and some others. The first mentioned work is assigned by Bake to Poseidonius of Apameia.

There were also some others of the same name who are not mentioning: [C. P. M.]

POSEIDONIUS (Ποσείδωνος), the name of two Greek physicians, who have been confounded together by Sprengel (Hist. de la Méd., vol. ii. p. 92, French transl.), and placed in "the time of Valens;" and also by M. Littre (Œuvres d’Hippocr. vol. iii. p. 5), who, while correcting one half of Sprengel’s chronological mistake, falls himself into the same error, and equally supposes them to have been one and the same individual, whom he places in the first century after Christ.

1. The author of some medical works, of which nothing but a few fragments remain, who quotes Archigenes (ap. Aët. ii. 12, p. 255), and is himself quoted by Rufus Ephesius (ap. Ang. Mai, Classic. Auct., v. Tab. Codic. Edit., vol. iv. p. 11), and who must, therefore, have lived about the end of the first century after Christ. He is one of the earliest writers who is known to have mentioned the glandular or true plague, though this disease was, till quite lately, supposed to have been unknown till a much later period (see M. Littre, loco cit.). He is several times quoted by Aëtius (i. 3, 121, ii. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 12, 13, 18, 20, 21, 24, pp. 139, 243, 244, 246, 247, 248, 254, 255, 257, 258, 260), and Paulus Aegineta (vii. 3, 21, 22, pp. 614, 692, 693). The name frequently occurs in Galen, but it is probable that in every passage the philosopher is referred to and not the physician. If (as seems upon the whole not unlikely) this Poseidonius is the pupil of Zopyrus at Alexandria, who is mentioned by Apollonius Cynensis as his fellow-pupil (ap. Dietz, Schol. in Hippocr. et Gal. vol. i. p. 2), there is a chronological difficulty which the writer is not at present able to explain.

2. The son of Philostorgius and brother of Philagrins, who lived in the latter half of the fourth century after Christ, during the reign of Valentinian and Valens. (Philostorg. H. E. viii. 10.) [W. A. G.]

POSEIDONIUS, of Ephesus, a celebrated silver-chaser, who was contemporary with Pasciules, in the time of Pompey. (Pllin. H. N. xxi. 12. s. 55.) Pliny mentions him also among the artists who made athletas et armados et valetas sacrificantesque, and adds to the mention of his name the words qui et argentum caelestium nobilitat (H. N. xxi. 8. s. 19. § 34). Nagler (Künstler-Lexicon) makes the singular mistake of ascribing to him the sphere of the celebrated philosopher Poseidonius, which is mentioned by Cicero (de Nat. Doct. ii. 34). [P. S.]

POSIUS, a Roman modeler, who lived in the first century n. e., and who was mentioned as an acquaintance by M. Varro, according to whom they made apples and grapes, which it was impossible to distinguish from the real objects. (Varro, ap. Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 12. s. 45. The text of the passage is very corrupt; but there can be little doubt that the reading as restored by Gronovius gives the meaning fairly, namely: M. Varro tradit sibi cognitum Romae Posiun nomine, a quoc facta poma et uvas, ut non possess discernerse a vera.) These imitations of fruit must have been first modelled, and then painted. Their truthfulness would suggest the suspicion that they were in wax; but, from the absence of any statement to that effect, it must be supposed that they were only in some kind of clay or stucco or gypsum. [P. S.]

POSSIDIANUS, a disciple of Augustine, with whom he lived upon intimate terms for nearly forty years. In a. d. 307 he was appointed Bishop of Copto, a town in Numidia at no great distance from Hippo Regius; but this elevation brought no tranquillity nor ease, for his career from this time forward presents one continued struggle with a succession of fierce antagonists. For a long period he was engaged in active strife with the Donatists, maintained triumphant disputations in public with their leaders on several occasions, and was one of the four preludes despatched in 410 by the orthodox party in Africa to Honorius, for the purpose of soliciting a repeal of the law which had been passed in favour of their heretical opponents. He next took a prominent part in the councils held against Celestius and Pelagius. In A.D. 430 he was driven from Calama by the Vandals, sought refuge at Hippo, and while that city was besieged, watched over the deathbed of his preceptor and friend. Prosper relates in his chronicle (A.D. 437) that Possidius, along with Novatus and Severianus, strenuously resisted the efforts of Genseric to propagagte the doctrines of Arianism, and it is generally believed, that having been expelled from Africa, after the capture of Carthage (A.D. 439), he made his way to Italy, and there died.

Two tracts by Possidius are still extant.

1. Vita Augustini. 2. Indiculus Scriptorum Augusti.

These are attached to all the best editions of Augustine. The best edition of the Vita, in a separate form, is that of Salinas, 8vo. Rom. 1731, and Aug. Vindel. 1768; of the Indiculus, that published at Venice, 8vo. 1735. [W. R.]

POSTISSA (Φθοσ), a Greek writer, mentioned on the authority of Jerome, as one of the two or three of his works, namely, the third book of his history of the Amazonos (Ἀμαζωία, vii. p. 396, d.), and the third book of his history of Magnesia (Μαγνησία, xii. p. 533, d.).

POSTVIERA or POSTVORTA, is properly a surname of Carmenta, describing her as turning backward and looking at the past, which she revealed to poets and other mortals. In like manner the prophetic power with which she looked into the future, is indicated by the surnames Antevorta, Prorsa (i.e. Provers), and Porrima. Poets, however, have personified these attributes of Carmenta, and thus describe them as the companions of the goddess. (Ov. Fast. i. 633; Macrob. Sat. i. 7; Gellius, xvi. 16; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 339.) [L. S.]

POSTUMIA. 1. A Vestal virgin, accused of incest in A.D. 413, in consequence of the elegance of her dress and the freedom of her remarks, but acquitted, with an admission on the part of the poet, that she was careful in her conduct for the future. (Liv. iv. 44.)

2. The wife of Ser. Sulpisius, was a busy intriguing woman, and did not bear a good character. She is said to have been one of the mistresses of Julius Caesar (Suet. Jul. 50), and Cicero suspected that it was her charms which drew his legatus Pompeius from Cilicia to Rome. (Cic. ad Att. v. 21. § 9.) Her name frequently occurs in Cicero's correspondence at the time of the civil wars (ad Fam. iv. 2, ad Att. x. 3, a, x. 14, xii. 11. c.c.).

POSTUMIA, PONTIA. [Pontia, No. 2.]

POSTUMIA GENS, patrician, was one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome, and frequently held the highest offices of the state, from the banishment of the kings to the downfall of the republic. The most distinguished family in the gens was that of ALBINUS or ALBINUS, but we also find at the commencement of the republic distinguished families of the names of MEGRILLUS and TUBERTUS. The first of the Postumii, who obtained the consulship, was P. Postumius Tubertus, in B.C. 503, only six years after the expulsion of the kings. REGILLIENUS is properly an agnomen of the ALBINI, and accordingly persons with this surname are given under ALBINI. In the Punic wars, and subsequently, we also find the surnames PYRGENSES, TEMPSANUS, and TYMPANUS. A few Postumii are mentioned without any surname; these are given below.

2. C. POSTUMUS, tribunus militum in B.C. 168. (Liv. xiv. 6.)

3. POSTUMUS, a soothsayer, who predicted success to Sulla, and told him to keep him in chains, and put him to death if matters did not turn out well. Plutarch (Sull. 9) says that this occurred when Sulla was marching upon Rome, in B.C. 88; whereas Cicero (de Div. i. 33) and Valerius Maximus (i. 6. § 4) relate that it happened before the battle in which Sulla defeated the Samnites.

4. M. POSTUMUS, quaestor of Verres in his government of Sicily, B.C. 73. (Cic. Verr. ii. 18.)

5. CN. POSTUMUS, was one of the supporters (subscriptores) of Ser. Sulpicius in his prosecution of Murena for bribery in B.C. 63. He had been a candidate for the praetorship in the same year. (Cic. pro Mure. 26, 27, 32.)

6. T. POSTUMUS, an orator mentioned by Cicero with praise (Brut. 77), may perhaps have been the same person as the following.

7. POSTUMUS, a friend of Cicero, belonged to the Pompeian party, and on the breaking out of the civil war, in B.C. 49, was appointed by the senate to succeed Furfanius Postumius in Sicily; but as he refused to go to the province without Cato, Fannius was sent in his stead. (Cic. ad Att. vii. 15. § 2.) Cicero mentions him as one of his friends in B.C. 46 (ad Fam. vi. 12. § 2, xiiii. 69). He speaks of him again as one of the procurators of the games of Octavius in B.C. 44 (ad Att. xx. 2. § 3).

8. POSTUMUS, a legate of Caesar, whom he sent over from Greece to Italy in B.C. 48, to hasten the passage of his troops. (Appian, B.C. ii. 56.)

9. P. POSTUMUS, a friend of M. Marcellus, who was murdered at Athens in B.C. 45. (Scribivs, ap. Cic. ad Fam. iv. 12. § 2.)

10. Q. POSTUMUS, a Roman senator, was torn to pieces by order of Antony, because he meditated deserting to Augustus in B.C. 31. (Dion Cass. i. 13.)

POSTUMUS, architect. [POLLIO.]

POSTUMULENUS, is only known as a friend of Trebius or Trebonius (Cic. ad Fam. vi. 10).

POSTUMUS, which signifies a person born after the death of his father, was originally a praenomen (Varr. L.L. v. 60, ed. Muller), but was also used as a cognomen, of which several instances occur in the persons mentioned below.

POSTUMUS, a Roman, to whom Horace addresses one of his odes (ii. 14). Nothing is known of him, but he may have been the same person as the Postumus to whom Propertius addresses one of his elegies (iii. 12).

POSTUMUS, stands second on the list of the thirty tyrants enumerated by Trebellius Pollio [see Aurelius]. His full name was M. CAESARIUS TIBERIUS POSTUMUS. Of humble origin, he owed his advancement to merit, was nominated by Valerian, who entertained the strongest conviction of his worth, governor of Gaul, and was entrusted specially with the defence of the Rhenish frontier. By his aid Gallienus was enabled to repulse for some years the attacks of the barbarians; but on setting out for Illyria (A.D. 257), in order to quell the insurrection of Ingenuus [INGENUUS], he committed his son Saloninus to the guardianship of Silvanus. Postumus, feeling slighted by this arrangement, took advantage of the disaffection of the troops towards the royal family, raised the standard of rebellion, assumed the style and title of emperor, and drove Saloninus to take refuge in Colonia Agrippina, where he was besieged, and eventually put to death upon the capture of the city. These events took place in A.D. 258 and 259, while Valerian was prosecuting his unfortunate campaign against the Persians. Whatever guilt may attach to the circumstances under which Postumus established his sway—and these are differently represented by different authorities, since Pollio declares that he was urged on by the discontent of the army and the provincials rather than by any ambition of his own, denying, at the same time, that he had any hand in the death of the youth whom he represents as having been actually consigned to his protection—it seems certain that he exercised his power with firmness, moderation, and skill. Not only were the efforts of Gallienus to take vengeance for his son signally frustrated; but while the nominal sovereign was indulging in slothful pleasures, the pretender, beloved by all to whom his influence extended, maintained a strong and just government, and preserved Gaul from the devastation of the warlike tribes upon the eastern border. Hence the titles of Imperator and Germanicus Maximus, which recur upon the medals of several successive years, are in this case something better than a mere empty boast. At length, however, his fickle subjects became weary of submitting to the strict and well-regulated discipline enforced in all departments of the state, rallied round a new adventurer named Lelianus [LIELIANUS; LOLLIANUS] and Postumus, who assuredly may claim the highest place among the numerous pageants of royalty that sprung up and disappeared with such rapidity during this disturbed epoch, was slain A.D. 267, in the tenth year of his reign. The number of coins still extant bearing the effigy of this prince, and the skilful workmanship displayed in the gold pieces especially, prove that the arts of peace were not despised in his court, while the letters S.C. stamped after the usual fashion upon the brass money, seem to indicate that he had surrounded himself with a body of counsellors, whom he chose to consider the true Roman senate.

All questions connected with this reign have been investigated, with much diligence, accuracy, and learning, by Breugny in the Mémoires de l'Académie des Sciences et Belles-Lettres, vol. xxx. p. 338, &c. There is also a dissertation on the Life of Postumus by Ioseph. Meierus, preserved in Walerok Elect. p. 203. The chief ancient authorities are, Trebl. Poll. Trig. Tyrrann. ii.; Aurel.

VICT. DE CAES. 33, Epit. 32; Eutrop. ix. 7; Oros. vii. 22; Zosim. i. 56; Zonar. xii. 24. From inscriptions and medals we obtain the name given above, M. Cassianus Latinius Postumus, but Victor terms him Cassius Lobina Postumus, while Pollio uniformly designates him as Postuminus, and erroneously limits the duration of his power to seven years.

POSTUMUS, son of the foregoing, is mentioned by Trebellius Pollio, who presses in his name to swell the number of the 30 tyrants, stating that having received first the title of Caesar, and subsequently that of Augustus, he was slain along with his father. But when we recollect that notwithstanding the multitude of coins still existing of the elder Postumus, not one has been found commemorating the dignities of the younger, we are led with Eckhel to doubt the testimony of a writer notoriously inaccurate, and to conclude that no such person ever existed, or at all events that he was never invested with the title of Augustus or Caesar. (Trebell. Pollio, Trig. II.; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 447.) It must not, however, be concealed, that in addition to the pieces described by Golziius, which every numismatist rejects as spurious, there are to be found in some cabinets two very rare medals, one in gold, the other in billon, bearing upon the obverse the head of the elder Postumus, with the legend IMP. C. POSTUMUS. P. F. AUG., and on the reverse the bust of a more juvenile personage, with a radiated crown, and the words INVICT. AUG. Whether we are justified in regarding this as a representation of the younger Postumus, is a question which can hardly be answered with certainty, but the arguments adduced to prove the affirmative are far from being conclusive. (See Mioinnet, Médailles Romaines, vol. ii. p. 70.) A cut of the billon coin is placed below.

COIN OF POSTUMUS GEORGIUS.

POSTUMUS, ACTIUS, a rhetorician, mentioned by the elder Seneca. (Contr. 21.)

POSTUMUS, AGRIPPA. [AGrippa, p. 78.]

POSTUMUS, CURTIUS. 1. 2. Q. and CN. CURTIUS POSTUMI, two brothers, were argentarii, with whom Verres had pecuniary dealings. One of these, Quintus, who is called by Cicero a sedulus of Verres, was afterwards a judex inquests in the trial of Verres. (Cic. Verr. i. 39, 61.)

3. M. CURTIUS POSTUMUS, was recommended by Cicero to Caesar in b.c. 54 for the post of tribune of the soldiers, which he obtained. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 15. § 3, iii. 1. § 3.) On the breaking out of the civil war, in b.c. 49, he espoused with zeal the cause of Caesar, and was, on that account, a disagreeable guest to Cicero, whom he visited at his Formian villa. He appears to have entertained the hope of obtaining, through Caesar’s influence, some of the higher dignities in the state (Ibophan cogitavit). It appears that Atticus was afraid lest Curtius should prevent him from leaving Italy.
about this time. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 2, n. 5, 6, x. 13, § 3, ad Fam. ii. 16. § 7.) When Cicero had returned to Rome, after the defeat of the Pompeians, and considered it advisable to cultivate the friendship of Caesar, he renewed his acquaintance with Curtius, and accordingly speaks of him as one of his friends in B.C. 46; but in the following year he writes with indignation to Atticus that Curtius thinks of becoming a candidate for the consulship (ad Fam. vi. 12. § 2, ad Att. xii. 49.). After Caesar's death Curtius attacked with vehemence those persons, like Cicero, who rejoiced at Caesar's death, but defended his acts (ad Att. xiv. 9. § 2). Instead of Curtius Postumus, we frequently find Curtius Postumius in many manuscripts and editions of the text of the preceding.

POSTUMUS, T. FURFANIUS, was one of the judges at the trial of Milo in B.C. 52, and had previously suffered injuries from Clodius. (Cic. pro Mil. 27.) He appears to have been praetor in Sicily in B.C. 50 and 49, and in the latter year the senate appointed Postumus as his successor (ad Att. vii. 5. § 2). [POSTUMUS, N. S.] He is again mentioned as the governor of Sicily, with the title of proconsul, in B.C. 45 (ad Fam. vi. 8. § 3, vi. 9).

POSTUMUS, JU'LIUS, a paramour of Mutilia Priscia, who had great influence with Livia, the mother of Tiberius, and whom Sejanus employed to injure Agrippina, the widow of Germanicus, in the opinion of Livia, A.D. 26. (Tac. Ann. iv. 12.) In an inscription (Gruter, 113, 1) we find mention made of a C. Julius Sex. P. Postuma, who was prefect of Egypt under Claudius; he was cited for the defence of C. Caesa. iv. 15; Veil. Pat. ii. 116; Flor. iv. 12. § 11.)

POTAMUS, M. EGNA'TIUS. [POTAMUS, C. RABIRIUS, whom Cicero defended in B.C. 54 in an oration, still extant, was a Roman eunuch, and the son of C. Curius, a wealthy farmer of the public revenues. He was born after the death of his father, who had married the sister of C. Rabirius, whom Cicero had defended in B.C. 63, when he was accused by T. Iabienus; and he was adopted by his uncle Rabirius, whose name he consequently assumed. The younger Rabirius carried on a profitable business as a money-lender, and among his debtors Tolemy Auleses, who had been compelled to borrow large sums of money, in order to purchase the support of the leading men at Rome, to keep him on the throne. To pay his Roman creditors, Tolemy was obliged to oppress his subjects; and his actions became at length so intolerable, that the Egyptians expelled him from the kingdom. He accordingly fled to Rome in B.C. 57, and Rabirius and his other creditors supplied him with the means of corrupting the Roman nobles, as they had no hopes of regaining their money except by his restoration to the throne. Tolemy at length obtained his object, and Gabinius, the proconsul of Syria, encouraged by Pompey, marched with a Roman army into Egypt in B.C. 55. Tolemy thus regained his kingdom. Rabirius forthwith repaired to Alexandria, and was invested by the king with the office of Diocetes, or chief treasurer, no doubt with the sanction of Gabinius. In this office he had to assay money both for himself and Gabinius; but his exertions were so terrible, that Tolemy had him apprehended, either to secure him against the wrath of the people, or to satisfy their indignation, lest they should drive him again from his kingdom. Rabirius escaped from prison, probably through the connivance of the king, and returned to Rome. But here a trial awaited him. Gabinius was accused of extortion (repetundae) under the provisions of the lex Julia, passed in the consulship of Caesar, B.C. 59, and was condemned to pay a considerable fine. As Gabinius was unable to pay this sum, a suit was instituted under the same law against Rabirius, who was liable to make up the deficiency, if it could be proved that he had received any of the money of which Gabinius had illegally become possessed. The suit against Rabirius was, therefore, a supplementary appendage to the cause of Gabinius. The accuser, the. Procurator, and the judges, were the same; and as Cicero had defended Gabinius, he also performed the same office for Rabirius. (Cic. pro Rabirio Postumo, passim.) The issue of the trial is not mentioned; but as the judges had condemned Gabinius, they probably did not spare his tool. We may therefore conclude that he went into banishment, like his patron, and was recalled by Caesar from exile. At all events, we find him serving under Caesar in B.C. 46, who sent him from Africa into Sicily, in order to obtain provisions for the army. (Hirt. B. Afr. 3.)

SHORTUS. Q. SEIUS, a Roman eunuch, said by Cicero to have been poisoned by P. Clodius, because he was unwilling to sell his house to the latter. (Cic. pro Dom. 44, 50, de Harusp. Resp. 14.)

POSTUMUS, VIBIUS. consul suffectus, A.D. 5, conquered the Dalmatiens in A.D. 10, and received, in consequence, the honour of the triumphal cortege. (Cic. Fam. vii. 10. Sir. 10; Sermo xxxvi. 15; Veil. Pat. ii. 116; Flor. iv. 12. § 1.)

POTAMUS, M. EGNA'TIUS. A Spaniard by birth, was bishop of Lisbon in the middle of the fourth century; and if the first of the pieces mentioned below be genuine, if the main part of his career, he must, in the early part of his life, have been a champion of the Catholic faith. Subsequently, however, he was a zealous Arian, and it is believed that he drew up the document known in ecclesiastical history as The second Sirmian Creed. (Phoebanias.) The writings usually ascribed to Potamius are:— 1. Epistola ad Athanasium Episcopum Alexandriae de Consuetudine Fidei Det, in some MSS. entitled Epistola Potamii ad Athanasium ab Arianis (impetitum? postquam in Concilio Arianorum subscriptorum, composed in the year A.D. 355, while the opinions of the author were yet orthodox. The authenticity of this piece, however, which is characterised by great obscurity of thought and of expression, and often half barbarous in phraseology, is very doubtful. It was first published by the Benedicente D'Achery, in his Spiegel eines Venerischen altnr. Schriften, 4to. Paris, 1661, vol. ii. p. 366, or vol. iii. p. 299, of the new edition by Baluze, fol. 1717, and will be found under its best form in Galland's Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. iv. vol. Venet. 1769, p. 96. 2. Sermo de Lazaro, and 3. Sermo de Martyrio Suaeux Prophecie. Two discourses resembling in style the epistle to Athanasius, long attributed to Zeno, bishop of Verona, and published, without suspicion, among his works, until the brothers Ballerini (S. Zenonis Sermone, fol. Venet. 1739, p. 297—303) proved that they must be assigned to Potamius, whom however they supposed to be a person altogether different from the bishop of Lisbon, and belonging to a different age. The arguments which they employ to demonstrate this last position are founded upon the second title of the Epistola ad Athenassium as given above, but this title Galland, Schoenemann, and others, hold to be the blunder of an ignorant transcriber. The Sermones will be found in Galland, and the discussions with regard to the real author in the Prolegomena to the volume, cap.
x. p. xvii. [W. R.]

Potamonom, a scriba of Verres, and one of the instruments of his tallcy, is called by Ciceron in irony " homo severus, ex vetere filia equestri disciplina" (Cic. Ferr. iii. 60, 66). He was originally the scriva and friend of Q. Caecilius Niger, the questor of Verres, and he remained with Verres, when Caecilius left the island. (Cic.
Div. in Cordic. 9.)

Potamomon (Potammon). 1. Of Alexandria. Of this philosopher we have notices in Diogenes Laërtius (Proem. § 21), Porphyry (*de Vita ed.), and Suidas (s. v. ἀρέσις, Potammon). Many attempts have been made to reconcile, by emendation and conjecture, the discrepancies found in these notices, or to ascertain the truth regarding him. Of these an elaborate account will be found in Brucker's Historia Criticq Philosophiae (vol. ii.
p. 193, &c.). This subject has also been investigated in a treatise by Goeckner, entitled, De Potamomis Alex. Philosophia Eclectica, recensentior Platonorum Disciplinae admodum dissimulat. Dis-
p. 4to. Liiasne, 1743. Of this an excellent ab-tract is given by Harless (in Fabric. Ibid. vol. iii.
p. 184, &c.). What is chiefly interesting and important regarding Potamomon, is the fact recorded by Laërtius, that, immediately before his time (πρὸ diēgnos), Potamomon had introduced an eclectic sect of philosophy (ἐλεκτρικῇ τις ἀρέσις). Modern writers have made too much of this solitary fact,
for we read nowhere else of this school of Potamomon.
The meaning of Porphyryus, in the passage referred to above, is by no means clear. It is impossible to tell whether he makes Potamomon the occasional disciple of Plotinus, or Plotinus of Potamomon.
Suidas, in the article ἀρέσις, evidently quotes Laërtius, but in Potammon he states, that he lived πρὸ diēgnos ηλίου, καὶ μετ᾽ αὐτῶν. Whatever meaning these words may have—for that is one of the points of discussion in this question—the two articles are irreconcilable. Indeed, Suidas exhibits his usual confusion in this name. He makes (s. v. Λεσβιός).
Potamomon the rhetorician [No. 2], a philosopher, and we need not encumber the question with his unsupported authority on a point of chronology.
Yet, to accommodate his statement with those of Laërtius and Porphyryus, Goeckner and Harless suppose three Potamomons. For this, or even for the supposition that there were two, there seems no necessity. Setting aside the authority of Suidas, remembering the uncertainty of the time of Laërtius
—to determine which his mention of Potamomon may furnish a new element,—we cannot but attach much weight to the statement of Porphyryus, the contemporary of Plotinus, and who refers to Potamon, as a well-known name. We should, therefore, conclude that the Potamomon mentioned by Laërtius and Porphyryus are the same, and, on a minute investigation of the passage where he is mentioned by the latter author, that he was older than Plotinus, and entrusted his children to his guardianship. He may have brought from Alexandria to Rome the idea of an eclesiastic school.

Potamomos. 513

But he had no followers in his peculiar combinations. They were supplanted by the school that endeavoured to ingraft Christianity upon the older systems of philosophy. Indeed, the short notice given by Laërtius does not entitle Potamomon to the distinction invariably conferred upon him, that he was the first to introduce an eclesiastic school; though, probably, he was the first who taught at Rome a system so called.

Laërtius states briefly a few of his tenets, deduced from his writings, from which we can only learn that he combined the doctrines of Plato with the Stoic and Aristotelian, and not without original thought of his own. According to Suidas he wrote a commentary on the Republic of Plato.

2. Of Mytilene ([Strab.] xiii. p. 617), son of Les-bonax the rhetorician, was himself a rhetorician, in the time of Tiberius Caesar, whose favour he enjoyed (Suidas, s. v.). Westermann, indeed, makes him a teacher of Tiberius, but this is stated nowhere else (Geschichte Griech. Bered. p. 106). He is mentioned as an authority regarding Alexander the Great, by Plutarch (Alex. 61). It is, probably, whom Lucian states to have attained the age of ninety (Macrobr. § 23). Suidas informs us that, in addition to his life of Alexander the Great, he wrote several other works, namely, شخصيات, بروفونتُو فكْيَّاً، نمْلَعْ سُلْفِرُو ضِرْرَةَوَ.َك. And, to the treatises mentioned by Suidas, should probably be added that سةَ فِيِّ دَبَرُ فَرْخُاَ، quoted by Ammianus in his treatise πρὸ ὁλων καὶ διαφόρων λέονων, s. v. بروفينْو. (Suidas, s. v. Θεοδωρὸς Γαβειρις, Αειγόλια, Ποθαίοις.*

3. A poet, named at Lucullus, (Ant. Graec.
vol. iii. p. 44, Jacobus.)

Pothaeus (Pothoos), a Greek architect, of unknown age and country, who, in conjunction with AntiphiONUS and Megacles, made the treaury of the CARTHAGINIANS at OLYMPIA. (Paus. vi. 19, § 4. s. 7.)

Pothienus (Potheinos), artists. 1. An Athenian sculptor, whose name is preserved on an inscription which was affixed to the portrait-statue of a certain Nymphodotus, in the palaestra at ATHENS. (Böckh, Corp. Inscri. No. 270, vol. i.
p. 375. The inscription, as explained by Böckh, reads thus, Εἰσώντα τῆριε Ποθείνον . . . τειχώς Σκαλιού, which can only mean that Pothienus was both the sculptor and the dedicator of the statue.
That artists not unfrequently dedicated their own works, is shown by Schneider, Kunstblatt. 1827, No. 83; comp. R. ROCHETTE, Lettre à M. Schorr,
p. 392).

2. A vase-painter, whose name appears on a beautiful vessel, in the ancient style, representing the contest of Theost and Peleus, which was found in 1833 at Ponte dell' Abbadia, and is now in the museum at Berlin. It is doubtful whether the name inscribed on the vase is Ποθείνος or Ποθείνος;
it but looks more like the latter. (Levzezow, Verzeichniss. No. 1065, p. 240; Gerhard, *Berlins Ant.
Bildwerke,* No. 1065, p. 291; R. ROCHETTE, Lettre à M. Schorr, pp. 56, 57.)

Pothius, an emuch, the guardian of the young king of PLATON, and the PAINTER of the kingdom, who commanded the assassination of Pompey, when the latter fled for refuge to Egypt after the loss of the battle of Pharsalia in K. 48 (Lucan, viii. 464, &c.). He plotted against Caesar when he came to Alexandria, after the same year. It was Pothinus who placed Achillas over the Egyptian forces, with directions to seize a favourable opportunity for attacking Caesar, but he himself remained with the young king in the quarters of Caesar. But as he was here detected in carrying on a treasonable correspondence with Achillas, he was put to death by order of Caesar. (Caes. B. C. iii. 108, 112; Dion Cass. xii. 36, 39; Plut. Caes. 48, 49; Lucan. x. 333, &c. 515, &c.)

POTITUS. [Πότιτος], a personification of love or desire, was represented along with Eros and Himeros, in the temple of Aphrodite at Megara, by the hand of Scopas. (Paus. i. 43. § 6; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4, 7.)

POTITIUS, one of the most ancient patriotic genii at Rome, but it never attained any historical importance. The Potitii were, with the Pinarii, the hereditary priests of Hercules at Rome: the legend which related the establishment of the worship of this god, is given under PINARIA GENSI. It is further stated that the Potitii and Pinarii continued to discharge the duties of their priesthood till the censorship of App. Claudius (b.c. 312), who induced the Potitii, by the sum of 50,000 pounds of copper, to instruct public slaves in the performance of the sacred rites; whereat the god was so angry, that the whole gens, containing twelve families and thirty grown up men, perished within a year, or, according to other accounts, within thirty days, and Appius himself became blind (Liv. i. x. 29; Festus, p. 237, ed. Müller; Val. Max. i. 1. § 17). Niebuhr remarks that if there is any truth in the tale respecting the destruction of the Potitii gens, they may have perished in the great plague which raged fifteen or twenty years before, since such legends are not scrupulous with respect to chronology. The same writer further observes that it is probable that the worship of Hercules, as attended to by the Potitii and the Pinarii, was a form of religion peculiar to these gentes, and had nothing to do with the religion of the Roman state; and that as App. Claudius wished to make these sacra privata part of the sacra publica, he induced the Potitii to instruct public slaves in the rites, since no foreign god could have a flamen. (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 309.)

POTITUS. A. AFRA'NIUS, vowed during an illness of Caligula, to sacrifice his life, if the emperor recovered, expecting to be rewarded for his devotion. But when Caligula got well, and Afranius was unwilling to fulfill his vow, the emperor had him decked out like a sacrificial victim, paraded through the streets, and then hurled down from the eminence (as opus) by the Colline gate. (Dio Cass. lvi. 17. 7; Suet. Cal. 27.)

POTITUS, VALE'RIUS. Potitus was the name of one of the most ancient and most celebrated families of the Valeria Genesi. This family, like many of the other ancient Roman families, disappears about the time of the Samnite wars; but the name was revived at a later period by the Valeria gens, as a praenomen: thus we find mention of a Potitus Valerius Messalla, who was consul suffectus in b.c. 29. The practice of using extinct family-names as praenomina was common to other gentes: as for instance in the Cornelia gens, where the Lentuli adopted, as a praenomen, the extinct cognomen of Cossus. [Cossus; Lentulus.]

1. L. VALERIUS POTITUS, consul b.c. 483 and 470, the founder of the family, was a relation of the celebrated P. VALERIUS PUBILICOLA; but it is a matter of dispute whether he was his brother or his nephew. Dionysius, it is true, calls him (viii. 77) his brother *; but it has been conjectured by Graecanus, Gelenius, and Sylburg, that we ought to read ἀδελφόνυς or ἀδελφόεις instead of ἀδελ-

φιος; and this conjecture is confirmed by the fact that Dionysius elsewhere (viii. 87) speaks of him as the son of Marcus, whereas we know that the father of Publicola was Volusus. If Potitus was the son of Marcus, he was probably the son of the M. Valerius who was consul b.c. 505, four years after the kings were expelled, and who is described in the Fasti as M. Valerius Volus. Moreover, seeing that Potitus was consul a second time b.c. 470, that is, thirty-nine years after the expulsion of the kings, it is much more likely that he should have been a nephew than a brother of the man who took such a prominent part in the events of that time. We may, therefore, conclude with tolerable certainty that he was the nephew of Publicola.

Potitus is first mentioned in b.c. 485, in which year he was one of the questores parricidi, and, in conjunction with his colleague, K. Fabius, impeached Sp. Cassius Visceclinus before the people. [Visceilinus.] (Liv. ii. 41; Dionys. viii. 77.) He was consul in b.c. 483, with M. Fabius Vibulanus (Liv. ii. 42; Dionys. viii. 87), and again in 470 with T. Aemilius Mammercus. In the latter year he marched against the Aequi; and as the enemy would not meet him in the open field, he proceeded to attack their camp, but was prevented from doing so by the indications of the divine will. (Liv. ii. 69; Dionys. ix. 51, 55.)

2. L. VALE'RIUS POTITUS, consul b.c. 449, with M. Horatius Barbatus, in b.c. 449. Dionysius calls him a grandson of the great P. Valerius Publicola, and a son of the P. Valerius Publicola, who was consul in b.c. 460, and who was killed that year in the assault of the Capitol, which had been seized by Herodonus (Dionys. xi. 4); and hence we find him described as L. Valerius Pubilicola Potitus. But we think it more probable that he was the son or grandson of L. Valerius Potitus [No. 1; first, because we find that Livy, Cicero, and Dionysius, invariably give him the surname of Potitus, and never that of Publicola, and secondly because the great popularity of Potitus would naturally give origin to the tradition that he was a lineal descendant of that member of the gens, who took such a prominent part in the expulsion of the kings.

The annals of the Valeria gens recorded that L. Valerius Potitus was the first person who offered opposition to the decemvirs; and whether this was the case or not, we can be no nearer the truth of the case, or the order in which the events took a leading part in the abolition of the tyrannical power. Ille and M. Horatius are represented as the leaders of the people against Ap. Claudius after the murder of Virginia by her father; and when the plebeians had secured to the Sacred Hill, he and Horatius were sent to them by the senate, as the only acceptable members, to negotiate the terms of peace. In this mission they succeeded; the decemvirs was abolished, and the two friends of the plebs, Valerius and Horatius, were elected consuls, b.c. 449. Their consulship is memorable by the

* Dionysius also calls him L. Valerius Publicola, but this is opposed to the Fasti, and is in itself improbable.
enactment of the celebrated Valerian and Horatian Lexes, which secured the liberties of the plebs, and gave them additional power in the state. 1. The first law is said to have made a plebisicium binding on the whole people, but Niebuhr supposes that the sanction of the senate and the confirmation of the curiae were necessary to give a plebisicium the full force of a lex. [Comp. Philo, p. 296, a. 2. The second law enacted that whoever shouldprocure the election of a magistrate without appeal should be outlawed, and might be killed by any one with impunity. 3. The third law declaredthat, whoever harmed the tribunes of the plebs, the aediles, the judges, or the decemvirs, should be outlawed and accrued. It is doubtful who are meant by the judges and decemvirs: various conjectures have been made on the point by modern writers (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 369; Arnold, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 313). After the enactment of these laws, the consuls proceeded to march against the foreign enemies of the state. The people flocked to the standards of the popular consuls, and fought with enthusiasm under their orders. They accordingly met with great success; Valerius defeated the Aequi and the Volsci, Horatius the Sabinus, and both armies returned to Rome covered with glory. However, Valerius refused a triumph to these traitors to their order; whereupon the centuries conferred upon them this honour by their supreme authority, regardless of the opposition of the senate. (Liv. iii. 39—41, 49—55, 61—64; Dionys. xi. 4, &c. 45, &c.; Cic. de Rep. ii. 31, Brut. 14; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. pp. 345—376.) In B.C. 446 Valerius was chosen by the centuries one of the quaestores parricidii (Tac. Ann. xi. 22; respecting the statement in Tacitus, see Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Quaestor). 3. C. Valerius Potitus Volusus, described in the Capitoline Fasti as L. F. Volusi n., was consular tribune b.C. 415 (Liv. iv. 49), and consul with M. Acemnius Mamercinus, b.C. 410. In his consulship he distinguished himself by his opposition to the agrarian law of the tribune M. Maenius; and he recovered the Arx Carventana, which had been taken by the Volsci, in consequence of which he entered the city in triumph; he was consul a second time in b.C. 407, and a third time in b.C. 404. (Liv. iv. 57, 61.) 4. L. Valerius Potitus, described in the Capitoline Fasti as L. F. P. N., was consular tribune five times, namely in b.C. 414, 466, 403, 401, 398 (Liv. iv. 49, 58, v. 11, 10, 14). He was also twice consul; first in b.C. 393, with P. Cornelius Maluginensis Cosus, in which year both consuls had to resign, through some fault in the auspices (vitio facti), and L. Lucretius Flavus Tricipitinus and Ser. Sulpiicus Camerinus were chosen in their stead; and a second time in the following year, b.C. 392, with M. Manlius, in which year both the consuls celebrated the great games, which had been vowed by the dictator M. Furius, and also carried on war against the Aequi. In consequence of their success in this war, Valerius obtained the honour of a triumph, and Manlius of an ovation (Liv. v. 31; Dionys. l. 74). In the same year Valerius was the third interrex appointed for holding the comitia (Liv. v. 31), and in b.C. 390, the year in which Rome was taken by the Gauls, he was magister equitum to the dictator M. Furius Camillus. (Liv. v. 48.) 5. P. Valerius Potitus Publicola, described in the Capitoline Fasti, as L. F. L. N., and consequently a son of No. 4, was consular tribune six times, namely, in b.C. 386, 384, 330, 377, 370, and 367. (Liv. vi. 6, 18, 27, 32, 36, 42.) 6. C. Valerius Potitus, a son of No. 3, judging from his pnenomen, was consular tribune, b.C. 370. (Liv. vi. 36.) 7. C. Valerius Potitus Flaccus, probably son or grandson of No. 6, was consul b.C. 351, with M. Claudius Marcellus. Livy says, that in some annals Valerius appeared with the cognomen of Potitus, and in others with that of Flaccus (Liv. viii. 18). Orosius, who mentions Valerius (iii. 10), calls him simply Valerius Flaccus, without the cognomen of Potitus. It is probable that he was the first of the family who assumed the surname of Flaccus, and that his descendants dropped the name of Potitus. If this supposition is correct, the Flacci, who became afterwards a distinguished family of the Valeria gens, would be sprung from this Valerius Potitus. (Flaccus, Valerius.) 8. L. Valerius Potitus, probably a brother of No. 7, was magister equitum in b.C. 351, to the dictator Cn. Quintilius Varus. (Liv. viii. 18.) 9. M. Valerius Maximus Potitus, consul b.C. 328. (Maximus, Valerius, No. 6.) 10. POTO'NE, a poet. PRACHIAS, artist. PRACLIIUS, the name of a father and a son, whom Cicero recommended to Caesar in b.C. 45. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii.) PRAECONIUS, L. VALER'IUS, a legatus who was defeated and killed by the Aquitani a year before Caesar's legatus, P. Crassus, made war upon this people, b.C. 56 (Caesar, B. G. iii. 20). This defeat of Praeconius is not mentioned by any other writer, and we know nothing of him or of the history of the war. PRAENEST'IA, a surname of the Roman Fortune, who had a temple and oracle at Praeneste. (Ov. Fast. vi. 62; Suet. Domit. 15; comp. Fortuna.) (L. S.) PRAESENS, BRU'TTIUS, to whom one of Pliny's letters is addressed (Ep. vii. 3), was probably the father of the following Præsens. PRAESEN'N BRU'TTIUS, the father of Crispina, wife of the emperor Commodus. He is generally supposed to be the C. Bruttius Præsens who appears in the Fasti as consul for 4. d. 153, and again for 4. d. 180. There is also a C. Bruttius Praesens marked as having been consul for the second time in A. d. 139, and another as consul in A. d. 217. (Capitolin. M. Aurel. 27; Lamp. Commot. 12; Censorin. 21.) [W. R.] PRAETEXTATUS, C. ASI'NIUS, consul A. d. 243, with C. Vetutius Atticus. (Fasti; Capitol. Gorp. 26.) PRAETEXTATUS, ATE'IUS. [Ateius] PRAETEXTATUS, SULPI'CIUS. 1. Q. SULPICIUS Praetextatus consular tribune, b.C. 434. There was considerable difference in the annalists respecting the supreme magistrates for this year, and I learn from Livy that Valerius Antonius and Q. Tubero made Q. Sulpicius one of the consuls for the year. (Liv. iv. 23; Dion. xii. 53.) 2. SER. SULPICIUS Praetextatus, four times consular tribune, namely in b.C. 377, 376, 370, 368. He married the elder daughter of M. Fabius Ambustus; and it is said that the younger daughter of Fabius, who was married to Licinius Stolo, urged on her husband to procure the consulsip for the plebeians, as she was jealous of the honours of her sister's husband. Niebuhr has pointed out the worthlessness and contradictions in this tale. (Liv. vi. 22—24, 36, 38; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 2. 3.)

PRAETEXTATUS, VETTIUS AGORIUS, a senator of distinguished ability and uncorrupted morals, was prosconul of Achaea in the reign of Julian, Praefectus Urbri under Valentinian I., and Praefectus Pretoriori under Theodosius. He died in the possession of the last office, when he was consul elect. (Amm. Marc. xxii. 7, xxvii. 9, xxviii. 1; Zosim. iv. 3; Symmach. Ep. x. 26; Valesius, ad Amm. Marc. xxii. 7.) It was at the house of this Vettius Praetextatus that Macrobius supposes the conversation to have taken place, which he has recorded in his Saturnalia. [See Vol. ii. p. 883.]

PRATINAS (Πρατίνας), one of the early tragic poets who flourished at Athens at the beginning of the fifth century, B.C., and whose combined efforts brought the art to its perfection, was a native of Phlius, and was therefore by birth a Dorian. His father's name was Pyrrhonides or Encomius. It is not stated at what time he went to Athens, but we find him exhibiting there, in competition with Choeurilus and Aeschylus, about Ol. 70, B.C. 500—499. (Suid. s. v., Άριστας, Πρατίνας.) Of the two poets with whom he then contended, Choeurilus had already been twenty years before the public, and Aeschylus now appeared, for the first time, at the age of twenty-five; Pratinas, who was younger than the former, but older than the latter, was probably in his full vigour at this very period.

The step in the progress of the art, which was ascribed to Pratinas, is very distinctly stated by the ancient writers; it was the separation of the satyric from the tragic drama (Suid. s. v., πράτινας ἰγραφή Σαῦρος; Acro, ad Hor. Art. Poët. 230, reading Pratinae for Pratini; respecting the alleged share of Choeurilus in this improvement, see Choeurilius, Vol. 1. p. 697, b.) The change was a very important one, and it preserved a characteristic feature of the older form of tragedy, the entire rejection of which would have met with serious obstacles, not only from the popular taste, but from religious associations, and yet preserved it in such a manner as, while developing its own capabilities, to set free the tragic drama from the fetters it imposed. A band of Satyrs, as the companions of Dionysus, formed the original chorus of tragedy; and their jests and frolics were interspersed with the more serious action of the drama, without causing any more sense of incongruity than is felt in the reading of those jocose passages of Homer, from which Aristotle traces the origin of the satyrical drama and of comedy. As however tragedy came to be separated more and more from any reference to Dionysus, and the whole of the heroic mythology was included in its range of subjects, the chorus of Satyrs of course became more and more inimicable and a hindrance, and at the same time the jocose element, which formed an essential part of the character of the chorus of Satyrs, became more and more incongruous with the earnest spirit and thrilling interest of the higher tragic dramas. It is easy to enter into the fun of the Prometheus the Fire-kindler, where an old Satyr sings his heart in attempting to embrace the beautiful fire; but it is hard to fancy what the poet could have done with a chorus of Satyrs, in place of the ocean nymphs, in the Prometheus Bound. The innovation of Pratinas at once relieved tragedy of this inebrius, and gave the Satyrs a free stage for themselves; where, by treating the same class of subjects on which the tragedies were founded, in a totally different spirit, the poet not only preserved so venerable and popular a feature of his art as the old chorus, but also, in the exhibition of trelologies, afforded a wholesome relaxation, as well as a pleasant diversion, to the overstrained minds of the spectators.

It has been suggested by some writers, that Pratinas was induced to cultivate the satyrical drama by his fear of being eclipsed by AEschylus in tragedy; a point which is one of pure conjecture. It is more to the purpose to observe that the early associations of Pratinas would very probably imbue him with a taste for that species of the drama; for his native city, Phlius, was the neighbour of Sicyon, the home of those "tragic choruses," which the Dorians claimed to be the inventors of tragedy: it was adjacent also to Corinth, where the cyclic choruses of Satyrs, which were ascribed to Arion, had been long established. (Herod. v. 67; Theocrit. xix.; Aristot. Poët. 3; Bentley, Plat.)

The innovation of Pratinas, like all the great improvements of that age of the development of the drama, was adopted by his contemporaries; but Pratinas is distinguished, as might be expected, by the large proportion of his satyrical dramas; having composed, according to Suidas, fifty plays, of which thirty-two were satyrical. He gained but one prize. (Suid. s. v.) Büch, however, by an alteration in the text of Suidas, assigns to Pratinas only twelve satyrical dramas, thus leaving a sufficient number of tragedies to make three for every satyrical drama, that is, twelve tetralogies and two single plays. (Trag. Gr. Prinac. p. 123.) In merit, the satyrical dramas of Pratinas were esteemed the first, except only those of Aeschylus. (Paus. ii. 13, § 16.) His son Aristus was also highly distinguished for his satyrical plays. (Aristot.)

Pratinas ranked high among the lyric, as well as the dramatic poets of his age. He cultivated two species of lyric poetry, the hyparcheme and the dithyramb, of which the former was closely related to the satyrical drama by the jocular character which it often assumed, the latter by its ancient choruses of Satyrs. Pratinas may perhaps be considered to have shared with his contemporary Lasus the honour of founding the Athenian school of dithyrambic poetry. Some interesting fragments of his hyparchemes are preserved, especially a considerable passage in Athenaeus (i. p. 22, a.) which gives an important indication of the contest for supremacy, which was then going on between both poetry and music, and between the different kinds of music. The poet complains that the voices of the singers were overpowered by the noise of the flute. He expresses his desire to supplant the prevailing Phrygian melody by the Dorian. It is impossible to say how much of his lyric poetry was separate from his dramas; in which, both from the age at which he lived, and from express testimony, we know that great importance was assigned not only to the songs, but also to the dances of the chorus. In the passage just cited Athenaeus mentions him as one of the poets who were called δροσητοκολ*, from the large part which the choral dances bore in their dramas.

PRAXAGORAS (Πραξαγόρας), an Athenian, lived after the time of Constantine the Great, probably under his son. He wrote at the age of nineteen, two books on the Athenian kings; at the age of twenty-two, two books on the history of Constantine; and at the age of thirty-one, six books on the history of Alexander the Great. All these works were written in the Ionic dialect. None of them has come down to us with the exception of a few extracts made by Photius, from the history of Constantine. In this work Praxagoras, though a heathen, placed Constantine before all other emperors. (Phot. Cod. 62.)

PRAXAGORAS (Πραξαγόρας), a celebrated physician, who was a native of the island of Cos. (Galen, de Uteri Dissert. c. 10, vol. ii. p. 905, et alibi.) His father's name was Nicarchus* (Galen, loco cit.; de Facult. Nat. lib. 3, vol. ii. p. 141, de Treme, c. 1, vol. vii. p. 584), and he belonged to the family of the Asclepiadai (id. de Meth. Med. i. 3, vol. x. p. 28). He was the tutor of Philotimus (id. loco cit.; de Aliment. Facult. i. 12, vol. vi. p. 509), Pistonius (Cels. de Med. i. praef. p. 6), and Herophilus (Galen, de Differ. Puls. iv. 3, vol. viii. p. 723, de Meth. Med. i. 3, vol. x. p. 28, de Treme, c. 1, vol. vii. p. 585); and as he was a contemporary of Chrysiippus, and lived shortly after Diocles Carystus (Cels. de Med. i. praef. p. 5; Pliny, H. N. xxvi. 6), he may be safely placed in the fourth century B.C. He belonged to the medical sect of the Dogmatici (Galen, Introd. c. 4, vol. xiv. p. 683), and was celebrated for his knowledge of medical science in general, and especially for his attainments in anatomy and physiology. He was one of the chief defenders of the humoral pathology, who placed the seat of all diseases in the humours of the body (id. med. c. 9, p. 699). He is supposed by Sprengel (Hist. de la Med., vol. i. p. 422, 3), Hecker (Gesch. der Heilk. vol. i. p. 219), and others, to have been the first person who pointed out the distinction between the veins and the arteries; but this idea is controverted (and apparently with success) by M. Litré (Œuvres d'Hippocr. vol. i. p. 202, &c.), who shows that the distinction in question is alluded to by Aristotle (if the treatise de Spiritu be genuine), Hippocrates (or at least the author of the treatise de Articulis, who was anterior to Praxagoras), Diogenes Apolloniates, and Euryphon. Many of his anatomical opinions have been preserved, which show that he was in advance of his contemporaries in this branch of medical knowledge. On the other hand, several curious and capricious errors have been attributed to him, as, for instance, that the heart was the source of the nerves (an opinion which he held with Aristotle), and that the ramifications of the artery, which he saw issue from the heart, were ultimately converted into nerves, as they contracted in diameter (Galen, de Hippocr. et Plat. Decr. i. 6, vol. v. p. 187). Some parts of his medical practice appear to have been very bold, as, for instance, his venturing, in cases of lieus when attended with intussusception, to open the abdomen in order to replace the intestine (Cael. Aurel. de Morb. Acut. iii. 17, p. 244). He wrote several medical works, of which only the titles and some fragments remain, preserved by Galen, Caecilius Aurelius, and other writers. A fuller account of his opinions may be found in Sprengel's Hist. de la Méd., and Kühn's Commentatio de Praxagora Coe, reprinted in the second volume of his Opuscula Academica Medica et Philologica, p. 128, &c. There is an epitome by Crinagoras, in honour of Praxagoras in the Greek Anthology. (Anth. Plan. 273.) [W. A. G.]

PRAXASPE (Πραξάσπη), a Persian, who was high in favour with king Cambyses, and acted as his messenger. By his means Cambyses had his brother Smerdis assassinated. In one of his fits of madness, Cambyses shot the son of Praxaspe with an arrow through the heart, in the presence of his father. When the news of the usurpation of Smerdis reached Cambyses, he naturally suspected Praxaspe of not having fulfilled his directions. The latter, however, succeeded in clearing himself. After the death of Cambyses, the Magians deemed it advisable to endeavour to secure the co-operation of Praxaspe, as he was the only person who could certify the death of Smerdis, having murdered him with his own hands. He at first assented to their proposals, but having been directed by them to proclaim to the assembled Persians that thepretender was really the son of Cyrus, he, on the contrary, declared the stratagem that was being practised, and then threw himself headlong from the tower on which he was standing, and so perished. (Herod. iii. 30, 33, 34, 62, 66, 74.) [C. P. M.]

PRA'XIAS (Πραξίας), artists. 1. An Athenian sculptor of the age of Pheidias, but of the more archaic school of Calamis, commenced the execution of the statues in the pediments of the great temple of Apollo at Delphi, but died while he was still engaged upon the work, which was completed by another Athenian artist, Androstrhenes, the disciple of Exeudamus. (Paus. x. 19. § 3. s. 4.)

The date of Praxias may be safely placed about Ol. 83, B.C. 448, and onwards. His master Calamis flourished about B.C. 467, and belonged to the last period of the archaic school, which immediately preceded Pheidias. [See PHEIDIAS, p. 245, b.] Moreover, the indications which we have of the time when the temple at Delphi was decorated by a number of Athenian artists, point to the period between B.C. 448 and 430, and go to show that the works were executed at about the very time when the temples of Athena at Athens, and of Zeus at Olympia, were being adorned by Pheidias and his disciples. (Comp. Phidias, p. 248, b.; Polygnotus, p. 467, b.; and Müller, Phil., pp. 28, 29.)

The sculptures themselves are described by Pausanias (l. c.) very briefly as consisting of Artemis and Leto, and Apollo and the Muses, and also the setting sun and Dionysus and the women called Thyiades. In all probability, the first collected together, those connected with the genealogy of Apollo, occupied the front pediment, and the other pediment was filled with the remaining sculptures, namely those connected with the kindred divinity Dionysus, the inventor of the lyre and the patron of the dithyramb. As the temple was one of the largest in Greece, it is likely that there were, in each pediment, other figures subordinate to those mentioned by Pausanias. (Welecker, die Vorstellungen der Giebelfelder und Metopen an dem Tempel zu Delphi, in the Rheinisches Museum, 1842, pp. 1–29.)

2. A vase-painter, whose name appears on one of the Canino vases, on which the education of Achilles is represented. The name, as reported by M. Orioli, the discoverer of the vase, is Πραξιάς, ΤΠΑ 4-1ΑΣ, a proper name, so totally unknown, as to raise a strong suspicion that the name has either been miswritten or misread, and that it ought to be ΠΠΑ 4-1ΑΣ. There is a similar diversity in the name of the vase-painter Exechias. (Raoul-Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 57. Comp. pp. 44, 45, and De Witte, in the Recue de Philologie, 1847, vol. ii. p. 422.)

PRAXI'DAMAS (Πραξιδάμας). 1. A writer on poetry or music, probably the latter. Suidas is the only author who expressly mentions him (s. v. ψαλτής). Harpocratus (s. v. Μουσαράς) seems to allude to memoirs of Praxidamas, written by Aristoxenus. He must, therefore, have lived between the time of Democritus, n. c. 460, and that of Aristoxenus, n. c. 320. (See Jonasius, de Script. Hist. Phil. i. 14, 8, &c.)

2. The first athlete who erected a statue of himself at Olympia (Oi. 59, n. c. 514), to commemorate his victory with the cestus. (Paus. vi. 18; Pindar. Nax. vi. 27, &c.)

PRAXI'DICE (Πραξίδικη), i. e. the goddess who carries out the objects of justice, or watches the execution of the laws. When Menelaus arrived in Laconia, on his return from Troy, he set up a statue of Praxidice near Gytheium, not far from the spot where Paris, in carrying off Helen, had founded a sanctuary of Aphrodite Mignonitis (Paus. iii. 22, § 2). Near Halirauris, in Boeotia, we meet with the worship of Praxidice, in the plural (ix. 33, § 2), who were called daughters of Ogyges, and their names were Alcmena, Thel- linoe, and Aulis (ix. 33, § 4; Suid. s. v.; Steph. Byz. s. v. Τραξίδη). Their images consisted merely of heads, and their sacrifices only of the heads of animals. With the Orphic poets Praxidice seems to be a surname of Persephone. (Orph. Άργου. 31, Ημηῦν. 28, 5; comp. Müller, Orchom. p. 122, 2d edit.)

PRAXILLA (Πραξίλλα), of Sicyon, a lyric poet, who flourished about OL. 82, n. c. 450, and was one of the nine poets who were distinguished as the Lyric Muses. (Suid. s. n.; Esseb. Chron. s. a.; Antip. Thees. Ep. 23; Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 114, Anth. Ped. ix. 26.) Her scolia were among the most celebrated compositions of that species. (Ath. xv. p. 694, n.) She was believed by some to be the author of the scolia preserved by Athenaeus (p. 695, c.), and in the Greek Anthology (Brumel, Anal. vol. i. p. 157), which was extremely popular at Athens (Paus. ap. Eustath. ad H. ii. 711; Aristoph. Vesp. 1231, et Schol.) She also composed dithyrambs (Hephaest. 9, p. 22, ed. Gaisf.)

This poetess appears to have been distinguished for the variety of her metres. The line of one of her dithyrambs, which Hephaestus quotes in the passage just referred to, is a dactylic hexameter: it must not, however, be inferred that her dithyrambs were written in heroic verse, but rather that they were arranged in dactylic systems, in which the hexameter occasionally appeared. One species of logaeodic dactylic verse was named after her the Praxilean (Πραξιλέας), namely,

\[ \text{as in the following fragment:} \]

\[ \ddag \text{διὰ τῶν ἀυρίων καλὸν κηθάσαι,} \]

which only differs from the Alcaic by having one more dactyl. (Hephaest. 24, p. 43; Hermann, Elem. Doct. Metr. p. 231.) Another verse named after her is the Ioantic (Ioani) Ἀθηναίοι, hexameter trimenary choraliac. (Hephaest. 36, p. 63.)

The few fragments and references to her poems, which we possess, lead to the supposition that the subjects of them were chiefly taken from the erotic stories of the old mythology especially as connected with the Dorians. In one of her poems, for example, she celebrated Carneus as the son of Zeus and Europa, as educated by Apollo and Leto, and as beloved by Apollo (Paus. iii. 13, § 3, s. 5; Schol. ad Theoccr. v. 83:) in another she represented Dionysus as the son of Aphrodite (Hesych. s. v. Βάσιου Διόνυσος:) in one she sang the death of Adonis (Zenob. Prov. iv. 21), and in another the rape of Chrysippeus by Zeus. (Ath. xiii. p. 603, a.) She belongs decidedly to the Dorian school of lyric poetry, but there were also traces of Aecleic influence in her rhythms, and even in her dialect. Tatian (auto. Graec. 52, p. 131, ed. Worth?) mentions a statue of her, which was ascribed to Lywippus. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. ii. pp. 126, 17, Müller, Hist. ant. Gr. Lit. vol. i. pp. 188, 189; Boden, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. pt. 2, p. 11, n. 129, f.)

PRAXION (Πραξίων), a Greek writer, on the history of Megara (Suidas, Harpocrat. and Phot. s. v. Σικίορος; Schol. ad Aristoph. Eccles. 18.)

PRAXIPHANES (Πραξίφανος). 1. A Periatic poet, which was a native either of Mytilene (Clem. Alex. i. p. 365, ed. Potter), or of Rhodes (Strab. xiv. p. 655). He lived in the time of Demetrius Polioretces and Potelyam Lagi, and was a pupil of Theophrastus, about n. c. 322 (Proclus, l. i. in Timaeum; Tzetzes, ad Hesiod. Op. et Dies, 1.) He subsequently opened a school himself, in which Epicurus is said to have been one of his pupils (Diog. Laërt. x. 19). Praxiphanes paid especial attention to grammatical studies, and is hence named along with Aristotle as the founder and creator of the science of grammar (Clemens Alex. i. c.; Bekker, Anecdol. ii. p. 229, where Πραξίφανος should be read instead of Πραξιφανος). Of the writings of Praxiphanes, which appear to have been numerous, two are especially mentioned, a Dialogue Περ PRAXITELES.

The position occupied by Praxiteles in the history of ancient art can be defined without much difficulty. He stands, with Scopas, at the head of the later Attic school, so called in contradistinction to the earlier Attic school of Phidias.

Without attempting those sublime impersonations of divine majesty, in which Phidias had been so inimitably successful, Praxiteles was unsurpassed in the exhibition of the softer beauties of the human form, especially in the female figure. Without aiming at ideal majesty, he attained to a perfect ideal gracefulness; and, in this respect, he occupies a position in his own art very similar to that of Apelles in painting. In that species of the art to which he devoted himself, he was as perfect a master as Phidias was in his department, though the species itself was immeasurably inferior. In fact, the character of each of these artists was a perfect exponent of the character of their respective times. The heroic spirit and the religious earnestness of the period preceding the Peloponnesian War gave to the productions of one the prevailing love of pleasure and sensual indulgences found its appropriate gratification in the other. The contrast was marked in their subjects as well as in their style. The chryselephantine statue of Zeus at Olympia realised, as nearly as art can realise, the illusion of the actual presence of the supreme divinity; and the spectator who desired to see its prototype could find it in no human form, but only in the sublimest conception of the same deity which the kindred art of poetry had formed: but the Cnidian Aphrodite of Praxiteles, though an ideal representation, expressed the ideal only of sensual charms and the emotions connected with them, and was awesomely modelled from a cottaezen. Thus also the subjects of Praxiteles in general were those divinities whose attributes were connected with sensual gratification, or whose forms were distinguished by soft and youthful beauty,—Aphrodite, Erinys, Eros, and Dionysus.

His works were chiefly imitated from the most beautiful living models he could find; but he scarcely ever executed any statues professedly as portraits. Quintilian (xii. 10) praises him and Lyssippus for the natural character of their works.

His works are too numerous to be all mentioned here individually. The most important of them will be described according to the department of mythology from which their subjects were taken.

1. Statues of Aphrodite. By far the most celebrated work of the master, and that in which he doubtless put forth all his power, was the marble statue of Aphrodite, which was distinguished from other statues of the goddess by the name of the Cnidian, who purchased it. The story, related by Piso (H. N. xxxvii. 5. 4. § 5), is that the artist made two statues of Aphrodite, of which the one was draped, the other not. In his own opinion, they were of equal value, for he offered them for sale together at the same price. The people of Cos, who had always possessed a character for severe virtue, purchased the draped statue, "severum id ac pudicum arbitrantes;" the other was bought by the Cnidian, and its fame almost entirely eclipsed the merits of the rival work. It was always esteemed the most perfectly beautiful of the statues of the goddess. According to Pliny, it surpassed all other works, not only of Praxiteles, but in the whole world; and many

made the voyage to Cnidos expressly to behold it. So highly did the Cnidians themselves esteem their treasure, that when King Nicomedes offered them, as the price of it, to pay off the whole of their heavy public debt, they preferred to endure any suffering rather than part with the work which gave their city its chief renown. It was afterwards carried, with the Samian Iera and the Lindian Athena, to Constantinople, where it perished by fire, with innumerable other works of art, in the reign of Justinian. (Zonar. xiv. 2.)

The temple in which it stood at Cnidos was so constructed, that the beauties of the statue could be seen equally well from every point of view.

Of the numerous descriptions and praises of the statue, which abound in the ancient authors, the one which gives us the best notion of it is that of Lucian (Amor. 13, 14, vol. ii. pp. 411, 412; comp. Imag. 6, vol. ii. p. 463.) The material was the purest and most brilliant Parian marble; the form was in every respect perfect; the position of the left hand was the same as in the Venus of Medici; the right hand held some drapery which fell to the knees by her side. It gave her a gentle smile; and the whole expression was supposed by the ancients to indicate the appearance of the goddess when Paris adjudged to her the prize of beauty:

Οὗτος ὁ Πραξιτέλης τεχνίσατο, οὐθ' ὁ σίδαρος, ἀλ' οὗτος ἔστησ, ὡς ποτε κρυμμένη, an opinion, which, however well it may have accorded with the grace and beauty of the work, cannot be regarded as the true expression of the intention of the artist, for the drapery and vase by the side of the figure indicate that she has either just left or is about to enter the bath. The representation of the goddess as standing before Paris is rather to be seen in the Venus of Medici and in the copy, by Menaphontus, of the Aphrodite in the Tread. (Plato, Epip. 10, ap. Bruneck, Anal. vol. i. p. 171, Art. Plan. iv. 161, Jacobs, Anth. Plut. Art. vol. i. p. 675; compare even in Art. Plut. i. 166, Jacobs, l. c., 676, and several other epigrams, which stand with these in the Anthology of Planudes; Auson. Epig. 56; Athenag. Legat. pro Christ. 14, p. 61; Jacobs, in Wieland's Attickes Museum, vol. iii. pp. 24, f., 29, f.) This statue appears to have been the first instance in which any artist had ventured to represent the goddess entirely divested of drapery. The artist modelled it from a favourite courtezean named Phryne (Ath. xiii. pp. 585, 591), of whom also he made more than one portrait statue. (Paus. ix. 27. § 4. s. 5, x. 14. § 5. s. 7; Aelian. V. II. ii. 32; Tattian. Orat. ad Graec. 53, p. 115, ed. Worth.) This statue was, therefore, a new ideal of the goddess; which was frequently imitated by succeeding artists. It is, however, very doubtful which, or whether any, of the existing statues of Venus, are copies of the Cnidian Aphrodite. Its type is preserved on coins of Cnido, struck in honour of the marble statues, which are probably copies of it; are the following: one in the garden of the Vatican; another in the Museo Pio-Clementino, which, however, is supposed by Böttiger to be a copy of the Cnian, on account of the drapery which covers part of the figure, which Visconti, and most of the subsequent writers, take to be a mere addition made by the artist in copying the Cnidian statue; another, which was formerly in the Bruschi palace, and is now in the Glyptothek at Munich; there are also some busts after it. (Rasche, Lee Rei Num. s. e. Cnido; Eckel, Doc. Num. Vet. vol. ii. p. 590; Lippert, Duetsch. i. 81; Perrier, No. 28; Epitocius, No. 86; Mus. Pio-Clem. i. 11; Flaxman, Lectures on Sculpture, pl. xxii.; Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, § 127, n. 4, Denkmäler d. alt. Kunst, vol. i. pl. xxxv. No. 146, a. b. c. d., vol. ii. pl. xxxv. No. 277.) It has been the subject of much discussion among the writers on art, whether or not the Venus of Medici is an imitation of the Cnidian Aphrodite. (See Heyne, Antiq. Aphytisätte, vol. i. pp. 123, f.; Winckelmann, Gesch. d. Kunst, b. v. c. 2. § 3; Meyer zu Winck. l. c., and Beilage vitt. zu b. ix., Gesch. d. Kunst, vol. i. p. 113; Visconti, Mus. Pio-Clem. vol. i. p. 18; Levezow, Ob die Mern. ein Bild. d. Kind. sei; Thiersch, Epochien, p. 268; Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, l. c.) The truth appears to be that Cleomenes, in making the Venus of Medici, had the Venus of Praxiteles in mind, and imitated it in some degree; but the difference in the treatment of the drapery by him and by Menaphontus, would have considered a copy of the other. Types between the two are seen in the Aphrodite of Menaphontus and in the Capitoline Venus; of which the latter, while preserving the drapery and vessel of the Cnidian statue, has almost exactly the attitude and expression of the Venus of Medici. (See Müller, Denkmäler, vol. ii. pl. xxvi. n. 278.)

The supposed copies of the Cnian Venus are even more doubtful than those of the Cnidian. Indeed, with the exception of that in the Museo Pio-Clementino, already mentioned, there is none which can with any probability be regarded as a copy of it. A fine conjectural restoration of it is given in plate xxii. to Flaxman's Lectures on Sculpture.

Besides the Cnian and the Cnidian, Praxiteles made other statues of Aphrodite, namely: one in bronze which, Pliny tells us, was considered equal to the Cnidian, and which perished at Rome in the fire in the reign of Claudius (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. § 50; 17. § 12; Thespiae, 15. § 2); another in marble, at Thesspiae (Paus. ix. 27. § 3); another, at Alexandria on Mt. Latmus. (Steph. Byz. s. v.)

2. Eros, and other divinities connected with Aphrodite. Praxiteles made two marble statues of Eros, of the highest celebrity, the one of which was dedicated at Thespiae, the other at Parium on the Propontis. Like all the early Greek artists, Praxiteles represented Eros not as a child, but as in the flower of youth. The statue at Thespiae, which was of Pentelic marble, with the wings gilt (Julian. Or. ii. p. 54, c.), was dedicated by Phryne (Lucian, An. 14, 17; Paus. ix. 27. § 59), and an interesting story is told of the manner in which she became possessed of it. Praxiteles, in his fondness for Phryne, had promised to give her whichever of his works she might choose, but he was unwilling to tell her which of them, in his own opinion, was the best. To discover this, she sent a slave to steal Praxiteles that a bust been broken out in his house, and that most of his works had already perished. On hearing this message, the artist rushed out, exclaiming that all his toil was lost, if the fire had touched his Satyr or his Eros. Upon this Phryne confessed the stratagem, and chose the Eros. (Paus. ix. 20. § 2.) When Mummian plundered Thespiae, like other Greek cities, of the works of art, he spared this statue, and it was still at Thespiae in the time of Cicero, who says that visits were made to that city expressly to see it. (In Verr. iv. 2.) It was removed to Rome by Caligula, restored to Thespiae by Claudius, and carried back by Nero to Rome, where it stood in Pliny's time in the schools of Octavian, and it finally perished in the conflagration of that building in the reign of Titus. (Paus. ix. 27. § 3; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 3. s. 4. § 5; Dion Cass. vii. 24.) Its place at Thespiae was supplied by a marble copy by Menodorus. (Paus. l. c.) There was in the same place a bronze statue of Eros, made by Lysippus, in emulation of the work of Praxiteles. (ib.)

The other statue of Eros, at Parium on the Propontis, is said by Pliny (l. c.) to have equalled the Cnidian Venus. Nothing is known of its history, unless it be (which is extremely probable) the same as that of which the Sicilian, Heius, was robbed by Verres. (Cic. in Verr. l. c.) Callistatus ascribes two bronze statues of Eros to Praxiteles; but the truth of this statement is doubtful, and the author may perhaps have confounded the bronze statue at Thespiae by Lysippus with the marble one by Praxiteles. (Callist. Epoch. 3. 11.) A copy of one of these statues is seen in a beautiful torso found at Centocelle, on the road from Rome to Palestrina. (Mus. Pio-Clem. i. pl. 12,) of which there is a more perfect specimen at Naples (Mus. Borb. vi. 25); there is also a very similar figure among the Elgin Marbles in the British Museum. (Müller, Denkmüller, vol. i. pl. xxxv. n. 144, 145.) To this class of the artist's works belong also the statues of Peitho and Paregorus, in the temple of Aphrodite Praxis at Megara. (Paus. i. 43. § 6.)

3. Subjects from the Mythology of Dionysus. The artist's ideal of Dionysus was embodied in a bronze statue, which stood at Elis (Paus. vi. 26. § 1), and which is described by Callistatus (Epoch. 8). It represented the god as a charming youth, clad with ivy, girt with a Faun's skin, carrying the lyre and the thyrsus. He also treated the subject in a famous bronze group, in which Dionysus was represented as attended by Intoxication and a Satyr (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 8. s. 19. § 10: Liberam Patriem et Eubriatem nobilissiumusus und Syrtem, quem Graecus Peribonum nominat). According to these words of Pliny, the celebrated statue of a satyr, which Praxiteles, as above related, ranked among his best works, was the figure in this group. This may, however, be one of Pliny's numerous mistakes, for it seems, from Pausanias's account of this satyr, that it stood alone in the street of the triads at Athens (Paus. i. 20. § 1; Athx. xiii. p. 591, b.; Heyne, Antiq. Aufsätze, vol. ii. p. 63). It is generally supposed that we have copies of this celebrated work in several marble statues representing a satyr resting against the trunk of a tree, the best specimen of which is that in the Capitoline Museum (Mus. Cap. iii. 32; Mus. Frang. ii. pl. 12; Mus. Pio-Clem. ii. 30; Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, § 127, n. 2, Denkmüller, vol. i. pl. xxxv. n. 143), Another satyr, of Parian marble, was at Megara. (Paus. i. 43. § 5.) Groups of Muses, Harpies, and Dancing Carians are mentioned by Pliny among the marble works of Praxiteles; and some also Sileni in the collection of Asinius Pollio. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 5; Aeumill. Ep. 2, ap. Brunc, Anal. vol. ii. p. 275, Anth. Pal. ix. 756; Böttiger, Analith. vol. iii. p. 147; Müller, Archiöl. l. c.) Among other works of this class, for which the reader is referred to Müller (l. c.) and Sillig (s. c.), the only one requiring special mention is the marble group of Hermes carrying the infant Dionysus, of which copies are supposed to exist in a bas-relief and a vase-painting. (Paus. v. 17. § 1; Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, l. c.)

4. Subjects from the Mythology of Apollo. This class contained one of the most celebrated statues of Praxiteles, namely the bronze figure of Apollo the Hierodule (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 6. s. 10;) Plutarch Apollo, subrecepto Lactantia communis insilvantianem, quem Sauroctonum vocat; comp. Martial, Ep. xiv. 173.) Numerous copies of it exist; and some on panel, one in marble, and several on gems. (Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, l. c. n. 7, Denkmüller, vol. i. pl. xxxvi. n. 147, a. h.)

There still remain numerous works of Praxiteles, a full enumeration of which will be found in Sillig. (Cat. Artif. s. c.) It was an undecided question among the ancients, whether the celebrated group of Niobe was the work of Praxiteles or of Scopas.

One point in the technical processes of Praxiteles deserves particular notice. It is recorded by Pliny that Praxiteles, on being asked which of his own works in marble he thought the best, replied, those in which Nicias had had a hand, "tantum," adds Pliny, "circumlimitio ejus tributavit." (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 11. s. 40. § 26.) In all probability, this circumlimitio consisted in covering the marble with a tinted encaustic varnish, by which we can easily conceive how nearly it was made to resemble flesh. (See Dict. of Ant. art. Pictura, § viii.) It was probably from a confused recollection of this statement in his Greek authorities that Pliny had shortly before (l. c. 11. s. 30), mentioned Praxiteles as an improver of encaustic painting.

Praxiteles had two sons, who were also distinguished sculptors, Timarchus and Cephsodotus II. (Pseudo-Plut. Vit. X. Orat. pp. 843, 844; Paus. i. 8. § 5, ix. 12. § 5.) Respecting the error by which some writers make a second Praxiteles out of the artist Pausites, see PASITELLES, No. 2. [P. S.]

PRAXITELEA (Prozita). 1. A daughter of Phrasinus and Diogenia, was the wife of Ezechres, and mother of Cecrops, Pandarus, Motion, Orneus, Procris, Creusa, Cithoaria, and Orethylia. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 1.) Some call her a daughter of Cepheus. (Lycurg. c. Lecrot. 93.)

2. A daughter of Thespis. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.)

3. A daughter of Leus in Athens, and a sister of Theore and Eubule. (Aelian, V. H. xii. 28.) [L. S.]

PRAXO, a lady of high rank at Delphi, who was connected by relations of hospitality with Perseus, king of Macedonia. It was at her house that the Cretan Evander, and the other emissaries employed by Perseus to assassinate Eumenes in n. 12, were lodged ; on which account she was suspected of participating in the plot, and was carried to Rome by C. Valerius. Her subsequent fate is not mentioned. (Liv. xili. 15. 17.) [E. H. B.]

PRECOLA, the mistress of P. Cethegus, was courted by Lucullus in order to use her influence with Cethegus, when he was seeking to obtain the command against Mithridates. (Plut. Lucull. 6.) [CETHEGUS, No. 7.]

PRECIAIUS NUS, a jurisconsult, was a friend of Cicero and Trebatius, and had influence with Caesar. Cicero mentions him in b. c. 54 (Cic. ad PRIAMUS.

Fam. vii. 8). His name shows that his original name was Precius, and that he was adopted by a member of another gens.

I. PRECIUS, a distinguished Roman equus, who carried on business at Panormus, when Verres was governor of Sicily (Cic. Tarr. v. 62, 65). A certain Precius left some property to Cicero, which is mentioned two or three times in his correspondence under the name of Preciana hereditas (ad Fam. xiv. 5. § 2, ad Att. vi. 9. § 2, vii. 1. § 9); but who this Precius was is not known.

PREPELAUS (Πρηπέλαος), a general in the service of Cassander, king of Macedonia. He is first mentioned in n. c. 315, when he was sent by Cassander on a secret mission to Alexander the son of Polyperchon, whom he succeeded in detaching from the cause of Antigonus and inducing to join his arms with those of Cassander (Diod. xiv. 64). Shortly after he sent him commanding an army which was sent to support Asander in Caria, and co-operating with that general again, with much success, he was sent against Polyzelus (n. p. 68). From this time we hear no more of him till n. c. 303, when he held the important fortress of Corinth with a large force, but was unable to prevent its falling into the hands of Demetrius, and only saved himself by a hasty flight (Id. xx. 103). In the following summer (n. c. 302) he was sent by Cassander, with a considerable army, to co-operate with Lysimachus in Asia, where his arms were crowned with the most brilliant successes; he reduced in a short space of time the important cities of Adramyttium, Ephesus, and Sardes, and made himself master of almost the whole of Aeolia and Ionia. But he was unable to prevent the recovery of a great part of these conquests by Demetrius, before the close of the same autumn (Id. xx. 107, 111). After this we hear no more of him. [E. H. B.]

PRESBON (Πρεσβών), a son of Phrixus, by a daughter of Acetes, king of Colchis. He himself was the father of Clymenus (Paus. ii. 20. § 2).—Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1125.) A son of Minyas was likewise called Presbon. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 230.)

P. PRESENTIELUS, one of the commanders of the allies in the Marsic war, defeated the leagte Perperna in n. c. 90. (Appian, B. C. i. 41.)

PRIAMUS (Πριαμος), the famous king of Troy, at the time of the Trojan war. He was a son of Laomedon and Strymo or Placia. His original name is said to have been Podarces, i.e. "the swift-footed," which was changed into Priamus, "the ransomed" (from πραξαμαι), because he was the only surviving son of Laomedon and was ransomed by his sister Hesione, after he had fallen into the hands of Heracles (Apollod. ii. 6. § 4, iii. 12. § 3). He is said to have been first married to Arise, the daughter of Merops, by whom he became the father of Aesacus; but afterwards he married the Phrygian Hecabe, whom he married Hecabe (Hecuba), by whom he had the following children: Hector, Alexander or Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, Pammon, Polites, Antiphus, Hipponus, Polydorus, Troilus, Creusa, Laodice, Polyxena, and Cassandra. By other women he had a great many children besides (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5). According to the Homeric tradition, he was the father of fifty sons, nineteen of whom were children of Hecabe, to whom others add an equal number of daughters (Ilom. ii. xxiv. 493, 494, with the note of Eustath.; comp. Hygin. Fab. 90; Theocr. xv. 139; Cit. Tusc. i. 35). Previous to the outbreak of the war of the Greeks against his kingdom, he is said to have supported the Phrygians in their war against the Amazons (Hom. II. iii. 184). When the Greeks landed on the Trojan coast Priam was already advanced in years, and took no active part in the war (xxiv. 487, 500). Only once did he venture upon the field of battle, to conclude the agreement respecting the single combat between Paris and Menelaus (iii. 250, &c.). After the death of his son Hector, Priam, accompanied by Hermes, went to the tent of Achilles to ransom Hector's body for burial, and obtained it (xxiv. 470). His death is not mentioned by Homer, but later poets have filled up this gap in the legend. When the Greeks entered the city of Troy, the aged king, it is said, put on his armour, and was on the point of rushing into the crowd of the enemy, but he was prevailed on by Phrygius to take refuge with herself and her daughters, as a suppliant at the altar of Zeus Herculeus. While he was standing in the temple, his son Polites, pursued by Pyrrhus, rushed into the temple, and expired at the feet of his father, whereupon Priam aimed at Pyrrhus, but was killed by him. (Vrg. Aen. ii. 512, &c.; Eurip. Trojad. 17; Paus. ii. 24. § 5, iv. 17. § 3.) His body remained unburied. (Vrg. Aen. ii. 558; Sicen. Trojad. 50, &c.; Q. Smyrni. xiii. 240, &c.) Another Priam is mentioned by Virgil (Aen. v. 564), as a son of Polites, and is accordingly a grandson of king Priam. [L. S.]

PRIAMUS, a Greek by birth, and a Roman freedman, whose name occurs in an inscription as Siciniius Priamus, with the designation Anap, that is, a worker in gold. (Muratori, Thes. vol. ii. p. 326, xix. n. 9; R. Rochette, Lettre & M. Schorn, p. 393.) [F. S.]

PRIAPATIUS, a king of Parthia. [Arsaces, IV.]

PRIAPUS (Πριαπός), a son of Dionysus and Aphrodite (Paus. ix. 31. § 2; Diod. iv. 6; Titiull. i. 4. 7; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 932). Aphrodite, it is said, had yielded to the embraces of Dionysus, but during his expedition to India, she became faithless to him, and lived with Adonis. On Dionysus' return from India, she indeed went to meet him, but soon left him again, and went to Lampsacus on the Hellespont, to give birth to the child of the god. But Hera, dissatisfied with her conduct, touched her, and, by her magic power, caused Aphrodite to give birth to a child of extreme ugliness, and with unusually large genitals. This child was Priapus. According to others, however, Priapus was a son of Dionysus and a Naid or Chione, and gave his name to the town of Priapus (Strab. xiii. p. 557; Schol. ad Theoc. i. 21), while others again describe him as a son of Adonis, by Aphrodite (Tzetza ad Lyc. 331), as a son of Hermes (Hygin. Fch. 160), or a son of a long-eared father, that is, of Pan or a Satyr (Macrobi. Sat. vi. 5). The earliest Greek poets, such as Homer, Hesiod, and others, do not mention this divinity, and Strabo (xiii. p. 559) expressly states, that it was only in later times that he was honoured with divine worship, and that he was worshiped more especially at Lampsacus on the Hellespont, whence he is sometimes called Hellesponticus (Ov. Fast. i. 440, vi. 341; Arnob. iii. 10). We have every reason to believe that he was regarded as the promoter of fertility both of the vegetation and of all animals connected with an agricultural life, and in this capacity he was worshipped as the protector of flocks of sheep and goats, of bees, the vine, all garden-produce, and even of fishing (Paus. ix. 31. § 2; Virg. Epid. vii. 33. Georg. iv. 110, with the commentators). Like other divinities presiding over agricultural pursuits, he was believed to be possessed of propitiatory powers, and is sometimes mentioned in the plural (Tibull. i. 4. 67; Moschus, iii. 27). As Priapus had many attributes in common with other gods of fertility, the Orphics identified him with their mystic Dionysus, Hermes, Helios, &c. (Schol. ad Theoc. i. 21; Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 691, 242.) The Attic legends connect Priapus with such sensuous and licentious beings as Conisalus, Ortheunes, and Tychon. (Strab. i. c.; Aristoph. Lys. 982; comp. Diod. iv. 6.) In like manner he was confounded by the Italians with Mutunus or Mutunus, the personification of the fructifying power in nature (Sallus. ad SoI. p. 219; Arnob. i. 11). The sceptres offered to him consisted of the first-fruits of gardens, vineyards, and fields (Anthol. Patal. vi. 102), of milk, honey, casks, rams, asses, and fishes (Anthol. Patal. x. 14; Ov. Fast. i. 391, 416; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. ii. 84.) He was represented in carved images, mostly in the form of hermae, with very large genitals, carrying fruit in his garment, and either a sickle or cornucopia in his hand (Tibull. i. 1. 22, 4. 8; Virg. Georg. iv. 110; Horat. Sat, i. 8; Hirt. Mythol. Bilderb. p. 172). The hermae of Priapus in Italy, like those of other rustic divinities, were usually painted red, whence the god is called ruber or rubenatus. (Ov. Fast. i. 415, vi. 319, 339.)

PRAI'PUS, a maker of fictile vases, whose name occurs on a cup in the Durand collection, found at Vulci. (Cab. Durand. n. 693, p. 261; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn. p. 57.)

PRIMIGENIA, a surname of Fortuna, under which name she had celebrated a sanctuary at Praeneste, and at Rome on the Quirinal. (Gic. de Div. ii. 41; Liv. xxxiv. 53.)

PRIMUS, a Roman freedman, whose name appears on an inscription in the Museum at Naples, in the form M. ANTURII M. L. PRIMUS ARCHITECTUS. M. Raoul-Rochette has copied and published the inscription; and he states that he was assured by M. C. Bonucci, that the stone came from the great theatre at Pompeii, of which, therefore, if this statement be correct, Primus was the architect. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn. p. 441.)

PRIMUS, M. ANTONIUS, was born at Tolosa in Gaul, and received in his boyhood the surname of Deco, which signified in the Gallic language 'head of a herd.' (Suet. Vitell. 10; Martial. ix. 100.) He had a natural talent for military life, and rose to the dignity of a senator; but having been condemned of forgery (Julium) under the lex Cornelia in the reign of Nero, he was expelled from the senate, and banished from the city. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 40; Dion Cass. liv. 9.) After the death of Nero (A. d. 68), he was restored to his former rank by Galba, and appointed to the command of the seventh legion, which was stationed in Pannonia. It was believed that he subsequently wrote to Otho, offering to take the command of his forces; but as Otho would not employ him, he gave him no support in his struggle with Vitellius. When the fortunes of the latter began to decline (A. d. 69), Antonius was one of the first generals in Europe who declared in favour of Vespasian; and he rendered him the most important services. He was well fitted to play a conspicuous part in a civil war, being bold in action, ready in speech, unscrupulous in the use of means, equally ready to plunder and to bribe, and possessing considerable military abilities. It was by his influence that the legions in Moesia, as well as those in Pannonia, espoused the side of Vespasian. When the other generals of Vespasian were of opinion that they should remain in Pannonia, and await the arrival of Mucianus, who was marching from the East at the head of a powerful body of Vespasian's troops, Antonius on the contrary urged an immediate invasion of Italy. His energy overruled all opposition. Without waiting till the army was ready, Antonius, with a small body of picked troops, and accompanied by Arrius Varus, who had gained great renown under Corbulo in the Armenian war, crossed the Alps and pushed forwards into Italy. In rapid pursuit of his great success, he obtained possession of several towns in Transpadane Gaul, and at Patavium was joined by two legions which had followed him from the north. At Patavium he allowed his troops a short time to repose, and then marched upon Verona, which also fell into his power. Meantime Alienus Caecina, who had been sent by Vitellius at the head of a large army to oppose Antonius, adopted no active measures against him, though with his superior forces he might easily have driven him out of Italy. Shortly afterwards three more legions crossed the Alps and joined Antonius, who was now at the head of five legions. His authority however was shared by two generals of consular rank, T. Ampius Flavinus, the governor of Pannonia, and Aponius Saturninus, the governor of Moesia; but an insurrection of the soldiery delivered him from these rivals, and obliged them to flee from the camp. Antonius affected great indignation at these proceedings, but it was believed by many that the mutiny had been instigated by himself that he might obtain the sole command. The army of Caecina meanwhile had been thrown into great confusion by the treason of their general Caecina, who had endeavoured to persuade his troops to desert Vitellius and espouse the cause of Vespasian; but not succeeding in his attempt, he had been thrown into chains, and new generals elected by the soldiers in his stead. Antonius resolved to avail himself of these favourable circumstances for making an immediate attack upon the army of Vitellius. He accordingly broke up from his quarters at Verona, and advanced as far as Bedriacum, a small town at not great distance from Cremona. At Bedriacum the enemy was so strongly posted as to make the approach of Arrius Varus, who had charged the enemy too soon and was driven back with loss, throw the army of Antonius into confusion, and nearly caused the loss of the battle. Antonius only arrested the flight by killing one of his own standard-bearers who was in the act of flying, and by leading the men against the enemy with the standard in his hand. Victory at length declared for Antonius, and the enemy fled in confusion to Cremona, from which town they had marched to Bedriacum. In the night Antonius was attacked by another army of Vitellius, consisting of six legions, which had been stationed at Hostilia, thirty miles distant, and which had immediately set out against Antonius upon hearing of the defeat of their comrades. The skill and valour of Antonius again secured the victory for his troops after another hard-fought battle. In the morning he marched against Cremona, which was at length obliged to submit to him after a vigorous defence. The unhappy city was given up to plunder and flames; and at the end of four days of incessant pillage, during which the most horrible atrocities were perpetrated, the entire city was levelled to the ground.

Hitherto Antonius had acted with moderation and caution; but, as frequently happens, success revealed his cruel character, and brought forth to public view the avarice, pride, and other vices which were inherent in his nature. Henceforth he treated Italy like a conquered country; and in order to maintain his popularity with the soldiers, allowed them every kind of licence. Mucianus, who was jealous of his success, and who wished to reserve to himself the glory of putting an end to the war, wrote to Antonius, recommending caution and delay, though he worded his letters in such a manner that the responsibility of all movements was thrown upon Antonius. But to the officers of Antonius he expressed himself with more openness, and thus endeavoured to keep Antonius in the north of Italy. Antonius, however, was not of a temper to brook such interference, and he therefore wrote to Vespasian, extolling his own exploits, and covertly attacking Mucianus. Without troubling himself about the wishes of the latter, he crossed the Apennines in the middle of winter, and marched straight upon Rome. Upon reaching Orcirium, however, he halted for some days. His soldiers, whose appetites had been whetted by the plunder of Cremona, and who were impatient to glut themselves with the spoils of Rome, were indignant at this delay, and accused their general of treachery. It is probable that Antonius, who saw that it would be difficult to restrain his soldiers, feared the general odium, as well as the displeasure of Vespasian, if his troops were to sack the imperial city. But whatever were his motives or intentions, circumstances occurred which put an end to his inactivity. News arrived that Flavius Sabinius had taken refuge in the Capitol, and that he was there besieged by the Vitellian troops. Thereupon Antonius immediately marched upon Rome, but before he could reach the city the Capitol was burnt, and Sabinius killed. Upon arriving at the suburbs, he endeavoured to prevent his troops from entering the city till the following day; but the soldiers, who saw the prey before their eyes, demanded to be led forthwith to the attack. Antonius was obliged to yield; he divided his army into three bodies, and gave orders for the assault. The troops of Vitellius fought with the courage of despair; driven out of the suburbs, they continued the combat in the streets of the city, and the struggle continued for many days. At length the work of butchery came to an end; the soldiers of Vitellius were every where destroyed, and the emperor himself put to death. Thereupon Domitian, who was in Rome, received the name of Caesar; Arrius Varus was entrusted with the command of the Praetorian troops; but the government and all real power was in the hands of Antonius. His rapacity knew no bounds, and he kept plundering the emperor's palace, as if he had been at the sack of Cremona. The subservient senate voted him the consulary ornaments; but his rule lasted only for a short time. Mucianus reached Rome soon after the death of Vitellius, and was immediately received by the senate and the whole city, as their master. But though Antonius was thus reduced to a subordinate position in the state, Mucianus was still jealous of him. He, therefore, would not allow him to accompany Domitian in his expedition into Germany; at which Antonius was so indignant that he repaired to Vespasian, who was at Alexandria. He was not received by Vespasian in the distinguished manner which he had expected, and to which he thought that he was entitled; for though the emperor treated him with kindness and consideration on account of the great services he had rendered him, he secretly regarded him with dislike and suspicion, in consequence of the accusations of Mucianus, and the haughty conduct of Antonius himself. (Tac. Hist. ii. 86, libb. iii.-iv.; Dion Cass. lxxv. 28; Joseph, B. J. iv. 11.) This is the last time that Antonius is mentioned by Tacitus; but we learn from Martial, who was a friend of Antonius, that he was alive at the accession of Trajan. In an epigram of the tenth book, which was probably published in A.D. 100, the second year of Trajan's reign [see Vol. II. p. 965, b.], Antonius is said to be in his sixtieth year. (Mart. x. 23, comp. x. 32, ix. 100.)

PRISCIA, MUTIVLIA, a friend of Livia, the mother of the emperor Tiberius, and the mistress of Julius Postumus. (Tac. Ann. iv. 12.)

PRISCA, PUBLIA, the wife of C. Geminus Rufus, who was put to death in A.D. 51, in the reign of Tiberius. Prisca was also accused and summoned before the senate, but stabbed herself in the senate-house. (Dion Cass. livii. 4.)

PRISCIANAUS, one of the most celebrated grammarians of the later period of Roman literature. From the surname Caesariensis which is given to him, we gather that he was either born at Caesarea, or at least was educated there. The time at which he lived cannot be fixed with any great precision. He is spoken of as a contemporary of Cassiodorus, who lived from A.D. 468 to at least A.D. 562. (Paulus Diaconus, de Gest. Longob. i. 25.) According to a statement of Aldhelm (ap. Mni, Acta. Class. vol. v. p. 501, &c.), the emperor Theodosius the younger, who died in A.D. 450, copied out Priscian's grammatical work with his own hand. Some authorities, therefore, place him in the first half of the fifth century, others a little later in the same century, others in the beginning of the sixth century. The second is the only view at all consonant with both the above statements. Priscian was a pupil of Theotistus. (Prisc. xvii. 1.) He himself taught grammar at Constantinople, and was in the receipt of a salary from the government, from which (as well as from parts of his writings, especially his translation of the Periegesis of Dionysius) it appears probable that he was a Christian. Of other particulars of his life we are ignorant. He was celebrated for the extent and depth of his grammatical knowledge, of which he has left the evidence in his work on the subject, entitled Commentariae grammaticorum Libri XVIII., addressed to his friend and patron, the consul Julianus. Other titles are, however, frequently given to it. The first sixteen books treat upon the eight parts of speech recognised by the ancient grammarians, letters, syllables, &c. The last two books are on syntax, and in one MS.
PRISCIANUS.

are placed as a distinct work, under the title De Constructione. Priscianus made good use of the works of preceding grammarians, but the writers whom he mainly followed were Apollonius Dyscolus (Apollonia, cius auctoritatem in omnias sequendam partem, xiv. 1, vol. i. p. 501, ed. Kreil) and Herodianus (ii. 6, vol. i. p. 74, ed. Kreil). The treatise of Priscianus soon became the standard work on Latin grammar, and in the epitome of Rabanus Maurus obtained an extensive circulation. One feature of value about it is the large number of quotations which it contains both from Latin and Greek writers, of whom nothing would otherwise have remained. His acquaintance with Greek as well as Latin enabled him to carry on a parallel between the two languages.

Besides the systematic grammatical work of Pris-cianus there are still extant the following writings:
—1. A grammatical catechism on twelve lines of the Aeneid, manifestly intended as a school book.
2. A treatise on accents. 3. A treatise on the symbols used to denote numbers and weights, and on coins and numbers. 4. On the metres of Terence. 5. A translation of the Προγιγουσαμα (Præcoerentiam) of Hermogenes. The transliteration of the Greek work was discovered and published by Heer in 1791. This and the two preceding pieces are addressed to Symmachus. 6. On the decensions of nouns. 7. A poem on the emperor Anastasius in 312 hexameters, with a preface in 22 iambic lines. 8. A piece De Ponderibus et Meusuris, in verse. (Wernsdorf, Poet. Lat. Min.
vol. v. p. 212, &c. 235, &c. 494, &c.) This piece has been attributed by some to the grammarian Rhemnius Fannius Palaimon, by others to one Remus Favinus, but the authorship of Priscianus seems well established. 9. An Epitome phe eomenon, or De Sideribus, in verse. (Wernsdorf l. c.
vol. i. p. 239.) This and the two preceding pieces have been edited separately by Endlicher (Vienn. 1838), with a preliminary dissertation.
10. A free translation of the Periegesis of Dionysius in 1427 lines, manifestly made for the instruction of youth. It follows the order of the Greek on the whole, but contains many variations from the original. In particular Priscianus has taken pains to substitute for the heathen allusions
a phraseology better adapted for Christian times.
11. A couple of epigrams. (Antid. Lat. v. 47, 139.)
To Priscianus also are usually attributed the acrostichs prefixed to the plays of Plautus, and describing the plot.

The best edition of Priscianus is that by Kreil, which contains all but a few of the shorter poems (above, Nos. 7, 8, 9, 11). [C. P. M.]

PRISCIANUS, THEODORUS, a physician, who was a pupil of Vinicius (Rer. Med. iv. praef. p. 81, ed. Argent.), and who therefore lived in the fourth century after Christ. He is supposed to have lived at the court of Constantinople, and to have attained the dignity of Archbiater. He belonged to the medical sect of the Empirici, but not without a certain mixture of the doctrines of the Methodici, and even of the Dogmatici. He is the author of a Latin work, entitled,
"Rerum Medicorum Libri Quattuor," which is time attributed to a person named Octavia Horatiana. The first book treats of external disese, the second of internal, the third of female diseases, and the fourth of physiology, &c. The author, in his preface, speaks against the learned and wordy disputes held by physicians at the bedside of the patient, and also their putting their whole reliance upon foreign remedies in preference to those which were indigenous. Several of the medicines which he mentions himself are absurd and superstitious; the style and language of the work are bad; and altogether it is of little interest and value. It was first published in 1532, in which year two editions appeared, one at Strasburg, fol., and the other at Basel, 4to. Of these the latter is more correct than the other, but not so complete, as the whole of the fourth book is wanting, and also several chapters of the first and second books. It is also to be found in Kraut's Experimentsurii Medicinae, Argent., fol., 1544, and in the Aldine Collection of Medicini Antiqui Latino., 1547, fol., Venet. A new edition was commenced by J. M. Bernhold, of which only the first volume was ever published (1791, 8vo. Ansbach), containing the first book and part of the second. A work "on Diet," which is sometimes attributed to Theodorus Priscianus, is noticed under Theodorus. (See Sprengel, Hist. de la Méd.; Chou-lant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Mederschen.) [W. A. G.]

PRISCILLA, CASSIA, a Roman female artist, whose name appears, with the addition of a post,
base-relief, in the Borgia collection, at Velletri, representing Hercules and Omphale. (Müllin, Galler.
Myth. pl. cxxvi. n. 453; Muratori, Thes. vol. i.
p. xxv. 1; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p.
33.) [P. S.]

L. PRISCILLIATA/ANUS, acquired enviable celebrity as an informer, under Caracalla, by whom he was made praefect of Achaia. He was celebrated also for his gladiatorial skill in wild beast fights, and eventually was banished to an island, during the reign of Macrinus, in the instance of the senate, whose hatred he had incurred by procuring the destruction of several members of their body. (Dion Cass. lxxxvii. 21.) [W. R.]

PRISCI'NUS, PEDUCAEUS. [Pedaecaeus,
Nos. 7 and 8.]

PRISCUS, artists. 1. ATTUAS, a Roman painter, who lived under the Flavian emperors (about A. D. 70), and who continued the art to the Theodosius.
In conjunction with Cornelius Pinias, he adorned with paintings the temple of Honos et Virtus, when it was restored by Vespasian. Of these two artists Priscus approached nearest to the ancients. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 37.)

2. Of Nicomedea, an architect and military engineer, who lived under Septimius Severus. (Dion Cass. lxxxix. 11, lxxxv. 11.) [P. S.]

PRISCUS (Pieitio), one of the earliest and most important Byzantine historians, was surnamed PANTII, because he was a native of Pa-nium in Thrace. We know little of his life in general, but much of a short, though highly interesting and important period of it, viz. from A. D.
445—447, when he was ambassador of Theodosius
the Younger at the court of Attila. The embassy consisted of several persons. In later years he and one Maximinus transacted diplomatic business for the emperor Marcian, in Egypt and Arabia.
He died in or about A. D. 471. Niebuhr thinks he was a heathen. Priscus wrote an account of his embassy to Attila, enriched by digressions on the life and reign of that king, the Greek title of which is Ιστορια Β. Χαριτι ιν και κατα Αττιας, which was originally divided into eight books, according to Suidas. This is the most valuable account we have on Attila, and it is deeply to be regretted that only fragments of it have come down to posterity: it was written after the death of Theodosius, which took place in A.D. 450. Priscus is an excellent and trustworthy historian, and his style is remarkably elegant and pure. Suidas says that he also wrote Μεταληθηριωτικά, Declamationes Rhetoricas and Epistolae, which are lost. Jornandes and Juvenecus, the author of the Life of Attila, borrowed largely from the History of Priscus, whose name is often mentioned by them, as well as by other Byzantine writers, as, for instance, by Ammianus, who calls him Πρίσκιος, and by Theophanes, who calls him Πρύσκιως, both apparently mistakes or corruptions of the text. The fragments of the History were first edited in Greek by David Hoeschel, Augsburg, 1603, 4to; a Latin translation with notes, by Cantecleers or Chantecler, Paris, 1609, 8vo; the same reprinted together with the text, and revised by Fabrot in the Paris edition of Excerpta de Legationibus, together with Dexippus, Menander, and others; the same also in Labbe's Protrepticum, Paris, 1648, fol. The latest and best edition, together with the other writers who have furnished the materials for the Excerpta de Legationibus, is, by Niebuhr, in the Bonn Collection of the Byzantines, 1829, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vii. p. 539, 540; Hanckinis, de Script. Byzant.; Niebuhr's Notes on Priscus, in his edition mentioned above; Suidas, s. v. Πρίσκος Ηναινώς.) [W. P.]

PRISCUS, a brother of the emperor Philipus I. Having received the command of the Syrian armies, by his intolerable oppression he gave rise to the rebellion of Iotapianus. [IOTAPIANES.] (Zosim. i. 18, 21.) [W. R.]

PRISCUS, a friend of the younger Pliny, who has addressed several of his letters to him; one on the death of Martial, another respecting the health of Fannia, &c. (Ep. ii. 13, iii. 21, vi. 8, vii. 8, 19). Pliny himself nowhere in the letters mentions his gentile name, but we find him called in the superscription of one of the letters, Cornelius Priscus: if this superscription is correct, he is probably the same as the Cornelius Priscus, who was consul in A.D. 93 [see below]. Some modern writers, among whom is Heineccius, thinks that the Priscus to whom Pliny wrote is the same as the jurist Nepotius Priscus, who lived under Trajan and Hadrian, and who was therefore, a contemporary of Pliny. [NERATIUS.]

PRISCUS, ANCHA/RIUUS, accused Caesius Cordus prosconcius of Crete, of the crimes of repente and majestas, in the reign of Tiberius, A.D. 21. (Tac. Ann. iii. 38, 70.)

PRISCUS, L. ATI/LIUS, consular tribune b.c. 399 and 396, is spoken of under Attilius, No. 1. The surname of Priscus is only given to him in the Capitoline Fasti.

PRISCUS ATTALUS. [ATTALUS, p. 411.]

PRISCUS, T. CAES/O/NIUS, a Roman eques, was appointed by Tiberius the minister of a new office which he instituted, and which was styled a Colophonian. (Suet. Tib. 42.)

PRISCUS, CORNE/LLIUS, consul, with Pompeius Collena, in A.D. 93, the year in which Agricola died. (Tac. Agr. 44.) See above Priscus, the friend of Pliny.

PRISCUS, FULCI/NIUS. [FULCNIUS.]

PRISCUS, HELVI/DIUS. 1. A legate of a legion under T. Ummidius Quadratus, governor of Syria, was sent by the latter across the Taurus, in A.D. 52, in consequence of the disorders that had arisen through the conduct of Julius Pelignus, the governor of Cappadocia (Tac. Ann. xii. 49). This Priscus must have been a different person from the celebrated Helvidius Priscus mentioned below, since the latter did not obtain the quaestorship till the reign of Nero, and the legates of the legions were usually chosen at that time from persons of higher rank.

2. The son-in-law of Thrasea Paetus, and, like him, distinguished by his love of liberty, which he at length sealed with his blood. He was born at Tarraceia*, and was the son of a certain Cluvius, who had filled the post of chief centurion (primipilus). His name shows that he was adopted by an Helvidius Priscus, perhaps by the Helvidii who is mentioned above. In his youth he devoted himself with energy to the higher branches of study, not, says Tacitus, to disguise an idle leisure under a pompous name, but in order to enter upon public duties with a mind fortified against misfortune. He chose as his teachers of philosophy those who taught that nothing is good but what is honourable, nothing bad but what is disgraceful, and who did not reckon power, nobility, or any external things, either among blessings or evils. In other words he embraced with ardour the Stoic philosophy. So distinguished did he become for his virtue and nobleness of soul, that when quaestor he was chosen by Thrasea Paetus as his son-in-law; and by this connection he was still further strengthened in his love of liberty. He was quaestor at Achaia during the reign of Nero, and by the way in which he discharged the duties of his office, gained the love of the provincials. (Comp. Schol. ad Juv. v. 36.) Having obtained the tribunship of the plebs in A.D. 56, he exerted his influence to protect the poor against the severe proceedings of Obultronius Sabinius, the quaestor of the treasury. The name of Priscus is not mentioned again for a few years. His freedom of speech and love of independence could not prove pleasing to the court, and he, therefore, was not advanced to any of the higher offices of the state. It appears that he and his father-in-law were even unprompted enough to celebrate in their houses republican festivals, and to commemorate the birth-days of Brutus and Cassius.

These proceedings reached the ears of the emperor; Thrasea was put to death [THRASEA], and Priscus banished from Italy (A.D. 66). He retired with his wife, Fannia, to Apollonia in Macedonia, where he remained till the death of Nero. He was recalled to Rome by Galba (A.D. 68), and one of his first acts was to bring to trial Eprius Marcellus, the accuser of his father-in-law; but as the sentiment

* This statement depends only upon a correction of the text of Tacitus (Hist. iv. 5). Some manuscripts have Tarentium or Tarentinae municipio; but we find in the Florentine manuscript, Carecinas municipio, which has been altered, with much probability, into Tarreccinum municipio.
mants of Galba were doubtful, he dropped the accusation. On the murder of Galba at the beginning of the following year (a. d. 69), he obtained from Otho the corpse of the emperor, and took care that it was buried (Plut. Galb. 28). In the course of the same year he was nominated praetor for the next year, and as praetor elect ventured to oppose Vitellius in the senate. After the death of Vitellius in December, a. d. 69, Priscus again attacked his old enemy Eprius Marcellus. The contest between them arose respecting the manner in which the ambassadors were to be chosen who were to be sent to Vespasian; Priscus maintaining that they should be appointed by the magistrates, Marcellus that they should be chosen by lot, fearing that if the former method were adopted he might not be appointed, and might thus appear to have received some disgrace. Marcellus carried his point on this occasion. Priscus accused him, shortly afterwards, of having been one of the informers under Nero, but he was acquitted, in consequence of the support which he received from Mucianus and Domitian.

Although Vespasian was now emperor, and no one was left to dispute the throne with him, Priscus did not worship the rising sun. During Vespasian's continued absence in the East, Priscus, who was now praetor (a. d. 70), opposed various measures which had been brought forward by others with a view of pleasing the emperor. Thus he maintained that the retrenchments in the public expenses, which were rendered necessary by the exhausted state of the treasury, ought to be made by the senate, and not left to the emperor, as the consul elect had proposed; and he also brought forward a motion in the senate that the Capitol should be rebuilt at the public cost, and only with assistance from Vespasian. It may be mentioned, in passing, that in the year Priscus, as praetor, dedicated the spot on which the Capitol was to be built. (Tac. Hist. iv. 53.) On the arrival of the emperor at Rome, Priscus was the only person who saluted him by his private name of Vespasian; and, not content with omitting his name in all the edicts which he published as praetor, he attacked both the person and the office of the emperor. Such conduct was downright folly; he could not by short speeches and insulting acts restore the republic; and if his sayings and doings have been rightly reported, he had only himself to thank for his fate. Thus we are told by one of his admirers that Vespasian having forbidden him on one occasion from appearing in the senate, he replied, "You can expel me from the senate, but, as long as I am a member of it, I must go into the house." — "Well, then, go in, but be silent." — "Don't ask me for what reason; I will not explain it. — "But I must ask you." — "Then I must say what seems to me just." — "But if you do I will put you to death." — "Did I ever say to you that I was immortal? You do your part, and I will do mine. Yours is, to kill; mine, to die without fear; yours is, to banish; mine, to go into exile without sorrow." (Epictet. Dissert. i. 2.) After such a specimen of the way in which he bearded the emperor, we cannot be surprised at his banishment. His wife Fannia followed him a second time into exile. It appears that his place of banishment was at no great distance from the capital; and he had not been long in exile before he was executed by order of Vespasian. It would seem that the emperor was persuaded by some of the enemies of Priscus to issue the fatal mandate; for shortly afterwards he sent messengers to recall the executioners; and his life would have been saved, had it not been for the false report that he had already perished. The life of Priscus was written by Herennius Senecio at the request of his widow Fannia; and the tyrant Domitian, in consequence of this work, subsequently put Senecio to death, and sent Fannia into exile for the third time. Priscus left a son, who is called simply Helvidius, without any surname, and is therefore spoken of under Helvidius. (Tac. Ann. xii. 28, xvi. 28, 33, 53, Hist. ii. 91, iv. 5—9, 43, 44, Agric. 2, Dial. de Orat. 5; Dion Cass. lxxv. 7, lxvi. 12, lxvii. 13; Suet. Vesp. 15; Plin. Ep. vii. 18.)

PRISCUS, JAVOLENUS. [JAVOLENUS.]

PRISCUS, JU'LIUS, a centurion, was appointed by Vitellius (a. d. 69) prefect of the praetorian guards on the recommendation of Fabius Valens. When news arrived that the army, which had espoused the side of Vespasian, was marching upon Rome, Julius Priscus was sent with Alfenus Varus at the head of fourteen praetorian cohorts and all the squadrons of cavalry to take possession of the passes of the Apennines, but he and Varus disgracefully deserted their post and returned to Rome. After the death of Vitellius, Priscus put an end to his life, more, says Tacitus, through shame than necessity. (Tac. Hist. ii. 92, iii. 55, 61, iv. 11.)

PRISCUS, JU'NIUS, praetor in the reign of Caligula, was put to death by this emperor on account of his wealth, though accused as a pretext of other crimes. (Dion Cass. lix. 18.)

PRISCUS, C. LUTO-RIUS, a Roman eques, composed a poem on the death of Germanicus, which obtained great celebrity, and for which he was liberally paid by Tiberius. When Drusus fell ill, in a. d. 21, Priscus composed another poem on his death, anticipating, if he died, a still more handsome present from the emperor, as Drusus was his own son, while Germanicus had been only his son by adoption. Priscus was led by his vanity to recite this poem in a private house in presence of a distinguished company of women of rank. He was denounced in consequence to the senate; and this body, anxious to punish the insult to the imperial family, condemned Priscus to death, without consulting Tiberius, and had him executed forthwith. The proceeding, however, displeased Tiberius, not through any wish to save the life of Priscus, but because the senate had presumed to put a person to death without asking his opinion. He therefore caused a decree of the senate to be passed, that no decree of the body should be given in the aenarium till ten days had elapsed; and as they could not be carried into execution till this was done, no one could in future be executed till ten days after his condemnation. (Tac. Ann. iii. 49—51; Dion Cass. lvi. 20.) It is recorded of this Lutorius Priscus that he paid Sejanna the enormous sum of 50,000,000 sesterces (quinquiescentes sextertium) for an eunuch of the name of Paezon. (Plin. H. N. vii. 39, s. 40.)

PRISCUS, Q. MU'STIUS, consul sufectus, a. d. 163 (Fasti).

PRISCUS, NERATIUS. [NERATIUS.]

PRISCUS, Q. NO'NIUS, consul a. d. 149 with Ser. Scipio Ortius (Fasti).

PRISCUS, NOVIUS, was banished by Nero, in a. d. 66, in consequence of his being a friend of Seneca. He was accompanied in his exile by his wife Aristoria Flacilla. (Tac. Ann. xv. 71.) We learn from the Fasti that D. Novius Priscus was consul a. d. 78, in the reign of Vespasian. He was probably the same person as the one banished by Nero.

PRISCUS, T. NUMICUS, consul b. c. 469 with A. Virginuis Tricostus Caesomontanus, fought against the Volscians with success, and took Ceno, one of their towns. (Liv. ii. 63; Dionys. ix. 56.)

PRISCUS PANITES. [See above, Priscus, the Byzantine writer.]

PRISCUS, PETRO'NIUS, banished by Nero, a. d. 66. (Tac. Ann. xv. 71.)

PRISCUS, SERVLIUS. The Prisci were an ancient family of the Servilia gens, and filled the highest offices of the state during the early years of the republic. They also bore the agnomen of Structus, which is always appended to their name in the Fasti, till it was supplanted by that of Fidenas, which was first obtained by Q. Servilius Priscus Structus, who took Fidenae in his dictatorship, b. c. 435 [see below, No. 6], and which was also borne by his descendants [Nos. 7 and 8].

1. P. SERVILIUS PRISCUS STRU'CTUS, consul b. c. 495 with Ap. Claudius Sabinus Regillensis. This year was memorable in the annals by the death of king Tarquin. The temple of Mercury was also dedicated in this year, and additional colonists were led to the colony of Sigma, which had been founded by Tarquin. The consuls carried on war against the Volscians with success, and took the town of Suessa Pometia; and Priscus subsequently defeated both the Sabines and Aurunci. In the struggles between the patricians and plebeians respecting the law of debt, Priscus was inclined to espouse the side of the latter, and published a proclamation favourable to the plebeians; but as he was unable to assist them in opposition to his colleague and the whole body of the patricians, he incurred the enmity of both parties. (Liv. ii. 21—27; Dionys. vi. 23—32; Val. Max. ix. 3; 6; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 3.)

2. Q. SERVILIUS PRISCUS STRU'CTUS, a brother of No. 1, was magister equitum, in b. c. 494, to the dictator, M. Valerius Maximus. (Dionys. vi. 40.)

3. SP. SERVILIUS PRISCUS STRU'CTUS, consul b. c. 476, with A. Virginuis Rutinius. In consequence of the destruction of the Fabii at the Crimson in the preceding year, the Etruscans had advanced up to the very walls of Rome, and taken possession of the hill Janiculum. In an attempt which Priscus made to take this hill by assault, he was repulsed with great loss, and would have sustained a total defeat, had not his colleague Virginius come to his assistance. In consequence of his rashness on this occasion, he was brought to trial by the tribunes, as soon as his year of office had expired, but was acquitted. (Liv. ii. 51, 52; Dionys. ix. 25, &c.)

4. Q. SERVILIUS PRISCUS STRU'CTUS, probably son of No. 2, was consul b. c. 468, with T. Quintius Capitolinus Barbatus, and again b. c. 466, with Sp. Postumius Albus Regillensis. In each year Priscus commanded the Roman armies in the wars with the neighbouring nations, but did not perform anything worth recording. (Liv. ii. 64, lit. 2; Dionys. ix. 57, 60.)

5. P. SERVILIUS SP. F. P. N. PRISCUS STRU'CTUS, son of No. 3, was consul b. c. 463, with I. Aebutius Elua, and was carried off in his consulate by the great plague which raged at Rome in this year. (Liv. iii. 6, 7; Dionys. ix. 67, 68; Oros. ii. 12.)

6. Q.* SERVILIUS P. F. SP. N. PRISCUS STRU'CTUS FIDENAS, son of No. 5, was appointed dictator b. c. 435, in consequence of the alarm excited by the invasion of the Veientes and Fidenates, who had taken advantage of the plague, which was then raging in Rome, to ravage the Roman territory, and had advanced almost up to the Colline Gate. Servilius defeated the enemy without difficulty, and pursued the Fidenates to their town, to which he proceeded to lay siege, and which he took by means of a mine. From the conquest of this town he received the surname of Fidenas, which was afterwards adopted by his children in the place of Structus. Servilius is mentioned again in b. c. 431, when he called upon the tribunes of the plebs to compel the consuls to elect a dictator, in order to carry on the war against the Volsci and Aequi. In b. c. 418 the Roman army was defeated by the Aequi and the Lavicani, in consequence of the dissensions and incompetency of the consular tribunes of that year. Servilius was therefore appointed dictator a second time; he carried on the war with success, defeated the Aequi, and took the point of Laviki, where the senate forthwith established a Roman colony. (Liv. iv. 21, 22, 26 45—47.)

7. Q. SERVILIUS Q. F. P. N. (PRISCUS) FIDENAS, the son of No. 6, was consular tribune six times, namely, in b. c. 402, 398, 395, 390, 383, 386. (Liv. v. 8, 14, 24, 36, vi. 4. 6.) He was also interrex in b. c. 397. (Liv. v. 17.) There can be no doubt that this Servilius was the son of No. 6, both from his praenomen Quintus, and his surname Fidenas, as well as from the circumstances that he is designated in the Capitoline Fasti, Q. F. P. N. A difficulty, however, arises from the statement of Livy, that the C. Servilius, who was consular tribune in b. c. 418, was the son of the conqueror of Fidenae (Livy iv. 45, 46); but this is probably a mistake, since the consular tribune of b. c. 418 is called, in the Capitoline Fasti, C. SERVILIUS Q. F. C. N. AXXILA. Besides which, if he were the son of the conqueror of Fidenae, he must have been a younger son, as his praenomen shows; and in that case the younger son would have obtained one of the highest dignities in the state sixteen years before his elder brother.

8. Q. SERVILIUS Q. F. Q. N. (PRISCUS) FIDENAS, the son of No. 7, was consular tribune three times, namely, in b. c. 332, 378, 369. (Liv. vi. 22, 31, 36.)

9. SP. SERVILIUS PRISCUS, censor b. c. 378, with Q. Cloelius Siculus (Livy vi. 31). As this Servilius does not bear the surname of Fidenas, he probably was not a descendant of the conqueror of Fidenae.

* Livy (iv. 21) calls him A. Servilius, in speaking of his dictatorship of b. c. 433, but Q. Servilius when he mentions his dictatorship of b. c. 418 (iv. 40), as well as when he speaks of him elsewhere (e.g. iv. 26). There can, therefore, be no doubt that the name of Quintus is to be preferred, which we find also in the Capitoline Fasti.
PROAESRIUS.

PRISCUS SENE'CIO, Q. SO'SIUS, consul A. d. 169, with P. Coelius Apollinaris (Fasti).

PRISCUS, STAT'TIUS, consul A. d. 158, with Plautius Quintus, two years before the death of the emperor Antoninus (Fasti). He was one of the generals sent by his successor, M. Aurelius, to conduct the war against the Parthians, A. d. 162—165. He took Artaxata, the capital of Armenia, and rescued the whole of that country from the Parthian power. (Capitolin. Ant. Phil. 9, Verus 7; Dion Cass. lxxi. Fragm. p. 1201, ed. Reimarus.)

PRISCUS, TARQU'NIUS. [TARQUINIIUS.]

PRISCUS, TARQUITIIUS, had been a legate of Statilius Taurus, in Africa, whom he accused, in order to gratify Agrippina, the wife of the emperor Claudius, who was anxious to obtain possession of his pleasure grounds. Taurus put an end to his life before sentence was pronounced; and the senate expelled Friscus from its body as an informer. He was restored, however, to his former rank by Nero, and appointed governor of Bithynia; but was condemned in A. d. 61, on account of extortion in his province, to the greatest delight of the senate. (Tac. Ann. xii. 59, xiv. 46.)

PRISCUS, M. TREBATIUS, consul suffectus in A. d. 109. (Fasti.)

PRISCUS, L. VALER'RIUS MESSA'LA TITRA'SEA, was distinguished alike by his birth and wisdom during the reign of Septimius Severus. He was consul in A. d. 196, and about seventeen years afterwards fell a victim to the cruelty of Caracalla. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 5.)

PRISCUS, VE'CTIUS, a person mentioned by the younger Pliny. (Plin. Ep. vi. 12.)

PAVER'NAS, an agnomine given to L. Acemi-lus Mamercinus, from his taking Privernum in B. c. 329. [MAMERCINUS, No. 9.]

PROAESRIUS (Proaeresiav), a distinguished teacher of rhetoric, was a native of Armenia, born about A. d. 276, of good connections, though poor. He came to Antioch to study under the rhetorician Ulpius. Having soon risen to high distinction in his school, he removed to Athens, where he placed himself under Julian, then seated in the chair of rhetoric. There came along with him from Antioch his friend Hephaestion. A fact told by Eunapius in his life of Proaesrius (Vit. Soph. vol. i. p. 73, ed. Boissoneade), illustrates both the poverty and the zeal of these youths. They had between them but one change of raiment (ιμάτων καλτρεχοντων), and three thin, faded blankets (στραμάτα). When Proaesrius went forth to the public schools, his friend lay in bed working his exercises, and this they did alternately. Proaesrius soon acquired a high place in his master’s esteem, of which, as well as his own merit, a singular proof is given by Julian (ibid. p. 71, &c.). On the death of Julian (according to Clinton, Fast. Rom. p. 401, in A. d. 340), who left Proaesrius his house (Eunap. ibid. p. 69), it was determined no longer to confine the chair of rhetoric to one, but to extend this honour to many. (Eunap. ibid. p. 79.)

Epiphanius, Diophantus, Sophas, Paranas, and Hephaestion were chosen from among a crowd of competitors; but Hephaestion left Athens, dreading competition with Proaesrius. The students, generally, betook themselves to their professors, according to their nations; and there attached themselves to Proaesrius the students coming from the district south from Pontus inclusive, as far as Egypt and Lybia. His great success excited the jealousy of the others, who combined against him. Through the intervention of a corrupt consul, he was driven from Athens. A new pro-consul not only restored him, but, after a public trial, bestowed on him public marks of approbation, and placed him at once at the head of all the teachers of rhetoric in Athens. The fresh attempts of his enemies to supplant him by splendid entertainments, at which they endeavoured to win over men of power, were rendered nugatory by the arrival in Athens of Anatolius, the paeon of Ilyrium. It is probable that the favour with which that accomplished man regarded Proaesrius, attracted to the latter the attention of the emperor Constans, who sent for him to Gaul, about A. d. 342. Constans detained him for more than one year (if we may found upon the expression χευμά-ριον, Eunap. ibid. p. 69), and then sent him to Rome. Here he was highly esteemed, and having written or delivered a eulogy on the city, was honoured in return with a life-size statue of bronze, bearing the inscription, "Prince of Eloquence." On his departure from Rome, he obtained for Athens a tributary supply of provisions from several islands—a grant which was confirmed by the eparch of Athens at the solicitation of Anatolius—and he himself was honoured with the title of στρατοσθάργης. When the emperor Julian (A. d. 362) had promulgated the decree, for which he is so strongly censured, even by his eulogist Ammianus Marcellinus (xx. 10, xxv. 4), forbidding teachers belonging to the Christian religion to practise their art, we are told (Hieron. in Chronic. An. 2370), that Proaesrius was expressly exempted from its operation, but that he refused any immunity not enjoyed by his brethren. To this partial suspension of his rhetorical functions, Eunapius also alludes, but, distrusted by his love of the man, and his hatred of his religion, says doubtingly, "he seemed to be a Christian" (ibid. p. 92). Eunapius says that it was about this very time he himself arrived at Athens, and found in Proaesrius all the kindness of a father. It is probable, then, that this was in the year 363, when Julian was in the East, and we may suppose the edict less rigidly enforced. Proaesrius was then in his 87th year. Eunapius remained at Athens for five years, and states that his friend and teacher died not many days after his departure. Proaesrius had married Amphidia of Tralles, and by her he had several daughters, all of whom died in the bloom of youth, and on whom Milesius wrote him consolatory verses. His rival Diophantus pronounced his funeral oration (Eunap. ibid. p. 94), and his epitaph, written by his pupil Gregory Nazianzen, is given by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 137). From the account given of him by Eunapius, who had the best means of information, we learn that he was of gigantic stature (Casaubon and Wytenbach, ed Eunap. vol. ii. p. 285, conjecture that he was nine feet high!), and of stately bearing, so vigorous in his old age, that it was impossible to suppose him other than in the prime of life. His constitution was of iron strength (αιθρήσκον), braving the winter colds of Gaul without shoes, and in light clothing, and drinking unwarmed the water of the Rhine when almost frozen. His style of eloquence seems to have been flowing, and graced with allusions to classic times. He had great powers of extemporary speaking, and a COIN OF PROBUS.

PROBUS, a name borne by several celebrated Roman grammarians, whom it is difficult to distinguish from each other.

1. M. VALERIUS PROBUS, of Berytus, who having served in the army, and having long applied without success for promotion, at length took himself, in disgust, to literary pursuits. He belongs to the age of Nero, since he stands last in order in the catalogue of Suetonius, immediately after Q. Remmius Palamen. He flourished in the reigns of Tiberius, Caius, and Claudius; this is fully confirmed by the notice of Jerome in the Eusebian chronicle under Olympiad cclxix. (A.D. 56—7): "Probus Berytus eruditissimus grammaticorum Romae agnoscitur." Chance led him to study the more ancient writers, and he occupied himself in illustrating (enmendare ut distinguere et adnotare curvit) their works. He published a few trifling remarks on some matters of minute controversy (nimis poseva et exiguus de quibusdam minutis questionibus edidit), and left behind him a considerable body of observations (silvam) on the earlier forms of the language. Although not in the habit of giving regular instructions to pupils, he had some admirers (sectatores), of whom he would occasionally admit three or four to benefit by his lore. To this Probus we may, with considerable probability, assign those annotations on Terence, from which fragments are quoted in the Scholia on the dramatist. (Sueton. de illus. Gramm. 24; Schopfen, de Terentio et Donato eius interprete, 8vo. Bonn, 1821, p. 31.)

2. VALERIUS PROBUS, termed by Macrobius "Vtr perfectissimus," flourished some years before A. Gellius, and therefore about the beginning of the second century. He was the author of commentaries on Virgil, and possessed a copy of a portion at least of the Georgics, which had been corrected by the hand of the poet himself. These are the commentaries so frequently cited by Servius; but the Scholia in Bucolica et Georgica, now extant, under the name of Probus, belong to a much later period. (Gell. i. 15. § 10; iii. i. § 3, ix. 9. § 12, 15, xiii. 29. § 1, xx. 30. § 5; Macrobi. Sat. v. 22; Heyne, de antiqu. Virgil. interpret. subjoined to his notices "De Virgiliis editionibus.")

It must not be concealed, that many plausible reasons, founded upon the notices contained in the Notae Attique, may be adduced for believing that the Valerius Probus of Gellius is one and the same person with the Probus Berytus of Suetonius and Hieronymus, for although Gellius, who speaks of having conversed with the pupils and friends of Valerius Probus, did not die before A. D. 180, it is by no means impossible, as far as we know to the contrary, that Probus Berytus might have lived on to the beginning of the second century, although the words of Martial (Ep. iii. 2, 12) cannot be admitted as evidence of the fact. This view has been adopted and ably supported by Jahn in the Prolegomena to his edition of Persius, 8vo. Lips. 1843 (p. ccxxvi, &c.). The chief difficulty, however, after all, arises from the chronology. Probus of Berytus is represented by Suetonius as having long sought the post of a centurion, and as having not applied himself to literature until he had lost all hopes of success; hence he must have been well advanced in life before he commenced his studies, and consequently, in all probability, must have been an old man in A. D. 57, when he was recognised at Rome as the most learned of grammarians. Moreover, a scholar who in the age of Nero undertook to illustrate Virgil, could scarcely with propriety have been represented as devoting himself to the ancient writers, who had fallen into neglect and almost into oblivion, for such is the meaning we should naturally attach to the words of Suetonius.

3. The life of Persius, commonly ascribed to Suetonius, is found in many of the best MSS. of the Satirist with the title Vita A. Persii Flacci de Commentario Probi Valerii subiata. Now since this biography bears evident marks of having been composed by some one who lived at a period not very distant from the events which it relates, we may fairly ascribe it to the commentator on Virgil.

4. The name of the ancient scholar on Juvenal was, according to Valla, by whom he was first published, Probus Grammaticus. (See In D. Junii Juv. Sat. Comment. vetusti post Pindori Curas, ed. D. A. G. Cramer, 8vo, Hamburg, 1823, p. 5.)

5. In the "Grammaticae Latinae antequi" (4to. Hannover, 1605, p. 1386—1494), we find a work upon grammar, in two books, entitled M. Valerii Probii Grammaticae Institutiones, with a preface in verse, addressed to a certain Coelostinus. The first book treats briefly of letters, syllables, the parts of speech and the principles of prosody. The second book, termed Collectanea, comprises general rules for the declension of nouns and verbs, with a few remarks on the arrangement of words and examples of the different species of metrical feet, corresponding throughout so closely with the treatise of M. Claudius Sacerdos [see PLOTUS MARCUS], that it is evident that one of these writers must have copied from the other, or that both must have derived their materials from a common source. The text of this Probus has lately received important improvements from a collection of the Codex Boiensis, now at Vienna, and appears under its best form in the "Corpus Grammaticorum Latinarum" of Lindemann, 4to. Lips. 1801, vol. i. pp. 99—140. The lines to Coelostinus are included in the Anthol. Lat. of Burmann, vol. i. addenda, p. 739, or No. 205, ed. Meyer.

6. In the same collection by Putschias, p. 1496—1541, is contained M. Valerii Probii Grammatici de Notis Romanorum Interpretingis Libellus, an explanation of the abbreviations employed in inscriptions and writings of various kinds.
PROCILLIUS.

7. Endlicher, in his Analecta Grammatica, has published, from a Codex Bobiensis, now at Vienna, a fragment Valerii Probi de Nomine. It is not unlikely that the same individual may be the author of the three pieces last named, but this is a point by which, it is vain to speak with confidence. (Osnab. Beiträge zur Griech. und Rom. Philol. Literatur-Geschichte, ii. p. 283; Jahn, l.c.; Suringar, Historia Critica Scholiast. Lat. [W. R.].

PROBUS, AEMILIUS. [NEPOS, CORNELIUS.] PROCAS, one of the fabulous kings of Alba Longa, succeeded Aventinus, reigned twenty-three years, and was the father of Numitor and Amulius. (Dionys. i. 71; Liv. i. 3; Appian, Rom. i. 1; Virg. Aen. vi. 767.)

PROCHIRUS, MICHAEL. [MICHAEL, literary, No. 11.]

PROCHORUS (Πρόχορος). There is extant in MS. a Greek life of St. John the Evangelist, professedly written by Prochorus, one of the seventy disciples, and also one of the seven deacons. (Luke, x. 1; Acts, vi. 5.) The work is professedly spurious, but critics are not determined as to its age. Vossius and others have striven to identify the work with the Circuitus Ioannis, mentioned in the Synagoga S. Scripturarum ascribed to Athenaeus. Le Nourry and Itigius assign to it a later date; and Tillemont regards it as comparatively recent, a forgery of the Middle Ages. It bears the title Προχόρου τοῦ ἐφ θανεια τῶν ἑτά κατασταθέντων, ἀνεύον Στεφάνου τοῦ προνομάρτυρι, περὶ Ιωάννου τοῦ Σελοδίου καὶ εὐαγγελιστοῦ Ἱστορία.

PROCILLA, JULIA, the mother of Agricola (Tac. Agr. 4).

PROCILLIUS 1. A Roman historian, a contemporary of Cicero. He appears to have written on early Roman history, as Varro quotes his account of the origin of the Curtian lake, and likewise on later Roman history, as Pliny refers to him respecting Pompey's triumph on his return from Africa (Varr. L. L. v. 149, comp. v. 154, ed. Müller; Plin. H. N. viii. 2). He was held in high estimation by Atticus; but Cicero writes that Deurnicus was far superior to him, from which we may infer that Procellius wrote likewise on geographical subjects. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 2. § 2.)

2. Tribute of the plebs, b. c. 56, was accused by Ciodius in b. c. 54, together with his colleagues, C. Cato and Nonius Sufenas, on account of the violent acts which they committed in their tribuneship. Cato and Nonius were acquitted, but Procellius was condemned. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15, § 4, 16, § 5, ad Q. Fr. ii. 6, § 1; Drumm, Geschichte Rom., vol. ii. p. 333, vol. iii. p. 100.) This Procellius may have been the same person as the historian.

3. L. PROCILLIUS, whom we know only from coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Juno Sisitana, and the reverse Juno in a chariot. We may infer from this coin that the Procellius came from Lanuvium, which was celebrated for its worship of Juno Sisitana. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 289.)

PROCLES.

PROCILLIUS, C. VALERIUS, a Gallie chief, whose father C. Valerius Caburnus had received the Roman franchise from C. Valerius Flaccus. Caesar placed great confidence in Procillius, and reckoned him as one of his friends. He employed Procillius as his interpreter in the confidential interview which he had with Divitius, and he likewise sent him on a subsequent occasion, along with M. Mettius, as his ambassador to Ariovistus. Procillius was thrown into chains by Ariovistus, but, on the defeat of the latter, was rescued by Caesar in person, a circumstance which, Caesar states, caused him as much pleasure as the victory itself. (Caes. B. G. i. 19, 47, 53.)

PROCLEIA (Προκλεία), a daughter of Laomedon, and the wife of Cynus, by whom she became the mother of Tennes and Hemitha. (Paus. x. 14. § 2; Tezze. ad Lyc. 252.)

PROCLES, (νονονοι). One of the twin sons of Aristodemus, who, according to the tradition respecting the Dorian conquest of Peloponnese, on the death of their father, inherited jointly his share of the conquered territory, and became the ancestor of the two royal families of Sparta. Procles was usually regarded as the younger of the two brothers. The line of kings descended from him was called, after his son or grandson Eurypion, the Eurypontidae. (Herod. viii. 131, vi. 51, &c.; Paus. iv. 1. § 7.)

2. Tyrant of Epidaurus, the father of Lysis or Melissa, the wife of Periander. Having revealed to the son of the latter the secret of his mother's death [PRIANDRE], he incurred the implacable resentment of Periander, who attacked and captured Epidaurus, and took Procles prisoner. (Herod. iii. 50—52; Paus. ii. 28. § 8.)

3. The son of Pitreus, was the leader of the Ionians who settled in the island of Samos. He was an Epidaurian by birth, and led with him a considerable number of Epidaurian exiles. Androclus and the Ephesians attacked Procles and his son Leoculars, who shared the royal power with him, and expelled them. (Paus. vii. 4. § 2.)

4. A descendant of Demaratus, king of Sparta, from whom, together with Eurythynus, who was apparently his brother, he inherited the dominion of Elisaeum and Teuthrania, in Asia Minor. He was among the Greeks who accompanied the younger Cyrus in his expedition against his brother, and is mentioned more than once by Xenophon (Anab. i. 3, 2, ii. 7, 8, 16). He returned safe home; for at the time of the expedition of Thimbron into Asia Minor (v. c. 169) he and Eurythenes were still governing their little principality, and readily attached themselves to the Macedonian commander. (Xen. Helen. i. 5, § 6.)

PROCLAS, a distinguished Greek medalist, whose name appears on the coins of Naxos and of Catana. The name was first discovered on an extremely rare coin of Naxos, where it is engraved on the plinth of a statue of Silenus, which forms the reverse of the coin, in characters so fine as to require a strong lens to decipher them. There remained, however, a possibility of doubt whether the name was that of the engraver of the medal, or that of the maker of the original stamp itself. This doubt has been fully set at rest by the discovery of the same name on a splendid medal of Catana, in the collection of the Duc de Luynes. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schor, p. 95, with an engraving at the head of M. Raoul-Rochette's Preface.)

PROCLUS (Πρόκλες), historical. 1. Prefect of the city under Theodosius the Great. He was put to death in the tenth year of his reign. An epigram on the pedestal of an obelisk at Constantinople records his success in setting the obelisk upright. (Anthol. Gracc. iv. 17.) A Latin translation of the epigram by Hugo Grotius is given by Fabricius (Bibl. Gracc. vol. ix. p. 369).

2. Surnamed Όνωμαντίσης, according to some authorities (Theophrases, p. 140; Cedrenus, p. 298), predicted the death of the emperor Anastasius. It appears to be this Proclus of whom Zonaras (Annal. xiv. p. 55) relates that he set on fire the fleet of Vitalianus, who was in arms against Anastasius, by means of mirrors. Other accounts (Chron. Jovin. Malahæ, vol. ii. p. 126) say that it was by means, not of mirrors, but of sulphur, that he effected this. His story has sometimes been erroneously referred to Proclus Diadochus (Fabric. Bibl. Gracc. vol. ix. p. 370). (C. P. M.)

PROCLUS (Πρόκλες), literary. 1. Eutychius Proclus, a grammarian who flourished in the 2nd century, born at Suse in Africa. He was the instructor of M. Antoninus (Jul. Capit. Vit. Ant. c. 2). It is probably this Proclus who is mentioned by Trebellius Pollio (Aenall. Tyr.) as the most learned grammarian of his age. He was created consul by Antoninus (Fabric. Bibl. Gracc. vol. ix. p. 365).

2. Or Proclus, son of Themison, held the office of hierophant at Laodicea in Syria. He wrote, according to Suidas, the following works:—1. Θεολογία, 2. Εἰς τὴν παρ' ἡνοίᾳ τῶν Πανδοράς μύθον, 3. Εἰς τὰ χρονᾶ ὅπως. 4. Εἰς τὴν Νικομάχιαν ἀρρητικῆς ἀφορμήσεις, and some geometrical treatises.

3. Surnamed Μαλλώνης, a Stoic philosopher, a native of Cilicia. He was, according to Suidas (s. v.), the author of ὑπόστασις τῶν Δισμερῶν συ- φράματιν, and a treatise against the Epicureans. It is probably this Proclus who is mentioned by Proclus Diadochus (in Tim. p. 166).

4. Or Proclus, a follower of Montanus, from whom a sect of heretics were called Procliani, who were deemed bad enough to require rebaptizing, if they returned to the church (Fabric. Bibl. Gracc. ix. p. 366.).

5. A native of Naukratis in Egypt. He was a man of distinction in his native city, but in consequence of the civil commotions there removed, while still young, to Athens. There he placed himself under the instructions of Adriamus, and afterwards himself taught eloquence, and had Philostratus as one of his pupils. He possessed several houses in and near Athens, and imported considerable quantities of merchandise from Egypt, which he disposed of wholesale to the ordinary vendors. After the death of his wife and son he took a concubine, to whom he entirely surrendered the control of his household, and in consequence of her mismanagement, reaped considerable discredit. It was his practice, if any one paid down 100 drachmae at once, to allow him admission to all his lectures. He also had a library, of which he allowed his pupils to make use. In the style of his discourses he imitated Hippias and Gorgias. He was remarkable for the tenacity of his memory, which he retained even in extreme old age. (Philostor. Vit. Procli, p. 602, &c. ed. Olearius.)

6. Surnamed Δαίδαλος (the successor), from his being regarded as the genuine successor of Plato in doctrine, was one of the most celebrated of the Neoplatonic school. (Marin. c. 10. In some MSS. he is styled Δαίδαλος Παλαικράσης.) He was of Lycean origin, the son of Patricius and Marcella, who belonged to the city of Xanthus, which Proclus himself regarded as his native place. According, however, to the distinct statement of Marinus (Vit. Procli, c. 6) he was born at Byzantium, on the 8th of February, a. D. 412, as is clear from the data furnished by his horoscope, which Marinus has preserved. The earlier period of his life was spent at Xanthus. When still very young, he was distinguished by his remarkable eagerness for study, to which Marinus believes him to have been urged by Athena herself, who appeared to him in a vision. Such watchful care, indeed, did the gods, according to that writer, take of Proclus, that he was preternaturally cured of a dangerous malady of his youth by Apollo, who appeared in his own person for the purpose. Statements like this indicate how large an abatement must be made in the extravagant account which Marinus gives of the precocity and progress of Proclus. From Xanthus he removed, while still young, to Alexandria, where his studies were conducted chiefly under the guidance of the rhetorician Leonas, who received him into his family, and treated him as though he had been his own son. Through him Proclus was introduced to the leading men and the most distinguished scholars of Alexandria, whose friendship he speedily secured by his abilities, character, and manners. He studied grammar under Orion. (Orion.) He also applied himself to learn the hieratic language, and imitated example of his father, to devote himself to the study of jurisprudence. Leonas having occasion to make a journey to Byzantium, took young Proclus with him, who eagerly embraced the opportunity of continuing his studies. On his return to Alexandria, Proclus abandoned rhetoric and law for the study of philosophy, in which his instructor was Olympiodorus. He also learnt mathematics from Hero. Whether from the confusion of his doctrines, or the indistinctness of his mode of expounding them, Olympiodorus was rarely understood by his disciples. Proclus, by his extraordinary powers of apprehension and memory, was able, after the lectures, to repeat them almost verbatim to his fellow-pupils. He also with great ease, according to Marinus, learnt by heart the philosophical treatises of Aristotle. Olympiodorus was so delighted with him, that he offered him his daughter in marriage. Becoming at last dissatisfied with the instruction to be obtained at Alexandria, Proclus removed to Athens, where he was received by a fellow-countryman of the name of Nicolaus. By Syrianus, with whom he formed an acquaintance, he was introduced to Plutarchus, the son of Nestorius, who was charmed with the aptitude and zeal displayed by so young a man (he was at the time not 20 years of age), so that though very old, he addressed himself to the task of instructing the young aspirant, and read with him Aristotle’s treatises. Plutarchus, by this encouragement, even took him to reside with him, and termed him his son. Plutarchus at his death commended Proclus to the care of his successor Syrianus, who in his turn regarded him rather as a helper and ally in his philosophical pursuits, than as a disciple, and took him to cultivate with him the ascetic system of life, which was becoming the practice of the school; and soon selected him as his future successor. After a sufficient foundation had been laid by the study of Aristotle, Proclus was initiated into the philosophy of Plato and the mystic theology of the school. By his intense application and unwearied diligence, he achieved such rapid progress, that by his 29th year he had written his commentary on the Timaeus of Plato, as well as many other treatises. On the death of Syrianus he succeeded him, and inherited from him the house in which he resided and taught. The income which he derived from his school seems to have been sufficient to enable him to lead a very pleasant and retired life. It remained with him, so that he might continue to pursue his studies, as also to contribute something to the support of Plutarchus, who was reduced to a very mean state. He also found time to take part in public affairs, giving his advice on important occasions, and, by precept and example, endeavouring to guide the conduct of the leading men. Whether it was that his interference in this way provoked hostility, or (as Ritter, vol. iv. p. 658 believes) that his eager attachment to, and diligent observance of heathen practices had drawn down upon him the suspicion of violating the laws of the Christian emperors, Proclus was compelled to quit Athens for a time; he went to Asia, where he had the opportunity of making himself better acquainted with the mystic rites of the East. He himself compiled a collection of the Chaldæan oracles, on which he laboured for five years. After a year’s absence, he came back to Athens. After his return he proceeded more circumspectly in his religious observances, concealing them even from his disciples, for which cause, according to Marinus, his house was conveniently situated. The profounder secrets of his philosophy he professed only to his most confidential disciples, in meetings with respect to which it appears secrecy was enjoined (ἄγραφοι συνόδαι). Marinus records, with intense admiration, the perfection to which he attained in all virtues. His ascetic temper led him to decline the numerous advantageous matrimonial connections that were offered to him; but towards all his friends he exhibited the greatest urbanity, watch-his will he liberally remembered his slaves. As a philosopher he enjoyed the highest celebrity among his contemporaries and successors. Marcus does not scruple to call him absolutely inspired, and to affirm that when he uttered his profound dogmas his countenance shone with a preternatural light. Besides his other philosophical attainments he was a distinguished mathematician, astronomer and grammarian. Cousin considers that all the philosophical myths which ever emanated from the great thinkers of Greece, Orpheus, Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle, Zeno, Plotinus, &c. were concentrated in and re-emitted by Proclus (Præf. p. xxvi.). Such laudation is extravagant and absurd. Proclus was a fanciful speculator, but nothing more, though the vagueness and incomprehensibility of his system may have led some moderns to imagine that they were interpreting Proclus when they were only giving utterance to their own vague speculations. That Proclus, with all his profundity, was utterly destitute of good sense, may be gathered from what Marinus tells of him, that he used to say that, if he could have his way, he would destroy all the writings that were extant, except the works of Plato; as indeed scarcely any other impression is left by the whole life which Marinus has written of him. That this want of good sense characterised the school generally is clear from the fact that as the successor of Proclus they could tolerate so very silly a person as Marinus.

In the writings of Proclus there is a great effort to give an appearance (and it is nothing more) of strict logical connection to the system developed in them, that form being in his view superior to the methods of symbols and images. He professed that his design was not to bring forward views of his own, but simply to expound Plato, in doing which he proceeded on the idea that everything in Plato must be brought into accordance with the mystical theology of Orpheus. He wrote a separate work on the coincidence of the doctrines of Orpheus, Pythagoras, and Plato. It was in much the same spirit that he attempted to blend together the logical method of Aristotle and the fanciful speculations of Neoplatonic mysticism. Where reasoning fails him, he takes refuge in the πίατος of Plotinus, which is superior to knowledge, conducting us to the operations of theory, which transcends all human wisdom, and comprises within itself all the advantages of divinations, purifications, initiations, and all the activities of divine inspiration. Through it we are united with the primeval unity, in which every motion and energy of our souls comes to rest. It is this principle which unites not only men with gods, but the gods with each other, and with the one,—the good, which is of all things the most credible.

Proclus held, in all its leading features, the doctrine of emanations from one ultimate, primeval principle of all things, the absolute unity, towards which all again all things strive. This union he did not, like Plotinus, conceive to be effected by means of pure reason, as even things destitute of reason and energy participate in it, purely as the result of their subsistence (ὑπραπτικός, Théol. Plat. i. 25, ii. 1, 4). In some unaccountable way, therefore, he must have conceived the πίατος, by which he represents this union as being effected, as something which did not involve rational or thinking activity. All inferior existences are connected with the highest only through the intermediate ones, and can return to the higher only through that which is intermediate. Every multitude, in a certain way, partakes of unity, and everything which becomes one, becomes so by partaking of the one. (Inst. Théol. § 3.) Every multitude is a union of the one and the many: that which unites the one and the many is nothing else than the pure, absolute one—the essential one, which makes every thing else partake of unity.

Proclus argued that there is either one principium, or many principia. If the latter, the principia must be either finite or infinite in number. If infinite, what is derived from them must be infinite, so that we should have a double infinity, or else, finite. But the finite can be derived only from the finite, so that the principia must be finite in number. There would then be a definite number of them. But number presupposes unity. Unity is therefore the principium of principia, and the cause of the finite multiplicity and of the being of all things. (Théol. Plat. ii. 1.) There is therefore one principium which is incorporeal, for the corporeal consists of parts, and is therefore unchangeable, for everything that moves, moves towards some object or end, which it seeks after. If the principium were moveable it must be in want of the good, and there must be something desirable outside it. But this is impossible, for the principium has need of nothing, and is itself the end towards which everything else strives. The principium, or first cause of all things, is superior to all actual being (οὐσία), and separated from it, and cannot even have it as an attribute. (l. c.) The absolutely one is not an object of cognition to any existing thing, nor can it be named (l. c. p. 95). But in contemplating the emanation of things from the one and their return into it we arrive at two words, the good, and the one, of which the first is analogical and positive, the latter negative only (l. c. p. 96). The absolutely one has produced not only earth and heaven, but all the gods which are above the world and in the world; it is the god of all gods, the unity of all unities (l. c. ii. p. 110). Everything which is perfect strives to produce something else, the full seeks to impart its fulness. Still more must this be the case with the absolute good, though in connection with that we must not conceive of any creative power or energy, for that would be to make the One imperfect and not simple, not fruitful through its very perfection (l. c. p. 101). Every emanation is less perfect than that from which it emanates (Inst. Théol. 7), but has a certain similarity with it, and, so far as this similarity goes, remains in it, departing from it so far as it is unlike, but as far as possible being one with it, and remaining in it (Inst. Théol. 31). What is produced from the absolutely one is produced as unity, or of the nature of unity. Thus the first produced things are independent unities (αὐτοτελεῖς ἐνδέξεις). Of these independent unities some are simple, others more composite. The nearer the unities are to the absolute unity the simpler they are, but the greater is the sphere of their operation and their productive power. Thus out of unity there arises a multitude of things which depart farther and farther from the simplicity of the absolute one; and as the producing power diminishes, it introduces more and more conditions into things, while it diminishes their universality and simplicity. His whole system of emanations seems in fact to be a realization of the logical subordination of ideas. The simplest ideas which are contained in those which are composite being regarded by him as the principles of things.

The emanations of Proclus proceeded in a curious triadic manner. That which precedes all power, and emanates immediately from the primal cause of all things, is limit. The power or force which produces existence is infinite (Theol. Plat. iii. p. 133). From these two principia arises a third, a compound of the two—a substance (as a sort of genus of all substances), that which in itself is absolutely an existing thing and nothing more (e. c. p. 133). Everything, according to Proclus, contains in itself being (αύστα), life (ζωή), and intelligence (νοῦς). The life is the centre of the thing, for it is both an object of thought and exists. The intelligence is the limit of the thing, for the intellect (νοοῦς) is in that which is the object of intellect (νοττόν), and the latter in the former; but the intellect or thought exists in the thing thought of objectively, and the thing thought of exists in the intellect productively (νοερῶς). This accordingly is the first triad, limit, infinitude, and the compound of the two. Of these the first—the limit—is the deity who advances to the extreme verge of the conceivable from the inconceivable, primal deity, measuring and defining all things, and establishes the paternal, concatenating and immaculate race of gods. The infinite is the in-exhaustible power of this deity. The "mixed" is the first and highest world of gods, which in a concealed manner comprehends everything within itself.

Out of this first triad springs the second. As the first of the unities produces the highest existing thing, the intermediate unity produces the intermediate existent thing, in which there is something first—unity, divinity, reality; something intermediate—power; and something last—the existence in the second grade, conceivable life (νοττόν ζωή); for there is in everything which is the object of thought, being (τά ελέη), life (τά ζωή), and thought (τά νοεῖν). The third of the unities, the "mixed," produces the third triad, in which the intelligence or thinking power (νοῦς) attains to its subsistence. This thinking power is the limit and completion of everything which can be the object of thought. The first triad contains the principle of union,—the second of multiplicity and increase by means of continuous motion or life, for motion is a species of life,—the third, the principle of the separation of the manifold, and of forming in it a pure unity.

In his treatise on Providence and Fate, Proclus seeks to explain the difference between the two, and to show that the second is subordinate to the first in such a manner that freedom is consistent with it. Both providence and fate are causes, the first the cause of all good, the second the cause of all connection (and connection as cause and effect). There are three sorts of things, some whose operation is as eternal as their substance, others whose substance does not exist, but is perpetually coming into existence, and, between these, things whose substance is eternal, but whose operation takes place in time. Proclus names these three kinds intellectual, animal and corporeal. The last alone are subjected to fate, which is identical with nature and is itself subject to providence, which is nothing else than the deity himself. The corporeal part of man is entirely subject to fate. The soul, as regards its substance, is superior to fate; as regards its operation, sometimes (referring to those operations which require corporeal organs and motions) beneath, sometimes superior to fate, and so forms the bond of connection between intellectual and corporeal existence. The freedom of the soul consists in its living according to virtue, for this alone does not involve servitude. Wickedness on the other hand is want of power, and by it the soul is subjected to fate, and is compelled to serve all that ministers to or hinders the gratification of the desires. Proclus strongly distinguishes the soul from that which is material, pointing out its reflective power as a mark of difference; the corporeal not being able to turn back in that way upon itself, owing to its consisting of separable parts. He founded on this also an argument for the immortality of the soul. (Inst. Theol. 15.) Some of the topics touched upon in this treatise are carried out still further in the essay On Ten Questions about Providence.

In the treatise on the origin of evil (περὶ τῆς τῶν κακῶν υποστάσεως), Proclus endeavours to show that evil does not originate with God, or with the daemons, or with matter. Evil is the consequence of a weakness, the absence of some power. As with the total absence of all power activity would be annihilated, there cannot be any total, unmixd evil. The good has one definite, eternal, universally operating cause, namely God. The causes of evil are manifold, indefinite, and not subject to rule. Evil has not an original, but only a derivative existence.

The following works of Proclus are still extant:—1. Εἰς τὴν Πλάτωνος Θεολογίαν, in six books. 2. Στοχεύεισι Θεολογική (Institutio Theologicae). This treatise was first published in the Latin translation of Franciscaus Patricius. The Greek text, with the translation of Aem. Portus, is appended to the edition of the last-mentioned work, published at Hamburgh in 1618. 3. A commentary on the First Alcibiades of Plato. 4. A commentary on the Timaeus of Plato. Of this commentary on the Timaeus five books remain, but they only treat of about a third of the dialogue. It is appended to the first Basle edition of Plato. 5. Various notes on the Politeia of Plato, printed in the same edition of Plato as the last-mentioned work. 6. A commentary on the Parmenides of Plato, published in Stuibbaum’s edition of that dialogue. 7. Portions of a commentary on the Cratylus of Plato, edited by Boisnoude, Lips. 1820. 8. A paraphrase of various different slights of the treatise of Ptolemaeus: first published, with a preface, by Melanchthon, at Basle, 1534. 9. A treatise on motion (περὶ κίνησεως), a sort of compendium of the last five books of Aristotle’s treatise περὶ φυσικῆς ἀκρόασεως. 10. Τοποτήτων τῶν ἀστρονομικῶν ὑπόθεσεως (Basle, 1520). 11. Σφαιρα, frequently appended to the works of the ancient astronomers. There are also several separate editions of it. 12. A commentary on the first book of Euclid’s elements (attached to various editions of the text of Euclid). 13. A commentary on the Έργα καὶ ἡμερία of Hesiod, in a somewhat mutilated form (Τομοφάμα εἰς τὰ Νεών ἢργα καὶ ἡμερία), first published at Venice in 1537. A better edition is that by Heinsius (Leyden, 1603). 14. Χρηστομάθεα γραμματική, or rather some portions of it preserved by Photius (cod. 239), treating of poetry and the lives of various celebrated poets. The short life of Homer which passes under the name of Proclus, was probably taken from this work. 15. Ἐπίσκεψις ἤν κατὰ Χρυσοστόμον. The object of this work was to maintain the eternity of the universe against the Christian doctrine on the subject. The work of Proclus has not come down to us in a separate form, but we still possess his arguments in the refutation of them by Joannes Philoponus (de Aetercitate Mundi). 16. De Mulierum Subsistencia (Περὶ τῶν κακῶν ὑποτάσσων). This and the two preceding treatises only exist in the Latin translation of Gulielmus de Morbeka. They are printed entire by Fabricius, in his Bibliotheca Graeca, vol. i. p. 373, &c. 19. A little astrological treatise on the effect of eclipses, in a Latin translation, 20. A treatise on poetry, also in a Latin translation, printed, together with a treatise by Choerobouces (Paris, 1615). 21. Five hymns. 22. Some scholia on Homer. There is no complete edition of the extant works of Proclus. The edition of Cousin (Paris, 6 vols. 8vo, 1820–1827) contains the treatises on Providence and Fate, on the Ten Doubts about Providence, and on the Nature of Evil, the commentary on the Alcibiades, and the commentary on the Parmenides. There are English translations of the commentaries on the Timaeus, the six books on the Theology of Plato, the commentaries on the first book of Eutilid, and the Theological Elements, and the five Hymns, by Thomas Taylor.

PROCLUS (SAIN'T), was at a very early age appointed reader in the church at Constantinople. He was also employed as secretary or amanuensis to St. Chrysostom, and was employed in a similar capacity by Atticus (who succeeded Arcadius as patriarch of Constantinople), by whom he was invested successively with the orders of deacon and presbyter. He was raised to the rank of bishop of Cyzicus by Sisinius, the successor of Atticus, but did not exercise the functions of his office, the people of Cyzicus choosing another in his place. On the death of Sisinius (A. D. 427) there was a general expression of feeling in favour of Proclus as his successor, but Nestorius was appointed. Proclus contended zealously against the heresies which the latter strove to introduce into the church, combating them even in a sermon preached before Nestorius himself. On the deposition of Nestorius, Proclus was again proposed as his successor; but his elevation was again opposed, though on what grounds does not appear very clearly ascertained. But on the death of Maximianus, who was appointed instead, Proclus was at last created patriarch. In A. D. 438 Proclus gained a great deal of honour by having the body of St. Chrysostom brought to Constantinople. There is still extant a fragment of a Latin translation of an eloge on St. Chrysostom, by Proclus, delivered probably about this time. It was in the time of Proclus that the custom of chanting the Trisagion was introduced into the church. While in office, Proclus conducted himself with great prudence and mildness. For further details respecting his ecclesiastical career, the reader is referred to Tillemont's Mémoires Ecclesiastiques (vol. xiv. pp. 704–718). His extant writings are enumerated by Fabricius (B. G. vol. ix. pp. 505–512). One of the most celebrated of his letters (περὶ πίστεως) was written in A. D. 455, when the bishops of Armenia applied to him for his opinion on certain propositions which had been disseminated in their dioceses, and were attributed to Theodorus of Mopsuestia. The discussion that ensued with respect to these propositions made a considerable stir in the East.

Proclus bestowed a great deal of pains upon his style, which is terse and sententious, but is crowded with antitheses and rhetorical points, and betrays a laboured endeavour to reiterate the same sentiment in every possible variety of form. From the quotations of subsequent authors, it appears that several of the writings of Proclus are lost. The Platonie Theology of Proclus Diadochus has sometimes been erroneously described as a theological work of St. Proclus. The 24th of October is the day consecrated to the memory of St. Proclus by the Greek church. [C. P. M.]

PROCLUS (Πρόκλος), one of the eminent artists in mosaic who flourished in the Augustan age. His name occurs on two inscriptions found at Perinthus, from one of which we learn that he adorned the temple of Fortune in that city, and that the Alexandrian merchants, who frequented the city, erected a statue in honour of him. The second inscription is the epitaph of a mosaic artist, who is said in it to have left a son, his associate and equal in the art; from which it would seem probable that both father and son were named Proclus. The second inscription, as restored, runs thus:— PROCOPIUS.

PROCLUS (Πρόκλου), a physician, probably a native of Rhegium, among the Bruttii in Italy. He belonged to the medical sect of the Methodici (Galen, De Meth. Med. i. 7, vol. x. p. 52, Introduct. c. 4, vol. xiv. p. 684), and must have lived about the end of the first century after Christ, as he was junior to Theossilus, and senior to Galen. He is no doubt the same physician who is called Proculus in our present editions of Caecilius Aurelianus (De Morb. Chron. iii. 8, p. 469), where he is said to have been one of the followers of Themison, and his opinion on the different kinds of dropsy is quoted. He may also be the same person whose remedy for the gout and sciatica is mentioned by Paulus Aegineta (iii. 77, vii. 11, pp. 492, 661) and Joannes Actuarius (De Meth. Med. v. 6, p. 265). [W. A. G.]

PROCLUS, LARGI'/NUS, a person in Germany, who predicted that Domitian would die on a certain day. He was in consequence sent to Rome, where he was condemned to death; but as the punishment was deferred, in order that the martyrdom might be avoided at the fair day which had passed, he escaped altogether, as Domitian died on the very day he had named. (Dion Cass. ixviii. 16; comp. Suet. Dom. 16.)

PROCNE (Πρόκνη), a daughter of king Pandion of Athens, was the wife of Tereus, and was metamorphosed into a swallow. (Apollod. iii. 14, § 8; Thucyd. ii. 29.)

PROCOPIUS (Προκοπίους), Roman emperor in the East, through rebellion, from A. D. 363 to 366. According to all probability, he was a relation of the emperor Julian through Basilia, the mother of that emperor, and the second wife of Constantius Consul, who was the youngest son of Constantius Chorus. [See the genealogical table Vol. I. p. 382.] Procopius was a native of Cilicia, where he was born about A. D. 363. Constantius II. made him his secretary, and employed him in the field as tribune. The emperor Julian created him comes, and appointed him commander in Mesopotamia, and made him万人将军 in A. D. 365. It was then said that Julian had advised him to assume the purple, or manifested a wish that he should be his successor in case he should lose his life in the projected expedition, and this saying afterwards found many believers, to the great advantage of Procopius. However, it was Julian who succeeded Julian, in 363, and by him Procopius was charged with conducting the body of the fallen hero to Tarsus. Aware that Julian entertained suspicions against him, or, perhaps, in order to carry out schemes which, at that period, nobody expected, Procopius went to Caesarea in Cappadocia, instead of returning to the imperial quarters. This step was sufficient to rouse the suspicions of Julian, whatever might have been his previous disposition, and some troops were despatched to seize the fugitive, who, however, deceived his pursuers, and escaped with his family to Tauris. Afraid of being betrayed by the barbarians, he soon left that country, and returned to Asia Minor; a dangerous step, which, however, throws some light on his secret plans. During some time he wandered from place to place, and his return having been discovered by Valentinian and Valens, the successors of Julian (364), he hid himself in the mountains, till at last he found refuge at the house of the senator Strategius, who lived near Chalcedon. Strategius became a confidant of the ambitious schemes of Procopius, who found further adherents among the numerous adversaries of Valens in Constantinople, whether the fugitive general often proceeded on secret visits. The eunuch Eugenius became one of the principal promoters of the plans of Procopius, which were now manifestly those of depositing Valens, and making himself master of the East. The plot broke out in 365, and owing to his numerous partisans and his own artifices, the people of Constantinople proclaimed him emperor on the 28th of September of that year. The emperor Valens was at that period staying at Caesarea in Cappadocia, but was soon informed of the rebellion, and prepared for effective resistance. Meanwhile, Procopius set out for Asia Minor with a well-disciplined army, advanced as far as the Sangarius, and, having made bold stratagems, caused an imperial body, which defended the passage of that river, to desert their master, and join his own army. However, Valens advanced in his turn, and laid siege to Chalcedon, but was defeated under its walls, and obliged to retreat into Phrygia; Marcellus, a general of Procopius, took the important town of Cyzicus, and Procopius became master of Bithynia; a series of successes which turned his mind, made him saucy, and caused him more adversaries than adherents. The war was renewed with vigour in the spring of the following year 366, but to the great disadvantage of Procopius, whose army, commanded by the fugitive Persian prince, Hormidas, was totally defeated by the celebrated general Arbotion. Soon afterwards, on the 27th of May, 366, another battle was fought at Naoclia, in Phrygia, the two rivals commanding their armies in person, and it ended in the rout of the rebels. Procopius fled seconded by a few attendants, with whom he wandered some days in the mountains, when they treacherously seized him, and delivered him into the hands of Valens, by whose order he was immediately put to death. Socrates says that Procopius suffered death by being tied to two trees forcibly bent together, which, on snapping asunder, tore the body of the unfortunate man to pieces. The cruel conduct of Valens against the partisans of Procopius belongs to the history of the former. There are gold and silver coins of Procopius extant, the former being extremely rare, according to Eckhel. (Anm. Marc, xxvi. 6; Zoisim. lib. iv.; Themist. Orat. 7; Socrat. iv. 3, &c.; Philostorg. ix. 5; Eckhel, vol. viii. pp. 156, 157.)

COIN OF PROCOPIUS.

* That is, if in Galen, De Meth. Med. i. 7, vol. x. p. 52, we read τοῦ Προγήου instead of καλγρήγιου, an alteration which is not likely to be a sound one, as the name of Rheginus applied to a physician is probably not to be found elsewhere.
PROCOPIUS (Προκοπίου), one of the most eminent Byzantine historians, was a native of Cæsarea in Palestine, where he was born, at the beginning of the sixth century of the Christian era. He went to Constantinople when still a young man, and there obtained so much distinction as an advocate and a professor of eloquence, that he attracted the attention of Belisarius, who appointed him, in A.D. 527, his secretary, or secretary. In this quality Procopius accompanied the great hero on his different wars in Asia, Africa, and Italy, being frequently employed in state business of importance, or in conducting military expeditions. In the Gothic war we find him entrusted with the commissariat department, and at the head of the Byzantine navy, a post of vital importance for the success of the campaign. Procopius returned with Belisarius to Constantinople a little before 542.

His eminent talents and corresponding merits were appreciated by the emperor Justinian, who conferred upon him the title of illustris, made him a senator, and in 562 created him prefect of Constantinople. Procopius died a little before, or a little after the death of Justinian, that is, about A.D. 565, at the age of sixty and upwards, probably nearer to seventy. Of this great historian Gibbon says, with much truth, that according to the vicissitudes of courage or servitude, of favour or disgrace, he successively composed the history, the panegyric, and the satire of his own times. It is, however, still doubtful whether Procopius actually was the author of that collection of satire and scandal which is attributed to him, under the title of "Historia Arcana" or "Anecdotes." We shall speak of it after first mentioning two other points of doubt regarding our author, the solution of which has occupied the mind and the pen of eminent scholars. First, it has been questioned whether he was a Christian or a Pagan. Space, however, will not allow us to give even the shortest account of the different opinions that have been, or are, still, prevalent on that subject, and we consequently merely mention that, while Eichel and La Mothe de Vayer, both quoted below, declared him to be a Pagan, Gerard Vossius, Fabricius, Harles, and others thought that he was a Christian. Indeed, Procopius frequently speaks of faith, either Christian or Pagan, in a manner inconsistent with his own words, so as fully to justify doubts respecting his creed. Assemani and Cave take a middle course. The latter thinks that he was neither Christian nor Pagan entirely, but being somewhat of a sceptical turn of mind (or perhaps we ought to say, extremely liberal and excessively tolerant in religious matters) he used to despise the superstitions of the Pagans in his conversations with Christians, and would admit, when in company with Pagans, that there was also truth without the sphere of Christianity. We may add that Justinian, who was a bigoted Christian, whether in orthodoxy or heterodoxy, would probably not have permitted a Pagan to discharge the functions of a senator, or a prefect of Constantinople. The other doubt point alluded to above is of a very strange description. For, since Procopius has given a most graphic description of the plague which devastated Constantinople in 543, rendering his narrative still more lucid and scientifically descriptive, by entering into medical details concerning the symptoms of the disease, &c., it has been thought by some that he was a professional medical man. He thus figures as a physician in several French medical dictionaries. But this is going too far. Procopius betrays, in all his works, a vast deal of miscellaneous knowledge, and while describing the plague, probably derived some additional information from medical friends, which, however, no more makes him a physician, than his work on the Buildings of Justinian constitutes him a professional architect.

As an historian Procopius deserves great praise. Many of his contemporaries, as well as writers who lived a short time after him, speak of him with unreserved esteem. His style is good, formed upon classic models, often elegant, and generally plastic and full of vigour. The general impression of his writings is that of a man who has thought much and seen much, from a position at the highest quarters of information. Procopus is the principal historian for the eventful reign of Justinian.

Among the works of Procopius the most important is:—1. Ἱστορία, in 8 books; viz., two On the Persian War, containing the period from A.D. 400—553, and treating more fully of the author's own times; two On the War with the Vandals, from A.D. 535—545; four On the Gothic War, or properly speaking, only three books, the fourth (eighth) being a sort of supplement containing various matters, and going down to the beginning of A.D. 553. It was continued by Agathias till 559. The work is extremely interesting; the descriptions of the habits, &c. of the barbarians are faithful and masterly done. Photius gives an analysis of the first two books, and Agathias, the continuator of Procopius, gives an analysis of all the eight books, in the preface to his History.

2. Κοινοτρία, Λόγια VI. de Actùis fìliorum Constantinæ et regibus Romanorum. A work equally interesting and valuable in its kind, though apparently too much seasoned with flattery of the emperor. Gibbon thinks that Procopius was afraid of having offended the pride of Justinian, through too faithful a narrative of glorious events in which the emperor had no personal share, and that he subsequently wrote on the splendid buildings of his master, in order to regain his favour.

3. Ανέκδοτα, Historia Arcana, a collection of anecdotes, some of them witty and pleasant, but others more indecent and sometimes absurd, reflecting upon Justinian, the empress Theodora, Belisarius, and other eminent persons. It is a complete Chronique Scandalous of the court of Constantinople, from A.D. 549 till 562. The authorship of Procopius has been much doubted, partly because his contemporaries do not mention it, and partly because such a production can hardly be reconciled with the character of a grave historian and statesman. However, the first writer who attributed this work to Procopius, namely Suidas (s. v. Προκοπίους), does so in a very positive manner, and adds that it had until then not been issued for circulation, which, indeed, it was not fit for. Montesquieu and Gibbon both give credit to the Anecdotes, and do not doubt the authorship of Procopius.

On Orationes, probably extracts from the "History," which is rather overstocked with harangues and speeches.

Editions:—1. Historia. Latini Versiones. The first of these was published under the title De Bello italicō adversus Gothos gesto, lib. iv. Foligno, 1470, fol. Vcnet. 1471, fol., by Leonardo Aretino, or Leonardo Brunii of Arezzo, who, thinking that he had the only existing MS. of the work, was dishonest enough to style himself the author of it. Other versions are:—De Bello Pers. et Vandal. ex Versione Raphaelis Valoteram., Rome, 1509, fol.; cum Christopherus Person, Rome, 1506, fol.; cum Praefatione Benti Rhennani, Basel, 1531, fol.; cum Zosimo, ibid. 1576, fol.; cum Jornande et Agathin, Lyon, 1595, 8vo.; sub titulo De Gothorum Origine, Frankfort, 1006, fol.; by Hugo Grotius, in his Historia Gothorum Longobard. et Vandal., Amsterdam, 1655, 8vo.; and others.—

3. Historia Arcana. Graece et Latine, cum Notis N. Alemanni, Lyon, 1625, fol.; idem, Cologne, 1669, fol.; a Joan. Eichelo, Helmstädt, 1634, 4to.; Excerpta, by Hugo Grotius, in his work quoted above. The famous Christian Thomasius intended to make a new edition, but it did not appear. There is an English translation, 1674, 8vo.; a German, by Paul Reinhard, Erlangen and Leipzig, 1753, 8vo.; and there are French and Italian versions.

4. Orationes, Basel, 1538, 8vo.

There are two collections of the Works of Procopius, with Latin versions, notes, &c. the first by Claude Maltret, Paris, 2 vols. fol. 1602, 1663, which is not very carefully edited, and was badly reprinted at Venice, 1729, fol.; and the second in the Bonn Collection of the Byzantines, by Dindorf, Bonn, 3 vols. 8vo., 1835—1838: it contains Alemann's valuable notes on the Historia Arcana, an index, and a text revised with great care. (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. vii. p. 553, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 510; Hancikus, Script. Byzant.; La Mothe de Vayer, Augmentes sur les Historiaires Graec., in vol. vii. of his Oeuvres.)

PROCRIS (Πρόκρης), a daughter of Erechtheus in Athens, was married to Cephalus (Apollod. iii. 15. § 2; comp. CEPHALUS). A second Procris was a daughter of Theopis (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.).

PROCRUSTES (Πρόκροστης), that is, "the Stretch," is a surname of the famous robber Polyphemon or Damascus. He used to force all the strangers that fell into his hands into a bed which was either too small or too large, and in which he had their limbs stretched by force until they died. He was slain by Theseus, on the Cepheus in Attica; the bed of Procrustes is used proverbially even at the present day. (Plut. Theb. 11; Paus. i. 58. § 5; Ov. Met. vii. 438.)

C. PROCULEIUS, a Roman eques, one of the friends of Octavian, was sent by the latter, after the victory at Actium, to Antony and Cleopatra. Antony was just expiring when Proculius arrived, having previously told Cleopatra to trust Proculius more than any other of the friends of Octavian. The account of his interview with Cleopatra is related at length by Plutarch, who calls him Procleius (Plut. Act. 77—79; Dion Cass. lii. 11.). It is of this Proculius that Horace speaks (Carm. ii. 2):—

"Vivet extemplo Procleius aeo, Notus in fratres animi paterni:"

and Porphyrio relates, in his commentary on this passage, that Proculius divided his property with his brothers Caeio (not Scipio as in some editions) and Murena, who had lost their property in the civil wars. It is also stated by Dion Cassius (liv. 3), that Proculius was a brother of the Murena, who was condemned, in b. c. 22, on account of his conspiring against Augustus. The nature of this relationship is, however, not clear. The full name of this Murena was A. Terentius Varro Murena, and Drummann conjectures that he was the son of L. Licinius Murena, who was consul b.c. 62, and that he was adopted by A. Terentius Varro. The same writer farther conjectures that Proculius was the son of C. Licinius Murena, the brother of the consul of b.c. 62, and that he was adopted by some one of the name of Proculius. In that case Proculius would have been the cousin of Murena. We know that it was common among the Romans to call cousins by the name of brothers (frater patrælos et fratres). (Dummann, Geschichts Roms, iv. pp. 193, 194.)

The great intimacy of Proculius with Augustus is attested by many writers. (Dion Cass. l. c.; Tac. Ann. iv. 40; Plin. H. N. vii. 45. § 46, xxxvi. 25. § 59.) Dion Cassius (l. c.) speaks of him and Maecenas as the principal friends of the emperor, and they both interceded, but to no purpose, for the life of their relation, Murena. We also learn from Tacitus (l. c.), that he was one of the Romans to whom Augustus had thought of giving his daughter Julia in marriage. Proculius put an end to his own life by taking gypsum, when suffering from a disease in the stomach. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 25. § 59.)

The following coin, which has C. PROCULI L. F. on the reverse, may have been struck by the above-mentioned Proculius. It is uncertain to whom the head on the obverse refers; on the reverse we see a bipennis. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 289.)

COIN OF C. PROCULEIUS.

PROCULUS, a Roman cognomen, was originally a praenomen, like Postumus and Agrippa. The Roman grammarians connected it with procuél, and explain it in two different ways, as meaning either a person born when his father was at a distance from his native country, or a person born of parents advanced in age. (Paul. Diae. ex Fest. p. 235, ed. Mäüller.)

PROCULUS, the wealthy descendant of a race of robber chiefs, was a native of Albium Inaunianum, PROCLUS.

in Liguria. Having entered upon the career of a soldier, he served with great distinction in the Roman legions, and frequently held the command of a tribune. In the year A. D. 260, he was per- suaded by a bold ambitious wife to place himself at the head of the discontented inhabitants of Lyons, and to assume the purple. During the brief period of his sway, he achieved a victory over the Ale- manni; but having been attacked and routed by Probus, he sought refuge among the Franks, by whom he was delivered up to death. (Vopisc. Vita Proculi in Script. Hist. Aug.) [W. R.]

PROCLUS, the jurist. The fact that Proclus gave his name to the school or sect (Proculiani or Proculiani, as the name is also written), which was opposed to that of the Sabiniani, shows that he was a jurist of note. He was a contempor- ary of Nerva the son [NERVA]. Proclus is often cited, and there are 37 extracts from him in the Digest from his eight books of Epitola. He is the second jurist in order of time who is ex- cepted in the Digest. Labeo is the first. Ac- cording to the Florentine Index, he wrote eight books of Epitola; but he wrote at least eleven books. (Dig. 18, tit. 1, s. 69.) He appears also to have written notes on Labeo.

It is inferred that Proclus was named Sempronius Proclus, from the case put in the Digest (31. a. 47); but in that passage Sempronius Proclus asks the opinion of his grandson (nepos), whose name, as the answer shows, was Proclus. If he was a daughter's son, his name would not necessarily be Sempronius. Proclus is called "non levis juris auctor" by the Divi Fratres (Dig. 37. tit. 14. s. 17.) Some writers suppose that Proclus is the Licius Proclus, who was Praefectus Praetorio under Otho. (Tacit. Hist. i. 46, 82, ii. 39, &c.) Lampridius (Alex. Severus, 66) makes Proclus one of the consiliarii of Alexander Severus; but that is not the only mistake which Lampridius commits in that passage. (Zimmerm., Geschichte des Röm. Praefecten.)

PROCLUS, a physician. [PROCLUS.]

PROCLUS, ACERRONIUS. [ACERRO- NIIUS.]

PROCLUS, C. ARTO'RIUS, a Roman grammian, who erroneously gave the name of figurae to tropi. (Quintil. ix. i, init.) This writer is frequently quoted by Festus, under the simple name of Artorius. (Festus, pp. 225, 352, 364, ed. Müller.)

PROCLUS, BA'RIUS, one of the soldiers whom Otho employed to corrupt the fidelity of Galba's troops, when he was aspiring to the em- pire. (Tac. Hist. i. 25; Plut. Gabb. 24.)

PROCLUS, CERVARIUS, was privy to the conspiracy of Piso against Nero, but, in con- sequence of his turning informer and accusing Fenius Rufus, he obtained his pardon. (Tac. Ann. xv. 50, 66, 71.)

PROCLUS, CESTIUS. [CESTIUS, No. 4.]

PROCLUS, COCECIUS, one of the specula- tores (see Dict. of Ant. p. 508, b, 2d ed.) of the emperor Galba. (Tac. Hist. i. 24.)

PROCLUS, FLAVIUS, a Roman eques in the reign of the emperor Claudius. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 2, s. 8.)

PROCLUS, JULIUS. 1. Is related in the legend of Romulus to have informed the sorrowing Roman people, after the strange departure of their king from the world, that Romulus had descended from heaven and appeared to him, bidding him tell the people to honour him in future as a god under the name of Quirinus. (Liv. i. 10; Ov. Fast. ii. 499, &c.; Flor. i. 1; Lactant. i. 15; Dion Cass. lvi. 46.) 2. A friend of Martial. (Mart. i. 71.) 3. Slain by Commodus in Asia. (Lamprid. Commod. 7.)

PROCLUS, LICI'NIUS, was one of Otho's friends, and was advanced by him to the dignity of praefect of the praetorian cohorts. Otho placed more confidence in him than in any of his other generals, and he maintained his influence with the emperor by calumniating those who had more virtue than himself. His want of experience in war and his evil counsels hastened Otho's fall. He escaped with his life after the defeat at Bedriacum, and obtained his pardon from Vitellius by pleding that he had purposely betrayed his master. (Tac. Hist. i. 46, 82, it. 33, 39, 44, 60.)

PROCLUS, C. PLAUT'IIUS, consul b. c. 358, with C. Fabius Ambustus, carried on war with the Hernici, whom he conquered, and obtained in consequence the honour of the Franks, having been summoned by Nero to Greece, they were accused on their arrival, and, as no opportunity was afforded them of clearing themselves of the charges brought against them, they put an end to their own lives (Dion Cass. lxi. 17.) It is of these two brothers, Scribonius Proclus and Scribonius Rufus, that Tacitus speaks, calling them simply "Scribonii fratres." We learn from him that Pactus Africanus was supposed to have denounced them to Nero (Tac. Ann. xiii. 48, Hist. iv. 41). These brothers were probably the sons of the preceding Scribonius Proclus. (See Reimarvs, ad Dion Cass. l.c.)

PROCLUS, TTTIUS, put to death in A. D. 48, because he had been privy to the adulteries of Silus and Messalina. (Tac. Ann. xi. 35.)

PROCLUS, VE'CTIUS, the step-father (vi- tricus) of the wife of the younger Pliny (Plin. Ep. ix. 13, § 13.) Pliny addresses one of his letters (iii. 15) to a certain Proclus, who may perhaps be the same person as this Vectius Proclus.

PROCLUS, VOLU'SIUS, had been one of the instruments employed by Nero in the murder of his mother, and was a commander of one of the ships in the fleet off the Campanian coast, when the conspiracy of Piso against Nero was formed. From a woman of the name of Epicharis, he obtained some information respecting the plot, which he straightway communicated to Nero. (Tac. Ann. xv. 51, 57.)

PRODICUS (Prō'dikos), was a native of Iulis in the island of Ceos, the birthplace of Simonides PRODICUS.

(Plat. Protag. p. 316, d.; Suid. s. v.), whom he is described as having imitated (Plat. Prot. pp. 339, c., 340, e., 341, b.), and with whom he was without doubt acquainted, as the poet did not die till the 79th, or the beginning of the 80th Olympiad. Prodicus came freely to Athens for the purpose of transacting business on behalf of his native city, and even attracted admiration in the senate as an orator (Plat. Hipp. Maj. p. 292, comp. Philos. Vit. Soph. i. 28), and his reputation was even apt to fall (Plat. Protag. p. 316, a.; Philol. l. c.). Plutarch describes him as slender and weak (Plat. an sent ger. sit Resp. c. 15); and Plato also alludes to his weakliness, and a degree of effeminacy which resulted therefrom (Plat. p. 315, d.). Philostratus is the first who taxes him with luxury and avarice (l. c., comp. Welcker, Kleine Schriften, ii. p. 513, &c.). In the Protagorai of Plato, which points to the 87th Olympiad (any more exact determination is disputable) as the time at which the dialogue is supposed to take place, Prodicus is mentioned as having previously arrived in Athens. He had been brought forward in a play of Eupolis, and in the Clouds and the Birds of Aristophanes (l. 390), which belong to Ol. 89 and Ol. 91, and came frequently to Athens on public business. (Plat. Hipp. Maj. p. 292.) Still later, when Isocrates (born Ol. 86. 1) is mentioned as his disciple (see Welcker, Kleine Schriften, ed. Olearius), published first in the Rheinisches Museum der Philologie, and Naeke, i. 1—39, 533—545, afterwards in F. G. Welcker's Kleine Schriften, ii. p. 392—541), and in the year of the death of Socrates, Prodicus was still living. (Plat. Apol. p. 19. c.) The dates of his birth and death cannot be determined. The statement of Suidas (s. v., comp. Schol. on Plat. de Rep. x. p. 600. c.), that he was condemned to the hemlock cup as a corrupter of the youth in Athens, sounds very suspicious (comp. Welcker, p. 562). According to the statement of Philostratus (p. 483, comp. 496, ed. Olearius), on which little more reliance can be placed, he delivered his lecture on virtue and vice in Thebes and Sparta also. The Apology of Plato unites him with Gorgias and Hippias in the statement, that into whatever city they might come, they were competent to instruct the youth. Lucian (Vit. Herod. c. 9) mentions him among those who had held lectures at Olympia. In the dialogues of Plato he is mentioned or introduced, not indeed without irony, though, as compared with the other sophists, with a certain degree of esteem. (Hipp. Maj. p. 292, Theaet. p. 151, b., Phaedo, 60, Protag. p. 341, a., Charmid. p. 163, d., Meno, p. 96, Cratyli. p. 384, b., Symp. p. 177, Euthydi. p. 305.) Aristophanes in the Clouds (l. 360) deals more indulgently with him than with Socrates; and the Xenophonic Socrates, for the purpose of combating the voluptuousness of Aristippus, borrows from the book of the wise Prodicus (Prodt. δος σοφι) the story of the choice of Hercules (Memor. ii. 1 § 21, &c.). This separation of Prodicus from the other sophists has been pointed out by Welcker in the above quoted treatise (p. 400, &c.). Like Protagoras and others, Prodicus delivered lectures in return for the payment of contributions (Τραγοδοιανεω — Xen. Mem. ii. 1 § 21, comp. Philostr. p. 492, Diog. Laërt. vi. 21, comp. Welcker, Protag. p. 314, b.) of from half a drachma to 50 drachmas, probably according as the hearers limited them-
PROETUS.

former seeks to deter him from the path of virtue by urging the difficulty of it; the latter calls attention to the unnatural character of enjoyment which anticipates the need of it, its want of the highest joy, that arising from noble deeds, and the consequences of a life of voluptuousness, and how she herself, honoured by gods and men, leads to all noble works, and to true well-being in all circumstances of life. Hercules decides for virtue. This outline in Xenophon probably represents, in a very abbreviated form, and with the omission of all collateral references, the leading ideas of the original, of which no fragments remain (comp. Welcker, p. 469, &c., who also shows that the amplifications in Dio Chrysostomus and Themistius belong to these rhetoricians, and are not derived from the Horae of Prodicus, p. 486, &c. Respecting the numerous imitations of this narrative in poets, philosophers, rhetoricians, and in works of art, see, in like manner, Welcker, p. 467, &c.). In another speech, which treated of riches, and the substance of which is reproduced in the dialogue Ergaia, Prodicus had undertaken to show that the power of governments depends solely upon the use which is made of them, and that virtue must be learnt. (Welcker endeavours to point out the coincidence of the former doctrine with that of Socrates and Antisthenes, p. 493, &c.) Similar sentiments were expressed in Prodicus's Praise of Agriculture (Themist. Orat. 30, p. 349; comp. Welcker, p. 496, &c.). His views respecting the worthlessness of earthly life in different ages and callings, and how we must long after freedom from connection with the body in the heavenly and cognate aether, are found represented in the dialogue Ariochus, from a lecture by Prodicus; as also his doctrine that death is not to be feared, as it affects neither the living nor the departed (comp. Stob. Serm. xx. 35). Whether the appended arguments for immortality are borrowed from him, as Welcker (p. 500) endeavours to show, is doubtful. Welcker goes on to account for particularizations of the sun, moon, rivers, fountains, and whatever else contributes to the comfort of our life (Sext. Eup. adv. Math. i. 52; Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 42), and he is therefore, though hastily, charged with atheism (ib. 55). (Ch. A. B.)

PRODORUS, one of the statues in the beginning mentioned by Pliny as of some celebrity, but not distinguished by any of their works. (H. N. xxxiv. 8, s. 19. § 25.)

[P.S.]

PROETUS (Προετος). 1. A son of Abas and Ocealos, and a twin-brother of Acrisius. In the dispute between the two brothers for the kingdom of Argos, Proetus was defeated and expelled (Paus. ii. 25. § 6). The cause of this quarrel is traced by some to the conduct of Proetus towards Danae, the daughter of a king (Apollod. ii. 4. § 1), and Ovid (Met. v. 238) represents Acrisius as expelled by Proetus, and Persens, the grandson of Acrisius, avenges his grandfather by changing Proetus into a block of stone, by means of the head of Medusa. But according to the common tradition, Proetus, when expelled from Argos, fled to Jobates or Amphinax in Lyicia, and married his daughter Antea or Sthenoeboa (Hom. II. vi. 160; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 630, &c.; comp. Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vi. 48). Jobates, thereupon, restored Proetus to his kingdom by armed force. Tirynth was taken and fortified by the Cyclopes (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 553; Paus. ii. 16. § 4), and Acrisius then shared his kingdom with his brother, surrendering to him Tirynth, i.e. the Heraeum, Midea and the coast of Argolis (Paus. ii. 16. § 5). By his wife Proetus became the father of three daughters, Lyssipe, Hippmodoros, and Hippindassa (Servius, I., c.) calls the two last Hipponeos and Cyrialessa, and Aelian, V. H. iii. 42, mentions only two daughters, Elge and Celaene. When these daughters arrived at the age of maturity, they were stricken with madness, the cause of which is differently stated by different authors; some say that it was a punishment inflicted upon them by Dionysus, because they had despised his worship (Apollod. l.c.; Diod. iv. 68), and according to others, by Hera, because they presumed to consider themselves more handsome than the goddess, or because they had stolen some of the gold of her statue (Serv. ad Virg. Ecl. vi. 48). In this state of madness they wandered through Peloponnesus. Melampus promised to cure them, if Proetus would give him one third of his kingdom. As Proetus refused to accept these terms, the madness of his daughters not only increased, but was communicated to the elder Argive women, and they murdered their own children and ran about in a state of frenzy. Proetus then declared himself willing to listen to the proposal of Melampus; but the latter now also demanded for his brother Bias an equal share of the kingdom of Argos. Proetus consented (Herod. ix. 54; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. ix. 30), and Melampus having chosen the most robust among the young men, gave chase to the mad women, amid shouting and dancing, and drove them as far as Sicyon. During this pursuit, Iphinoe, one of the daughters of Proetus, died, but the two others were cured by Melampus by means of purifications, and were then married to Melampus and Bias. There was a tradition that Proetus had founded a sanctuary of Hera, between Sicyon and Titane, and one of Apollo at Sicyon (Paus. ii. 7. § 7, 12. § 1). The place where the cure was effected upon his daughters is by some identified with the well mentioned by Strabo (Strab. viii. p. 486), others, the well Cleitor in Arcadian (Or. Met. xvi. 325), or Lusi in Arcadia (Paus. viii. 18. § 3). Some even state that the Proctides were cured by Asclepius. (Pind. Pyth. ii. 96.)

Besides these daughters, Proetus had a son, Megapenthes (Apollod. ii. 2. § 2; comp. Mega- penthes). When Bellerophontes came to Proetus to be purified of a murder which he had committed, the wife of Proetus fell in love with him, and invited him to come to her: but, as Bellerophontes refused to comply with her desire, she charged him before Proetus with having made improper proposals to her. Proetus then sent Bellerophontes to Jobates in Lyicia, with a letter in which Jobates desired to murder Bellerophontes. (Hom. Il. vii. 157, &c.; comp. Apollod. ii. 3. § 1; Tzetza, ad Lyce. 17; comp. Hipponeos.)

2. A son of Thersander and father of Maera. (Paus. x. 30.; Schol. ad Od. xi. 325.) [L.S.]

PROMACHORNA (Προμαχώρα), i.e. "the protectress of the bay," was a surname of Athena, under which she had a sanctuary on mount Buthrothmos near Hermione. (Paus. ii. 34. § 9.) [L.S.]

PROMACHUS (Προμαχος). 1. One of the Epigoni, was a son of Parthenopeus. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 2; Paus. x. 10. § 4.)

2. A son of Aeon, was killed by Pelias. (Apollod. i. 9. § 7; comp. Pelias.)
3. A son of Alegenor, a Boeotian, fought in the Trojan war. (Hom. II. xiv. 475.)

4. A son of Hercules and brother of Echephron.

(Paus. viii. 42. § 2; comp. ECHEPHRON.)

5. The name Promachus, that is, “the champion,” also occurs as a surname of Hercules at Thbes (Paus. ix. 11. § 2), and of Hermes at Tanagra (ix. 22. § 2). [L.S.]

PROMA THIDIES (Προμαθίδες), of Heraclea, wrote a work entitled Ἡμαλάων, which treated of mythological subjects (Athen. vii. p. 296, b.). Besides this work, which must have been in poetry, Prometheus also wrote other works in prose, among which was one on the history of his native town. Athenaus quotes his account of the cup-of-Nestor (Athen. xi. p. 439, b.; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 1126, ii. 815, 847, 913, 931; Steph. Byz. a. v. Γᾶλαλος). Promathides is placed by Pausan a little before the time of Augustus. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 492, ed. Westermann.)

PROMETHEUS (Προμηθές), is sometimes called a Titan, though in reality he did not belong to the Titans, but was only a son of the Titan Iapetus (whence he is designated by the patronymic Πατηρωμαθιδίς, Hes. Theog. 528; Apollon Rhod. i. 1067), by Clymene, so that he was a brother of Atlas, Menoetius, and Epimetheus (Hes. Theog. 507). His name signifies “forethought,” as that of his brother Epimetheus denotes “afterthought.” Others call Prometheus a son of Theemis (Aeschyl. Prom. 19), or of Uranus and Clymene, or of the Titan Teverus and Hem (Herod. Congr. 26; Lyc. Oeum. 1283; Pausian. ad Hom. p. 987). By Pandora, Hesione, or Axiopha, he is said to have been the father of Deucalion (Aesch. Prom. 560; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 1283; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1066), by Pyrrha or Clymene he begot Hellen (and according to some also Deucalion; Schol. ad Apollon. l.c.; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. i. 68), and by Celeno he was the father of Lycur and Chimaerus (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 132, 219), while Herodotus (iv. 45) calls his wife Asia. The following is an outline of the legends related of him by the ancients. Once in the reign of Zeus, when gods and men were disputing with one another at Mecone (afterwards Sicyon, Schol. ad Pind. Nem. i. 123), Prometheus, with a view to deceive Zeus and rival him in prudence, cut up a bull and divided it into two parts: he wrapped up the best parts and the intestines in the skin, and at the top he placed the stomach, which is one of the worst parts, while the second heap consisted of the bones covered with fat. When Zeus pointed out to him how badly he had made the division, Prometheus desired him to choose, but Zeus, in his anger, and seeing through the stratagem of Prometheus, chose the heap of bones covered with the fat. The father of the gods avenged himself by withholding fire from mortals, but Prometheus stole it in a hollow tube (forkula, ραψης, Aeschyl. Prom. 110). Zeus now, in order to punish men, caused Hephæstus to mould a virgin, Pandora, of earth, whom Athena adorned with all the charms calculated to entice mortals; Prometheus himself was put in chains, and fastened to a pillar, where an eagle sent by Zeus consumed in the daytime his liver, which, in every succeeding night, was restored again. Prometheus was thus exposed to perpetual torture, but Heraclæ killed the eagle and delivered the sufferer, with the consent of Zeus, who thus had an opportunity of allowing his son to gain immortal fame (Hes. Theog. 521, &c., Op. et Dies. 47, &c.; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 15; Apollod. ii. 5. § 11). Prometheus had cautioned his brother Epimetheus against accepting any present from Zeus, but Epimetheus, disregarding the advice, accepted Pandora, who was sent to him by Zeus, through the mediation of Hermes. Pandora then lifted the lid of the vessel in which the foresight of Prometheus had concealed all the evils which might torment mortals in life. Diseases and sufferings of every kind now issued forth, but deceitful hope alone remained behind (Hes. Op. et Dies. 83, &c.; comp. Hornt. Carm. 89, 102). The following is an outline of the legend about Prometheus, as contained in the poems of Hesiod. Aeschylus, in his trilogy Prometheus, added various new features to it, for, according to him, Prometheus himself is an immortal god, the friend of the human race, the giver of fire, the inventor of the useful arts, an omniscient seer, an heroic sufferer, who is overcome by the superior power of Zeus, but will not bend his inflexible mind. Although he himself belonged to the Titans, he is nevertheless represented as having assisted Zeus against the Titans (Prom. 218), and he is further said to have opened the head of Zeus when the latter gave birth to Athena (Apollod. i. 3. § 6). But when Zeus succeeded to the kingdom of heaven, and wanted to extirpate the whole race of man, the place of which he proposed to give to quite a new race of beings, Prometheus prevented the execution of the scheme, and saved the human race from destruction (Prom. 229, 230). He deprived them of their knowledge of the future, and gave them hope instead (248, &c.). He further taught them the use of fire, made them acquainted with architecture, astronomy, mathematics, the art of writing, the treatment of domestic animals, navigation, medicine, the art of prophecy, working in metal, and all the other arts (252, 445, &c., 480, &c.). But, as in all these things he had acted contrary to the will of Zeus, the latter ordered Hephæstus to chain him to a rock in Scythia, which was done in the presence of Cnatos and Bis, two ministers of Zeus. In Scythia he was visited by the Oceanides; Ia also came to him, and he foretold her the wanderings and sufferings which were yet in store for her, as well as her final relief (703, &c.). Hermes then likewise appears, and desires him to make known a prophecy which was of great importance to Zeus, for Prometheus knew that by a certain woman Zeus would beget a son, who was to dethrone his father, and Zeus wanted to have a more accurate knowledge of the future of fate. But Prometheus steadfastly refused to reveal the decree of fate, whereupon Zeus, by a thunderbolt, sent Prometheus, together with the rock to which he was chained, into Tartarus (Hornt. Carm. ii. 18, 35). After a lapse of time, Prometheus returned to the upper world, to endure a fresh course of suffering, for he was now fastened to mount Caucasus, and tormented by an eagle, which every day, or every third day, devoured his liver, which was restored again in the night (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1247, &c.; iii. 653; Strab. xv. p. 688; Philostr. Vit. Apoll. ii. 3; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 15; Aeschyl. Prom. 1015, &c.). This state of suffering was to last until some other god, of his own accord, should take his place, and descend into Tartarus for him (Prom. 1025). This came to pass when Cheiron, who had been incurably wounded by an arrow of Hercules, desired to go into Hades ; and Zeus allowed him to supply the place of Prometheus (Apollod. ii. 5. § 4 ; comp. Hes. Theog.). According to others, however, Zeus himself delivered Prometheus, when at length the Titan was prevailed upon to reveal to Zeus the decree of fate, that, if he should become by Thetis the father of a son, that son should deprive him of the sovereignty. (Serv. ad Virg. Ecl. vi. 42; Apollod. iii. 18. § 5 ; Hygin. Fab. 54 ; comp. Aeschy. Prom. 167, sq. 376.)

There was also an account, stating that Pro- metheus had created men out of earth and water, at the very beginning of the human race, or after the flood of Deucalion, when Zeus is said to have ordered him and Athena to make men out of the mud, and the winds to breathe life into them (Apollod. i. 7. § 1 ; Ov. Met. i. 81 ; Etym. Mag. s. v. Προμηθέας). Prometheus is said to have given to men something of all the qualities possessed by the other animals (Horat. Carm. i. 16. 18). The kind of earth out of which Prometheus formed men was shown in later times near Panopeus in Phocis (Paus. x. 4. § 9), and it was at his suggestion that Deucalion, when the flood approached, built a ship, and carried into it provisions, that he and Pyrrha might be able to support themselves during the calamity (Apollod. i. 7. § 2). Prometheus, in the legend, often appears in connection with Athena, e.g., he is said to have been punished on Mount Caucasus for the criminal love he entertained for her (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1249) ; and he is further said, with her assistance, to have ascended into heaven, and there secretly to have lighted his torch at the chariot of Helios, in order to bring down the fire to man (Serv. ad Virg. Aen. vi. 42).

At Athens Prometheus had a sanctuary in the Academy, from whence a torch-race took place in honour of him (Paus. i. 50. § 2 ; Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 53 ; Harpocrat. s. v. Ανατραίς). The myths of Prometheus are most minutely discussed by Welcker, in his Aeschyli Thespie Theatri (Darmstadt, 1824) ; by Vöckler, Mythologie des Iapet. Geschlechtes, 1824 ; and with especial reference to the Prometheus of Aeschylus, by Schoemann, Des Aeschylus Geseffelser Prometheus, Greifswald 1844, and by Blakie, in the Class. Mus. vol. v. p. 1, &c., which contain a very sound explanation of the myths, as developed by Aeschylus. [L. S.]

PRONAEA (Προναία), a surname of Athena, under which she had a chapel at Delphi, in front of the temple of Apollo. (Herod. i. 92 ; Aeschy. Eum. 21 ; Paus. ix. 10. § 2.) Pronaea also occurs as a surname of Hercules. (Paus. l. c.) [L. S.]

PRONAPIDES (Προναπίδης), a various reading is Προναπίδης), an Athenian, is said to have been the teacher of Homer. (Tzetzes, Chil. v. 634.) He is enumerated among those who used the Pelasgic letters, before the introduction of the Phoenician, and is characterised as a graceful composer of song. (Diod. iii. 66.) Tatian (Orat. ad Graec. c. 62) mentions, among the early Greek writers, one Pro- nauides, an Athenian, who lived with Herodotus, in his edition of Tatian, plausibly conjectures he be Pronaes. According to the Scholiast on Theodosius the Gram- mariam, Pronapides invented the mode of writing from left to right now in use, as contradistinguished from the στυλόφων, the βουστροφώδης, and other methods. (Bekker, Anecd. Graec. 786. 17 ; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 217.) [W. M. G.]

PRONAX (Πρόναξ), a son of Talus and Lysi- maech, and a brother of Acrisius and Eriphyle, VOL. III.

He was the father of Lycurgus and Amphithemis (Apollod. i. 7. § 13). According to some traditions the Nemean games were instituted in honour of Pronax. (Aelian, V. H. iv. 5 ; comp. Paus. iii. 12. § 7.) [L. S.]

PRONOE (Πρόνοη), the name of three mythical persons, one a Nereid (Hes. Theog. 261), the second a daughter of Phorbas, and mother of Pleroun and Calydon, by Aetolas (Apollod. i. 7. § 7), and the third a Naiad. (Conon, c. 2.) [L. S.]

PRONOMUS (Πρόνομος), of Thebes, the son of Oenias, was one of the most distinguished aulic musicians of Greece at the time of the Peloponnesian War (Epigr. Incert. 212, Brunck, Anuml. vol. iii. p. 194). He was the instructor of Alcibiades in flute-playing. (Ath. iv. p. 184, d.) He invented a new sort of flute, the compass of which was such, that melodies could be played upon it in all the three modes of music, the Dorian, the Phrygian, and the Lydian, for each of which, before this invention, a separate flute had been necessary. (Paus. ix. 12. § 4. s. 5, 6 ; Ath. xiv. p. 631, e.)

One very celebrated composition of his was a Delian prosodia (that is, a prelude to be played as the sacred embassy to Delos approached the temple), which he made for the people of Chalcis in Ionia. (Paus. l. c.) His melodies were brought forward, in competition with those of Sacadas, the Argive, in the musical contests which formed a part of the festivities celebrated at the foundation of Messene by Epaminondas (Paus. iv. 27. § 4. a. 7). Another proof of the high esteem in which he was held by his fellow-citizens was afforded by their erection of his statue near that of Epaminondas, in the temple of Apollo Spodius, at Thebes (Paus. ix. 12. § 4. s. 5, 6). He is mentioned once by Aristophanes (Eccles. 102, comp. Schol. and Suid. s. c.), but only to hang a jest on his long beard. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 136 ; Ulrici, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichthl. vol. ii. p. 76 ; Bode, Gescht. d. Hellen. Dichthl. vol. ii. pt. i. pp. 43, n. 3, 207, 314, pt. ii. pp. 192, 236, 351.) [P. S.]

PRONOPUS (Πρόνοπος). 1. A son of Phaeus, and brother of Agenor in Psophis, slew Alceaeus. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 6 ; comp. AGENOR and AL- MARON ; Schol. ad Thuc. i. 3.)

2. A Trojan who was slain by Patroclus. (Horn. II. xvi. 399.) [L. S.]

PRONUBA, a surname of Juno among the Romans, describing her as the deity presiding over marriage. (Virg. Aen. iv. 166, vii. 319 ; Or. Hor. vi. 43.) [L. S.]

PROPERTIUS, SEX. Aurelius. (The agnom, NAUTA, found in some Codices and early editions, seems to have been derived from a corrupt reading of ii. 34. 38.) The materials for a life of Propertius are meagre and unsatisfactory, consisting almost entirely of the inferences which may be drawn from hints scattered in his writings. We know neither the place nor date of his birth. He tells us that he was a native of Umbria, when it borders on Etruria, but nowhere mentions the exact spot. Conjecture has assigned it, among other towns, to Mevania, Ameria, Hispalium, and Assium ; of which one of the two last seems entitled to the preference. The date of his birth has been variously placed between the years of Rome 697 and 708 (b. c. 57 to 46). Lachmann, however, was the first who placed it so low as b. c. 48 or 47 ; and the latest date (b. c. 46) is that of Hertzberg, the recent German editor. The latter's computation proceeds on very strained inferences, which we have not space to discuss; but it may possibly be sufficient to state that one of his results is to place the tenth elegy of the second book, in which Propertius talks about his extremas actus (v. 6) in n. c. 25, when, according to Hertzberg, he was one-and-twenty! For several reasons, too long to be here adduced, it might be shown that the year assigned by Mr. Clinton, namely, n. c. 31, is a much more probable one, and agrees better with the relative ages of Propertius and Ovid. We know that the latter was born in n. c. 43, so that he would have been eight years younger than Propertius: a difference which would entitle him to call Propertius his predecessor, whilst at the same time it would not prevent the two poets from being sodales (Ov. Trist. iv. 10. 45).

Propertius was not descended from a family of any distinction (ii. 24. 37), nor can the inference that it was equestrian be sustained from the mention of the aurea bulla (iv. 1. 131), which was the common ornament of all children who were ingenues, (Cic. in Verr. i. 1. 58, with the note of Asconius; Macro. l. 6.) The paternal estate, however, seems to have been sufficiently ample (Nam tua versuserat cum multis rura juventi, iv. 1. 129); but of this he was deprived by an agrarian division, probably that in n. c. 36, after his father's death, and this thrown into an oppressive poverty (in tenuissimis egeris ipse Lores, ib. 1. 128). At the time of this misfortune he had not yet assumed the toga virilis, and was therefore under sixteen years of age. He had already lost his father, who, it has been conjectured, was one of the victims sacrificed after the taking of Perusia; but this notion does not rest on any satisfactory grounds. The elegy on which it is founded (i. 21) refers to a kinsman named Gallus. We have no account of Propertius's education; but from the elegy before quoted (iv. 1) it would seem that he was destined to be an advocate, but abandoned the profession for that of poetry. That he was carefully instructed appears from the learning displayed in his writings, and which was probably acquired altogether at Rome; the smallness of his means having prevented him from finishing his education at Athens, as was then commonly done by the wealthy Romans. At all events, it is plain from the sixth elegy of the first book, written after his connection with Cynthia had begun, that he had not then visited Greece. In the twenty-first elegy of the third book he meditates a journey thither, probably at the time when he had quarrelled with his mistress; but whether he ever carried the design into execution we have no means of knowing.

The history of Propertius's life, so far as it is known to us, is the history of his amours, nor can it be said how much of these is fiction. He was, what has been called in modern times "a man of wit and pleasure about town"; nor in the few particulars of his life which he communicates in the first elegy of the fourth book, does he drop the slightest hint of his ever having been engaged in any serious or useful employment. He began to write poetry at a very early age, and the merit of his productions soon attracted the attention and patronage of Maecenas. This was most probably shortly after the final discomfiture and death of Antony in n. c. 30, when, according to the com-and he has been followed by Barth and other critics. Masson's reasons for fixing on that year are that none of his elegies can be assigned to a later date than b. c. 16; and that Ovid twice mentions him in his Ars Amatoria (iii. 333 and 536) in a way that shows him to have been dead. The first of these proves nothing. It does not follow that Propertius ceased to live because he ceased to write; or that he ceased to write because nothing later has been preserved. The latter assertion, too, is not indisputable. There are no means of fixing the dates of several of his pieces; and Ep. iv. 6, which alludes to Caius and Lucius, the grandsons of Augustus (l. 92), was probably written considerably after n. c. 15. (Clinton, E. H. n. c. 26.)

With regard to Masson's second reason, the passages in the Ars Am. by no means show that Propertius was dead; and even if they did, it would be a strange method of proving a man defunct in b. c. 15, because he was so in n. c. 2. Masson's own date for the publication of that poem!

Propertius resided on the Esquiline, near the gardens of Maecenas. He seems to have cultivated the friendship of his brother poets, as Ponticus, Bassus, Ovid, and others. He mentions Virgil (ii. 34. 63) in a way that shows he had heard parts of the Aeneid privately recited. But though he belonged to the circle of Maecenas, he never once mentions Horace. He is equally silent about Tibullus.

His not mentioning Ovid is best explained by the difference in their ages; for Ovid alludes more than once to Propertius, and with evident affection.

In 1722, a stone, bearing a heading and two inscriptions, one to Propertius, and one to a certain Cominius, was pretended to be discovered at Spello, the ancient Hispellum, in the palace of Theresa Grilli, Princess Papamilla. Though the genuineness of this monument was maintained by Montfaucon and other antiquarians, as well as by several eminent critics, later researches have shown the inscription of Propertius's name to be a forgery. The same stone, discovered in the same place, was known to be extant in the previous century, but bearing only the inscription to Cominius. (See the authorities adduced by Hertzberg, Quaest. Propert. vol. i. p. 4.)

As an elegiac poet, a high rank must be awarded to Propertius, and among the ancients it was a most point whether the preference should be given to him or to Tibullus. (Quint. x. 1. § 93.) His genius, however, did not fit him for the sublimer flights of poetry, and he had the good sense to refrain from attempting them. (iii. 3. 15, &c.) Though he excels Ovid in warmth of passion, he never indulges in the grossness which disfigures some of the latter's compositions. It must, however, be confessed that, to the modern reader, the elegies of Propertius are not nearly so attractive as those of Tibullus. This arises partly from their obscurity, but in a great measure also from a certain want of nature in them. Muretus, in an admirable parallel of Tibullus and Propertius, in the preface to his Scholia on the latter, though he does not finally adjudicate the respective claims of the two poets, has very happily expressed the difference between them in the following terms:—

"Ilum (Tibullum) judices simplicius scripsisse quae cogitaret: hunc (Propertium) diligentius cogitasse quid scriberet. In illo plus natura, in hoc plus curae atque industriae perspicacia." The fault

Cum mihi sommus ab exequios penderet amoris,
Et quererer lecti frigida regna mei.

That Propertius married, probably after Cynthis's death, and left legitimate issue, may be inferred from the younger Pliny, twice mentioning Passienus Paulus, a splendidissimus eques Romanus, as descended from him. (Ep. vi. 15, and ix. 22.) This must have been through the female line. The year of Propertius's death is altogether unknown. Masson placed it in n. c. 15 (Vit. Ovid. a. u. c. 739), of Propertius was too pedantic an imitation of the Greeks. His whole ambition was to become the Roman Callimachus (iv. 1. 63), whom, as well as Philetas and other of the Greek elegiac poets, he made his model. He abounds with obscure Greek myths, as well as Greek forms of expression, and the same pedantry infects even his versification. Tibullus generally, and Ovid almost invariably, close their pentameter with a word contained in an iambic foot; Propertius, especially in his first book, frequently ends with a word of three, four, or even five syllables. P. Burmann, and after him Paldamus, have pretended to discover that this termination is favourable to pathos; but Propertius's motive for adopting it may more probably be attributed to his close, not to say servile, imitation of the Greeks.

The obscure truth Propertius, which is such that Jos. Scaliger (Castigationes in Propertius, p. 169, Steph. 1537) did not hesitate to say that the second book was almost wholly unintelligible, is not owing solely to his recondite learning, and to the studied brevity and precision of his style, but also to the very corrupt state in which his text has come down to us. Alexander ab Alexandro (Genial. Dial. ii. 1) relates, on the authority of Pontanus, that the Codex Archeytus was found under some casks in a wine cellar, in a very imperfect and illegible condition, when Pontanus, who was born in 1426, was a mere youth. This story was adopted by Jos. Scaliger (Ibid. p. 168), who, assuming as well the recklessness and negligence of the first transcriber, introduced many altertions and transpositions, which were adopted by subsequent critics to the age of Broukhius and Burmann. Van Santen, in the preface to his edition, published at Amsterdam, in 1700, was the first to question the truth of the story related by Alexander (p. x. &c.), chiefly on the grounds that there is extant a MS. of Propertius, with an inscription by Puccius, dated in 1502, in which he mentions having collated it with a codex which had belonged to B. Valla, and which he styles antiquissimus: an epitater he could not have applied to any copy of the MS. alluded to by Alexander. That this codex of Valla's was not that found in the wine cellar is shown by an annotation of Ant. Perreius, in a copy of Catullus, Tibullus, and Propertius, dated in the early part of the sixteenth century, in which he distinguishes them. It may be observed that this reasoning allows that there was such a MS. as that mentioned by Alexander, who, however, does not say that it belonged to Pontanus. But though Van Santen's arguments do not seem quite conclusive, they have been adopted by most modern critics; and have been further strengthened by the observation that Petrucho, who flourished most near the time of the poet, ought, if the passage from Propertius (iii. 34. 65) just as it is now read, in his fictitious letters (the 2d to Cicero); and that one at least of the MSS. now extant (the Guelferbytanus or Neapolitan) is undoubtedly as old as the thirteenth century. Whatever may be the merits of this question, it cannot be doubted that the MS. from which our copies are derived was very corrupt; a fact which the followers of Van Santen do not pretend to deny.

The Edito Princeps of Propertius was printed in 1472, fol.; it is uncertain at what place. There is another edition of the same date in small 4to. The text was early illustrated and amended by the care of Beroaldus, Jos. Scaliger, Marcetus, Passerat, and other critics. The works of Propertius have been often printed with those of Catullus and Tibullus. The following are the best separate editions:— By Broukhiusius, Amsterdam, 1702, sm. 4to. By Vulpis, Padua, 1755, 2 vols. 4to. By Barntius, Leipzig, 1778, 8vo. By Burmann, Utrecht, 1780, 4to. This edition appeared after Burmann's death, edited by Santenius. By Kuinoel, Leipzig, 1804, 2 vols. 8vo. By Lachmann, Leipzig, 1816, 8vo. This edition is chiefly critical. Many conjectures are introduced into the text, and the second book is divided into two, at the tenth elegy, on insufficient grounds. By Paldamus, Halle, 1837, 8vo. By Le Maire, Paris, 1832, 8vo, forming part of the Bibliotheca Latina. By Hertzberg, Halle, 1844—5, 4 thin vols. 8vo. The commentary is ample, but prolix, and often fanciful and inconclusive.

Propertius has been translated into French by St. Amand, Bourges et Paris, 1819, with the Latin text; into German by Hertzzierr, Stuttgartd, 1833 (Metzler's Collection); into Italian terza rima by Bacello, Verona, 1742. There is no complete English translation, but there is a correct, though rugged, version of the first book, accompanied with the Latin text, anonymous, London 1781.

PROPERTIUS CELER, a man of praetorian rank in the reign of Tiberius, begged to be allowed to resign his senatorial rank on account of his poverty, but received from the emperor instead a million of sestertii, in order to support his dignity. (Tac. Ann. i. 75.)

PROPINQUIUS, POMPEIUS, the procurator of the province of Belgica, at the death of Nero, A. D. 68, was slain in the following year, when the troops proclaimed Vitellius emperor (Tac. Hist. i. 12. 58).

PROSIPA [Postverba.]

PROSE/PRINA. [Persiphone.]

PROSPER, surnamed Aquisitanus or Aquitanicus, from the country of his birth, flourished during the first half of the fifth century. Regarding his family and education no records have been preserved; but in early life he settled in Provence, and there became intimately associated with a certain Hilarius, who, to avoid confusion, is usually distinguished as Hilarius Prosperi or Prosperianus. The two friends displayed great zeal in defending the doctrines of Augustin against the attacks of the Semipelagians who were making inroads upon the orthodoxy of Southern Gaul, and having opened a correspondence with the bishop of Hippo, they received in reply the two tracts still extant under the titles De Praedestinatione Sanctorum, and De Dono Perseverantiae. Finding that, notwithstanding these exertions, their antagonists were still active and successful, they next undertook a journey to Rome, where they submitted the whole controversy to Pope Coelestinus, and induced him by their representations to publish, in A. D. 431, his well-known Epistolae ad Episcopos Gallorum, in which he denounces the heresy of Cassianus, and warns all the dignitaries of the church to prohibit their presbyters from entertaining and disseminatingtenets so dangerous. Armed with this authority, Prosper returned home, and, from the numerous controversial tracts composed by him about this period, appears to have prosecuted his labours with unflagging enthusiasm. Soon after, however, he disappears from history, and we know nothing certain with regard either to his subsequent career or to the date of his death. In the chronicle of A[. D. 830] he is spoken of as the Notarius of Pope Leo, and in some MSS. is styled Episcopus Rheginensis (i. e. Ries in Provence), but ecclesiastical historians agree in believing that Prosper of Aquitaine had no claim to these titles.

The works usually ascribed to this writer may be divided into three classes:—I. Theological. II. Historical. III. Poetical.

I. Theological.—1. Epistola ad Augustinum de Reliquiis Pelagianae Haeresis in Gallia. Written between a. d. 427—429, and considered of importance in affording materials for the history of Semi-pelagianism. 2. Epistola ad Rufinum de Gratia et Libero Arbitrio. Written while Augustine was still alive, and therefore not later than the middle of the year a. d. 430. 3. Pro Augustino Responsiones ad Capitula Operationis Collegorum calumniantem. Written about a. d. 431. 4. Pro Augustino Doctrina Responsiones ad Capitula Operationis Vincentiarnun. Written, probably, soon after the preceding. 5. Pro Augustino Responsiones ad Esolicited qua de Genuesi Civitate sunt nissu, Belonging to the same epoch as the two preceding. 6. De Gratia Dei et Libero Arbitrio Liber. In reply to the doctrines of Cassianus respecting Free-will, as laid down in the thirteenth of his Collationes Patrum [Cassianus], whence the piece is frequently entitled De Gratia Dei adversus Collatorum. Written about a. d. 432. 7. Psalmorum a C. usque ad CL. Expositio, assigned by the Benedictine editors to a. d. 433, but placed by Schoene- mann and others before a. d. 424. 8. Sententiarum et Operow S. Augustini ex Collectarum Libros. Compiled about a. d. 451. The whole of the above will be found in the Benedictine edition of the works of Augustin; the epistle is numbered Lxxxi, and is placed immediately before another upon the same subject by Hilarinus; the remaining tracts are all included in the Appendix to vol. x.

The authenticity of the following is very doubtful:—1. Confessio. Sometimes ascribed to Prosper Aquitanicus, sometimes to Prosper Tyro. It was first published from a Vatican MS. by Sirmont (V. Par. 1619), in a volume containing also the Opuscula of Eugenius, bishop of Toledo, together with some poems by Draconis and others. See also the collected works of Sirmont, Paris, 1639, vol. ii. p. 913. 2. De Vocatione Gentium Libri duo. Ascribed in some MSS. to Ambrose. Great diversity of opinion exists with regard to the real author. Erasmus would assign it to Eucherius, bishop of Lyons, Vossius to Hilarius Prosperi, Quesnel to Leo the Great. The whole question is fully discussed by Antelsius, in an essay, of which the title is given at the end of this article, and by the brothers Ballerini in their edition of the works of Leo, vol. ii. p. 662 [Leo]. Those who assign it to Prosper suppose it to have been written about a. d. 440, while the Ballerini bring it down as low as 496. 3. Ad Sacram Virginem Demetrias, etc. Epistola i. De Humilitate Christiana Tractus, supposed to have been written about a. d. 440. It is placed among the letters of Ambrose (Ixxxiv. in the earlier editions of that father, claimed for Prosper by Sollevi and Antelmius, chiefly on account of the fancied resemblance in style, and given by Quesnel to Leo the Great. See the edition of the works of Leo by the Ballerini, vol. ii. p. 743. 4. Praedicatorum Seds Apostolicae

II. Historical.—Two, perhaps we should say three, chronicles are extant bearing the name of Prosper. It will be convenient to describe them separately according to the titles by which they are usually discriminated.

1. Chronicon Consularum, extending from a. d. 379, the date at which the chronicle of Jerome ends, down to a. d. 455, the events being arranged according to the years of the Roman consuls. We find short notices with regard to the Roman emperors, the Roman bishops, and political occurrences in general, but the troubles of the Church are especially dwelt upon, and above all the Pelagian heresy. In the earlier editions this chronicle ended with the year a. d. 444, but appeared in its complete form in the Historiae Francorum Scriptores Cocutae of Andrew Du Chesne, fol. Par. 1656—1649. Riessler refers from internal evidence to the conclusion that it was originally brought down by Prosper to a. d. 433, and that subsequently two additions were made to it, either by himself or by some other hand, the one reaching to a. d. 444, the other to a. d. 455. We ought to observe also that, as might be expected in a work of this nature, we find it in some MSS. continued still further, while in others it is presented in a compressed and mutilated form.

2. Chronicon Imperiale, called also Chronicon Plioboeanum, because first made known by Peter Pithou, in 1588. It is comprehended within precisely the same limits as the preceding (a. d. 379—455), but the computations proceed according to the years of the Roman emperors, and not according to the consuls. While it agrees with the Chronicon Consular in its general plan, it differs from it in many particulars, especially in the very brief allusions to the Pelagian controversy, and in the slight, almost disrespectful notices of Augustine. It is, moreover, much less accurate in its chronology, and is altogether to be regarded as inferior in authority.

The singular coincidence with regard to the period embraced by these two chronicles, a coincidence which, however, in some degree disappears if we adopt the hypothesis of Rössler, would lead us to believe that they proceeded from the same source; but, on the other hand, the difference of arrangement, and the want of harmony in details, would lead to an opposite conclusion. Hence, while the greater number of critics agree in regarding the Chronicon Aquitanicus as the former of the first, not a few are inclined to make over the second to Prosper Tyro, who, it is imagined, flourished in the sixth century. It must be remembered, at the same time, that the existence of this second Prosper as a personage distinct from the antagonist of the Semipelagians, has never been clearly demonstrated, and consequently all statements regarding him must be received with caution and distrust.

N N 3

3. Labbe, in his \textit{Nora Bibliotheca MSS. Librorum}, fol. Paris, 1657, published the Chronicon Consular, with another chronicle prefixed, commencing with Adam, and reaching down to the point where the Consular begins. This was pronounced by Labbe to be the complete work as it issued from the hands of Prosper, the portion previously known having been, upon this supposition, detached from the rest, for the sake of being tacked as a supplement to the chronicle of Jerome. The form and style, however, of the earlier section are so completely different from the remainder, that the opinion of Labbe has found little favour with critics.

For full information with regard to these chronicles, and the various opinions which have been broached as to their origin, we may refer to Roncalli, \textit{Vetust. Lat. Script. Chroniconum}, 4to. Patav. 1787; Rössler, \textit{Chronica Medii Aevi}, Tübingen. 1793; Graevius, \textit{Thesaurus, Antiq. Rom.} vol. xi.

III. \textsc{Poetical.} Among the works of the Christian poets which form the fifth volume of the \textit{"Collectio Pisaurensis"} (4to. Pisan. 1766), the following are attributed to Prosper Aquitanicus, but we must premise that they have been collected from many different sources, that they unquestionably are not all from the same pen, and that it is very difficult to decide whether we are to regard Prosper Aquitanus and Prosper Tiro, the latter name being prefixed to several of these pieces in the MSS., as the same or as distinct individuals.

1. \textit{Exsistentis S. Augustini Epigrammatum Liber unus}, a series of one hundred and six epigrams in elegiac verse, on various topics connected with speculative, dogmatical, and practical theology, and with morals. Thus the third is \textit{De Esenien Dei tatis}, the thirty-ninth \textit{De Justitia et Gratia}, the twenty-second \textit{De diligendo Deum}, the hundred and fifth \textit{De colibienda Ira.}

2. \textit{Carmen de Ingratis}, in dactylic hexameters, divided into four parts and forty-five chapters. An introduction is prefixed in five elegiac couplets, of which the first two explain the nature and extent of the poem.

Unde voluntatis sanctae subsistat origo,
Unde animis pias insit, et unde fides.
Adversum ingratos, falsis et virtute superbos,
Centenias decres versibus excolui.

3. \textit{In Obiectatorum S. Augustini Epigramma}, in five elegiac couplets. 4. Another, on the same subject, in six elegiac couplets. 5. \textit{Epitaphium Nestorianae et Pelagianarum haereseon,} in eleven elegiac couplets, in which "Nestoriana Haeresis loquitur." Written after the condemnation of the Nestorians by the council of Ephesus in \textit{A. D. 431.}

6. \textit{Uxorem hortatur ut se totam Deo dedici}, in fifty-three elegiac couplets, with an introduction in sixteen lambic Dimeters Catalectic (Anacreontics). Besides the above there is a \textit{Carmen de Providence divina,} in some editions of Prosper, which is rejected by Antelmius, and made over by some scholars to Hilarius.

The first among the works ascribed to Prosper which issued from the press was the \textit{Epigrammata published at Mayence, 4to. 1494, as \"Epigrammata Sancti Prosperi episcopi regionis de Vitius et Virutibus ex dictis Augustini,\" and reprinted by Aldus, 4to. Venet. 1501, along with other Christian poems. Next appeared the treatise \textit{De Gratia Dei,} printed by Schoefier at Mayence, 4to. 1524, as \"S. Prosperi Presbyteri Aquitanici Libellus adversus inimicos Gratiae Dei contra Collatorum," in a volume containing the epistle of Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, the epistle of Pope Coelestinus, and other authorities upon the same subject. Then followed the \textit{Epistola ad Regiam} and the \textit{Responsiones ad Excortes, &c.} 8vo. Venet. 1538, and soon after Gryphius published at Leyden, fol. 1559, the first edition of the collected works, carefully corrected by the collation of MSS. The edition of Olivarius, 8vo. Duaci, 1577, was long regarded as the standard, but far superior to all others is the Benedietine, fol. Paris, 1711, superintended by Le Brun de Marette and D. Manuget.

Full information with regard to the interminable controversies arising out of the works of Prosper is contained in the notes and dissertations of the Benedictines, in the dissertations of Quenel and the Ballerini in their respective editions of the works of Leo the Great, and in a rare volume \"De veris Operibus SS. Patrum Leonis Magni et Prosperi Aquitanit Dissertatione commentaria, &c.\" 4to. Paris, 1689, by Josephus Antelmius, to which Quenel put forth a reply in the \textit{Epimenedes Parisienses.} viii. and xv. August, 1689, and Antelmius a duplicate in two \textit{Epistolas debus Epistolae P. Quenellii partibus responsoriae,} 4to. Paris, 1690.

(See the works on the Semipelagian heresy referred to in the end of the articles \textit{Cassiodorus} and \textit{Pelagius.})

PROSTATHYUS, a Roman artist in mosaic, of the time of the emperors, whose name is inscribed on a mosaic pavement found at Aventicum (\textit{Avenches}) in Switzerland. (Schmidt, \textit{Antiq. de la Suisse}, pp. 17, 19, 24; R. Rochette, \textit{Lettre à M. Schott}, p. 394.)

PROTAGORAS (Πρωταγόρας), was born at Abdera, according to the concurrent testimony of Plato and several other writers. (\textit{Protag.} p. 309, c. \textit{De Rep.} x. p. 606, c.; \textit{Heracleides Pont. ap. Diog. Laert. ix.} 55; Cicero, \textit{de Nat. Deor. i.} 23, &c.) By the comic poet Eupolis (\textit{op. Diog. Laert. ix.} 50), he is called a Teian (\textit{Tiftos}), probably with reference to the Teian origin of that city (\textit{Herod. i.} 168, &c.), just as Heanteus the Abderite is by Strabo. (See Ed. Geist in a programme of the Paedagogium at Giessen, 1827; comp. Fr. Hermann in the \textit{Schulzeitung,} 1850, ii. p. 509.) In the manifestly corrupted text of the \textit{Pseudo-Galenus} (\textit{de Philos. Hist.} c. 8), he is termed an Elean (compare J. Frei, \textit{Questiones Protagorae}, Bonae, 1845, p. 5). By the one his father is called Ar- temon, by the others Menaedrus or Maeander (\textit{Diog. Laert. ix.} 50, ib. Interp.), whom Philostratus (p. 494), probably confounding him with the father of Democritus, describes as very rich; \textit{Dion. Laert.} (ib. 53) as miserably poor. The well-known story, however, that Protagoras was once a poor porter, and that the skill with which he had fastened together, and poised upon his shoulders, a large bundle of wood, attracted the attention of Democritus, who conceived a liking for him, took him under his care, and instructed him (\textit{Epicurum in Diog. Laert. x.} 6, ix. 53; Aul.}
Gellius, N. A. v. 3; comp. Athen. viii. 13, p. 354, c.; — appears to have arisen out of the statement of Aristotle, that Protagoras invented a sort of porter's knot (πόθημα) for the more convenient carrying of burdens (Diog. Laërt. ix. 53; comp. Frei, l. c. p. 6, &c.). Moreover, whether Protagoras was, as later ancient authorities assumed (Diog. Laërt. ix. 50; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 301, d., &c.), a disciple of Democritus, with whom in point of doctrine he had absolutely nothing in common, is very doubtful, and Frei (l. c. p. 24, &c.) has undertaken to show that Protagoras was some twenty years older than Democritus. If, in fact, Anaxagoras, as is confirmed in various ways, was born about B.C. 500, and was forty years older than Democritus, according to the latter, the latter statement (Diog. Laërt. ix. 51; c. 34), Protagoras must have been older than Democritus, as it is certain that Protagoras was older than Socrates, who was born B.C. 468 (Plat. Protag. p. 317, c., 314, b., 361, e.; comp. Diog. Laërt. ix. 42, 56), and died before him at the age of nearly seventy (Plat. Meno, p. 91, e.; comp. Theod. p. 171, d., 164, e., Euthyph. p. 286, c.; the assumption of others, that he reached the age of ninety years, Diog. Laërt. ix. 55, Schol. in Plat. de Rep. x. p. 600, is of no weight), after he had practised the sophist art for forty years, and had by flight withdrawn himself from the accusation of Pythodorus, one of the Four Hundred, who governed Athens in B.C. 411 (Diog. Laërt. ix. 54; comp. Philostratus, l. c. Aristotle mentioned Euathlus, the disciple of Protagoras, as his accuser, Diog. Laërt. l. c.). Apollodorus, therefore, might very well assign the composition of his Olympian works to the period when he flourished (Diog. Laërt. ix. 54, 56). A more accurate determination of the date of his death, and thence of his birth, cannot be extracted from a fragment of the Sillii of Timon (in Sext. Emp. adv. Math. ix. 57), and a passage of Plato (Theaet. p. 171, d.), as the placing together of Protagoras and Socrates in them does not presuppose that their deaths were contemporaneous. Nor are we justified in concluding from the boastful expression of the sophist (Plat. Prot. p. 317, c.), that he was twenty years older than Socrates. On the other hand, if Euripides alluded to his death in the Ixion (according to Philochorus in Diog. Laërt. ix. 55), he must have died before B.C. 406 or 407, i. e. before the death of Euripides. With preponderating probability, therefore, Frei places the death of Protagoras in B.C. 411, assuming that Pythodorus accused him during the government of the Four Hundred (Quaest. Protag. p. 64), and accordingly assigns about B.C. 480 as the date of his birth.

That Protagoras had already acquired fame during his residence in Abdera cannot be inferred from the doubtful statement, that he was termed by the Abderites λόγος, and Democritus φιλοσοφός or σοφία. (Aelian. Var. Hist. iv. 20; comp. Suid. s. v. Προταγ. Αφίῳς, &c.) Phavorinus, in Diog. Laërt. ix. 50, gives to Protagoras the designation of σοφία. He was the first who called himself a sophist, and taught for pay (Plat. Protag. p. 349, a.; Diog. Laërt. ix. 52). He must have come to Athens before B.C. 443, since, according to the statement of Hermeneides Ponticus (Diog. Laërt. ix. 50), he gave laws to the Thurians, or, what is more probable, adapted for the use of the new colonists, who left Athens for the first time in that year, the laws which had been drawn up at an earlier period by Charondas, for the use of the Chalideic colonies (for according to Diod. xii. 11. 3, and others, these laws were in force at Thurii likewise). Whether he himself removed to Thurii, we do not learn, but at the time of the plague we find him again in Athens, as he could scarcely have mentioned the strength of mind displayed by Pericles at the death of his sons, in the way he does (in a fragment still extant, Plat. de Consol. ad Apoll. c. 33, p. 118, d.), had he not been an eye-witness. He had also, as it appears, returned to Athens after a long absence (Plat. Prot. p. 301, c.), at a time when the sons of Pericles were still alive (ibid. p. 314, e., 329, a.) A somewhat intimate relation between Protagoras and Pericles is intimated also elsewhere. (Plut. Peric. c. 25, p. 172, a.) His activity, however, was by no means restricted to Athens. He had spent some time in Sicily, and acquired fame there (Plat. Hipp. Maj. p. 282, d.), and brought with him to Athens many admirers out of other Greek cities through which he had passed (Plat. Prot. p. 315, a.). The impeachment of Protagoras had been founded on his book on the gods, which began with the statement: “Respecting the gods, I am unable to know whether they exist or do not exist.” (Diog. Laërt. ix. 51, &c.) The impeachment was followed by his banishment (Diog. Laërt. ix. 52; Cl. de Nat. Doctr. i. 23; Euseb. Praep. Evang. xiv. 19, &c.), or, as others affirm, only by the burning of his book. (Philostr. Vit. Soph. l. c.; Joseph. ap. Apian. ii. 37; Sext. Emp. adv. Math. ix. 56; Cl. Diog. Laërt. ix. 56.) Frei places the death of the sophists of Argos which Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 55) doubtless borrowed from one of his Alexandrine authorities (he describes them as still extant, ἅπατα τα σαφήμενα αδρότως βεβαιά τοιαύτα; comp. Welecker's account of Prodikos, in his Kleine Schriften, ii. p. 447, 465), and which he gives probably with his accustomed negligence, one may see that they comprised very different subjects:—ethics (περὶ ἄρτενων καὶ τῶν οὐκ οὕτως τῶν ἄνθρωπων πρασολογίων, πειράτους), politics (περὶ πολιτικῶν, πείρας τῆς ἐν ἀρχῇ καταστάσεως), &c.; comp. Frei, p. 182, &c., rhetoric (ἀριστογένους δου, τέχνης ἐφικτικαί), and other subjects of different kinds (προστακτικός, περὶ μαθημάτων, περὶ μάθης, περὶ τῶν ἐν Ἀθήναις). The works which, in all probability, were the most important of those which Protagoras composed, Truth (Ἀλήθεια), and On the Gods (Περὶ Θεῶν), are omitted in that list, although in another passage (ix. 51) Diogenes Laërtius refers to them. The first contained the theory refuted by Plato in the Theaetetus (Theaet. p. 161, c., 162, a., 166, c., 170, e.), and was probably identical with the work on the Existents (Περὶ τῶν ὄστρον), attributed to Protagoras by Porphyrius (in Euseb. Praep. Evang. x. 3, p. 468, Viger). This work was directed against the Eutici (Περὶ τῶν ἐν τῷ τὸν ἐν λέγοντα, and was still extant in the time of Porphyrius, who describes the argumentation of the book as similar to that of Plato, though without adding any more exact statements. With the doctrine that was peculiar to Protagoras we obtain the most complete acquaintance from the Theaetetus of Plato, which was designed to refute it, and the fidelity of the quotations in which is confirmed by the much more scanty notices of Sextus Empiricus and others. The sophist started from the fundamental presup-

position of Heraclitus, that every thing is motion, and nothing beyond or beyond it, and that out of it every thing comes into existence; that nothing at any time exists, but that everything is perpetually becoming (Plat. Theat. pp. 156, 152; Sextus Empiricus inaccurately attributes to him matter in a perpetual state of flux, ἄην ἄωστη, Pyrrhon. Hyp. i. 217, 218). He then distinguished two principal kinds of the infinitely manifold motions, an active and a passive; but premised that the motion which in one conjunction manifested itself actively, will in another appear as passive, so that the difference is as it were a fluctuating, not a permanent one (Theat. pp. 156, 157). From the occurrence of two such motions arise sensation or perception, and that which is felt or perceived, according to the different velocity of the motion; and that in such a way that where there is homogeneity in what thus meets, as between seeing and colour, hearing and sound (ib. p. 150), the definitiveness of the colour and the seeing of it (πτων ἀνεύ, or of something (πτως τυ), or of something (πτως), or to something (πρός τυ), p. 160, b., 156, c., 152, d.; Arist. Metaph. ix. 3; Sext. Emp. Hyp. i. p. 216, 218). Consequently there is or exists for each only that of which he has a sensation, and only that which he perceives is true for him (Theat. p. 152, a., comp. Cratyl. p. 386; Aristocles, in Eusen. Prerp. Evang. xiv. 20; Cic. Acad. ii. 46; Sext. Emp. l.c. and adv. Math. vii. 63, 369, 385, &c.); so that as sensation, like its objects, is engaged in a perpetual change of motion (Theat. p. 152, b.; Sext. Emp. Hyp. i. p. 217, f), opposite assertions might exist, according to the difference of the perception respecting each several object (Arist. Metaph. iv. 5; Diog. Laërt. ix. 3; Clem. Alex. Strom. v. p. 674, a.; Senec. Epist. 38); The conception which he thus discerned, which he drew from the Heraclitean doctrine of eternal Becoming, Protagoras summed up in the well-known proposition: The man is the measure of all things; of the existent that they exist; of the non-existent, that they do not exist (Theat. p. 152, a., 160, d., Cratyl. p. 385, e.; Arist. Metaph. x. 1, xi. 6; Sext. Emp. adv. Math. vii. 60, Pyrrhon. Hyp. i. p. 216; Aristocles, in Eusen. Prerp. Evang. xiv. 20; Diog. Laërt. ix. 51), and understood by the man, the perceiving or sensation-receiving subject. He was compelled, therefore, likewise to admit, that confusion was impossible, since every affirmation, if resting upon sensation or perception, is equally justifiable (Plat. Euthyd. p. 165, d. &c.; Isocr. Helenae Euc. p. 231, &c.; Diog. Laërt. ix. 53); but, notwithstanding the equal truth and justifiableness of opposite affirmations, he endeavoured to establish a distinction of better and worse, referring them to the utility of the objects according to the present subject, and promised to give directions for improving this condition, i.e. for attaining to higher activity (Theat. p. 167; comp. Sext. Emp. Hyp. i. p. 218). Already, before Plato and Aristotle (Metaph. iv. 4, comp. the previously quoted passages), Democritus had applied himself to the confusion of this sensuality of Protagoras, which annihilated existence, knowledge, and all understanding (Plut. adv. Colot. p. 1109, a.; Sext. Emp. adv. Math. viii. 389).

When Protagoras, in his book on the Gods, maintained that we are not able to know whether and how they exist (Timon, in Sext. Emp. adv. Math. ix. 56, comp. 56; Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 1, 12, 23, 42; Diog. Laërt. ix. 51, &c.) To regard the expression, ἀμαλ τινες εἰς, quales sint, as Frei does, l.c. p. 98, as a foreign addition, seems to me to involve difficulties, he probably could only have in mind the mutually opposed statements on the point, and must himself have been disposed to a denial as he could scarcely have been conscious of a corresponding sensation or perception.

It is not every pleasure, but only pleasure in the beautiful, to which Protagoras, in the dialogue which bears his name (p. 351, b.), allows moral worth; and he refers virtue to a certain sense of shame (αἰδός) implanted in man by nature, and a certain conscious feeling of justice (δίκη), which are to serve the purpose of securing the bonds of connection in private and political life (ibid. p. 322, c., &c.) and, accordingly, explains how they are developed by means of activity (ἐνέργεια), by laws (p. 325, c., &c., comp. 340, c). He is not able, however, to define more exactly the difference between the beautiful and the pleasant, and at last again contents himself with affirming that pleasure or enjoyment is the proper aim of the good (p. 354, &c.). In just as confused a manner does he express himself with respect to the virtues, of which he admits five (holiness, δυναμή, and four others), and with regard to which he maintains that they are distinguished from each other in the same way as the parts of the countenance (ib. p. 349, b., 329, c., &c.). As in these ethical opinions of Protagoras we see a want of scientific perception, so do we perceive in his conception of the Heraclitean doctrine of the eternal flux of all things, and the way in which he carries it out, a sophistical endeavour to establish, freed from the fetters of science, his subjective notions, setting aside the Heraclitean assumption of a higher cognition, and a conformed by moral activity (ἐνέργεια) by means of rhetorical art. That man was master of this in a high degree, the testimonies of the ancients leave indubitable. His endeavours, moreover, were mainly directed to the communication of this art by means of instruction (Plat. Prot. p. 312, c.), to render men capable of acting and speaking with readiness in domestic and political affairs (ib. p. 318, c.). He would teach how to make the weaker cause the stronger (ἐν ἰδιον ἐν τοιούτῳ λόγων κριέται ποιεῖτι, Arist. Rhet. ii. 24; A. Gellius, N. A. v. 3; Eudoxus, in Stephan. Hyg. s. v. Ἀείμηρα; comp. Arist. Nub. 113, &c. 245, &c. 873, 674, 875, &c.). By way of practice in the art he was accustomed to make his pupils discuss Theses (communes loci) on opposite sides (antinomically) (Diog. Laërt. x. 52, &c.; comp. Suid. s. v.; Dionys. Halic. Isocr. Timon in Diog. Laërt. x. 52; Sext. Emp. adv. Math. ix. 57; Cic. Brut. 12); an exercise which is also recommended by Cicero (ad Att. iv. 4,) and Quintilian (5. x. 10). The man was probably unfolded in his Art of Dispute (ῥήσις ἐνιαυτικῷ, see above). But he also directed his attention to language, endeavoured to explain difficult passages in the poets, though not always with the best success (Plat. Prot. p. 313, c., &c., comp. respecting his and the opposed Platonic exposition of the well-known lines of Simondes, Frei, p. 122, &c.); entered at some length into the threefold gender of names (ἄνδρα, ἀνήρ, and σειρήν, Arist. Rhet. iii. 5, Ep. Soph. c. 14; comp. Aristoph. Nub.)
465, &c.), and the tenses and moods of verbs (Diog. Laërt. ix. 52, 53; Quintil. iii. 4. § 10; Frei, l.c. p. 133, &c.). Although Protagoras left it to his pupils to fix the amount of his fees in proportion to the profit they considered themselves to have derived from his lessons (Plat. Prot. p. 328, b.; Arist. Eth. Nic. ix. 1), he—the first who demanded payment for instruction and lectures—nevertheless obtained an amount of wealth which became proverbial. (Plat. Hipp. Meg. p. 282, e.; Meno, p. 91, d.; Theaet. p. 161, a., 179, a.; Quintil. iii. 1. § 10; Diog. Laërt. ix. 52, 50, &c.)

PROTAGORIDES (Πρωταγόρηδης), of Cyzicus, a writer only known to us from Athenaeus, who refers to three of his works:—1. Περί Δαμνωνίων, on the games celebrated at Daphne, in a village in the neighbourhood of Antioch (iv. pp. 150, c., 176, a., 183, f.). 2. Κειμά τε Τοιρώι, a history of Comedy (iii. p. 124, e.). 3. Α'κροασίας σφωτικα, love tales (iv. p. 162, c.).

PROTARCHUS (Πρωτάρχης), an engraver of precious stones, whose name occurs on a very beautiful gem in the Florentine Museum, which represents Eros charming a lion with the harp. Formerly the artist's name was misread Πωλάρχης. (Gal. di Firenz. Gemm. i. 1; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, p. 391, n. 4.)

PROTEAS (Πρωτας), 1. An Athenian general in the time of the Peloponnesian war, the son of Epicles. He was one of the three commanders of the squadron sent out to assist the Corinthians in their contest with the Corinthians. Again, in the first year of the Peloponnesian war (b. c. 431), Proteas was one of the three commanders of the fleet of 100 ships, sent round Peloponnesus (Thuc. i. 45, ii. 23).

2. A Macedonian officer, the son of Andronicus. He was employed by Antipater in collecting a squadron with which to defend the islands and coasts of Greece against the Phoenicians and others in the service of Persia, and succeeded in capturing, at Siphnos, 8 out of a squadron of 10 ships, with which Datames was there stationed. (Arrian, Anat. ii. 2. § 7—11.)

3. Son of Lanice, the nurse of Alexander the Great. [LANICE.]

PROTEILAUS (Πρωτείλαυς), a son of Iphicles and Astyochoe, and accordingly a brother of Podareas, belonged to Phylie in Thessaly, whence he is called Φυλαίος (Lucian, Dial. Mort. 23. 1.; Hom. II. ii. 705; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 223), though this name may also be traced to his being a grandson of the Aeolid Phyllaeus. He led the warriors of several Thessalian places against Troy, and was the first of all the Greeks that was killed by the Trojans, for he was the first who leaped from the ships upon the Trojan coast (Hom. II. ii. 693, &c. xii. 601, xv. 703; Philostr. Hær. ii. 18). According to the common tradition Proteus was slain by Hector (Lucian, l.c. c. Tzetza. ad Lyc. 245, 528, 530; Hygin. Fab. 193; Ov. Met. xii. 67), but according to another story, he fell by the hands of Achilles (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 326; Plut. Alex. 1. 11), or of Euphorbos (Eustath. l. c. p. 325). Proteus is most celebrated in ancient story for the strong affection and fidelity existing between him and his wife Laodameia, the daughter of Acatus. When she heard of the death of her husband, she prayed to the infernal gods to be allowed to converse with him only for the space of three hours. The prayer being granted, Hermes conducted Proteus for a few hours to the upper world, and when Proteus died a second time, Laodameia expired with him (Hyg. Fab. 108; Eustath. p. 325). This story, from which the account of Lucian differs only slightly, has been variously modified by the poets, for, according to some, Laodameia, after the second death of her husband, made an image of him, which she worshipped, and when her father Acatus ordered her to burn it, she threw herself with the image into the flames (Hyg. Fab. 104). According to others, Proteus, on returning from the lower world, found his wife embracing his image, and when he died the second time, he begged of her not to follow too late, whereupon she killed herself with a sword. Others again relate that Laodameia, being compelled by her father to marry another man, spent her nights with the image of Proteus (Eustath. l. c.); but Conon (Narrat. 13), lastly, has quite a different tradition, for according to him, Proteus, after the Trojan war, took with him Aethylla, a sister of Priam, who was his prisoner. When, on his homeward voyage, he landed on the Macedonian peninsula of Pallene, between Mende and Scione, and had gone some distance from the coast, to fetch water, Aethylla prevailed upon the other women to set fire to the ships. Proteus, accordingly, was obliged to remain there, and built the town of Scione.

His tomb was shown near Eleus, in the Thracian Chersonesus (Strab. xiii. p. 555; Paus. i. 34. § 2; Tzetza. ad Lyc. 532). There was a belief that nymphs had planted elm-trees around his grave, and that those of their branches which grew on the Trojan side were sooner green than the others, but that at the same time the foliage faded and died earlier (Philostor. Hær. ii. 1); or it was said that the trees, when they had grown so high as to see Troy, died away, and that fresh shoots then sprang from their roots (Plin. H. N. xvi. 99; Anthol. Palat. vii. 141, 385). A magnificent temple was erected to Proteus at Eleus, and a sanctuary, at which funeral games were celebrated, existed in Phylace (Herod. vii. 116, 120; Paus. iii. 4. § 5; Pind. Isthm. i. 83, with the Schol.). Proteus himself was represented in the Lesche at Delphi. (Paus. x. 30. § 1.) [I. S.]

PROTEUS (Πρωτας), the prophetic old man of the sea (ξιλογόμαρ), occurs in the earliest legends as a subject of Poseidon, and is described as seeing through the whole depth of the sea, and tending the flocks (the seals) of Poseidon (Hom. Od. iv. 365, 383, 400; Virg. Georg. iv. 392; Theoc. ii. 58; Horat. Carm. i. 2. 7; Philostr. Icon. i. 17). He resided in the island of Pharos, at the distance of one day's journey from the river Aegeyntus (Nile), whence he is also called the Egyptian (Hom. Od. iv. 355, 359). Virgil, however, instead of Pharos, mentions the island of Carpathos, between Creta and Rhodes (Georg. iv. 397; comp.Hom. ii. ii. 676), whereas, according to the same poet, Proteus was born in Thessaly (Georg. iv. 396, comp. Acc. xi. 262). His life is described as follows. At midnight he rises from the flood, and sleeps in the shadow of the rocks of the coast, and around him lie the monsters of the deep (Hom. Od.
iv. 400; Virg. Georg. iv. 395). Any one wishing to compel him to foretell the future, was obliged to catch hold of him at that time; he, indeed, had the power of making every possible shape, in order to escape the necessity of prophesying, but whenever he saw that his endeavours were of no avail, he resumed his usual appearance, and told the truth (Hom. Od. iv. 410, &c. 455, &c.; Ov. Art. Am. i. 761, Post. i. 369; Philostr. Vit. Apoll. i. 4). When he had finished his prophecy he returned to the sea (Hom. Od. iv. 570). Homer (Od. iv. 365) ascribes to him one daughter, Eidothea, but Apollodorus (ii. 7) mentions two—Eidothea and Zenodotes (ap. Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1500) mentions Eurynome instead of Eidothea. He is sometimes represented as riding through the sea, in a chariot drawn by Hippocampe. (Virg. Georg. iv. 389.)

Another set of traditions describes Proteus as a son of Poseidon, and as a king of Egypt, who had two sons, Telegonus and Polygonus or Taulus. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 9; Tzet. ad Lyc. 124.) Diodorus however observes (i. 62), that only the Greeks called him Proteus, and that the Egyptians called him Cetes. His wife is called Psamathe (Eurip. Hel. 7) or Torone (Tzet. ad Lyc. 115), and, besides the above mentioned sons, Theoclymenus and Theonoë are likewise called his children. (Eurip. Hel. 9, 13.) He is said to have hospitably received Dionysus during his wanderings (Apollod. iii. 5. § 1), and Hermes brought to him Helen after the fall of Troy (Eurip. Hel. 46), or, according to others, Proteus himself took her to Paris, gave to the lover a phantom, and restored the true Helen to Menelaus after his return from Troy. (Tzet. ad Lyc. 112, 520; Herod. ii. 112, 118.) The story further relates that Proteus was originally an Egyptian, but that he went to Thrace and there married Torone. But as his sons by her used great violence towards strangers, he prayed to his father Poseidon to carry him back to Egypt. Poseidon accordingly opened a chasm in the earth in Pallene, and through a passage passing through the earth under the sea he led him back into Egypt. (Tzet. ad Lyc. 124; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 686.) A second personage of the name of Proteus is mentioned by Apollodorus (ii. 1. § 5) among the sons of Aegyptus. [L. S.]

PROTHeNOb (Πρωτηνός), a son of Arellycus, was one of the leaders of the Boeotians against Troy, where he was slain by Polydamas. (Hom. II. ii. 575.)

PROTHOUs (Πρωθος), a son of Tenthredon, commander of the Magnetes who dwelt about mount Pelion and the river Peneus, was one of the Greek heroes at Troy. (Hom. II. ii. 758.)

There are three other mythical personages of this name, one a son of Agrius (Apollod. i. 8. § 6), the second a son of Lycnon (iii. 8. § 1), and a third a son of Thuestis and brother of Althea (Paus. viii. 45. § 5, who calls him Πρωθος). [L. S.]

PROTOGENEIA (Πρωτογενεια). 1. A daughter of Deucalion and Pyrrha. (Apollod. i. 7. § 2.) She was married to Locrus, but had no children; Zeus, however, who carried her off, became by her, on mount Maenulas in Arcadia, the father of Opus. (Schol. ad Pind. Od. ix. 85; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. iv. 1780.) According to others she was not the mother, but a daughter of Opus. (Schol. ad Pind. I. c.) Endymion also is called a son of Proteogenia. (Conon, Narrat. 14.)

2. A daughter of Calydon and Aesolia. (Apollod. i. 7. § 7.)

PROTOGENES (Πρωτογενής), the chief instrument of the cruelties of the emperor Caligula, used to carry about him two books, one called the sword, and the other the dagger, in which were entered the names of the persons destined for death. These books were found, after the emperor's death, in his secret depositaries. They were burnt by order of Claudius, who likewise put Proteogenes to death. (Dion Cass. Hist. xx. 4; Suet. Cal. 27; Oros. vii. 5.)

PROTOGENES (Πρωτογενής), artists. 1. One of the most celebrated Greek painters, lived at the period of the greatest perfection of the art, and was contemporary with Apelles, about Ol. 112, a. c. 332. Almost all we know of him is contained in a passage of Pliny, the text of which is very much corrupted, yet not so as to affect any essential point in the history of the artist or his works. (Plin. II. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 20.)

Proteogenes was a native of Caunus, in Caria, a city subject to the Rhodians. [Comp. Paus. i. 3. § 4; Plut. Demetr. 22: Suidas makes him a native of Xanthus, in Lycia, s. e.) He resided at Rhodes almost entirely; the only other city of Greece which is said to have visited is Athens, where he executed one of his great works in the Propylaea. He appears to have been one of those men, who, combining the highest genius with modesty and contentment, only obtain by the exertions of generous friends the reputation which they have earned by their own merits. Up to his fiftieth year he is said to have lived in poverty and in comparative obscurity, supporting himself by painting ships, which at that period used to be decorated with elaborate pictorial devices. His fame had, however, reached the ears of Apelles, who, upon visiting Rhodes, made it his first business to seek out Proteogenes. The interesting trial of skill, by which the two artists introduced themselves to each other, has been related under APPELLES. As the surest way of making the merits of Proteogenes known to his fellow-citizens, Apelles offered him, for his finished works, on which Proteogenes himself had set a very insignificant price, the enormous sum of fifty talents apiece (quinquagenis talentis), at the same time spreading the report, that he intended to sell the pictures as his own. The Rhodians were thus roused to an understanding of what an artist they had among them; and Apelles at once confirmed the impression made by their own merits, who were anxious to retain such valuable works in their country pay for their previous indifference, by refusing to part with them except for an advanced price. (Plin. l. c. § 13.)

We possess the record of another interesting scene in the artist's tranquil life. When Demetrius Poliorcetes was using every effort to subdue Rhodes, he refrained from attacking the city at its most vulnerable point, lest he should injure the masterpieces of Proteogenes, his Ialysus, which had been placed

* The words of Pliny, genitus Rhoditis subjectae, which have given the critics much trouble, are now established as the true reading by the authority of the Bamberg MS., confirmed by historical testimonies as to the matter of fact. (See Janus's collation of the Bamberg MS., appended to Sillig's edition of Pliny.)
in that quarter; and he also paid the most flattering attentions to the artist himself. Protogenes, who was residing in his suburban cottage (comp. l. c. s. 87: casula Protogenes contentus est in hortulo suo) amidst the very camp of Demetrius, when the hostilities commenced, proceeded in his works with his usual steady perseverance, and, on the king's sending to him and asking how he could be so bold as to live and work without the walls, he replied, that he knew that the king was at war with the Rhodians, but not with the arts. His confidence had its reward. Demetrius stationed guards about his house, to preserve him from injury; and, instead of calling him away from his work to play the courtier, he himself withdrew from the military cares on which he was so intent, to visit the artist in his studio, and stood watching his work surrounded by the din of arms and the thunder of the battering engines. In the honourable tranquility thus secured to him during this year of tumult, Protogenes completed one of his most celebrated works. (Plin. l. c.; comp. vii. 38. s. 39.)

This form of the story is not only the most interesting, but at least as credible as any other. since Pliny doubtless copied it from some old Greek writer upon art. According to Plutarch (Demetr. 22, Reg. et Imp. Apologiæ, p. 183, b.) the picture on which Protogenes was engaged in his suburban residence, was the Ialysus itself; and the Rhodians, alarmed for the safety of the unfinished work, sent heralds to Demetrius, to entreat him to spare it, to whom Demetrius replied, that he would rather destroy the images of his father than that picture. Aulas Gallius (xv. 3) gives still another, and the least probable version of the story. (See also Suid. s. v.)

From this story it appears that Protogenes lived at least down to b. c. 303; and, connecting this with the statement that he was fifty years old before he attained to wealth and high reputation, the conjecture of Meyer (Gesch. d. bild. Künst, vol. i. p. 189), that he was born about Ol. 104, is not improbable. Müller gives Ol. 112—120, b. c. 332—300, as the time during which he flourished.

Protogenes belongs to the number of self-taught artists; at least in so far as this, that he owed comparatively nothing of his merits or reputation to whatever instruction he may have received. The name of his teacher was unknown; and the obscurity in which he so long lived is a proof that he had none of the prestige which attaches to the pupils of a celebrated school. His disadvantages in this respect he laboured to counteract by the most unwearied diligence. In characterizing the several painters of the period of the perfection of the art, Quintilian mentions Protogenes as excelling the rest in the care with which he wrought up his pictures (Xii. 10. § 6). On his most celebrated picture he is said to have spent seven years, or even, according to another statement, seven times, to have painted it four times over (Plin. l. c.; Aelian, xii. 41; Fronto, 11). In the opinion of Apelles, he carried this elaboration of his works to a fault, as we learn from an interesting story which is told, with some variations, by Pliny, Aelian, and Plutarch, respecting the criticisms of Apelles on the work just referred to, the Ialysus of Protogenes. On first beholding the picture, Apelles stood in silent admiration; and presently he remarked that the work and the artist were alike great, and that Protogenes was in every respect equal to himself or even superior, with the exception of two points, the one, that he did not know when to take his hand off his picture, the other, that he was deficient in that peculiar grace which Apelles always claimed as the one great quality by which he distinguished himself. (Plin. l. c. § 10; Plut. Demetr. 22; Aelian, i. c.; comp. Cic. Orat. 22.) Several passages might be quoted to prove the high esteem in which Protogenes was held by the ancients. That truth to nature, which in various degrees characterised the works of all the great artists of the age, was so conspicuous in his, that Petronius speaks of them as vying in truth with nature herself (Sat. 84). Cicero mentions him as one of the painters whose works were perfect in every respect. (Brut. 18; see also Varro, L. L. i x. 12, ed. Müller; Colum. R. R. i. pref. § 31.)

The number of the works of Protogenes was comparatively small, as Pliny remarks, on account of the labour he bestowed upon each of them. His master-piece was the picture of Ialysus, the tutelary hero of Rhodes, to which reference has already been made. If we may believe the anecdote related by Pliny, the artist lived, during all the years he was engaged on this picture, upon moistened lupines, in order that he might just satisfy the cravings of hunger and thirst, without subjecting himself to any sensation of corporeal pleasure which might interfere with the devotion of his whole faculties to the work. The same writer informs us that Protogenes painted this picture over four several times, as a precaution against damage and decay, so that, if one surface should be removed, another might appear from beneath it. Nearly all modern artists treat this reason as absurd, and explain the fact mentioned by Pliny, supposing it to be correct, simply as an example of the artist's elaborate finish. Very possibly the statement may be a conjecture of Pliny's own, founded upon the appearance presented by some parts of the picture, where the colour had peeled off. Another of Pliny's stories about the picture relates to the accidental production of one of the most effective parts of it, the foam at the mouth of a tired hound. The artist, he tells us, dissatisfied with his repeated attempts to produce the desired effect, at last, in his vexation, dashed the sponge, with which he had repeatedly effaced his work, against the faulty place; and the sponge, charged as it was by repeated use with the necessary colours, left a mark in which the painter recognised the very form which his art had failed to produce. Amidst all this truly Plinian gossip about the picture, we are left in profound ignorance of its composition; all that is clear is, that the hero was represented either as hunting, or as returning or just returned from the chase. It was, no doubt, dedicated in the temple of Ialysus at Rhodes, where it escaped destruction in the siege by Demetrius, as above related, and where it was seen by Cicero (Orat. 2), who again refers to it in a manner which perhaps implies that it had suffered from neglect (ad Att. ii. 21: we say perhaps, because the sentence is merely hypothetical). He also mentions it in his enumeration of the chief works of art existing in his time (in Verr. iv. 60). In the time of Strabo it was still at Rhodes (xiv. p. 652); but, when Pliny wrote, it had been carried to Rome, where it formed part of the rich collection in the temple of Ponce. Suidas (e. v.) mentions the picture as a strange and wonderful work, but appears to have mistaken the hero Ialysus for Dionysus (the reading however is doubtful).

His next most famous picture was that which Pliny tells us he painted during the siege of Rhodes, and to which, from that circumstance, a peculiar interest was attached (Sepulenturque tablum ejus temporeis hue fames, quod eum Protogones sub gladio pinxerit). Its subject was a satyr resting (quam Anaxagoraeonemon vocent), and still holding the pipe; a subject strikingly similar to the celebrated Satyr of Praxiteles, though, of course, treated differently in the two different departments of art. This picture was still at Rhodes in the time of Strabo, who mentions it and the Ialysus, and the Colossus, as the most remarkable objects at that place (l. c.). The Satyr (Strabo tells us) was leaning against a column, upon which the artist had originally painted a partridge sitting; but the people, who flocked to see the picture, were so struck with the perfectly natural appearance of the bird that they entirely overlooked the principal figure; and, to make matters worse, the bird-keepers brought tame partridges, which were no sooner placed opposite the picture than they began to chirp at the painted bird, thinking it alive, to the unbounded delight of the multitude.

His labour was lost (ἀρξας τὸν ἐνον πάρερφιν γέγονος), obtained permission from the keepers of the temple, and obliterated the partridge from the picture.

Another celebrated work of Protogenes was that in the Propylaea of the Acropolis of Athens, which Pliny thus describes: nobili Paralum et Amnoniada, quam quidam Nausicaam vocant. The Paralus, as is well known, was one of the two sacred ships of the Athenians, to which, at a later period, three more were added, of which one was the Ammonis, that is, the vessel in which offerings were sent to Jupiter Ammon. Thus much is clear; but how these vessels were represented, whether each formed a separate picture, or the two were combined in one composition, and what we are to understand by the phrase, quam quidam Nausicaam vocant, that is, what the ship Ammonis (or rather, painting) represented, feeling that Nausicaa and the island of the Phaeacians—are questions extremely difficult to solve. Pausanias, indeed, tells us (i. 22. § 6) that one of the paintings in the Propylaea represented Nausicaa and her maidens bathing, with Ulysses near them, as described by Homer (Od. vi. init.) ; but he ascribes the picture to Polygnotus, and says not a word of the sacred ships. The only escape yet suggested from this labyrinth of confusion, is by following the clue furnished by the conjecture of Ottfried Müller (Arch. d. Künst, Nachträge, p. 707, 2d ed.), that, instead of carrying on the nominative Πολυγνωτος in the passage of Pausanias, we should insert Πρωτογνησις after έγραφε δε κελ, so as to make him, and not Polygnotus, the painter of the picture which Pausanias describes as that of Nausicaa; and further, that the very subject of the painting was disputed among the ancients themselves, "some," as Pliny says, "taking it for Nausicaa," among whom was Pausanias; and others, of whom Pliny himself was one, regarding it as the representation of some harbour, into which the ships Paralus and Ammonias were sailing. According to this view the group which Pausanias took for Nausicaa and her companions may be explained as a group of maidens celebrating the festival of the god to whom the sacred vessels are bringing their offerings. This painting is also mentioned by Cicero, like the Ialysus, as one of the greatest works in existence, but he does not mention the artist's name (in Verr. l. c.). Pliny tells us that Protogenes, in memory of his former circumstances, added to this picture some little ships of war, as additional ornaments or bounding (pareregia).

Another picture, which Protogenes painted at Athens, was that of the Theseomatheae, in the senate-house of the Five Hundred (Paus. i. 3. § 4).

The other works of Protogenes, in the list of Pliny, are Cycippus, Tlepolemus, the tragic poet Phileus meditating (Philiscus), an athlete, king Antigonus, and the mother of Aristotle. Pliny adds that the great philosopher advised the artist to paint Alexander "propter aeretitatem rerum;" but that his own taste and the impulse of his genius carried him to other subjects, so that there was only one of his pictures, and that the last, in which the Macedonian conqueror appeared: this composition is called by Pliny Alexander and Pan.

In the enumeration of his works, that celebrated panel must not be forgotten, which, in the three simple lines, presented the most celebrated contest between Apelles and Protogenes, and excited more admiration than the great works of art near which it was preserved at Rome. To what has been said on this subject under Apelles, it need only be added that the words of Pliny, who had seen the picture (and that, no doubt, repeatedly), evidently describe mere lines drawn right across the panel (per tabulum); and even writers who object to such a display, as not even within the province of painting, and who seek for other ingenious and elaborate interpretations (such as that the three lines were three outlines of figures or limbs), are found to admit, not only that the notion of their being three simple lines is the only one countenanced by the text of Pliny (who, we repeat, saw the picture), but also that this feat, though merely manual, was all the greater and more wonderful, on account of their being mere lines of excessive thinness, the one within the other, from the extraordinary command of the instrument, and precision of eye and hand which such a feat supposes. Let it be remembered also, how great was the importance which the ancients rightly attached to accurate drawing; and, we would add, let those who sneer at the performance attempt to reproduce it.

Protogenes excelled also as a statistic (Plin. l. c.), though none of his works are individually specified: Pliny only mentions him among the artists who made, in bronze, athletas et armatos et venatores scriptoantique (H. N. xxxiv. 8, 19, § 34).

According to Suidas, Protogenes wrote two works on art, namely, Περι γραφις και εχθρων ἑθηκα θ'.

that is, "the work of Proysis, the chief of the artists' workshop." (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorau, pp. 394, 395.)

PRÓXEUS (Πρόξευς), 1. A native of Boeotia (according to Diod. xiv. 19, of Thebes). He was a disciple of Gorgias, and a friend of Xenophon. Being connected by the ties of hospitality with the younger Cyrus, the latter engaged him in his service. He came to Sardes at the head of 1500 heavy armed, and 500 light armed soldiers. (Xen. Anab. i. § 11, 2. § 8, 3.) It was at his invitation that Xenophon was induced to enter the service of Cyrus (iii. 1. §§ 4, 8). He was one of the four ill-fated generals whom Clearchus persuaded to accompany him to Tissaphernes. He was seized with the rest, and taken to the king of Persia, and afterwards put to death (ii. 5, § 31, &c. 6. § 1). Xenophon speaks of him as a man whose ambition was under the influence of strict probity, and who was especially anxious to secure the affections of his soldiers, so that while the well-disposed readily obeyed him, he failed to inspire the rest with a wholesome fear of his authority (ii. 6. § 17, &c.). He was 30 years of age at the time of his death (b.c. 401). For other occasions on which he is mentioned by Xenophon, see Anab. i. 5. § 14, ii. 1. § 10, v. 3. § 5. (Comp. Diog. Laërt. ii. 40.)

2. A brother of Hermocrates of Syracuse. (Xen. Hellen. i. 3. § 13.)

3. One of the Teguates, who was selected to join in founding Megalopola. (Paus. viii. 27. § 2; Xen. Hellen. vi. 5. § 6.)

[C. P. M.]

PROXENUS (Πρόξευς), literary. 1. Two persons of this name, one of Posidonia, and the other of Sybaris, are mentioned among the followers of Pythagoras by Iamblichus (Vit. Pyth. cap. ult.).

2. A person mentioned in Aristotle's will. (Diog. Laërt. v. 15.) From the directions given regarding his likeness, it is probable that he enjoyed the intimate friendship of the philosopher. [W. M. G.]

PROXIMUS, STATIUS, a tribune of the praetorian cohorts, joined the conspiracy of Piso against Nero. He was pardoned by the emperor, but put an end to his own life, through the foolish vanity of obtaining renown by dying when he might have lived. (Tac. Ann. xv. 50, 71.)

PRUDENTIUS, AEPIELIUS CLEMENS. Our acquaintance with the personal history of Prudentius, whom Bentley has designated as "the Horace and Virgil of the Christians," is derived exclusively from a short autobiography in verse, written when the poet was fifty-seven years old, and serving as an introduction to his works, of which it contains a catalogue. From this we gather that he was born during the reign of Constantius II. and Constant, in the consularship of Philippus and Salia, a.d. 318; that after acquiring, when a boy, the rudiments of liberal education, he frequented, as a youth, the schools of the rhetoricians, indulging freely in dissipated pleasures; that having attained to manhood, he practised as a fool and pleader; that he subsequently discharged the duties of a civil and criminal judge in two important cities; that he received from the emperor (Theodosius, probably, or Honorius), a high military appointment at court, which placed him in a station next to that of the prince, and that as he advanced in years, he became deeply sensible of the emptiness of worldly honour, and earnest in his devotion to the exercises of religion. Of his career after a.d. 405, or of the epoch of his death, we know nothing, for the praises of Stilicho, who suffered the penalty of his treason in 413, indicate that the piece in which they appear (C. Symm. ii.) must have been published before that date, but can lead to no inference with regard to the decease of the author.

The above notices are expressed with so much brevity, and in terms so indefinite, that a wide field has been thrown open to critics for the exercise of ingenuity in explaining and interpreting them. Every thing, however, beyond what we have stated, rests upon conjecture. We may, indeed, safely conclude that Prudentius was a Spaniard (see especially Peristeph. v. 140); but the assertions with regard to the place of his birth, rest upon no sure foundation; for although he speaks of the inhabitants of Saragossa (Peristeph. iv. 1. comp. 97) as "noster populus," he uses elsewhere the self-same phrase with regard to Rome (C. Symm. i. 192, comp. 36), and applies the same epithet to Calahorra (Peristeph. i. 116, iv. 31), and to Taragona (Peristeph. vi. 143). In like manner the attempts to ascertain the towns in which he discharged his judicial functions, and to determine the nature of the dignity to which he was eventually elevated, have proved entirely abortive. With regard to the latter, Gennadius concludes that he was what he called a Palatinius miles, i.e. an officer of the household (Cod. Theod. 6. ttt. 87), and certainly it is highly improbable that he was employed in active service; others imagine that he was consul, or praefect of the city — or of the praetorium — or that he was raised to the rank of patricium — opinions unsupported by even plausible arguments, and therefore not worth confuting.

The extant poems of Prudentius, of which we now proceed to give a list, are composed in a great variety of metres, and these we shall describe as we go along.

I. Præfatio, containing, as we have already remarked, an autobiography and a catalogue of the author's works. It extends to forty-five verses, and is composed in a stanza which would be termed technically Tricolon Tristrophon, the first line being a Choriambic Dimeter, the second a Choriambic Trimeter, the third a Choriambic Tetrameter, all acatalectic, and all formed upon the Homatian model.

II. Cathemerinon (i.e. καθημερινὸν ἔργον) Liber. A series of twelve hymns proper to be repeated or sung by the devout Christian; the first six at particular periods during each day; the remainder, with one exception, adapted to special occasions:—

PRUDENTIUS.

Passio martyrum, 106 lines, a system of the logaeodic verses employed in the preceding. 14. Passio Agnetis Virginis, a system of 133 Alcaic Heinde- casylyptic verses, the same with those which form the first two lines of the Alcaic stanzas in Horace.

IX. Dipyleon (or Dittocoon). Forty-eight tetrastichs in heroic hexameters relating to remarkable events and characters in Bible history, twenty-four being appropriated to those connected with the Old and twenty-four to those belonging to the New Testament. A keen controversy has arisen with regard to the authenticity of these summaries. They are not mentioned by Prudentius in his autobiography, when enumerating the rest of his productions, and they have been considered of an inferior stamp. Moreover, although found in all the best MSS., they are frequently placed, as it were apart, after the Epilogus mentioned below, thus indicating some suspicion in regard to the authorship, and in one codex they are ascribed to Amaenus, which some suppose to be merely a complimentary epithet, while others, considering that it is a proper name, have called into existence an independent Prudentius Amaenus unheard of before. With regard to the title, we read in Gennadius the "etiamus, vir seculari literatura eruditus, compositus διητύχων de toto Votere et Novo Testamento personis exceptis." Now, this διητύχων, which has been interpreted to signify εὐμαχία duplcum (i.e. the Old and New Testaments), appears under the varying shapes Dittocoon, Dittocoon, Dirochaeon, Dytpyelon, as the designation prefixed to the tetrastichs in the MSS., and we can scarcely doubt that Dip- tyelon (Διητύχων) is the true form, and that the rest are corruptions. On the whole, notwithstanding the formidable array of arguments in support of the opposite view of the question, there does not seem sufficient grounds for rejecting these little narratives as spurious, or for regarding them, as some have done, in the light of abridgements by a later hand, of a more voluminous original. The circumstance, that Prudentius does not include them in his list proves nothing, since they may have been written at a later period; and that something of the kind actually was written seems clear from the passage in Gennadius, obscure though it be.

X. Epilogus, from which we may, perhaps, infer that the preceding pieces had been composed after Prudentius had withdrawn from public life; thirty-four lines, Trochaic Dim. Cat. and Iambic Trim. Cat. placed alternately.

The Hexameron and the Invitatio (or Invitato- riad Martyrium, placed by Gennadius among the works of Prudentius, are no longer extant, and many doubt whether they ever existed. The clause in which the latter is named is so confused as to be almost unintelligible.

Although considerable diversity of opinion has always prevailed with regard to the merits of Prudentius, it is hard to understand how he ever acquired that amount of reputation which he has undoubtedly enjoyed among many eminent modern scholars. We are not at all surprised by the admiration with which he was viewed in the middle ages; and we may not feel, perhaps, much astonished by the panegyrics even of Fabricius, Barth and Tillemont; but how one so acute as Bentley, a critic little addicted to hyperbolical commendation, could have employed the phrase
PRUSIAS.

PRUSIAS I. (Ipooros), king of Bithynia, was the son of Zicius, whom he succeeded on the throne, and grandson of Nicomedes I. The date of his accession is unknown, but it appears that it preceded the death of Antiochus Hierax, and may therefore be placed at least as early as B.C. 292. (Trog. Pomp. Prod. xxvii.; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. pp. 413, 414; Niebuhr, K. Schrift. p. 267.)

The first event of his reign, which is recorded to us, is a war with the Byzantines, in which we find him engaging in B.C. 229, in conjunction with the Rhodians. The latter were at first supported by Attalus, king of Pergamus, as well as by Achaeus, who had lately assumed the sovereignty of Asia Minor, and they endeavoured also to set up Tiboetes, the uncle of Prusias, as a competitor for the throne of Bithynia. Their efforts were, however, unsuccessful: Prusias conquered all the possessions of the Byzantines in Asia, while the Thracians pressed them closely on the European side, and they were soon compelled to submit to a peace on disadvantageous terms. (Polyb. iv. 47—52.) Shortly after this, in B.C. 217, Prusias is mentioned among the princes who sent costly presents to the Rhodians after the great calamity they had suffered by an earthquake: and the following year (216) he obtained great distinction by defeating and cutting to pieces a formidable army of Gauls, who had been invited into Asia by Attalus, and had become the terror of the adjoining countries. (Id. v. 90, 111.) On the breaking out of the war between the Romans and Philip, king of Macedon, Prusias lent his assistance to the latter; and besides supplying him with an auxiliary squadron of ships, rendered him a more important service by invading the territories of his own neighbour and rival Antialus, whom he thus recalled from Greece to the defence of his own kingdom, B.C. 207. (Liv. xxvii. 30, xxxvii. 7.) The name of the Bithynian monarch was, in consequence, included in the treaty of peace between Philip and the Romans in B.C. 205 (Liv. xxxiv. 12), and we subsequently find the two kings uniting their forces to besiege Cius in Bithynia, which, after it had fallen into their hands, was sacked by order of Philip, the inhabitants sold as slaves, and the city itself given up to Prusias. (Polyb. xxv. 21, xxvii. 5; Liv. xxxiii. 34; Strab. xii. p. 563.)

It does not appear that the latter, though he was connected by marriage with the Macedonian king, took any part in the decisive struggle of Philip with the Roman power (B.C. 200—196); but in B.C. 190, when Antiochus was, in his turn, preparing to contend with the republic, he made repeated attempts to obtain the alliance of Prusias, who was at first disposed to lend a friendly ear, but yielded to the arguments of the two Scipios, and concluded an alliance with Rome, though he appears to have, in fact, taken no part in the war that followed. (Polyb. xxi. 9; Liv. xxxiv. 25; Appian. Syr. 23.) After the termination of that war, however, Prusias became involved in hostilities with Eumenes, king of Pergamus, by which he gave umbrage to the Romans, and he soon after greatly increased this offence by affording a shelter to his implacable enemy, the fugitive Hamilabd. The exiled general rendered important services to the king in his contest with Eumenes, but, notwithstanding these obligations, Prusias was unwilling to brave the anger of Rome, and when Flaminius was deputed by the senate to demand the surrender of Hannibal, the king basely gave his consent, and the Carthaginian general only escaped falling into the hands of his enemies by a voluntary death. (Polyb. xxi. 18, xxiv. 1; Liv. xxxix. 51; Justin, xxxii. 4; Plut. Flaminius 20; Corn. Nep. Hann. 10—12; App. Sgr. 11; Eutrop. iv. 5; Oros. iv. 20; Strab. xii. 563.) This is the last circumstance which can be referred with certainty to the elder Prusias: the period of his death, and of the accession of his son, is not mentioned by any ancient writer, but Mr. Clinton regards the Prusias mentioned in the treaty of b. c. 179, between Eumenes and Pharnaces, as the second king of this name: and this supposition, though not admitting of proof, appears at least a very probable one. (Clinton, P. /v. vol. ii. p. 417.) In this case we must place his death between 173 and 179. It was, however, during the latter part of his reign that Prusias, who had already made himself master of Cierus, Tiszio, and other dependencies of Heraclea, laid siege to that city itself; but while pressing the attack with vigour, he himself received a severe wound from a stone, which not only compelled him for a time to abandon the enterprise, but left him with a lameness for the remainder of his life. On this account he is sometimes distinguished by the epithet of the Lame (δ ὁ χαλάς) (Meunon. c.27, ed. Orell.)

Prusias appears to have been a monarch of vigour and ability, and raised his kingdom of Bithynia to a much higher pitch of power and prosperity than it had previously attained. Like many of his contemporary princes, he sought distinction by the foundation or new settlement of cities, among the most conspicuous of which were Cius and Smyrnia in the Propontis, which he repensed and restored after their ruin by Philip, bestowing on the one his own name, while he called the other his wife, Apameia. In addition to this, he gave the name of Prusias also to the small city of Cierus, which he had wrested from the Heracleans. (Strab. xii. p. 563; Steph. Byz. s. v. Προδησα and Άτακέςα, Meunon. c. 41, 47.) The foundation of Prusa, at the foot of Mount Olympus, is also ascribed to him by some authors. (Plin. v. 43. See on this point Droysen, Hellenism, vol. ii. p. 655.) Before the close of his reign, however, his power received a severe blow by the loss of the Helle-spontine Phrygia, which he was compelled to cede to the kings of Pergamus; probably by the treaty which terminated the war already alluded to, (Strab. i. c.)

PRUSIAS II. (Προδησα), king of Bithynia, was the son and successor of the preceding. No mention is found in any extant author of the peculiar circumstances of his reign, we may only know that it must have been subsequent to b. c. 183, as Strabo distinctly tells us (xii. p. 563), that the Prusias who received Hannibal at his court, was the son of Zelias. In b. c. 179, we find the name of Prusias associated with Eumenes in the treaty concluded by that monarch with Pharnaces, king of Pontus (Polyb. xxvi. 6), and this is supposed by Clinton to be the younger Prusias. It is certain, at least, that he was already on the throne before the breaking out of the war between the Romans and Perseus, b. c. 171. Prusias had previously sued for and obtained in marriage a sister of the Macedonian king, but notwithstanding this alliance he determined to keep aloof from the impending contest, and await the result with a view to make his peace with whichever party should prove victorious. (Liv. xlii. 12, 29; Appian, Mithr. 2.) In b. c. 169, however, he ventured to send an embassy to Rome, to interpose his good offices in favour of Perseus, and endeavour to prevail upon the senate to grant him a peace upon favourable terms. His intervention, however, was haughtily rejected, and fortune having the next year decided in favour of the Romans, Prusias sought to avert any offence he might have given by this ill-judged step, by the most abject and sordid flatteries. He received the Roman deputies who were sent to his court, in the garb which was characteristic of an emancipated slave, and styled himself the freedman of the Roman people: and the following year, b. c. 167, he himself repaired to Rome, where he sought to conciliate the favour of the senate by similar acts of squalid adulation. By this meanness he disarmed the resentment of the Romans, and obtained a renewal of the league between him and the republic, accompanied even with an extension of territory. (Polyb. xxx. 16; Liv. xlv. 44; Diod. xxxi. Exc. Vat. p. 83, Exc. Legat. p. 565; Appian. Mithr. 2; Eutrop. iv. 8; Zonar. ix. 24.)

From this time we find Prusias repeatedly sending embassies to Rome to prefer complaints against Eumenes, which, however, led to no results (Polyb. xxxi. 6, 9, xxxii. 3, 5), until, at length, in b. c. 156, after the death of Eumenes, the disputes between his successor Attalus and the Bithynian king broke out into open hostilities. In these Prusias was at first successful, defeated Attalus in a great battle, and compelled him to take refuge in Pergamus, to which he laid siege, but without effect. Meanwhile, Attalus, in the name of Rome, had wrested from the Bithynian king, and an embassy was sent by the senate, to order Prusias to desist: but he treated this command with contempt, and attacking Attalus a second time, again drove him within the walls of Pergamus. But the following year the arms of Attalus were more successful, and a fresh embassy from the senate at length compelled Prusias to make peace, b. c. 154. (Polyb. xxxii. 23, 26, xxxiii. 1, 10, 11; Appian. Mithr. 3; Diod. xxxi. Exc. Vales. p. 589.) Meanwhile, the Bithynian monarch had alienated the minds of his subjects by his vices and cruelties, and his son Nicomedes had become the object of the popular favour and admiration. This aroused the jealousy and suspicion of the old king, who, in order to remove his son from the eyes of his countrymen, sent him to Rome: and subsequently, as his apprehensions still increased, gave secret instructions to his ambassador Menas to provoke his assassination. Menas, however, finding how high Nicomedes stood in the favour of the Roman senate, attached himself to the cause of the prince, and united with Andronicus the ambassador of Attalus in an attempt to establish Nicomedes on the throne of Bithynia. Prusias was unable to make head against the disaffection of his own subjects, supported by the arms of Attalus, and after an ineffectual appeal to the intervention of the Romans, who secretly favoured Nicomedes, shut himself up within the walls of Nicomedia. The gates were, however, opened by the inhabitants, and Prusias himself was slain in a temple, to which he had fled for refuge. His death took place in b. c. 149. (Ap-by Cambyses in B. C. 525, and his country made a province of the Persian empire. His life was spared by Cambyses, but as he was detected shortly afterwards in endeavouring to excite a revolt among the Egyptians, he was compelled to put an end to his life by drinking bull’s blood. (Herod. iii. 10, 13—15.)

PSAMMIS (Ψαμμίς), king of Egypt, succeeded his father Necho in B. C. 601, and reigned six years. He carried on war against Ethiopia, and died immediately after his return from the latter country. He was succeeded by his son Apries in B. C. 596 or 595. (Herod. ii. 159—161.) In consequence of the shortness of his reign and his war with the Ethiopians, his name does not occur in the writers of the Old Testament, like those of his father and son. Herodotus is the only writer who calls him Psammis. Manetho calls him Psammitides, and Rosellini and Wilkinson make him Psamtek II. (Bunsen, Αἰγυπτίων Στέλλα in der Weltgeschichte, vol. iii. p. 130.)

PSAMMITHICHUS or PSAMMITEICHUS (Ψαμμίτιχος, Ψαμμίτιχος), the Greek form of the Egyptian PSAMETIK. 1. A king of Egypt, and founder of the Saitic dynasty, reigned 54 years, according to Herodotus, that is, from B. C. 671 to 617. (Herod. ii. 157.) The manner in which Psammitichus obtained possession of the kingdom is related at length by Herodotus. After the death of Setho, the king and priest of Hephaestus, the dominion of Egypt was divided among twelve kings, of whom Psammitichus was one. He was king of the Saitic district, of which he was a native, when SaZabaon abandoned Egypt in consequence of a dream. (Herod. ii. 152.)

This period is usually called the Dodecarchia. The twelve kings probably obtained their independent sovereignty in the confusion which followed the death of Setho, of which Diodorus speaks (i. 66), and to which Isaiah probably alludes, when he says (Is. xix. 2), “they fought every one against his brother, and every one against his neighbour; city against city, and kingdom against kingdom.” The Dodecarchia is not mentioned by Manetho, but he makes three kings of the Saitic dynasty intervene between the last of the Ethiopians and Psammitichus. This, however, need occasion us no surprise, because, as Bunsen remarks, lists of dynasties know nothing of anarchies or dodecarchies; and, in the chronological tables of a monarchy, the name of a prince has the dynastic right of occupying the period, which the historian must represent as an anarchy or a divided sovereignty. Thus Louis XVIII. did not enter France as king till the eighteenth year of his reign, and Louis XVII. is never even mentioned in French history.

But to return to the narrative of Herodotus. These

COIN OF PRUSIAS II.

PRYTANIS (Πρότανης). 1. A king of Sparta, of the Proclidian line, who, according to Pausanias, was the son of Eurypen, and fourth king of that race. The same author ascribes to his reign the commencement of the wars between Sparta and Argos. Diodorus allot a period of forty-nine years to his reign, but omits all notice of the two kings between him and Procles. It is needless to remark, that the chronology, and even the genealogy, of the kings of Sparta before Lycurgus, is probably aporyphal. (Paus. iii. 7. § 2; Diod. ap. Eucl. Arm. p. 150.)

2. One of the sons of PARISADES I., king of Bosporus. He appears to have submitted without opposition to the authority of his elder brother Satyrus, who ascended the throne on the death of Parisades, b. c. 311, and was left by him in charge of his capital city of Panticapeum, during the campaign in which he engaged against their remaining brother Eumelus. Satyrus himself having fallen on this expedition, Prytanis assumed the sovereign power, but was defeated by Eumelus, and compelled to conclude a treaty, by which he resigned the crown to his brother. Without this, he made a second attempt to recover it, but was again defeated, and put to death by order of Eumelus. His wife and children shared the same fate. (Diod. xx. 22—24.)

PSAMMATOSIRIS. [Arsacidae, p. 363, &c.]

PSAMMENITUS (Ψαμμένιτος), king of Egypt, succeeded his father Amasis in B. C. 526, and reigned only six months. He was conquered twelve kings reigned for a time in perfect harmony, and executed some great works in common, among which was the wonderful labyrinth near the lake Moeris. But an oracle had predicted, that whoever should pour a libation out of a brazen helmet in the temple of Hephaestus should become king of Egypt. Now it came to pass, that as the twelve kings were assembled on one occasion in the temple of Hephaestus, the priest, by accident, brought out only eleven golden goblets, and Psammitichus, who happened to be standing last, took off his brazen helmet, and used it as a substitute. The other kings, thinking that the oracle had been fulfilled, gave Psammitichus the right of priority of the kingdom and induced him to the exercise of it. In these difficulties he sent to consult the oracle of Leto at Buto, and was told, "that vengeance would come by brazen men appearing from the sea." This answer staggered his faith, but no long time afterwards word was brought to him, that brazen men had landed from the sea, and were plundering the country. These were Ionian and Carian pirates, who were dressed in an entire suit of brazen armour, which appears to have been unknown in Egypt. Believing that these were the men whom the oracle had foretold, he took them into his service, and with their aid conquered the other eleven kings, and became sole ruler of Egypt. (Herod. i. 149—152.) The account of Herodotus, as Mr. Grote remarks, bears evident marks of being the genuine tale which he heard from the priests of Hephaestus, however little satisfactory it may be in an historical point of view. Diodorus (ii. 66, 67) makes a more plausible historical narrative, which, however, is probably a corruption, by the later Greeks, of the genuine story. According to him, Psammitichus was king of Saia, and by his possession of the sea-coast, was enabled to carry on a profitable commerce with the Phoenicians and Greeks, by which he acquired so much wealth that his colleagues became jealous of him, and conspired against him. Psammitichus raised an army of mercenaries from Arabs, Caria, and Ionia, and defeated the other kings near Memphis. Polyaenus (vii. 3) gives another version of the story about the Carian mercenaries.

But whatever may have been the way in which Psammitichus obtained possession of the kingdom, there can be no doubt that Greek mercenaries rendered him most important assistance, and that he relied mainly upon them for preserving the power which he had gained by force. He accordingly provided for them a settlement on the Pelusian or external branch of the Nile, a little below Bubastis, the Ionians on one side of the river, and the Carians on the other; and as the place, where they were stationed, was fortified, it was called Stratopeda, or the Camps. In order to facilitate intercourse between the Greeks and his other subjects, Psammitichus ordered a number of Egyptian children to live with them, that they might learn the Greek language; and from them sprung the class of interpreters (Herod. ii. 154). Strabo tells us (xvii. p. 801) that it was in the reign of Psammitichus that the Milesians, with a fleet of thirty ships, sailed up the Canopic or western branch of the Nile, and founded the city of Naucratis, which became one of the great emporia for commerce. It is certainly untrue that the Milesians founded Naucratis, as the city was of Egyptian origin; and it appears to have been the opinion of Herodotus that the Greeks first settled at Naucratis in the reign of Amasis. Still there are several circumstances which lead us to conclude that the Greeks had settled at Naucratis before the reign of the latter monarch, and it is therefore very probable that the western branch was opened in the reign of Psammitichus, for purposes of commerce. It appears, likewise, from the writers of the Old Testament, that many Jews settled in Egypt about this time. (Is. xix. 10; Jer. xlv. 1.)

The employment of foreign mercenaries by Psammitichus appears to have given great offence to the military caste in Egypt, and the king, relying on his popular popularity, did not fail to excite feelings and wishes of the native soldiery. It has been supposed that the previous custom of stationing the Egyptian troops on actual service at three different places— at Daphne, near Pelusium, on the eastern frontier, at Mareotis on the north-western frontier, and at Elephantine on the southern or Ethiopian frontier. As Psammitichus had no need of their services on the eastern frontier, which was guarded by his Greek mercenaries, he stationed a greater number than usual at the two other posts, and let them remain unrelieved for the space of three years. Indignant at this treatment, and also because they were assigned a less honourable place in the line of battle than the Greek mercenaries, they emigrated in a body of 240,000 men, into Ethiopia, where settlements were assigned to them by the Ethiopian king (Herod. ii. 30; Diod. i. 67). It must, therefore, have been chiefly with his Ionian and Carian troops that Psammitichus carried on his wars against Syria and Phoenicia, with the hope of bringing those rich and fertile countries under his dominion, an object which was followed up by his son and successor Neco. It is related of Psammitichus that he laid siege to the city of Azotus (the Ashdod of Scripture) for twenty-nine years, till he took it (Herod. ii. 157); and he was in Syria, when the Scythians were advancing against Egypt, and induced them by large presents to abandon their undertaking. (Herod. i. 105.)

As Psammitichus had displeased a large portion of his subjects by the introduction of foreigners, he seems to have paid especial court to the priesthood. He built the southern propylæa of the temple of Hephaestus at Memphis, and a splendid aula, with a portico round it, for the habitation of Aps, in front of the temple (Herod. ii. 153). (On the reign of Psammitichus, see Heeren, African Nations. vol. ii. p. 306, &c.; Bunsen, Aegypten Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, vol. ii. p. 190, &c.; Böckh, Monnert und die Hamilton-Perioden, p. 341, &c.; Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. iii. p. 429, &c.)

2. The father of Inaros, who defeated and slew Achemenes, the son of Dareius Hystaspis. (Herod. vii. 7.) [INAROS.]

PSAOI (Ψαοί), of Plateaæ, a Greek writer, who continued the history of Diyllos in 30 books. (Diod. xxi. 5, p. 490, ed. Wesseling; Dionys. Comp. Verb. c. 4.) [DIYLLUS.]

PSELLUS (Ψελλός). There are several Greek writers of this name, concerning whom Leo Allatius wrote a valuable dissertation, which was appended by Fabricius to the fifth volume of his Bibliotheca Graeca, and is repeated by Harless in an abridged form, but with additions and corrections, in the second edition (vol. x. pp. 41, &c.).

1. Simon, surnamed Psellus, though a Hebrew, and not himself a writer, deserves mention here, as he was the grandfather of Josephus (Jos. Vit. 1).

2. Michael Psellus, the elder, of Andros, flourished in the 9th century. He was extremely learned in ancient literature and philosophy, and endeavoured to resist the torrent of ignorance and barbarism which was coming upon the Christian world. He was also an eager student of the Alexandrian philosophy. By these pursuits he incurred the suspicion of one of his own pupils, named Constantine, who attacked him in some elegant verses, as he had denounced Christianity. Upon this, Psellus placed himself under the care of the celebrated Photius; and having thus improved his knowledge of theology, he replied to his adversary in a long iambic poem, which is not now extant. Cave places him at A.D. 870 (Hist. Lit. s. a. vol. ii. p. 55); Baronius and others at A.D. 859 (Saxe, Onomat.). Some writers have stated that he was the tutor of the emperor Leo VI., surnamed Sapiens; but this arises from a confusion of the emperor Leo, who was a pupil of Photius, with Leo Byzantius, surnamed Philoponus, the grandson of John the patriarch; it was the latter who was the pupil of Psellus. Except the poem already referred to, we have no mention of any writings of the elder Psellus; but it is suspected by Cave, Allatius, and others, that he was the real author of some of the works which are ascribed to the younger Psellus, especially of the Dialogue on the Operations of Daemons, an unedited tract On Daemons, and a small work On Stones. The reasons for ascribing these works to the elder Psellus are their inferiority in style to the writings of the younger, and the traces they exhibit of the Alexandrian philosophy; but it is confessed that these reasons are inconsiderate. The Paraphrase to several Books of Aristotle, which is generally ascribed to Michael of Ephesus, is also thought by these scholars to be the work of the elder Psellus. (Compare Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. vol. iii. p. 538.)

3. Michael Constantinus Psellus the younger, a far more celebrated person, flourished in the 11th century of our era. He was born at Constantinople, of a consular and patrician family, A.D. 1020. When five years old he was placed in the hands of a tutor, to whom, however, he was said to have been far less indebted than to his own prodigious industry and talent. He afterwards studied at Athens, and excelled in all the learning of the age; so that he was a proficient at once in theology, jurisprudence, physics, mathematics, philosophy, and history. He taught philosophy, rhetoric, and dialectics, at Constantinople, where he stood forth as almost the last upholder of the falling cause of learning. The emperors honoured him with the title of Prince of the Philosophers (φιλοσοφον βασιλευς), and did not disdain to use his counsels, and in effecting their elevation he even had a share. The period during which he thus flourished at Constantinople extends over the reigns of Constantinus Monomachus (A.D. 1042-1054), his empress Theodora (to A.D. 1056), and Michael Stratonicus, who succeeded Theodora, and who entrusted Psellus with a conciliatory mission to Isaac Comnenus, whose soldiers had saluted emperor A.D. 1057. He still remained in favour with both these emperors, and with Constantinus Ducas, who succeeded Comnenus in A.D. 1060, and also with his successor Eudocia, and her three sons. When Romanus Diogenes, whom Eudocia had married, was also declared emperor (A.D. 1068), Psellus was one of his counsellors; but three years afterwards he was the chief adviser, among the senators, of the measure by which Diogenes was deposed, and Michael VII. Ducas, the son of Constantinus Ducas, elected in his place, A.D. 1071. Michael was the pupil of Psellus himself, by whom he had been so thoroughly imbued with the love of letters, that, in spite of the remonstrances of Psellus, he devoted himself to study and writing prose, to neglect of his imperious duties. To this faithful Michel should be ingratified for permitting his tutor to be supplanted in his favour by Joannes Italus, a man of far less talent, but an eloquent sophist, and a great favourite with the nobles, in discussions with whom the emperor spent his time. The deposition of Michael Ducas (A.D. 1078) was followed by the fall of Psellus, who was compelled by the new emperor, Nicephorus Botanias, to retire into a monastery; and in his dishonoured old age he witnessed the elevation of his rival to the title of Prince of the Philosophers, which he himself had so long held, and which the next emperor, Alexius Comnenus, conferred upon Joannes, in A.D. 1081. Psellus appears to have lived at least till A.D. 1105; some suppose that he was still alive in 1110, the thirtieth year of Alexius Comnenus. He was not only the most accomplished scholar, but also the most voluminous writer of his age. His works are both in prose and poetry, on a vast variety of subjects, and distinguished by an eloquence and taste which are worthy of a better period.

A great number of the works of Psellus are still unedited. Of those which have been printed there is no complete collection. In 1532 a work was printed at Venice, in 8vo., and reprinted at Paris in 1541, in 12mo., entitled Pselli Introductio in sex Philosophiae Modus: Synopsis quinque vocum et decem Categoriarum, together with similar works by Blemmides and Georgius Pachymerius. With this exception, all his works have been published singly, as follows:—1. Peri ἄγνωστου ἀνθρώπου, de Operatione Daemonum Dialogus, Gr. ed. G. Guadamini, Paris, 1615, 8vo.; carelessly reprinted, Kilom. 1688, 12mo. 2. De Lapidum Virtutibus, Gr. Lat. ed. Phil. Jac. Marc-senus, Tolosa, 1615, 8vo.; re-edited by J. Steph. Bernardus, Lugd. Bat. 1745, 8vo. (It has been already stated that some scholars attribute these works to the elder Psellus.) 3. Synopsis Organ Aristotelici, Gr. Lat. ed. a Elia Ehinger F. Aug. Vind. 1597, 8vo. 4. Mathematical Works, namely, (1) complete; Pseli Opus in quatuor Mathematicas Disciplinas, Arithmeticae, Musicae, Geometries, et Astronomiae, ed. Arseino, Archiopisc. Monemus, Gr. Venet. 1552, 8vo.; reprinted, Paris, 1545, 12mo.; re-edited by G. Xylander, Basili. 1556, 8vo.; (2) separate portions; Geometria, stud. M. C. The Greek Anthology contains one epigram ascribed to Psellus, which, in the absence of any further information, may be ascribed to the younger Michael Psellus, as the most celebrated person of the name. (Brunck, Anal. vol. iii. p. 127; Ja-

4. Ioannes Psellus, a Byzantine writer, whose time is unknown, and to whom are ascribed three poems. Constantinus Psellus, and some other writers of the same name, scarcely deserve mention. Very little is known of them, and in the statements which are made respecting them they are perpetually confounded with the younger Michael Psellus. (See Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. x. p. 97.)

[PS.]

PSIAX, an Athenian vase-painter, whose name is found inscribed on a lecythus made by Hilius, in the following form, ΨΙΑΞ ΕΡΑΦΕΝ. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 53, 54; comp. pp. 47, 48.)

[PS.]

PSILAS (Ψωλας), i.e. "the giver of wings," or the "unbearded," a surname of Dionysus, under which he was worshipped at Amyclae. (Paus. iii. 19. § 6; Lobeck ad Parynych. p. 435.)

[LS.]

PSOPHIS (Ψωφης), the founder of the town of Psophis in Arcadina, was, according to some, a son of Arrhon, but, according to others, Psophis was a woman, a daughter of Xanthus or of Eryx. (Paus. viii. 24. § 1.)

PSYCHE (Ψυχη), that is, "breath" or "soul," occurs in the later times of antiquity, as a personification of the human soul, and Apuleius (Met. iv. 28, &c.) relates about her the following beautiful allegoric story. Psyche was the youngest of the three daughters of some king, and excited by her beauty the jealousy and envy of Venus. In order to avenge herself, the goddess ordered Amor to inspire Psyche with a love for the most contemptible of all men: but Amor was so stricken with her beauty that he himself fell in love with her. He accordingly conveyed her to some charming place, where he, unseen and unknown, visited her every night, and left her as soon as the day began to dawn. Psyche might have continued to have enjoyed without interruption this state of happiness, if she had attended to the advice of her beloved, never to give way to her curiosity, or to inquire who he was. But her jealous sisters made her believe that in the darkness of night she was embracing some hideous monster, and accordingly one night, while Amor was asleep, she approached him with a lamp, and, to her amazement, she beheld the most handsome and lovely of the gods. In her excitement of joy and fear, a drop of hot oil fell from her lamp upon his shoulder. This awoke Amor, who censured her for her mistrust, and escaped. Psyche’s peace was now gone all at once, and after having attempted in vain to throw herself into a river, she wandered about from temple to temple, inquiring after her beloved, and at length came to the palace of Venus. There her real sufferings began, for Venus retained her, treated her as a slave, and imposed upon her the hardest and most humiliating labours. Psyche would have perished under the weight of her sufferings, had not Amor, who still loved her in secret, invisibly comforted and assisted her in her labours. With his aid she at last succeeded in overcoming the jealousy and hatred of Venus; she became immortal, and was united with him for ever. It is not difficult to recognise in this lovely story the idea of which it is merely the mythical embodiment, for Psyche is evidently the human soul, which is purified by passions and misfortunes, and is thus prepared for the enjoyment of true and pure happiness. (Comp. Manso, Versuche, p. 346, &c.) In works of art Psyche is represented as a maiden with the wings of a butterfly, along with Amor in the different situations described in the allegoric story. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 222, Tafel. 32.)

PSYCHRISTUS, JACOBUS. [JACOBUS, No. 1.]

PTERAS (Πτερας), of Delphi, a mythical artist, who was said to have built the second temple of Apollo at Delphi. The tradition was that the first temple was made of branches of the wild laurel from Tempe; and that the second was made of bees, of wax and bees’ wings. The name of Ptolemaeus. (Πτολεμαῖος), the name of two mythical personages, one a son of Peiranea, who accompanied Agamemnon as charioteer to Troy (Hom. II. iv. 228), and the other a son of Damoclisthon, king of Thebes. (Paus. ix. 5. § 8. s. 9, 10.) [P. S.]

PTOLEMAEUS (Πτολεμαῖος), minor historical persons. (Several persons of this name, which appears to have been one in its origin exclusively Macedonian, occur among the officers and generals of Alexander the Great, whom it is not always easy to distinguish from one another.)

1. Son of Lagus. [PTOLEMAEUS I. king of Egypt.]

2. Son of Philip, an officer who commanded the leading squadron of Macedonian cavalry at the passage of the Granicus. (Arr. Anab. i. 14.) It is supposed by Gronovius (ad Arr. l. c.) and by Droysen, that he is the same who was afterwards left by Alexander with a force of 3000 foot and 200 horse to defend the province of Caria, and who subsequently, together with Asander the governor of Lydia, defeated the Persian general Oromtotales, b.c. 332. (Arr. Anab. xi. 23, ii. 5.)

3. One of the select officers called Somatophylakes, or guards of the king's person, who was killed at the siege of Halicarnassus, b.c. 334. (Arr. Anab. i. 22.) Freisheim, in his supplement to Curtius (ii. 10. § 13), has assumed this to be the son of Philip, but it is more probable, as already pointed out, that the latter was the governor of Caria.

4. Son of Seleucus, another of the Somatophylakes, who combined with that distinguished post the command of one of the divisions of the phalanx. He was lately married when he accompanied Alexander on his expedition to Asia, b.c. 334, on which account he was selected by the king to command the body of Macedonians, who were allowed to return home for the winter at the end of the first campaign. In the following spring he rejoined Alexander at Gordium, with the troops under his command, accompanied by fresh reinforcements. At the battle of Issus (b.c. 332) his division of the phalanx was one of those opposed to the Greek mercenaries under Dareius, and upon which the real brunt of the action consequently devolved; and he himself fell in the conflict, after displaying the utmost valour. (Arr. Anab. i. 24, 29, ii. 8, 10; Curt. iii. 9. § 7.)

5. An officer who commanded a force of Thracian mercenaries, with which he joined Alexander in Bactria, b.c. 329. (Arr. Anab. iv. 7; Curt. vii. 10. § 11.)

6. Son of Ptolemy, an officer appointed by Antipater in b.c. 321, to be one of the Somatophylaces of the titular king, Philip Arrhidaeus. (Arr. ap. Phot. p. 72, a.) Nothing more is known of him, but Droysen conjectures that he was a son of Numa. (Droysen, vol. i. p. 154.)

7. Nephew of Antigonus, the general of Alexander, who afterwards became king of Asia. His name is first mentioned as present with his uncle at the siege of Nora in b.c. 320, when he was given up to Eumenes as a hostage for the safety of the latter during a conference with Antigonus. (Plut. Eum. 10.) At a later period we find him entrusted by his uncle with commands of importance. Thus in b.c. 315, when Antigonus was preparing to make head against the formidable coalition organized against him, he placed Ptolemy at the head of the army which was destined to carry on operations in Asia Minor against the generals of Cassander. This object the young general successfully carried out—relieved Amisus, which was besieged by Asclepiodorus, and recovered the whole satrapy of Cappadocia; after which he advanced into Bithynia, of which he compelled the king Zipoetes to join his alliance, and then occupied Ionia, from whence Seleucus withdrew on his approach. (Diod. xix. 57, 60.) He next threatened Caria, which was however for a time defended by Myrmidon, the Egyptian general; but the following year Ptolemy was able to strike a decisive blow in that quarter against Eupolemus, the general of Cassander, whom he surprised and totally defeated. (Id. ib. 62, 68.) The next summer (b.c. 313) the arrival of Antigonus himself gave a decided preponderance to his arms in Asia Minor, and Ptolemy, after rendering active assistance in the sieges of Caunus and Issus, was sent with a considerable army to Greece to carry on the war there against Cassander. His successes were at first rapid; he drove out the garrisons of his adversary from Chalcis and Eretria, invaded Attica, where he compelled Demetrius of Phalaris to make overtures of submission, and then carried his arms triumphantly through Boeotia, Phocis, and Locris. Wherever he went he expelled the Macedonian garrisons, and proclaimed the liberty and independence of the several cities. After this he directed his march to the Peloponnesse, where the authority of Antigonus had been endangered by the recent defection of his general Telesphorus. (Id. ib. 75, 77, 78, 87.) Here he appears to have remained till the peace of 311 suspended hostilities in that quarter. But he considered that his services had not met with their due reward from Antigonus; and when, therefore, in b.c. 310 the kings of Macedonia and Egypt were preparing to renew the war, Ptolemy suddenly abandoned the cause of his uncle and concluded a treaty with Cassander and the son of Lagus. Probably his object was to establish himself in the chief command in the Peloponnesse; but the reconciliation of Polyperchon with Cassander must have frustrated this object: and on the arrival of the Egyptian king with a fleet at Cos, Ptolemy repaired from Chalcis to join him. He was received at first with the utmost favour, but soon gave offence to his new patron by his intrigues and ambitious demonstrations, and was in consequence thrown into prison and compelled to put an end to his life by poison, b.c. 309. (Id. xx. 19, 27.) Schlosser has represented this general as an enthusiast in the cause of the liberty of Greece, but there seems no reason to suppose that his professions to that effect were more earnest or sincere than those of his contemporary Antigonus.

8. Son of Lysimachus, king of Thrace. He was the eldest of the three sons of that monarch by his last wife Arsinoy, and the only one who escaped falling into the hands of Ptolemy Ceraunus. Having in vain urged his mother not to trust to the friendly professions of the usurper, he himself appears to have made his escape and taken refuge with Monuinus, king of the Dardanians, whom he persauced to take up arms in his cause, but we know nothing of the events of the war. (Justin. xxiv. 2; Trog. Pomp. ProL xxiv.) It is probable, however, that the Ptolemy who is mentioned as establishing, or asserting, a transient claim to the throne of Macedonedia, during the period of anarchy which followed the death of Ptolemy Ceraunus (b. c. 290—277), is no other than the one in question. (Porphyry, op. Euseb. Arm. p. 157; Dacierus, op. Saneell. p. 267.)

3. Son of Ptolemy, king of Epirus, by his wife Antigone, a step-daughter of Ptolemy Lagi. When only fifteen years of age he was left by his father in charge of his hereditary dominions, when Ptolemyus himself set out on his expedition to Italy, b. c. 280. (Justin. xviii. 1.) Of his proceedings during his father's absence we know nothing: but immediately after the return of Ptolemyus, b. c. 274, we find Ptolemy actively co-operating with him, reducing Corcyra with a small force: and after the defeat of Antigonus Gonatas, repulsing him in an attempt to recover his lost kingdom, and inflicting on him a second defeat. He afterwards accompanied Ptolemyus on his expedition to the Peloponnesus, b. c. 272, and took a prominent part in the attack on Sparta, but in the march from thence towards Argos, Areus having occupied the mountain passes, a severe combat ensued, in which Ptolemyus, who commanded the advanced guard of his father's army, was slain. Young as he was, he had given the memory of his prowess, and of personal prowess, and, had his life been spared, would probably have rivalled the renown of his father. (Justin. xxv. 3, 4; Plut. Pyth. 28, 30.)

10. Son of Alexander II. king of Epirus. [Ptolemaeus, king of Epirus.]

11. An illegitimate son of Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, who was appointed by his father to command at Ephesus, when that important city fell into his hands during the war with Antiochus II. Ptolemyus was subsequently induced to revolt from his father, in conjunction with Timarchus, tyrant of Miletus, and attempted to establish his own power at Ephesus, but was compelled by a mutiny of his Thracian mercenaries to take refuge in the temple of Diana, where he was slain together with his mistress Eirene. (Trog. Pomp. ProL xxvi.; Athen. xiii. p. 583, a.; Niebuhr, XL Schrif. p. 265—271.) Son of Chrysermus, an officer high in the confidence of Ptolemy Philopator. He had been for some time on friendly terms with Cleomenes, whom he visited during his confinement; but accidentally betrayed to the latter the true intentions of the king of Egypt in regard to him, and thus gave rise to his attempted insurrection. On the first breaking out of the tumult Ptolemyus, having issued forth from the palace, was instantly attacked and put to death by three of the friends of Cleomenes, b. c. 220. (Plut. Cleom. 36, 37.)

13. Another person of the same name was governor of the city of Alexandria at the time of the outbreak of Cleomenes, and having fallen in with the little band of Spartans, was dragged from his chariot and put to death. (Polyb. v. 39; Plut. Cleom. 37.)

14. A Macedonian officer of high rank in the army of Philip V. during the Social War, who joined with Leontius and Mogaleas in promoting the treasonable designs of Apelles, and was in consequence put to death by Philip, n. c. 218. (Polyb. v. 25, 26, 29.)

15. Son of Thraseas, a leader of Greek mercenaries in the service of Ptolemy Philopator, who was appointed, together with Andromachus, to command the phalanx in the war against Antiocbus, n. c. 217. (Polyb. v. 65.)

16. Son of Aëropus, an officer in the service of Antiocbus the Great at the battle of Panium, n. c. 198. (Id. xvi. 16.)

17. Son of Euphemi, an officer in the service of Ptolemy Epiphanes king of Egypt, who was charged with the duty of arresting Scopas, and bringing him to trial. [Scopas.] (Polyb. xviii. 36.)

18. Son of Sosibius, the minister of Ptolemy Philopator. He was naturally of a haughty and ambitious character, and these qualities were increased by a visit he paid to the Macedonian court during the minority of Ptolemy Epiphanes. Hence, on his return to Egypt, he made common cause with his brother Sosibius, and took a prominent part against Tlepolemus who held the chief direction of affairs. Their intrigues were however defeated, and the party of Tlepolemus prevailed. (Polyb. xvi. 22.)

19. Surnamed Macron, an Egyptian officer, who was appointed to the government of Cyprus during the minority of Ptolemy Philometor; an office which he discharged with zeal and ability. By prudent economy in the administration of the island, he accumulated a large sum of money which he sent to Philometor, on his attaining his majority, and thus secured the favour of the young king (Polyb. xxvii. 12, and Vales. ad loc.). What led to the change in his policy we know not, but we subsequently find him betraying his trust, and giving over the island of Cyprus to Antiocbus Epiphanes. (2 Macc. x. 12.)

20. A rhetorician of Alexandria, who was employed as ambassador by Ptolemy Euergetes II. to Antiocbus Epiphanes when the latter was besieging Alexandria, n. c. 170 (Polyb. xxviii. 16). He is perhaps the same person with the brother of Comanus, whom we find accompanying that minister on his embassy to Rome in n. c. 162. (Id. xxvii. 27.)

21. An Egyptian, surnamed Symphetus, who was appointed by Ptolemy Euergetes II. to govern Cyrene during his absence, when he went to Rome in n. c. 162, to prefer his complaints in person against his brother Philometor. He subsequently joined the rebel against Cyreneus against Euergetes, and appears to have commanded the army with which they defeated him near the Catabasmons. (Polyb. xxxi. 26.)

22. Surnamed Caesarion, a son of C. Julius Caesar and Cleopatra. [Caesarion.]

23. Surnamed Philadelphus, a son of M. Antony, the Triumvir, by Cleopatra. He was the youngest of their three children, and could therefore hardly have been born before n. c. 39. (Dion Cass. xlix. 32.) In n. c. 34, he was proclaimed by his father king of Syria, including Cilicia, and all the provinces west of the Euphrates (Dion Cass. xlix. 41; Plut. Ant. 54). After the death of Antony, and the subjugation of Egypt, n. c. 30, his life was spared by Augustus, at the intercession of Juba and Cleopatra, and he was brought up by Octavia with her own children, but we hear nothing more of him. (Dion Cass. li. 15.; Plut. Ant. 87.) [E. H. B.] PTOLEMAEUS (Πτολεμαίος), literary. The celebrated astronomer and geographer of this name is spoken of below PTOLEMAEUS, CLAUDIUS.

I. HISTORIANS. 1. Of Megalopolis, the son of Agesarchus, wrote a history of king Ptolemy IV. Philopator, which is quoted by Atheneus (vi. p. 246, c. x. p. 425, c. xii. p. 577, f.), Clemens Alexandrinus (Protrep. p. 13), and Arnoldus (vi. 4). From these passages it is clear that the historian lived at the court of Ptolemy, who reigned from B.C. 222 to B.C. 204. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. xiii. ed. Westermann; Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. v. p. 295.) Schweighäuser supposes that the Ptolemy, who was governor of Cyprus during the regency of Ptolemy Philometor, is the same as Ptolemy of Megalopolis (Polyb. xvii. 12.); but the governor of Cyprus was a different person. [See above, No. 19.]

2. An Egyptian priest, of Mendes, who wrote on the ancient history of Egypt (τὰ Ἀιγυπτίων ἀνέκδοτα ἱστοριών, Syncell, p. 64). He related the acts of the Egyptian kings in three books, as we learn from Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. p. 138), who immediately before quotes from Ptolemy ἐν τοῖς χρόνοις, by which it appears doubtful whether we are to understand another distinct work, or a set of chronological tables connected with his great work on Egyptian history. Tattian also (Adv. Graec. 59) mentions him as a distinguished chro-nologer, and presently afterwards refers to his χρόνοι. A scholiast on Homer also quotes from Ptolemy, ἐν τῷ πρώτῳ χρόνῳ (Schol. Buttin. in Od. iv. 228). He is also referred to by Justin (Excerpt. ad Graec. p. 10), Eusebius (Præp. Evang. x. 12), Tertullian (Apol. 19), and Cyril (Julian. i. p. 15).

He probably lived under the first Roman emperors; for, since his work on Egypt was quoted by Apion (Clem. Alex. i. c.), it could not have been written later than the time of Tiberius; and, on the other hand, the absence of any allusion to it in Strabo, or any earlier writer, affords some presumption that it could not have been written earlier than the time of Augustus. This conclusion would become certain, if we were to adopt the opinion of Meursius and Vossius, that this Ptolemy was the author of a work upon King Herod, which is quoted by Ammonius (de Var. Diff. s. e. Θουατερία); but it is at least as probable that the author there cited is Ptolemy of Ascalon, of whose authority Ammonius makes use in other articles. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. pp. 225, 226, ed. Westermann; Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. v. p. 296.)

II. PHILOSOPHERS AND SOPHISTS. 3. 4. Of Alexandria, two disciples of Epicurus, of whom the only further information we possess is, that they were distinguished as δὲ μέλας and δὲ λευκός (Diog. Laërt. x. 25).

5. Of Cyrene, a sceptic, was the disciple of Eubulus, the disciple of Ephratus, the disciple of Timon. Diogenes tells us, that Timon had no successor until his school was restored by Ptolemy (lx. 115, 116).

6. Of Naukratis, a sophist, named Marathon, was a hearer of Heroes Atticus, but an imitator of Polemon; and an opponent of Hermacleides Lycius. The particulars of his life, which are not of sufficient importance to be mentioned here, may be read in Philostratus, (Vit. Sophist. ii. pp. 591, &c. 606).

7. A sophist and Peripatetic philosopher, of the beginning of the third century of our era, whom Longinus mentions that he had seen in his youth. We also learn from Longinus that Ptolemy left no writings except poems and declamations. (Proef. lib. περὶ τῶν καθένας, ap. Porphyry. Vitt. Platini. p. 127; comp. Harless, ad Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. iii. p. 304, n. rr.)

8. A Platonic philosopher, of whom nothing is known, except that he lived before Proclus, who quotes him in his work on the Timaeus of Plato (i. 7, b.)

9. Of Alexandria, sur- named Pindarion, was the son of Onomarchus, and the disciple of Aristarchus (Suid. s. e.). Suidas mentions the following as his works:—'Ομορφών ὑποτεθεμένων Βιβλία γ', περὶ τοῦ Ομορφοῦ χαρακτῆρος, περὶ Νεολαύδου περὶ λέξεως, περὶ τοῦ παρ.'Ομορ Οὔιτον, περὶ Ἀστερόπαινοι περὶ τοῦ Ομορμηνωμένου, and others. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. i. p. 520, vol. vi. p. 378).

10. Another disciple of Aristarchus, on account of his close adherence to whom he was called Ἐπι- στευτος or Ἐπιστῆς. He was also a hearer of the grammarians Hellanicus. He wrote upon the Wouns mentioned by Homer (περὶ τῶν παρ᾽ Ομηροῦ παραγωγῶν), and a Commentary on the Odys- seus (Suid. s. v.; Fabric. Bibli. Graec. ii. cc.).

11. The father of the grammarians Aristonicus, who himself was also a grammarians. Both father and sons were distinguished as teachers at Rome. The following were his works:—τὰ διδάσκαι εἰς τοὺς τρειγμ. ἐξείς ὑποτεθεμένα τοῖς τρειγμ. ὑποτεθεμένα, τὰ περὶ τοῦ ποιητῆ ἱστορικῆ, τὰ περὶ Μουντα καὶ Ἡρωικά (Suid. s. v.; Fabric. Bibli. Graec. ii. cc.).

12. Of Ascalon, taught at Rome. His works were, προσδοκία Ὀμηρική, περὶ Ἑλληνισμοῦ ἤτοι ὡσείς βιβλία ε', περὶ μέτον, περὶ τῆς Ὀδυσσείας Ἀριστάρχου διορθώσεως, περὶ διαφανῶς λέξεως, and other grammatical works. The most important of these works was that περὶ διαφανῶς λέξεως, which formed the foundation of the similar work of Ammonius. It is still extant, and it is printed in the Bibliotheca Graecæ of Fabricius (vol. vii. pp. 156—163, comp. vol. i. p. 52).

13. Of Alexandria, named Chennis, flourished under Trajan and Hadrian. His works were, περὶ παραβασίδος ἱστοριας; an historical drama, entitled Ἠρωις; an epic poem, in twenty-four rhapsodies, entitled Ἀρχάμων, and some others. (Suid. s. v.) We still possess in the Bibliotheca of Photius (Cod. 190) an epitome of the work of Ptolemy, περὶ τῆς εἰς τοὺς καθίσματα καθίσματος, in seven books, which there can be little doubt is the same work as that which Suidas mentions by the title περὶ παραβασίδος ἱστοριας. Photius commends the work as containing in a small space information which a whole life might be spent in collecting from other books; but he adds, that it contains many things which are marvellous and absurd, and badly put together. It is in fact a fragment of the most heterogeneous materials. It is addressed to a certain learned lady named Tertullia.

Suidas and Photius speak of Ptolemy as δ᾽ Ἡρακλείδος, which is naturally interpreted the son of Heracleion; but there is some doubt whether it ought not rather to be understood as meaning the father or teacher of Heracleion. (see Ionius, de Script. Hist. Philon. i. 2, § 5, and Villoisso, Proef. ad Apollon. Lex. Hom. p. iv.). Tzetzes calls him Ptolemy Helenoplaestos.
Suidas mentions a Ptolemy of Cythera, an epic poet, who wrote a poem about the virtues of the plant called palacantha; but this statement is perhaps the result of some confusion, since the work of Ptolemy Chemnus contains various marvelous statements respecting that very plant.

PTOLEMAEUS.

PTOLEMAEUS (Πτολεμαῖος), a surgeon, one of whose medical formulae is quoted by Celsus (De Med. vii. 7, p. 126), and who must, therefore, have lived in or before the first century after Christ. He is perhaps the same person whose opinion on the cause of dropsy is quoted by Caecilius Aurelianus (De Morb. Chron. iii. 8. p. 479), and who is called by him a follower of Erasistratus. Perhaps also he is the physician whose medical formulae are quoted by Asclepiades Pharmacian (ap. Galen. *De Compos. Medicin. sec. Loc. ii. 2, vol. xii. p. 594; see also ibid. iv. 7. p. 789, De Compos. Medicin. sec. Gen. vol. xiv. vol. xiii. pp. 849, 853). [W. A. G.]

PTOLEMAEUS (Πτολεμαῖος) of ALORUS, regent, or according to some authors king of Macedonia. The circumstances connected with his elevation, and the revolutions in which he took part, are very variously related. Diodorus (xxv. 71) calls him a son of Amyntas II.; but this seems to be a certain mistake, and Dippusius (Synecel. p. 263, b.) says that he was a stranger to the royal family. During the short reign of Alexander II., the eldest son of Amyntas, we find Ptolemy engaged in war with that prince, and apparently disputing the throne with him. Their differences were terminated for a time by the intervention of Pelopidas, but the reconciliation was a hollow one, and Ptolemy soon took an opportunity to remove the young king by assassination. (Plut. *Ptol. 26, 27; Diod. xv. 71; Maryp. op. Athen. xiv. p. 629, d.) It seems probable that this murder was perpetrated with the connivance, if not at the instigation, of the queen-mother Eurydice [Eurydice, No. 1.]; and Ptolemy in consequence obtained possession of the supreme power without opposition. But the appearance of a new pretender to the throne, Pausanias, soon reduced him to great difficulties, from which he was rescued by the intervention of the Athenian general Iphicrates, who established the brother of Alexander, Perdiccas III., upon the throne, while Ptolemy exercised the virtual sovereignty under the name of regent. (Aesch. de F. Leg. pp. 31, 32; Corn. Nep. Iphicr. 3.) It was probably after this that the partisans of the late king invoked the assistance of Pelopidas, who invaded Macedonia with a mercenary force, but was defeated by Ptolemy, who assumed his resentment by prosecutions of submission, and obtained the confirmation of his authority as regent, giving hostages for his friendly disposition towards the Thebans. (Plut. Pelop. 27.) To this new alliance it may be ascribed that Ptolemy abandoned his friendly relations with the Athenians, notwithstanding the benefits he had received from Iphicrates. (Aesch. l. c. p. 32.) He continued to administer the sovereign power for a period of three years, when he was, in his turn, assassinated by the young king Perdicas III., b. c. 364. (Diod. xv. 77.) Diodorus gives Ptolemy the title of king, and his name is included by the chroniclers among the Macedonian kings (Dexippus *or. * Hist. Phil. vii. 77; Plut. Ptol. 23, 26, 27; Epict. Ital. v. 67, i. c.; Euseb. Hist. vii. 26, p. 779); but it seems more probable that he assumed the regal authority without its designation. (Compare, in regard to the above facts, Thirlwall's Greece, vol. v. p. 162—165; Flate, Gesch. Macedonien, vol. i. pp. 38—40; and Abel, Makedonien vor König Philipp. p. 217—223.)

PTOLEMAEUS (Πτολεμαῖος), surnamed *APION (Ἀπίων) king of Cyrene, was an illegitimate son of Ptolemy Physcon, king of Egypt, by his mistress Eirene. His father left him by his will the kingdom of the Cyrenaica, to which he appears to have succeeded without opposition, on the death of Physcon, b. c. 117. We know nothing of the events of his reign, but at his death in b. c. 90, he bequeathed his kingdom by his will to the Roman people. The senate, however, refused to accept the legacy, and declared the cities of the Cyrenaica free. They were not reduced to the condition of a province until near thirty years afterwards; a circumstance which has given rise to much confusion, some of the later Roman writers having considered this latter date to be that of the death of Apion, and the accompanying bequest. Hence Sextus Rufus, Ammianus, and Hieronymus were led to suppose that there were two kings of the name of Apion, an error in which they have been followed by Scaliger, Frinchemius, and other modern writers. The subject has been satisfactorily examined by Valesius in his notes to Ammianus, and by Clinton. (Justin. xxvi. 5.; Liv. Epit. Ixx.; Jul. Obsequens. c. 109; Eutrop. vii. 11; Sex. Ruf. e. 13; Amm. Marc. xxii. 16. § 24; and Vales. ad loc.; Hieronym. in Euseb. Chron. Or. 171. 1, and Ol. 178.; Clinton, P. H. vol. iii. p. 369, note.)

PTOLEMAEUS (Πτολεμαῖος), surnamed *CERAEUS, king of Macedonia, was the son of Ptolemy I. king of Egypt, by his second wife Eurydice. The period of his birth is not mentioned; but if Droysen is right in assigning the marriage of Eurydice with Ptolemy to the year b. c. 321 (see Hellenism, vol. i. p. 154), their son cannot have been born till b. c. 320. He must, at all events, have been above thirty years old in b. c. 265, when the aged king of Egypt came to the resolution of setting aside his claim to the throne, and appointing his younger son, Ptolemy Philadelphus, his successor. (Appian. Syr. 62; Justin. xvi. 2.) To this step we are told that the old king was led not only by his warm attachment to his wife Berenice and her son Philadelphus, but by apprehensions of the violent and passionate character of his eldest son, which subsequent events proved to be but too well founded. Ptolemy Ceraunus quitted the court of Egypt in disgust, and repaired to that of Lyons, where his sister Lysandra was married to Agathocles, the heir to the Thracian crown. On the other hand, Arsinoë, the sister of Ptolemy Philadelphus, was the wife of Lysimachus himself, and exercised great influence over the mind of the old king. But instead of this being employed against her half-brother Cærenus, she appears soon to have made common cause with him; and he not only assisted her in her intrigues against Agathocles, but is even said to have assassinated that unhappy prince with his own hand. (Menn. c. 9; Just. xvii. 1.) The conduct of Ptolemy in the war that followed between Lysimachus and Seleucus is differently reported: Pausanias (i. 16. § 2) represents him as quitting the court of Lysimachus, and taking refuge with his rival, while Mennon (c. 12) states, with more probability, that he adhered to Lysimachus to the last, but after his death made his peace with Seleucus. It is certain, however, that he was received by the latter in the most friendly manner, and treated with all the distinction due to his royal birth. Seleucus, we are told, even held out hopes to him of establishing him on the throne of Egypt, when Ptolemy, probably deeming the crown of Macedonia to be more easily within his grasp, basely assassinated his new patron at Lysimachia, n. c. 280, and immediately assumed the diadem himself. (Appian. Syr. 62; Mennon. c. 12; Just. xvii. 2; Paus. i. 16. § 2; Euseb. Am. 157.) His authority appears to have been acknowledged without opposition by the army, and this enabled him to make himself master, with little difficulty, of the European dominions of Lysimachus. Antiochus, the son of Seleucus, was sufficiently occupied with maintaining his Asiatic and hereditary possessions, and Ptolemy Philadelphus was well contented to see his half-brother established on another throne, which led him to abandon all projects concerning that of Egypt. The usurper had the address to gain over Pyrrhus king of Epeirus, who might have proved his most dangerous rival, by a promise of assisting him with an auxiliary force in his expedition to Italy. Thus his only remaining opponent was Antigonus, the son of Demetrius, who now attempted to recover the throne of his father, and for him Ptolemy was more than a match. His fleet, supported by an auxiliary squadron of the Heracleans, totally defeated that of Antigonus, and compelled the latter to withdraw into Boeotia, while Ptolemy established himself, without further opposition, on the throne of Macedonia. (Mennon. c. 13; Just. xvii. 2, xxiv. 1.)

He was now able to fortify himself in his new position by a treaty with Antiochus, who acknowledged him as sovereign of Macedonia. But his jealousy and apprehensions were still excited by Arsinœ, the widow of Lysimachus, who had taken refuge at Cassandra with her two sons, Lysimachus and Philip; and he endeavoured to decoy them into his power by offering to marry Arsinœ, and share the kingdom with her children. The queen, notwithstanding her previous experience of his character, gave credit to his oaths and protestations and received him at Cassandra, but Ptolemy took the opportunity, during the nuptial festivities, to seize on the fortress, and immediately caused the two young princes to be assassinated. (Justin. xxiv. 1—3.) Their elder brother Ptolemy had, it appears, made his escape, and taken refuge with Monunius, king of the Dardanians, who for a time espoused his cause, and waged war, though without effect, against the Macedonian king. (Trog. Pomp. Proli. xxiv.)

Ptolemy, however, was not destined long to enjoy the throne which he had obtained by so many crimes. Before the close of the year which had witnessed the death of Seleucus, he was alarmed by the approach of a new and formidable enemy, the Gauls, who, now, for the first time, appeared on the frontiers of Macedonia. Their chief, Belgus, sent overtures for a treaty to Ptolemy, but the Macedonian king hautly refused them, and rejecting the professed assistance of Monunius, hastened to meet and give battle to the barbarian host. The result was most disastrous; the Macedonian army was totally routed, and the king, having been thrown from the elephant on which he was riding, fell alive into the hands of the enemy, by whom he was put to death in the most barbarous manner, and his head carried about on the point of a spear, in token of victory. (Justin. xxiv. 3—5; Paus. x. 19. § 7; Mennon. c. 14; Diod. xxii. Exc. Hoeschel. p. 495, Exc. Vales. p. 592; Dexippus ap. Sym. coll. p. 266; Polyb. ix. 35. § 4.)

Concerning the chronology of these events, see Clinton, (F. H. vol. i. pp. 237, 238.) It seems certain that the death of Ptolemy must have taken place before the end of n. c. 280, and that the period of seventeen months assigned to his reign by Dexippus (l. c.) must be reckoned from the death of Lysimachus, and not from that of Seleucus. (E. H. B.)

Ptolemaeus (Πτολεμαῖος), tetrarch of Chalcis in Syria, the son of Mennæus. He appears to have held the cities of Heliopolis and Chalcis as well as the mountain district of Íturaea, from whence he was in the habit of infesting Damascus and the more wealthy parts of Coele-Syria with predatory incursions. These Alexandras, queen of Judæa, endeavoured to repress by sending against him her son Aristobulus with an army, but without much success. Subsequently, when Pompey came into Syria, b. c. 64, Ptolemy was summoned to answer for his misdeeds, but was able to purchase impunity from the conqueror with a sum of a thousand talents. In b. c. 49, when Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, was put to death at Antioch by the partisans of Pompey, Ptolemy afforded shelter and protection to the brothers and sisters of the deceased prince, and his son Philippon at first married one of the captive princesses, Alexandra: but, afterwards, Ptolemy becoming enamoured of her herself, put Philippon to death, and made Alexandra his own wife.

After the battle of Pharsalia Ptolemy was confirmed by Caesar in the possession of his dominions, over which he continued to rule till his death in n. c. 40, when he was succeeded by his son Lysianias. The only occasion on which we meet with his name during this interval is in n. c. 42, when he united with Marion, prince of Tyre, in an attempt to restore Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, to the throne of Judæa. They were, however, both defeated by Herod. (Strab. xvi. p. 733; Joseph. Ant. xiii. 16. § 3, xiv. 3. § 2, 7. § 4, B. J. i. 9. § 2, 13. § 1.) We learn from his coins that he assumed the title of tetrarch. (Eckehl, vol. iii. p. 264.) (E. H. B.) Ptolemaeus, Claúdius ἡ Πτολεμαῖος Κλαύδιος. A few words will be necessary on PTOLEMAEUS.

PTOLEMAEUS.

the plan we intend to adopt in this article. Ptolemy stands before us in two distinct points of view: as a mathematician and astronomer; and as a geographer. There must of course be a separate treatment of these two characters. As an astronomer, it must be said that the history of the science, for a long train of centuries, presents nothing but comments on his writings: to treat the history of the latter would be so far to write that of astronomy itself. We shall, therefore, confine ourselves to the account of these writings, their principal contents, and the chief points of their bibliographical history, without entering into the biographical, or to the effect of the writings themselves, on the progress of science. And, though obliged to do this by the necessity of selection which our limits impose, we are also of opinion that the plan is otherwise the most advantageous. For, owing to that very close connection of Ptolemy's name with the history of astronomy of which we have spoken, the accessible articles on the subject are so discursive, that the reader may lose sight of the distinction between Ptolemy and his followers. The two other great leaders, Aristotle and Euclid, are precisely in the same predicament.

Of Ptolemy himself we know absolutely nothing but his date, which an astronomer always leaves in his works. He certainly observed in a.d. 139, at Alexandria; and Suidas and others call him Alexandrinus. If the canon presently mentioned be genuine (and it is not doubted), he survived A.D. 175, and thus, apart from the albuminous, he lived 161. Old manuscripts of his works call him Ptolemaeus Philadelphienus. But Theodorus, named Meliteniota (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. x. p. 411), in the eleventh century, describes him as of Ptolemais in the Thebaid, called Hermoeus. Accordingly, our personal knowledge of one of the most illustrious men that ever lived, both in merits and fame, and who resided and wrote in what might well be called the sister university to Athens, is limited to two accounts of one circumstance, between the uncertainties of which it is impossible to decide, and which give his birth to opposite sides of the Nile. Weidler (Hist. Astron. p. 177) cites some description of his personal appearance from an Arabic writer, who does not state his source of information. Some writers call him king Ptolemy, probably misled by the name, which is nevertheless known to have been borne by private persons, besides the astronomer. On this, and some other gossip not worth citing, because no careful study has been given to its preface, p. 151. Ptolemy is then, to us, the author of certain works; and appears in the character of pro- nucleator of his own researches, and deliverer and extender of those of Hipparchus. In this last character there is some difficulty about his writings. It is not easy to distinguish him from his illustrious predecessor. It is on this account that we have deferred special mention of Hipparchus, as an astronomer, to the present article.

The writings of Ptolemy (independently of the work on geography, which will be noted apart) are as follows:—

1. Μεγάλη Σωταξίς τῆς Ἀστρονομίας, as Fabricius has it, and as it is very commonly called: but the Greek, both in Grynon and Halma, begins with μαθηματικῆς σωταξίως Ἀστρονομία. But the Tetrabiblous presently mentioned, the work on astrology, is also σωταξίως, in Fabricius mathematikê σωταξίως: and the heading Mathematuea Syntaxis, in several places of Schweiger, Hoffmann*, &c., would rather puzzle a beginner. To distinguish the two, the Arabs probably called the greater work μεγάλη, and afterwards μεγάλης: the title Almagest is a compound of this last adjective and the Arabic article, and must be considered as the European as well as the Arabic vernacular title. To this name we shall adhere; for though Syntaxis be more Greek, yet, as there are two syntaxes of Ptolemy, and others of other writers, we prefer a well-known and widely-spread word, adopted by all middle Latin writers, and enriched with numerous historical associations. It reminds us, too, of those who preserved and communicated the work in question; and but for whose just appreciation it would have probably been lost.

On the manuscripts of the Almagest, see Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 281) and Halma's preface, p. xiv. &c. Doppelmayr (we copy Halma) says the manuscript used by Grynon, the first therefore printed from, was given to the Nuremberg library by Regiomontanus, to whom it was given (probably as a legacy) by Cardinal Bessarion. De Murr could not find this manuscript at Nuremberg, but only that of Theon's commentary, given by Regiomontanus, as described: but Montignot testifies to having caused it to be consulted for his version of the catalogue. Halma somewhat hastily concludes that there are difficulties in the way of supposing this manuscript to have been used: but public libraries do sometimes lose their manuscripts. This Later edition may count as one manuscript unknown to Fabricius, and by various others, in the Royal Library at Paris, principally five, as follows:—First, a Paris manuscript (No. 2339) nearly perfect, cited by some who have used it as of the sixth century, but pretty certainly not later than the eighth. It bears a presentation inscription to John Lascari, of the imperial family, who is known to have been sent by Lorenzo di Medici twice to Constantinople, after its occupation by the Turks, to procure manuscripts. Secondly, a Florence manuscript of the twelfth century, marked 2390. Thirdly, a Venice manuscript, marked 313, supposed to be of the eleventh century. Fourthly, two Vatican manuscripts, marked 560 and 164, of about the twelfth century. These Florence, Venice, and Vatican manuscripts were probably returned to their original owners at the peace of 1015. The seizes made by the French in Italy have procured us the only two editions of Euclid and Ptolemy which give various readings.

The first Halma's corrected of the Almagest, and print is in the epitome left by Regiomontanus, and edited by Grossewth and Boemier, Venice, 1496, folio, headed "Epitome Joannis de Monte regio in almagestum Ptolomei." The dedication to Cardinal Bessarion calls it the epitome of Purbach, who commenced it, and his pupil Regiomontanus, who finished it. It is a full epitome, omitting, in parti-

* So far was this approbation of the word Syntaxis carried, that it was applied to various astrological works having nothing to do with Ptolemy, Hoffman has two works in his list which he supposes to be English translations of the astrological syntaxis, because they bear as titles "the Compost of Phatolomus." We have one of them; which is a common astrological almanack, having just as much relation to Ptolemy as the current number of Moore, namely, a folly in common with him.

Ptolemaeus. It was reprinted (Lalande) Basle, 1543, folio; Nuremberg, 1550, folio; and, apparently in the same year, another title was put to it (Halm, preface, p. xiii.). The first complete edition is the Latin version of Peter Liechtenstein, "Almagestem Claudii Ptolemei, Pheludienis Alexandrini...", Venice, 1515, folio (Lalande and Baily). It is scarce, but there is a copy in the Royal Society's library. Baily says that it bears internal marks, and was made from the Arabic (as was indeed generally admitted), and throws great light on the subsequent Greek editions and versions. Next comes the version of George of Trebizond, "Ptolemaei Almagestum, ex Versione Latina Georgii Trapezuntii," Venice, 1525, folio. (Fabricius, who is in doubt as to whether it was not 1527, and confounds it with the former version.) From all we can collect, however, no one asserts himself to have seen an earlier edition of the version of Trapezuntius than that of Venice, 1528, folio (with a red lily in the title page); and Hoffman sets down none earlier. Its title (from a copy before us) is "Claudii Ptolemaei Pheludienis Alexandrini Almagestum... latina donatum linguam ab Georgio Trapezuntio... anno salutis m.d.xxviii. habente." This version is stated in the preface to have been made from the Greek: the editor was Lucas Gauricus. The nine books of the Almagest by the Arab Geber, edited by Peter Apian, Nuremberg, 1534, folio, are often set down as a commentary on, almost an edition of, the Almagest, have no right whatever to either name, as we say from examination. Halm, observing in the epitome of Purbach and Regiomontanus strong marks of Arabic origin, and taking Geber to be in fact Ptolemy, concludes that the epitome was made from Geber, and reproves them for not naming their original. Halm must have taken Geber's work to be actually the Almagest, for, with the above censure, he admits that the two epitomists have caught the meaning and spirit of Ptolemy. It is worth while, therefore, to state, from examination of Geber (whom Halm had not seen), and comparison of it with the epitome in question, that neither is Geber a commentary on the Almagest, nor the epitome formed from Geber.

The first Greek text of the Almagest (as well as that of Euclid) was published by Symon Grynoeus, Basle, 1538, folio: "Κα. Πτολεμαίων μεγάλη επίστασις ευρατον εις τον μαγνηταν εσω τατον δια των... Theon." It is Greek only, and contains the Almagest, and the commentary of Theon [Pappus]. Basle, 1541, folio. Jerome Gemmaeus published "...omnium quae extant opera (Geographia excepta)..." This edition contains the "Almagest, Tetrabiblon, Centiloquium, and Intererrationum Significationes of Ptolemy, and the Hypotheses of Proclus. Except as containing the first professed collection of the works, it is not of note. As to its Almagest, it is Trapezuntius as given by Gauricus. The publisher, H. Petrus, seems to have found reason to know that he had been mistaken in his editor. In 1531 (Basle, folio) he republished it as "...omnium quae extant opera, praeter Geographiam, quam non dissimili formae, vel pari typographischen..." The contents are the same as in the former edition, with notes added by the new editor. Erasmus Reinbold published the first book only (Gr. Lat. with Scholia), Wittenberg, 1549, 8vo. (Lalande, who gives also 1560), and also 1569 (Halm). S. Gracillis (Leprèle) published the second book in Latin, Paris, 1556, 8vo. (Lal. Halm). J. B. Porta gave the first book in Latin, with Theon, Naples, 1588, 4to. (Lal.), and the first and second books in the same way, Naples, 1605, 4to. (Lal. Halm).

From the time of Galileo, at which we are now arrived, we cannot find that any complete version of the Almagest (Greek edition there certainly was none) was published until that of Halm, to which we now come. Halm shall not attempt to describe the disquisitions by Delambre, Ideler, &c. contained in this splendid collection, but shall simply note the contents of the first four volumes: for the rest see Theon. Of the manuscripts we have already spoken. The descriptions are—Paris, 1813, 1816, 1819, 1820, quarto. The first two volumes contain the Almagest, in Greek and French, with the various readings. The third contains the κατω βασιλεως and the φασεις των ασκανων of Ptolemy, and the works of Geminus. The fourth contains the ηθοδος των πλανημεων and the ἀγαθην των μαθητων of Ptolemy, and the ισοπόδων of Proclus.

The part of the Almagest which really concerns the modern astronomer, as part of the effective records of his science, is the catalogue of stars in the seventh and eighth books. Of this catalogue there have been several distinct editions. The earliest (according to Lalande) is a Latin version by John Novaignamus, from Trapezuntius, "...Phaenomena stellarum 1022 fixarum ad hanc actatem reducta..." Colonge, 1537, folio, with forty-eight drawings of the constellations by Albert Durer. The next (Baily) is a Greek edition (stated to be furnished by Halley), at the end of the third of the four volumes of Hudson's "Geographiae veteris Scriptores Graeci minores," Oxford, 1698—1712, 8vo. The next (Halm) is a French version by Montignot, Nancy, 1786, and Strasburg, 1787, 4to, translated into German by Bode, Berlin and Stettin, 1793, 8vo. The last, and by far the best, is that given (in Greek) by the late Francis Baily, in his collection of the catalogues of Ptolemy, Ulugh Begh, Tycho Brahe, Halley, and Hovelius, which forms volume xiii. of the Memoirs of the Royal Astronomical Society, London, 1843, 4to. This edition of the

* Mr. Baily, who closely examined all his editions, as will presently be noted, does not even give the name of this one, though to our know ledge it was one of those he tried to make use of.
catalogue is the one which should be cited. It gives the readings of the Florence and Paris manuscripts (from Halma), of the Greek of Grynoeus and Halma, and of the Latin of Liechtenstein and Trapezuntius, with corrections from our present astronomical knowledge very sparingly, and we believe very judiciously introduced. The astronomer might easily make Ptolemy's catalogue what it ought to have been; the scholar, from criticism alone, would certainly place many stars where it is impossible Ptolemy could have recorded them, as being in frequent conversation with Mr. Baily during the progress of his task, we can confidently say that he had no bias in favour of making his text astronomically correct at the expense of critical evidence; but that he was as fully impressed with the necessity of producing Ptolemy's errors as his truths.

Mr. Baily remarks, as to the catalogue, and the same appears as to other parts of the Almagest, that Halma often gives in the text he has chosen readings different from those of all his principal subjects of collation. This means that he has, in a considerable number of cases, either amended his text conjecturally, or preferred the reading of some minor manuscript, without particular mention. This is no great harm, since, as the readings of all his great sources are always given, it amounts to having one more choice from an unnamed quarter. But it is important that the critical reader of the edition should have frequent notice of it; and the more so, as much as the readings are at the end of each volume, without* text-reference from the places in which they occur.

On the preceding summary of the bibliographical history of the Almagest, we shall remark that the reader is not to measure the currency of it by the number of its editions. It was the gold which lay in the Bank, while paper circulated on its authority. All the European books on astronomy were fashioned upon it, and it was only the more learned astronomers who went to the common original. Euclid was actually read, and accordingly, as we have seen, the presses were crowded with editions of the Elements. But Ptolemy, in his own words, was better known by his astrology than by his astronomy. We now come to his other writings, on which we have less to say.

2. Περιτριβλιόν, or Quadrivalent de Apeilematibus et Justiciis Astrorum. With this goes another small work, called αριστοκρατία, or Fructus Liberorum Suorum, often called Centiloquium, from its containing a hundred aphorisms. Both of these works are astrological, and it has been doubted by some whether they be genuine. But the doubt merely arises from the feeling that the contents are unworthy of Ptolemy. The Tetrabiblon itself is, like the Almagest and other writings, dedicated to his brother Syrus: it refers, in the introduction, to another work on the mathematical theory. Both works

* If editors will put the various readings at the end of their volumes, instead of at the bottom of the pages, we should wish, when there are more volumes than one, that the readings for one volume should be inserted at the end of another. It would then be practicable to have the text and its variations open before the reader at one and the same moment, which, when two or three instances come close together, is very desirable.

have been twice printed in Greek, and together; first, by John Camerarius (Gr. Lat.), Nuremberg, 1535, 4to; secondly, with new Latin version and preface, by Philip Melanthon, Basle, 1553, 8vo. (Fabricius, Hoffmann). Among the Latin editions, over and above those already noted as accompanying editions of the Almagest, Hain mentions two (of both works) of the fifteenth century; one by Ratdolt, Venice, 1494, 4to; another by Bonetus (with other astrological extracts), Venice, 1495, fol. There is then translated by Gogava, Louvain, 1548, 4to. (Hoffmann, Lalande); and there is another attached to the collection made by Hervagius (which begins with Julius Firmicus, and ends with Manilius), Basle, 1553, folio; and all except the Firmicus and Manilius seem to have been printed before, Venice, 1519, folio (Lalande). There is mention of two other editions, of Basle and Venice, 1551 and 1507, including both Firmicus and Manilius (Lalande). The Centiloquium has been sometimes attributed to Hermes Trismegistus; but this last-named author had a Centiloquium of his own, which is printed in the edition just described, and is certainly not in matter the same as Ptolemy's. Fabricius, mentioning the Centiloquium, says that Ptolemy de Electionibus, appeared (Lat.), Venice, 1509,—. Perhaps this is the same work as the one of the same title, afterwards published as that of the Arab zbkel. The English translation (1701) of the Centiloquium is called Ptolemy's "Quadrupartitum" (Hoffmann), must be from the paraphrase by Proclus, as appears from its title-page containing the name of Leo Allatius, who edited the latter. The usual Latin of the Centiloquium is by Jovius Pontanus: whether the Commentaries attributed to him, printed, Basle, 1531, 4to. (Lalande), &c., are any thing more than the version, we must leave to the professedly astrological bibliographer. It was printed without the Quadrupartitum several times, as at Cologne, 1544, 8vo.; and this is said to be with the comment of Trapezuntius, meaning probably the version. The commentaries or introductions, two in number, attributed to Proclus and Porphyry, were printed (Gr. Lat.) Basle, 1559, folio (Lalande).

3. Καπρίαν Βασιλείων. This is a catalogue of Assyrian, Persian, Greek, and Roman sovereigns, with the length of their reigns, several times referred to by Syncellus, and found, with continuation, in Theon. It is considered an undoubted work of Ptolemy. It is a pamphlet which has been printed by Seniger, Calvisius (who valued it highly), Petavius and Dodwell; but most formally by Bainbridge (in the work presently cited), and by Halma, as above noticed.

4. Φωτεία ἀπλάνων δότηρων καὶ συναγαγού ἐπιστημονικών, De Apparititis et Significationibus Incertantis. This annual list of sidereal phenomena has been printed three times in Greek: by Petavius, in his Uranologia, Paris, 1630, folio; partially in Fabricius, but deferred by Harless to a supplementary volume which did not appear; and by Halma, as above noticed. There are three other works of the same name or character, which have been attributed to Ptolemy, and all three are given, with the genuine one, by Petavius, as above. Two of them are Roman calendars, not worth notice. The third was published, in Latin, from a Greek manuscript, by Nic. Leonigius, Venice, 1616, 4vo. (Fabricius); and this is reprinted in the collection beginning with Julius Firmicus, above noticed. We have mentioned the versions of the genuine work which are found with those of the Almagest.

3. 6. De Analommatce and Planisphairion. These works are obtained from the Arabic. Fabricius, who had not seen them, conjectures that they are the same date and correct. The Analomma is a collection of graphical processes for facilitating the construction of sun-dials, grounded on what we now call the orthographic projection of the sphere, a perspective in which, mathematically speaking, the eye is at an infinite distance. The Planisphere is a description of the stereographic projection, in which the eye is at the pole of the circle on which the sphere is projected. Delambre seems to think, from the former work, that Ptolemy knew the gnomonic projection, in which the eye is at the centre of the sphere: but, though he uses some propositions which are closely connected with the theory of that projection, we cannot find any thing which indicates distinct knowledge of it. There is but one edition of the work De Analommatce, edited by Commandine, Rome, 1562, 4to. (Lalande says there is a Venetian title of the same date. He also mentions another edition, Rome, 1572, 4to., perhaps an error of copying). Nothing is said about the Arabic original, or the translator. The Planisphairion first appeared in print in the edition of the Geography, Rome (?) 1507, fol. (Hoffmann); next in Valder's collection, entitled "Sphaere atque Astromum Coelestium Ratio..." Basle (no place is named), 1536, 4to. With this is joined the Pla nisphairion of Jordanus. There is also an edition of Toulouse, 1544, fol. (Hoffmann). But the best edition is that of Commandine, Venice, 1558, 4to. Lalande says that it was reprinted in 1588. Suidas records that Ptolemy wrote δηλών επιφανειας σφαίρας, which is commonly taken to be the work on the planisphere. Both the works are addressed to Syria.

7. Περὶ ουσιών τῶν πλανήματος, De Planetarya. Hipparchus. This is a brief statement of the principal hypotheses employed in the Almagest (to which it refers in a preliminary address to Syria) for the explanation of the heavenly motions. Simplicius refers to two books of hypotheses, of which we may suppose this is one. It was first printed (Gr. Lat.) by Bainbridge, with the sphere of Proclus and the canon above noted, London, 1620, 4to, with a page of Bainbridge's corrections at the end; afterwards by Halma, as already described.

8. Αρισκείου βεβλα γ. This treatise on the theory of the musical scale was first published (Gr. Lat.) in the collection of Greek musicians, by Gogavisus. Venice, 1562, 4to. (Fabricius). Next by Wallis (Gr. Lat.), Oxford, 1682, 4to., with various readings and copious notes. This last edition was reprinted (with Porphyry's commentary, the first published) in the third volume of Wallis's works, Oxford, 1699, folio.

9. Περὶ κρυπτού καὶ άγευμοι, De Juicido Facultate et Animi Principatu, a metaphysical work, attributed to Ptolemy. It was edited by Bouillaud (Gr. Lat.), Paris, 1663, 4to., and the edition had a new title page (and nothing more) in 1681.

In Lalande we find attributed to Ptolemy, "Regulae Artis Mathematicae" (Gr. Lat.)—1569, 8vo., with explanations by Erasmus Reinhold.

The collection made by Fabricius of the lost works of Ptolemy is as follows:—From Simplicius, Περὶ μετρησιων μονὸβδολων, to prove that there can be only three dimensions of space; Περὶ δοσκόβ Βδολων, mentioned also by Eutocius; Τροχεια, two books of hypothesis. From Suidas, three books Μυθουνοι: From Heiberg and Simplicius, Οστηκτη πραγματεια. From Tzetzes, Περίφραγμα; and from Stephen of Byzantium, Περίπλωσ. There have been many modern forgeries in Ptolemy's name, mostly astrological.

It must rest an unsettled question whether the work written by Ptolemy on optics be lost or not. The matter now stands thus: Alhazen, the principal Arab writer on optics, does not mention Ptolemy, nor indeed, any one else. Some passages from Roger Bacon, taken to be opinions passed on a manuscript purporting to be that of Ptolemy, led Montucla to speak highly of Ptolemy as an optical writer. This mention probably led Laplace to examine a Latin version from the Arabic, existing in the Royal Library at Paris, and purporting to be Ptolemy's treatise. The consequence was Laplace's assertion that Ptolemy had given a detailed account of the phenomena of light with remarkable precision. Again, the remark of Laplace led Humboldt to examine the manuscript, and to call the attention of Delambre to it. Delambre accordingly gave a full account of the work in his Histoire de l'Astronomie Ancienne, vol. ii. pp. 411—431. The manuscript is headed Incepit Liber Ptolemani de Opticis sive Aspectibus translatus ab Ammiraco [or Ammirato] Ugenio Siculo. It consists of five books, of which the first is lost and the others somewhat defaced. It is said there is in the Bodleian a manuscript with the whole of five books of a similar title. The first three books left give such a theory of vision as might be expected from a writer who had the work attributed to Euclid in his mind. But the fifth book does actually give an account of refraction, with experimental tables upon glass, water, and air, and an account of the reason and quantity of astronomical refraction, much better than those of Alhazen and Tycho Brahé, or of any one before Cassini. With regard to the genuineness of the book, on the one hand there is its worthiness of Ptolemy on the point of refraction, and the attribution of it to him. On the other hand, there is the absence of allusion, either to the Almagest in the book on optics, or to the subject of refraction in the Almagest. Delambre, who appears convinced of the genuineness, supposed that it was written after the Almagest. But on this supposition, it must be supposed that Ptolemy, who does not unfrequently refer to the Almagest in his other writings, has omitted to do so in this one, and that upon points which are taken from the Almagest, as the assertion that the moon has a colour of its own, seen in eclipses. But what weight does most with us is the account which Delambre gives of the geometry of the author. Ptolemy was in geometry, perspicuous, elegant, profound, and powerful; the author of the optics could not even succeed in being clear on the very points in which Euclid (or another, if it be not Euclid) had been clear before him. Delambre observes, in two passages, "La démonstration de Tolémée est fort embrouillée; celle d'Euclide est et plus courte et plus claire." "Euclide avait prouvé proposition 21 et 22, que les objets paraissent diminués dans les miroirs convexes. On entrevoit que Tolémée a voulu aussi démontrer les mêmes propositions." Again, the refraction apart,
PTOLEMAEUS.

Delambre remarks of Alhazen that he is "plus riche, plus savant, et plus geometre que Ptolémée." Taking all this with confidence, for Delambre, though severe, was an excellent judge of relative merit, we think the reader of the Almagest will pause before he believes that the man who had written this last work (which suppression is absolutely necessary) became a poor geometer, on the authority of one manuscript headed with his name. The subject wants further investigation from such sources as still exist: it is not unlikely that the Arabic original may be found. Were we speaking for Ptolemy, we should urge that a little diminution of his fame as a mathematician would be well compensated by so splendid an addition to his experimental character as the credit of a true theory of refraction. But the question is, how stands the fact? and for our own parts, we cannot but suspend our opinion.

We now come to speak of Ptolemy as an astronomer, and of the contents of the Almagest. And with his name we must couple that of his great predecessor, Hipparchus. The latter was alive at B.C. 150, and the former at A.D. 150, which is of easy remembrance. From the latter of the two Ptolemy from the last of Hipparchus, it is from 250 to 260 years. Between the two there is nothing to fill the gap: we cannot construct an intermediate school out of the names of Geminus, Poseidonius, Theodosius, Sosigenes, Hyginus, Manilius, Seneca, Menelaus, Cleomedes, &c., and we have no others. We must, therefore, regard Ptolemy as the first who appreciated Hipparchus, and followed in his steps. This is no small merit in itself.

What Hipparchus did is to be collected mostly from the writings of Ptolemy himself, who has evidently intended that his predecessor should lose none of his fame in his hands. The historian who has taken most pains to discriminate, and to separate what is due to Hipparchus, is Delambre. If he should be held rather too partial to the predecessor of Ptolemy, those who think so will be obliged to admit that he gives his verdict upon the evidence, and not upon any prepossession gained before trial. He is too much given, it is true, to try an old astronomer by what he has done for us, but this does not often disturb his estimate of the relative merit of the ancients. And it is no small testimony that an historian so deeply versed in modern practice, so conversant with ancient writings, so niggard of his praise, and so apt to deny it altogether to any thing which has since been surpassed, cannot get through his task without making it evident that Hipparchus has become a chief favourite. The summing up on the merits of the true father of astronomy, as the historian calls him, is the best enumeration of his services which we can make, and will save the citation of authorities. The following is translated from the preliminary discourse (which, it is important to remember, means the last part written) of the Histoire de l'Astronomie Ancienne.

"Let no one be astonished at the errors of half a degree with which we charge Hipparchus, perhaps with an air of reproach. We must bear in mind that his astrolabe was only an armillary sphere; that its diameter was but moderate, the subdivisions of a degree hardly sensible; and that he had neither telescope, vernier, nor micrometer. What could we do even now, if we were deprived of these helps, if we were ignorant of refraction and of the true altitude of the pole, as to which, even at Alexandria, and in spite of armillary circles of every kind, an error of a quarter of a degree was committed. In our day we dispute about the fraction of a second; in that of Hipparchus they could not answer for the fraction of a degree; they might mistake* by as much as the diameter of the sun or moon. Let us rather turn our attention to the essential services rendered by Hipparchus to astronomy, of which he is the real founder. He is the first who gave and demonstrated the means of solving all triangles, rectilinear and spherical, both. He constructed a table of chords, of which he made the same sort of use as we make of our sines. He made more observations than his predecessors, and understood them better. He established the theory of the sun in such a manner that Ptolemy, 263 years afterwards, found nothing to change for the better. It is true that he was mistaken in the amount of the sun's inequality; but I have shown that this arose from a mistake of half a day in the time of the solstice. He himself admits that his result may be wrong by a quarter of a day; and we may always, without scruple, double the error supposed by any astronomer without doubting his good faith, but only attributing self-delusion. He determined the first inequality of the moon, and Ptolemy changed nothing in it; he gave the motion of the moon, of her apogee and of her nodes, and Ptolemy's corrections are but slight and of more than doubtful goodness. He had a glimpse of the second inequality; he made all the observations necessary for a discovery the honour of which was reserved for Ptolemy; a discovery which perhaps he had not time to finish, but for which he had prepared everything. He showed that all the hypotheses of his predecessors were insufficient to explain the double inequality of the planets; he predicted that nothing would do except the combination of the two hypotheses of the eccentric and epicycle. Observations were wanting to him, because these demand intervals of time exceeding the duration of the longest life; he prepared them for his successors. We owe to his catalogue the important knowledge of the retrograde motion of the equinoctial points. We could, it is true, obtain this knowledge from much better observations, made during the last hundred years; but such observations would not give proof that the motion is sensibly uniform for a long succession of centuries; and the observations of Hipparchus, by their number and their antiquity, in spite of the errors which we cannot help finding in them, give us this important confirmation of one of the fundamental points of Astronomy. He was here the first discoverer. He invented the planisphere, or the mode of representing the starry heavens upon a plane, and of producing the solutions of problems of spherical astronomy, in a manner often as exact as, and more commodious than, the use of the globe itself. He is also the father of true geography, by his happy idea of marking the position of spots on

* The reader must not think that Delambre says the diameter of the sun is a degree, or near it. By not answering for the fraction of a degree, he means that they could be sure of no more than the nearest degree, which leaves them open to any error under half a degree, which is about the diameter of the sun or moon.
the earth, as was done with the stars, by circles drawn from the pole perpendicularly to the equator, that is, by latitudes and longitudes. His method of eclipses was long the only one by which difference of meridians could be determined; and it is by the projection of his invention that to this day we construct our maps of the world and our best geographical charts.

We shall now proceed to give a short synopsis of the subjects treated in the Almagest: the reader will find a longer and better one in the second volume of the work of Delambre just cited.

The first book opens with some remarks on theory and practice, on the division of the sciences, and the certainty of mathematical knowledge: this preamble concludes with an announcement of the author's intention to avail himself of his predecessors, to run over all that has been sufficiently explained, and to dwell upon what has not been done completely and well. It then describes as the intention of the work to treat in order:—the relations of the earth and heaven; the effect of position upon the earth; the theory of the sun and moon, without which that of the stars cannot be undertaken; the sphere of the fixed stars, and those of the five stars called planets. Arguments are then produced for the spherical form and motion of the heavens, for the simplicity of this solution, Ptolemy then gives his reasons why it cannot be. With these, as well as his preceding arguments, our readers are familiar.

Two circular celestial motions are then admitted: one which all the stars have in common, another which several of them have of their own. From several expressions here used, various writers have imagined that Ptolemy held the opinion maintained by many of his followers, namely, that the celestial spheres are solid. Delambre inclines to the contrary, and he follow him. It seems to us that, though, as was natural, Ptolemy was led into the phraseology of the solid-orb system, it is only in the convenient mode which is common enough in all systems. When a modern astronomer speaks of the variation of the eccentricity of the moon's orbit as producing a certain effect upon, say her longitude, any one might suppose that this orbit was a solid transparent tube, within which the moon is materially restrained to move. Had it not been for the notion of his successors, no one would have attributed the same to Ptolemy: and if the literal meaning of phrases have weight, Copernicus is at least as much open to a like conclusion as Ptolemy.

Then follows the geometrical exposition of the motion of the heavens, in a table of chords, and the table itself to half degrees for the whole of the semi-circle, with differences for minutes, after the manner of recent modern tables. This morse of geometry is one of the most beautiful in the Greek writers: some propositions from it are added to many editions of Euclid. Delambre, who thinks as meanly as he can of Ptolemy on all occasions, mentions it with a doubt as to whether it is his own, or collected from his predecessors. In this, as in many other instances, he shows no attempt to judge a mathematical argument by any thing except its result: had it been otherwise, the unity and power of this chapter would have established a strong presumption in favour of its originality. Though Hipparchus constructed chords, it is to be remembered we know nothing of his manner as a mathematician; nothing, indeed, except some results on other circles, &c. As we can lead by spherical geometry and trigonometry enough for the determination of the connection between the sun's right ascension, declination, and longitude, and for the formation of a table of declinations to each degree of longitude. Delambre says he found both this and the table of chords very exact.

The second book is one of deduction from the general doctrine of the sphere, on the effect of position on the earth, the longest days, the determination of latitude, the points at which the sun is vertical, the equinoctial and solstitial shadows of the gnomon, and other things which change with the spectator's position. Also on the arcs of the ecliptic and equator which pass the horizon simultaneously, with tables for different climates, or parallels of latitude having longest days of given duration. This is followed by the considerations of oblique spherical problems, for the purpose of calculating angles made by the ecliptic with the vertical, of which he gives tables.

The third book is on the length of the year, and on the theory of the solar motion. Ptolemy forms us of the manner in which Hipparchus made the discovery of the precession of the equinoxes, by observation of the revolution from one equinox to the same again being somewhat shorter than the actual revolution in the heavens. He discusses the reasons which induced his predecessor to think there was a small inequality in the length of the year, decides that he was wrong, and produces the comparison of his own observations with those of Hipparchus, to show that the latter had the true and constant value (one three-hundredth of a day less than 365 1/4 days). As this is more than six minutes too great, and as the error, in the whole interval between the two epochs, amounted to more than a day and a quarter, Delambre is surprised, and with reason, that Ptolemy should not have detected it. He hints that Ptolemy's observations may have been calculated from their required result; on which we shall presently speak. It must be remembered that Delambre watches every process of Ptolemy with the eye of a lynx, to claim it for Hipparchus, if he can; and when it is certain that the latter did not attain it, then he might have attained it, or would if he had lived, or at the least it is to be matter of astonishment that he did not.

Ptolemy then begins to explain his mode of applying the celebrated theory of excentrics, or revolutions in a circle which has the spectator out of its centre; of epicycles, or circles, the centres of which revolve on other circles, &c. As we can make mathematical explanations, we shall refer the reader to the general notion which he probably has on this subject, to Naurieux's History of Astronomy, or to Delambre himself. As to the solar theory, it may be sufficient to say that Ptolemy explains the one inequality then known, as Hipparchus did before him, by the supposition that the circle of the sun is an excentric; and that he does not appear to have added to his predecessor at all, in discovery at least.

On this theory of epicycles, we may say a word or two for all. The common notion is that it was a cumbersome and useless apparatus, thrown away by the moderns, and originating in the Ptolemaic, or rather Platonic, notion, that all celestial motions must either be circular and uniform motions, or compounded of them. But on the contrary, it was an elegant and most efficient mathematical instrument, which enabled Hipparchus and Ptolemy to represent and predict much better than their predecessors had done; and it was probably at least as good a theory as their instruments and capabilities of observation required or deserved. And many readers will be surprised to hear that the modern astronomer to this day resolves the same motions into epicyclic ones. When the latter expresses a result by series of sines and cosines (especially when the angle is a mean motion or a multiple of it) he uses epicycles; and for one which Ptolemy scribbled on the heavens, to use Milton's phrase, he scribbles twenty. The difference is that the former believed in the necessity of these instruments, the modern only in their convenience; the former used those which do not sufficiently represent actual phenomena, the latter knows how to choose better; the former taking the instruments to be the actual contrivances of nature, was obliged to make one set explain everything, the latter will adapt one set to latitude, another to longitude, another to distance. Difference enough, no doubt; but not the sort of difference which the common notion supposes.

The fourth and fifth books are on the theory of the moon, and the sixth is on eclipses. As to the moon, Ptolemy explains the first inequality of the moon's motion, which answers to that of the sun, and by virtue of which (to use a mode of expression very common in astronomy, by which a word properly representative of a phenomenon is put for its cause) the motions of the sun and moon are below the average at their greatest distances from the earth, and above at their least. This inequality was well known, and also the motion of the lunar apogee, as it is called; that is, the gradual change of the position of the point in the heavens at which the moon appears when her distance is greatest. Ptolemy, probably more assisted by records of the observations of Hipparchus than by his own, detected that the single inequality above mentioned was not sufficient, but that the lunar motions, as then known, could not be explained without supposition of another inequality, which has since been named the excess. Its effect, at the new and full moon, is to make the effect of the preceding inequality appear different at different times; and it depends not only on the position of the sun and moon, but on that of the moon's apogee. The disentanglement of this inequality, the magnitude of which depends upon three angles, and the adaptation of an epicyclic hypothesis to its explanation, is the greatest triumph of ancient astronomy.

The seventh and eighth books are devoted to the stars. The celebrated catalogue (of which we have before spoken) gives the longitudes and latitudes of 1022 stars, described by their positions in the constellations. It seems not unlikely that in the main this catalogue is really that of Hipparchus, altered to Ptolemy's own time by assuming the value of the precession of the equinoxes given by Hipparchus as the least which could be; some changes having also been made by Ptolemy's own observations. This catalogue is pretty well shown by Delambre (who is mostly successful when he attacks Ptolemy as an observer) to represent the heaven of Hipparchus, altered by a wrong precession, better than the heaven of the time at which the catalogue was made. And it is observed that though Ptolemy observed at Alexandria, where certain stars are visible which are not visible at Rhodes (where Hipparchus observed), none of those stars are in Ptolemy's catalogue. But it may also be noticed, on the other hand, that one original mistake (in the equinox) would have the effect of making all the longitudes wrong by the same quantity; and this one mistake might have occurred, whether from observation or calculation, or both, in such a manner as to give the suspicious appearances.

The remainder of the thirteen books are devoted to the planets, on which Hipparchus could do little, except observe, for want of long series of observations. Whatever we may gather from scattered hints, as to something having been done by Hipparchus himself, by Apollonius, or by any others, towards an explanation of the great features of planetary motion, there can be no doubt that the theory presented by Ptolemy is his own.

These are the main points of the Almagest, so far as they are of general interest. Ptolemy appears in it a splendid mathematician, and an (at least) indifferent observer. It seems to us most likely that he knew his own deficiency, and that, as has often happened in similar cases, there was on his mind a consciousness of the superiority of Hipparchus which biased him to interpret all his own results of observation into agreement with the predecessor from whom he feared, perhaps a great deal more than he knew of, to differ. But nothing can prevent his being placed as a fourth geometry with Euclid, Apollonius, and Archimedes. Delambre has used him, perhaps, harshly; being, certainly in one sense, perhaps in two, an indiscreet judge of the higher kinds of mathematical merit.

As a literary work, the Almagest is entitled to a praise which is rarely given; and its author has shown abundant proofs of his conscientious fairness and nice sense of honour. It is pretty clear that the writings of Hipparchus had never been public property: the astronomical works which intervene between Hipparchus and Ptolemy are so poor as to make it evident that the spirit of the former had not infused itself into such a number of men as would justify us in saying astronomy had a scientific school of followers. Under these circumstances, it was open to Ptolemy, had it pleased him, most materially to underrate, if not entirely to suppress, the labours of Hipparchus; and without the fear of detection. Instead of this, it is from the former alone that we now chiefly know the latter, who is constantly cited as the authority, and almost as the master. Such a spirit, shown by Ptolemy, entitles us to infer that he really used the catalogue of Hipparchus in the manner hinted at by Delambre, he would have avowed what he had done; still, under the circumstances of agreement noted above, we are not at liberty to reject the suspicion. We imagine, then, that Ptolemy was strongly biased towards those methods both of observation and interpretation, which would place him in agreement, or what he took for agreement, with the authority whom in his own mind he could not disbelieve. (Halma and Delambre, \textit{op. cit.}; Weidler, \textit{Hist. THE GEOGRAPHICAL SYSTEM OF PTOLEMY.

The \textit{Geographik} ῶφηγεις of Ptolemy, in eight books, may be regarded as an exhibition of the final state of geographical knowledge among the ancients, in so far as geography is the science of determining the positions of places on the earth's surface; for of the other branch of the science, the description of the objects of interest connected with different countries and places, in which the work of Strabo is so rich, that of Ptolemy contains comparatively nothing. With the exception of the introductory matter in the first book, and the latter part of the work, it is a mere catalogue of the names of places, with their latitudes and longitudes, and with a few incidental references to objects of interest. It is clear that Ptolemy made a diligent use of all the information that he had access to; and the materials thus collected he arranged according to the principles of mathematical geography. His work was the last attempt made by the ancients to form a complete geographical system; it was accepted as the text-book of the science; and it maintained that position during the middle ages, and until the fifteenth century, when the rapid progress of maritime discovery caused it to be superseded.

The treatise of Ptolemy was based on an earlier work by Marinus of Tyre, of which we derive almost our whole knowledge from Ptolemy himself (i. 6, &c.). He tells us that Marinus was a diligent inquirer, and well acquainted with all the facts of the science, which had been collected before his time; but that his system required correction, both as to the method of delineating the sphere on a plane surface, and as to the computation of distances: he also informs us that the data followed by Marinus had been, in many cases, superseded by the more accurate accounts of recent travellers. It is, in fact, as the corressor of those points in the work of Marinus which were erroneous or defective, that Ptolemy introduces himself to his readers; and his discussion of the necessary corrections occupies fifteen chapters of his first book (cc. 6—20). The most important of the errors which he ascribes to Marinus, is that he assigned to the known part of the world too small a length from east to west, and too small a breadth from north to south. He himself has fallen into the opposite error.

Before giving an account of the system of Ptolemy, it is necessary to notice the theory of Brehmer, in his \textit{Entdeckungen im Alterthum}, that the work of Marinus of Tyre was based upon ancient charts and other records of the geographical researches of the Phoenicians. This theory finds now but few defenders. It rests almost entirely on the presumption that the widely extended commerce of the Phoenicians would give birth to various geographical documents, to which Marinus, living at Tyre, would have access. But against this may be set the still stronger presumption, that a scientific Greek writer, whether at Tyre or elsewhere, would avail himself of the rich materials collected by Greek investigators, especially from the time of Alexander; and this presumption is converted into a certainty by the information which Ptolemy gives us respecting the Greek itineraries and periplus which Marinus had used as authorities. The whole question is thoroughly discussed by Heeren, in his \textit{Commentario de Fontibus Geographicorum Ptolemaei, Tubalarumque vis annearum}, Gotting, 1827, which is appended to the English translation of his \textit{Ideen (Asiatische Nations}, vol. iii. Append. C). He shows that Brehmer has greatly overrated the geographical knowledge of the Phoenicians, and that his hypothesis is altogether groundless.

In examining the geographical system of Ptolemy, it is convenient to speak separately of its mathematical and historical portions; that is, of his notions respecting the figure of the earth, and the mode of determining positions on its surface, and his knowledge, derived from positive information, of the form and extent of the different countries, and the actual positions and distances of the various places in the then known world.

1. The Mathematical Geography of Ptolemy.—Firstly, as to the figure of the earth. Ptolemy assumes, what in his mathematical works he undertakes to prove, that the earth is neither a plane surface, nor fan-shaped, nor quadrangular, nor pyramidal, but spherical. It does not belong to the present subject to follow him through the detail of his proofs.

The mode of laying down positions on the surface of this sphere, by imagining great circles passing through the poles, and called meridians, because it is mid-day at the same time to all places through which each one of them passes; and other circles, one of which was the great circle equidistant from the poles (the equinoctial line or the equator), and the other small circles parallel to that one; and the method of fixing the positions of these several circles, by dividing each great circle of the sphere into 360 equal parts (now called degrees, but by the Greeks "parts of a great circle"), and imagining a meridian to be drawn through each division of the equator, and a parallel through each division of any meridian;—all this had been settled from the time of Eratosthenes. What we owe to Ptolemy or to Marinus (for it cannot be said with certainty to which) is the introduction of the terms \textit{longitude} (μήκος) and \textit{latitude} (παράδος), the former to describe the position of any place with reference to the length of the known world, that is, its distance, in degrees, from a fixed meridian, measured along its own parallel; and the latter to describe the position of a place with reference to the breadth of the known world, that is, its distance, in degrees, from the equator, measured along its own meridian. Having introduced these terms, Marinus and Ptolemy designated the positions of the places they mentioned, by stating the numbers which represent the longitudes and latitudes of each. The subdivision of the degree adopted by Ptolemy is into twelfths.

Connected with these fixed lines, is the subject of \textit{climates}, by which the ancients understood belts of the earth's surface, divided by lines parallel to the equator, those lines being determined according to the different lengths of the day (the longest day was the standard) at different places, or, which is the same thing, by the different lengths, at different places, of the shadow cast by a gnomon of the same altitude at noon of the same day. This system of climates was, in fact, an imperfect development of the more complete system of parallels of latitude. It was, however, retained for convenience of reference. For a further explanation of it, and for an account of the climates of Ptolemy, see the Dictionary of Antiquities, art. Chima, 2nd ed.

Next, as to the size of the earth. Various attempts had been made, long before the time of Ptolemy, to calculate the circumference of a great circle of the earth by measuring the length of an arc of a meridian, containing a known number of degrees. Thus Eratosthenes, who was the first to attempt any complete computation of this sort from his own observations, calculated that the distance from Syene to Alexandria, on the same parallel, was, on the average of seven days, equal to 5000 stadia apart, and the arc between them to be 1-50th of the circumference of a great circle, obtained 250,000 stadia for the whole circumference, and 6949 stadia for the length of a degree; but, in order to make this a convenient whole number, he called it 700 stadia, and so got 252,000 stadia for the circumference of a great circle of the earth (Cleomed. Cyc. Theor. i. 8; Ukert. Geogr. d. Griech. u. Römer, vol. i. pt. 2, pp. 42-45). The most important of the other computations of this sort were those of Poseidonius, (for he made two,) which were founded on different estimates of the distance between Rhodes and Alexandria: the one gave, like the computation of Eratosthenes, 252,000 stadia for the circumference of a great circle, and 700 stadia for the length of a degree; and the other gave 180,000 stadia for the circumference of a great circle, and 500 stadia for the length of a degree (Cleomed. i. Lykaoni. Strab. ii. pp. 86, 93, 95, 125; Ukert, l.c. p. 43). The truth lies just between the two; for, taking the Roman mile of 3 stadia as 1-75th of a degree, we have (75 x 8 =) 600 stadia for the length of a degree.†

Ptolemy followed the second computation of Poseidonius, namely, that which made the earth 130,000 stadia in circumference, and the degree 500 stadia in length; but it should be observed that he, as well as all the ancient geographers, speaks of his computation as confessedly only an approximation to the truth. He describes, in bk. i. c. 3, the method of finding, from the direct distance in stadia of two places, even though they be not under the same meridian, the circumference of the whole earth, and conversely. There having been found, by means of an astronomical instrument, two fixed stars distant one degree from each other, the places on the earth were sought to which those stars were in the zenith, and the distance between them estimated, this distance was, of course (excluding errors), the length of a degree of the great circle passing through those places, whether that circle were a meridian or not.

The next point to be determined was the mode of representing the surface of the earth with its meridians of longitude and parallels of latitude, on a sphere, and on a plane surface. This subject is discussed by Ptolemy in the last seven chapters of his first book (18-24), in which he points out the imperfections of the system of delineation adopted by Marinus, and expounds his own. Of the two kinds of delineation, he observes, that on a sphere is the easier to make, as it involves no method of projection, but is a direct representation; but, on the other hand, it is inconvenient to use, as only a small portion of the surface can be seen at once: while the converse is true of a map on a plane surface. The earliest geographers had no guide for their maps but reported distances and general notions of the figures of the masses of land and water. Eratosthenes was the first who attempted the aid of astronomy, but he did not attempt any complete projection of the sphere (see Eratosthenes, and Ukert, vol. i. pt. 2, pp. 192, 193, and plate ii., in which Ukert attempts a restoration of the map of Eratosthenes). Hipparchus, in his work against Eratosthenes, insisted much more fully on the necessary connection between geography and astronomy, and was the first who attempted to lay down the exact positions of places according to their latitudes and longitudes. In the science of projection, however, he went no further than the method of representing the meridians and parallels by parallel straight lines, the one set intersecting the other at right angles. Other systems of projection were attempted, so that at the time of Marinus there were several methods in use, all of which he rejected, and devised a new system, which is described in the following manner by Ptolemy (l. c. 20, 24, 25). On account of the impossibility of representing the map in the form of a sphere, it was kept as his datum line the old standard line of Eratosthenes and his successors, namely the parallel through Rhodes, or the 36th degree of latitude. He then calculated, from the length of a degree on the equator, the length of a degree on this parallel; taking the former at 500 stadia, he reckoned the latter at 400. Having divided this parallel into degrees, he drew perpendiculars through the points of division for the meridians; and his parallels of latitude were straight lines parallel to that through Rhodes. The result, of course, was, as Ptolemy observes, that the parts of the earth north of the parallel of Rhodes were represented much too long, and those south of that line much too short; and further that, when Marinus came to lay down the positions of places according to their reported distances, those north of the line were too near, and those south of it too far apart, as compared with the surface of his map. Moreover, Ptolemy observes, that this method of representation, inasmuch as the parallels of latitude ought to be circular arcs, and not straight lines.

Ptolemy then proceeds to describe his own method, which does not admit of an abridged statement, and cannot be understood without a figure. The reader is therefore referred for it to Ptolemy's own work (l. c. 24), and to the accounts given by Ukert (l.c. pp. 105, &c.), Mannert (vol. i. pp. 127, &c.), and other geographers. All that can be said of it here is that Ptolemy represents the parallels of latitude as arcs of concentric circles (their centre representing the North Pole), the chief of which are those passing through Thule, Rhodes, and Meroë, the Equator, and the one through Prasum. The meridians of longitude are represented by Ptolemy's method of determining the unknown land adjacent to the eastern nations of Asia, namely, the Sinae and the people of Serica; on the south, the unknown land which encloses the Indian Sea, and which adjacent to the district of Aethiopia called Agierymbo, on the south of Libya; on the west, the unknown land which surrounds the Aethiopic gulf of Libya, and the Western Ocean; and on the north, the continuation of the ocean, which surrounds the British islands and the northern parts of Europe, and the unknown land adjacent to the northern regions of Asia, namely Sarmatia, Scythia, and Serica.

He also defines the boundaries by meridians and parallels, as follows. The southern limit is the parallel of 16° 30' S. lat., which passes through a point as far south of the equator, as Meroë is north of it, and which he elsewhere describes as the parallel through Præsum, a promontory of Aethiopia; and the northern limit is the parallel of 65° N. lat., which passes through the island of Thule; so that the whole extent from north to south is 79° 30', or in round numbers, 80°; that is, nearly as possible, 40,000 stadia. The eastern limit is the meridian which passes through the metropolis of the Sinæ, which is 119° east of Alexandria, or just about eight hours; and the western limit is the meridian drawn through the Insulae Fortunatae (the Canaries) which is 60°, or four hours, west of Alexandria, and therefore 180°, or twelve hours, west of the easternmost meridian. The various lengths of the earth, in itinera me, he reckons at 70,000 stadia along the equator, 500 stadia to a degree, 40,000 stadia along the northernmost parallel (22° 30' stadia to a degree), and 72,000 stadia along the parallel through Rhodes (400 stadia to a degree), along which parallel most of the measurements had been reckoned.

In comparing these computations with the actual distances, it is not necessary to determine the true position of such doubtful localities as Thule and the metropolis of the Sinæ; for there are many other indications in Ptolemy's work, from which we can ascertain nearly enough what limits he intends. We cannot be far wrong in placing his northern boundary at about the parallel of the Zetland Isles, and his eastern boundary at about the eastern coast of Cochin China, in fact just at the meridian of 110° E. long. (from Greenwich), or perhaps at the opposite side of the Chinese Sea, namely, at the Philippine Islands at the meridian of 120°. It will then be seen that he is not far wrong in his dimensions from north to south; a circumstance natural enough, since the methods of taking latitudes with tolerable precision had long been known, and he was very careful to avoid himself of every recorded observation which he could discover. But his longitudes are very wide of the truth, his length of the known world, from east to west, being much too great. The westernmost of the Canaries is in a little more than 189° W. long., so that Ptolemy's easternmost meridian (which, as just stated, is in 110° or 120° E. long.) ought to have been that of 128° or 138°, or in round numbers 130° or 140°, instead of 180°; a difference of 50° or 40°, that is, from 1-7th to 1-9th of the earth's circumference.

It is well worthy, however, of remark in passing, that the modern world owes much to this error; for it tended to encourage that belief in the practicability of a western passage to the Indies, which occasioned the discovery of America by Columbus.

There has been much speculation and discussion as to the cause of Ptolemy's great error in this matter; but, after making due allowance for the uncertainties attending the computations of distance on which he proceeded, it seems to us that the chief cause of the error is to be found in the fact already stated, that he took the length of a degree exactly one sixth too small, namely, 500 stadia instead of 600. As we have already stated, on his own authority, he was extremely careful to make use of every trustworthy observation of latitude and longitude which he could find; but he himself complains of the paucity of such observations; and it is manifest that those of longitude must have been fewer and less accurate than those of latitude, both for other reasons, and chiefly on account of the greater difficulty of taking them. He had, therefore, to depend for his longitudes chiefly on the process of turning into degrees the distances computed in stadia; and hence, supposing the distances to be tolerably correct, his error as to the longitudes followed inevitably from the error in his scale. Taking Ptolemy's own computation in stadia, and turning it into degrees of 600 stadia each, we get the following results. The length of the known world, measured along the equator, is 90,000 stadia; and hence its length in degrees is 90,000 = 150°; the error being thus reduced from 50° or 40° to 20° or 10°. But a still fairer method is to take the measurement along the parallel of Rhodes, namely 72,000 stadia. Now the true length of a degree of latitude in that parallel is about 47° = 42 of a degree of a great circle = 33 1/3 x 600 stadia = 470 stadia, instead of 400; and the 72,000 stadia give a little over 153 degrees, a result lastest identical with the former. The remaining error of 20° at the most, or 10° at the least, is, we think, sufficiently accounted for by the errors in the itinera measures, which experience shows to be almost always on the side of making distances too great, and which, in this case, would of course go on increasing, the further the process was continued eastward. Of this source of error Ptolemy was himself aware; and accordingly he tells us that, among the various computations of a distance, he always chose the least; but, for the reason just stated, that least one was probably still too great.

The method pursued by Ptolemy in laying down the actual positions of places has already been incidentally mentioned in the foregoing discussion. He fixed as many positions as possible by their longitudes and latitudes, and from these positions he determined the others by converting their distances in stadia into degrees. For further details the reader is referred to his own work.

His general ideas of the form of the known world were in some points more correct, in others less so, than those of Strabo. The elongation of the whole of course led to a corresponding distortion of the shapes of the continents. He knew not the separate part of the Baltic, but was not aware of its being an inland sea. He makes the Palus Maeotis far too large and extends it far too much to the north. The Caspian he correctly makes an inland sea (instead of a gulf of the Northern Ocean), but he errs greatly as to its size and form, making its length from E. to W. more than twice that from N. to S. In the southern and south-eastern parts of Asia, he altogether fails to represent the projection of Hindostan, while, on the other hand, he gives to Ceylon (Taprobane) more than four times its proper dimensions, probably through confounding it with the mainland of India itself, and brings down the southern part of it below the equator. He shows an acquaintance with the Malay peninsula (his Aurea Chersonesus) and the coast of Cochinchina; but, probably through mistaking the eastern Archipelago for continuous land, he brings round the land which encloses his Sinus Siam. He also regards the great gulf Siam (probably either the gulf of Siam and the Chinese Sea, or both confounded together) so as to make it enclose the whole of the Indian Ocean on the south. At the opposite extremity of the known world, his idea of the western coast of Africa is very erroneous. He makes it trend almost due south from the pillars of Hercules to the Hesperia Kenas in $8^\circ$ N. lat., where a slight bend to the eastward indicates the Gulf of Guinea; but almost immediately afterwards the coast turns again to the S.S.W.; and from the expression already quoted, which Ptolemy uses to describe the boundary of the known world on this side, it would seem as if he believed that the land of Africa extended here considerably to the west. Concerning the interior of Africa he knew considerably more than his predecessors. Several modern geographers have drawn maps to represent the views of Ptolemy: one of the latest and best of which is that of Ukert (Geogr. d. Griech. u. Roemer, vol. i. pl. 5).

Such are the principal features of Ptolemy's geographical system. It only remains to give a brief outline of the contents of his work, and to mention the principal editions of it. Enough has already been said respecting the first, or introductory book. The next six books and a half (ii.—vii. 4) are occupied with the description of the known world, beginning with the West of Europe, the description of which is contained in book ii.; next comes the East of Europe, in book iii.; then Africa, in book iv.; then Western or Lesser Asia, in book v.; then the Greater Asia, in book vi.; then India, the Chersonesus Aurea, Sertia, the Sinae, and Taprobane, in book vii. cc. 1—4. The form in which the description is given is that of lists of places with their longitudes and latitudes, arranged under the heads, first, of the three continents, and then of the several countries and tribes. Prefixed to each section is a brief general description of the boundaries and divisions of the part about to be described; and remarks of a miscellaneous character are interspersed among the lists, to which, however, they bear but a small proportion.

The remaining part of the seventh, and the whole of the eighth book, are occupied with a description of a set of maps of the known world, which is introduced by a remark at the end of the 4th chapter of the 7th book, which clearly proves that Ptolemy's work had originally a set of maps appended to it. In cc. 5 he describes the general map of the world. In cc. 6, 7, he takes up the subject of spherical delineation, and describes the armillary sphere, and its connection with the sphere of the earth. In the first two chapters of book viii., he explains the method of dividing the world into maps, and the mode of constructing each map; and he then proceeds (cc. 3—28) to the description of the maps themselves, in number twenty-six, namely, ten of Europe, four of Libya, and twelve of Asia. The 29th chapter contains a list of the maps, and the countries represented in each; and the 30th an account of the lengths and breadths of the portions of the earth contained in the respective maps. These maps are still extant, and an account of them is given under Agathodeemon, who was either the original designer of them, under Ptolemy's direction, or the constructor of a new edition of them.

Enough has been already said to show the great value of Ptolemy's work, but its perfect integrity is another question. It is impossible but that a work, which was for twelve or thirteen centuries the text-book in geography, should have suffered corruptions and interpolations; and one writer has contended that the changes made in it during the middle ages were so great, that we can no longer recognise in it the work of Ptolemy (Schlözer, Nord. Gesch. in the Allgem. Weltliteratur, vol. xxxi. pp. 148, 176). Mannert has successfully defended the genuineness of the work, and has shown to what an extent the eighth book may be made the means of detecting the corruptions in the body of the work. (vol. i. p. 174.)

The Geographia of Ptolemy was printed in Latin, with the Maps, at Rome, 1462, 1475, 1478, 1482, 1486, 1490, all in folio; of these editions, those of 1482 and 1490 are the best: numerous other Latin editions appeared during the sixteenth century, the most important of which is that by Michael Servetus, Lugd. 1541, folio. The Edition Princesa of the Greek text is that edited by Erasmus, Basil. 1533, 4to.; reprinted at Paris, 1540, 4to. The text of Erasmus was reprinted, but with a new Latin Version, Notes, and Indices, edited by Petrus Montanus, and with the Maps restored by Mercator, Amst. 1605, folio; and a still more valuable edition was brought out by Petrus Berthius, printed by Elzevir, with the maps coloured, and with the addition of the Peutingerian Tables, and other important illustrative matter, Lugd. Bat. 1619, folio; reprinted Antwerp, 1624, folio. The work also forms a part of the edition of Ptolemy's works, undertaken by the Abbé Halmer, but left unfinished at his death, Paris, 1815—1829, 4to.; this edition contains a French translation of the work. For an account of the less important editions, the editions of separate parts, the versions, and the works illustrating Ptolemy's Geography, see de Beé, ibid. Lex. Bibliog. Script. Graec. A useful little edition of the Greek text is contained in three volumes of the Tauchnitz classics, Lips. 1843, 32mo. [P. S.] PTOLEMAEUS.

PTOLEMAEUS (Πτολεμαίος), king of Cyprus, was the younger brother of Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt, being like him an illegitimate son of Ptolemy Lathyrus. Notwithstanding this defect of birth he appears to have been acknowledged as king of Cyprus at the same time that his brother Auletes obtained possession of the throne of Egypt, b.c. 80. But he unfortunately neglected the precaution of making interest at Rome to obtain the confirmation of his sovereignty, and had the farther imprudence to give personal offence to P. Claudius, by neglecting to ransom him when he had fallen into the hands of the Cilician pirates (Strab. xiv. p. 684; Appian, B. C. ii. 29). He paid dearly for his niggardliness on this occasion, for when Claudius became the tribune of the people he decreed a law to deprive Ptolemy of his kingdom, and reduce Cyprus to a Roman province. Cato, who was entrusted with the charge of carrying into execution this nefarious decree, sent to Ptolemy, advising him to submit, and offering him personal safety, with the office of high-priest at Paphos, and a liberal maintenance. But the unhappy king, though he was wholly unprepared for resistance to the Roman power, had the spirit to refuse these offers, and put an end to his own life, b.c. 57. (Strab. l. c.; Dion Cass. xxxviii. 30, xxxix. 22; Liv. Épit. civ.; Plut. Cat. Min. 34—36; Appian, B. C. ii. 23; Vell. Pat. i. 45; Cic. pro Sext. 26—28; Val. Max. ix. 4, ext. § 1.)

We are told that Ptolemy had disgraced himself by every species of vice (Vell. Pat. l. c.), but it appears certain that it was the vast treasures that he possessed, which, by attracting the cupidity of the Egyptians, became the cause of his ruin. Indeed, the suspicion raised by which his vices were afterwards made the pretext.

F. E. B.

[PTOLEMAEUS, king of CYRENE. [PTOLEMAEUS APION.]

PTOLEMAEUS I. (Πτολεμαῖος), king of Egypt, surnamed SOTER (the Preserver), but perhaps more commonly known as the son of Lagus. His father was a Macedonian of ignoble birth [LAGUS], but his mother Arsinoé had been a concubine of Philip of Macedon, on which account it seems to have been generally believed that Ptolemy was in reality the offspring of that monarch (Curt. ix. 8, § 22; Paus. i. 6, § 2.) This could, indeed, hardly have been the case if Lucian's statement be correct (Macrob. 12), that Ptolemy was eighty-four years of age at the time of his death, as in that case he must have been born in B.C. 367, when Philip was not sixteen years old. But the authority of Lucian on this point can hardly outweigh the distinct assertions of other authors as to the existence of such a belief, and we must therefore probably assign his birth to a later period. Whatever truth there may have been in this report, it is certain that Ptolemy early enjoyed a distinction at the Macedonian court to which his father's obscurity would scarcely have entitled him, and we find him mentioned before the death of Philip among the friends and confidential advisers of the young Alexander. The part which he took in promoting the intrigue for the marriage of the prince with the daughter of Pidodaros, king of Caria, gave great offence to Philip, and Ptolemy was banished, together with all the other persons concerned. (Plut. Alex. 10; Arrian, Anab. iii. 6.) On the accession of Alexander, however, b.c. 335, he was immediately recalled from exile, and treated with the utmost distinction. It is remarkable that we do not find him holding any special command, or acting any important part during the first few years of the expedition to Asia, though it is clear that he accompanied the king throughout this period. Indeed, his name is only twice mentioned previous to the year b.c. 330, when he obtained the honourable post of Somatophylax in the place of Demetrius, who had been implicated in the conspiracy of Philotas. (Arr. ib. ii. 11, iii. 16, 27.) But from this period we find him continually employed on the most important occasions, and rendering the most valuable services.

In the following campaign (329), after the army had crossed the Oxus, Ptolemy was sent forward with a strong detachment, to apprehend the traitor Bessus, whom he seized and brought before Alexander. Again, in the reduction of the revolted province of Sogdiana, and in the attack on the rock-fortress of Chorienes, he is mentioned as taking a conspicuous part, and commanding one of the chief divisions of the army. (Arr. Anab. iii. 29, 30, iv. 16, 21.) But it was especially during the campaigns in India that the services of Ptolemy shone the most conspicuous; and we find him displaying on numerous occasions all the qualities of an able and judicious general, in command of separate detachments, or of one of the divisions of the main army. In the conquest of the Aspasians and Assacæans, in the reduction of the fortress of Auros, at the passage of the Hydaspes and the siege of Sangala, as well as in many minor operations, the name of Ptolemy is still among the most prominent; he was himself a general less remarkable than his abilities as a general; and we find him on one occasion slaying with his own hand the chief of one of the Indian tribes in single combat. Some writers also ascribed to him a share in the glory of saving the life of Alexander among the Malli [LEONNAUTUS], but it appears from his own testimony, as reported by Arrian and Curtius, that he was absent at the time on a separate command. (Arr. Anab. iv. 24, 25, 29, v. 13, 23, 24, vi. 5, 11; Curt. viii. 10. § 21, 13. § 18—27, 14. § 15, ix. 5, § 21.)

Numerous evidences occur during the same period of the high favour and personal consideration with which he was regarded by Alexander: we find him constantly in close attendance upon the king's person; and on occasion of the conspiracy of the pages it was he who, by discovering and revealing their treasonable designs, probably became the means of saving the life of his sovereign (Arr. iv. 8, 13; Curt. viii. 1. §§ 45, 48, 6, § 22, ix. 6, § 15; Chares ap. Athen. iv. p. 171, c.). According to a marvellous tale related by several writers Alexander was soon after able to return the obligation and save the life of his friend and follower when wounded by a poisoned arrow, by applying a remedy suggested to him in a dream. (Curt. ix. 8, § 22—27; Diód. xvii. 103; Strab. xv. p. 723; Justin. xii. 10; Cic. De Div. ii. 66.) During the tilosome march through Gedrosia, Ptolemy once more commanded one of the three principal divisions of the army; and in the festivities at Susa he was honoured with a crown of gold, while he obtained from his wife Arisacte, a sister of Barsine, (Curt. ix. 10, § 6; Diód. xvii. 104; Arrian, vii. 4; Plut. Eum. 1.) He is again mentioned as accompanying Alexander on his last military enterprise, the winter campaign against the Cos-saenae, n.c. 324. (Arr. iv. vii. 15.)

From all these facts it is clear that at the death of Alexander few among his friends and generals occupied so prominent a place as the son of Lagus, and Perdiccas appears to have looked upon him from the first as one of his most formidable rivals. But Ptolemy was too prudent to allow his ambition to lead him into any premature demonstrations of enmity. In the first assembly of the generals he had indeed proposed that the government should be administered by a council of officers; but this suggestion being rejected, he attached himself to the party of Perdiccas during the subsequent transactions. But he was far from losing sight of his own interests. It is said to have been by his advice that the different provinces and satrapies were portioned out among the generals, and he took care to secure for himself in the distribution the important government of Egypt, at once the most wealthy and the most secure from foreign invasion. (Curt. x. 6. §§ 13, 16, 7. § 16; Justin. xiii. 2, 4; Arrian. ap. Phot. p. 69; a; Dexippus, ibid. p. 64; a; Paus. i. 6. § 2.) Thither he appears to have hast-eated as speedily as possible: and one of his first acts on arriving in his new government was to put to death Cleomenes, who had administered the province under Alexander with the title of receiver-general of tributes, and had been expressly appointed by the council of generals to continue as hyparch under Ptolemy. Cleomenes had amassed vast treasures by extortion and rapine, and his execution thus tended to conciliate the minds of the Egyptians at the same time that it removed out of the way of Ptolemy a partisan of Perdiccas, and put him in possession of this accumulated treasure. (Paus. i. 6. § 3; Arrian. l.c.; Dexippus, l.c.) All his efforts were now directed to strengthen himself in his new position: he attacked his subjects by the mildness of his rule at the same time that he raised large forces, and concluded a secret league with Antipater against their common enemy, the regent Perdiccas. A still more overt act of disobedience was his persuading Archelaus, who had been entrusted with the funeral of Alexander, to allow his body to be transported to Egypt, instead of conducting it, as originally agreed, to Aegae in Macedonia. (Diod. xviii. 14. 26, 28; Paus. i. 6. § 3; Arrian. ap. Phot. p. 70, b.) About the same time (n. c. 322) he took advantage of the civil dissensy at Cyrene to annex that important city and province to his dominions. (Diod. xviii. 21; Arrian. ap. Phot. p. 70, a.)

It was not till the beginning of the year n. c. 321 that hostilities actually commenced between Perdiccas and his adversaries. The regent, justly deeming Ptolemy the most formidable of his antagonists, determined to leave Eumenes to make head against his enemies in Asia, while he himself marched against Egypt. The result of his expedition has been already given under Perdiccas [p. 187]. The personal popularity of Ptolemy with the Macedonian army, which had contributed essentially to his success, secured him a welcome reception by the royal forces immediately after the death of Perdiccas, but he wisely declined the office of regent, which was bestowed, by his advice, on Arrhidaeus and Ptolemy. In the new arrangements at Tyre, however, he naturally retained possession of Egypt and Cyrene; and it was probably at this period that he strengthened his union with the new regent Antipater, by marrying his daughter Eurydice. (Droysen, Hellenism. vol. i. p. 154.) But the very next year (n. c. 320) we find him venturing on a bold step, in direct contravention of the arrangements then made, by seizing on the important satrapy of Phoenicia and Coele-Syria, which had been assigned to Laomedon, whom he did not scruple to dispense by force of arms. (Diod. xviii. 39, 43; Appian. Syr. 52; Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 71, b.) It was probably during this expedition that he made himself master of Jerusalem, by attacking the city on the Sabbath day. (Josephus, Ant. xii. i, adv. Apion. i. 22.) The death of Antipater (n. c. 319) produced a great change in the relative situations of the different leaders, and Ptolemy was now induced to contract an alliance with Cassander and Antigonus against Polysperchon and Eumenes. He at first fitted out a fleet, with which he repaired to the coasts of Cilicia, and commenced operations against Eumenes, who in his turn threatened Phoenicia (Diod. xviii. 62, 73); but the war was eventually drawn off to the upper provinces of Asia, and

Ptolemy remained a passive spectator of the contest. At length the decisive victory of Antigonus over Eumenes raised the former to a height of power which rendered him scarcely less formidable to his allies than his enemies, and his treatment of Pithon and Eucrates sufficiently betrayed his ambitious designs. Seleucus, who had himself all with difficulty escaped from his bands, fled for refuge to Egypt, and by his representations of the character and projects of Antigonus awakened Ptolemy to a sense of the danger, and induced him to enter into an alliance with Cassander and Lysimachus against their common enemy, n. c. 316. (Id. xix. 56; Paus. i. 6. § 4.)

The next spring (315), after ineffectual attempts at negotiation, Antigonus commenced hostilities by the invasion of Syria, quickly recovered most of the cities in Phoenicia which had fallen under the yoke of Ptolemy, and laid siege to Tyre, the most important of all, and the strength of which for a long time defied all his efforts. While he was engaged in this siege, and in the equipment of a fleet, and his nephew Ptolemy was carrying on the war in Asia Minor with great success, the king of Egypt was undisputed master of the sea, of which he availed himself to establish a footing in Cyprus, where he either subdued almost all the petty princes among whom the island was divided. At the same time he did not neglect the affairs of Greece, whither he despatched a strong fleet under his admiral Polycleitus, and endeavoured to gain over the Greek cities by idle proclamations of liberty. Polycleitus, on his return, defeated Theodotus, one of Antigonus's admirals, at Aphroddisias in Cilicia, and took his whole fleet. But the next year (314) Tyre at length fell into the hands of Antigonus, who now found himself undisputed master of Syria and Phoenicia, and was, consequently, able to turn his own attention towards Asia Minor, leaving his son Demetrius to protect the newly-acquired provinces. The youth of Demetrius would have induced Ptolemy to attempt their recovery, but his attention was occupied during the year 313 b. c. a revolt in Tyre, and the defection of several of the princes of Cyprus. The conqueror succeeded in putting down through the agency of his general Agis, while he deemed it necessary to repair in person to Cyprus, with a large force, with which he quickly reduced the revolted cities, and placed the whole island under the command of Nicocreon of Salamis, on whose fidelity he had full reliance. After this he laid waste with his fleet the adjoining coasts of the main land, took the towns of Posideum in Syria, and Mallus in Cilicia, and withdrew again to Cyprus before Demetrius, who hastened to oppose him, could arrive on the spot. But the following spring (b. c. 312) he determined, at the instigation of Seleucus, to oppose Demetrius in the field, and invaded Palestine with a large army. He was met by the young general at Gaza, and a pitched battle ensued, in which Ptolemy and Seleucus were completely victorious, and Demetrius was compelled to evacuate Syria, leaving the whole country open to the Egyptian kings, who recovered almost without opposition all the cities of Phoenicia. After this he sent Seleucus at his own request with a small force across to Asia Minor to assist him in this enterprise, establishing a permanent footing. [Seleucus.]

Meanwhile, Demetrius partly returned his disaster by defeating Ptolemy's general Cilles, and soon after Antigonus himself advanced into Syria, to support his son. Ptolemy gave way before them, and withdrew into Egypt, where he prepared for defence; but Antigonus did not attempt to follow him, and spent his time in operations in Asia. The next year (b. c. 311) hostilities were suspended by a general peace. (Diod. xii. 57—62, 64, 69, 79—86, 90, 93, 103; Plut. Demetr. 5, 6; Paus. i. 6. § 5; Justin. xvi. 1; Appian. Syr. 54.)

Of the motives which led to this treaty we have no information, but the probability is that all parties regarded it as little more than a truce. Ptolemy appears to have been the first to reconnoitre hostilities, and, under pretence that Antigonus had not, pursuant to the treaty, withdrawn his garrisons from the Greek cities in Asia, he sent a fleet to Cilicia under Leonidas, who reduced many towns on the coast, but was again compelled to withdraw by the arrival of Demetrius. The next year (b. c. 309) Ptolemy in person sailed with a large fleet to Lycia, took the important city of Xanthus, as well as Camus and other places in Caria, and laid siege to Halicarnassus, which was, however, relieved by the sudden arrival of Demetrius. Ptolemy now withdrew to Myndus where he wintered, and the next spring (308) repaired in person to the Peloponnesus, where he announced himself as the liberator of Greece, but effected little, beyond the taking possession of the two strongholds of Corinth and Sicyon, which were yielded to him by Cratesipolis; and leaving placed garrisons in these he returned to Egypt. (Diod. xx. 16, 27, 37; Plut. Demetr. 7.)

This year was, however, marked by a more important advantage in the recovery of Cyrene, which had for some years past shaken off the Egyptian yoke, but was now, after the death of Ophellas, reduced once more under the subjection of Ptolemy by the arms of his brother Magas. [Magas.]

The next season (b. c. 307) Demetrius succeeded in establishing his authority over great part of Greece, and drove Demetrius the Phalerean out of Athens, who took refuge at the court of Egypt. Ptolemy appears to have remained inactive during these events, but it is probable that his military and naval preparations at Cyprus gave unbrage to Antigonus, who in consequence recalled Demetrius from Greece, and determined to make a grand effort to wrest that important island from the hands of his rival. It was occupied by Ptolemy's brother Menelaus with a powerful fleet and army, but he was unable to resist the forces of Demetrius, was defeated, and besieged in the city of Salamis, the capital of the island. Ptolemy himself now hastened to his relief with a fleet of 140 ships, and a sea-fight ensued between him and Demetrius—one of the most memorable in ancient history—which terminated, after an obstinate contest, in the total defeat of the Egyptian fleet. Ptolemy was now compelled to withdraw to Egypt, while his brother Menelaus, with his fleet and army and the whole island of Cyprus, fell into the hands of the conqueror. Antigonus was so much elated by this victory as to assume the title of king, an example which Ptolemy, notwithstanding his defeat, immediately followed, b. c. 300. (Diod. xx. 45—53; Plut. Demetr. 5, 6; Paus. i. 6. § 5; Justin. xvi. 1; Appian. Syr. 54.)

But the defeat at Salamis not only entailed upon the Egyptian king the loss of Cyprus, but left his rival for a time the undisputed master of the sea, an advantage of which Antigonus now determined to avail himself to strike a decisive blow against Egypt itself. For this purpose he himself advanced by land through Syria with a powerful army, while Demetrius supported him with his fleet. Ptolemy did not attempt to meet him in the field or oppose him on the frontiers of Egypt, but contented himself with fortifying and guarding the passages of the Nile, as he had done against Perdiccas: a manoeuvre which proved equally successful on the present occasion. The fleet of Demetrius suffered severely from storm, and his efforts to effect a landing in Lower Egypt were frustrated, while Antigonus himself was unable to force the passage of the river: his troops began to suffer from hunger: many of them deserted to Ptolemy, whose troops were active with bribes and promises; and the old king at length found himself compelled to abandon the enterprise and retire into Syria. (Diod. xx. 73—76; Plut. Demetr. 19; Paus. i. 6. § 6.) Ptolemy was well contented to have escaped from so great a danger, and doubtless occupied in recruiting his forces, but we do not learn that he ventured to resume the offensive. The next year however (b. c. 305), Demetrius having turned his arms against the Rhodians, Ptolemy assisted the latter with repeated supplies both of troops and provisions. So important, indeed, were his succours on this occasion, that when Demetrius had been at length compelled to raise the siege (304), the Rhodians paid divine honours to the Egyptian monarch as their saviour and preserver (vi. 19, 22), a title which appears to have been now bestowed upon Ptolemy for the first time. (Diod. xx. 81—83, 96, 98—100; Paus. i. 6. § 6, 8. § 6; Athen. xvi. p. 696, l.)

During the next two years the king of Egypt seems to have been a nearly passive spectator of the contest in Greece, though in the course of it Corinthus and Sicyon were wrested from his power by Demetrius: but at length in b. c. 302 the arrogant pretensions of Antigonus once more united Ptolemy and Seleucus with Cassander and Lysimachus in a league against their common foe. Still, however, Ptolemy took comparatively little part in the contest, which led to the decisive battle of Ipsus, and after advancing into Coele-Syria, and making himself master of part of that country and of Phoenicia, he was alarmed by a false report of the victory of Antigonus, and withdrew into Egypt. (Diod. xx. 106, 113; Justin. xv. 2, 4.)

The defeat and death of Antigonus (b. c. 301) altogether altered the relations of the allied monarchs. Seleucus was now become almost as formidable as Antigonus had been, and the possession of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia, which were claimed by Ptolemy as the price of his adhesion to the coalition, and by Seleucus as part of the allotted reward of his victory, was near producing an immediate breach between the two. Seleucus appears to have waived his pretensions for a time, but ultimately obtained possession (in what manner we know not) of the disputed provinces. (Diod. xxi. Exc. Vat. pp. 42, 43; Polyb. v. 67.) Meanwhile, their mutual jealousy led them to form new alliances with the other monarchs, and while Seleucus married Stratonic, the daughter of Demetrius, Ptolemy sought to strengthen his connection with Lysimachus, by giving that monarch his daughter Arsinoë in marriage. At the same time he did not refuse to be reconciled, in appearance at least, to Demetrius, to whom he even gave Ptolemaus, another of his daughters, for a wife. An alliance was at the same time concluded between them, and Pyrrhus, the fugitive heir to the throne of Epirus, was placed at the Egyptian court by Demetrius, as a hostage for his fidelity.

The young prince quickly rose to a high place in the favour of Ptolemy, who gave him his stepdaughter Antigone in marriage, and conceived the design of raising him up as a rival to Demetrius. His nominal alliance with the latter did not prevent him from furnishing all the support in his power to the Greek cities which were opposed to him, on occasion of the expedition of Demetrius to Greece in b. c. 297: and during the following year he took the opportunity to create a formidable diversion by sending Pyrrhus, at the head of a small force, to Epirus, where the young prince quickly established himself upon the throne. (Plut. Demetr. 32, 33, Pyrrh. 4, 5; Paus. i. 6, § 8.)

The next year (b. c. 295) he took advantage of Demetrius being still engaged in the affairs of Greece, to recover the important island of Cyprus. This he quickly reduced, with the exception of Salamis, where Phila, the wife of Demetrius, held out for a long time, but her husband's attention being now wholly engrossed by the prospects which had opened to him in Macedonia [DEMETRIUS], he was unable to render her any assistance, and she was ultimately compelled to surrender to Ptolemy. The whole island thus fell into the power of the king, and became from henceforth an integral portion of the Egyptian monarchy. (Plut. Demetr. 35, 36.)

After the lapse of a considerable interval that we again find Ptolemy engaging actively in foreign war. But he could not remain an indifferent spectator of the events which placed his old enemy Demetrius on the throne of Macedonia: and in b. c. 287 we find him once more joining in a league with Lysimachus and Seleucus against the object of their common enmity. The part taken by Ptolemy in the war that followed was, however, limited to the sending a fleet to the Aegean: and the defeat and captivity of Demo-

trios soon removed all cause of apprehension. (Plut. Demetr. 44, Pyrrh. 10, 11; Justin. xvi. 2.) It is probable that the latter years of his reign were devoted almost entirely to the arts of peace, and to promoting the internal prosperity of his dominions. But his advancing age now warned him of the necessity of providing for the succession to his throne.

Ptolemy was at this time the father of three legitimate sons, of whom the two eldest, Ptolemy surnamed Ceraunus, and Meleager, were the offspring of Eurydice, the daughter of Antipater, while the youngest, also named Ptolemy (afterwards surnamed Philadelphus) was the child of his latest and most beloved wife, Berenice. His attachment to Berenice, as well as the favourable opinion he had formed of the character of the young man himself, now led him to conceive the project of bestowing the crown upon the last of these three princes, to the exclusion of his elder brothers. Such a design met with vehement opposition from Demetrius the Phalerian, who now held a high place in the councils and favour of Ptolemy: but the king, nevertheless, determined to carry it into execution, and even resolved to secure the throne to his favourite son by establishing him on it in his own lifetime. In the year b. c. 285 accordingly, he himself announced to the assembled people of Alexandria that he had ceased to reign, and transferred the sovereign authority to his youngest son, whom he presented to them as their king. His choice was received, we are told, with the utmost favour, and the accession of the new monarch was celebrated with festivities and processions on a scale of unparalleled magnificence, during which the aged monarch himself appeared among the officers and attendants of his son. (Justin. xvi. 2; Athen. v. p. 196, 203.) Nothing occurred to interrupt the harmony which subsisted between them from this time till the death of the elder Ptolemy, which took place about two years after, b. c. 283. His reign is variously estimated at thirty-eight or forty years, according as we include or not these two years which followed his abdication. (Porphy. ap. Euseb. Arm. pp. 113, 114; Joseph. Ant. xii. 2.) He was not only honoured by his son with a splendid funeral; but his body was deposited in the magnificent edifice which had been erected as the mausoleum of Alexander; and divine honours were paid to him in common with the great conqueror. (Theocr. Idyll. xvii. 16—19; Strab. xvii. p. 794.)

The character of Ptolemy has been generally represented in a very favourable light by historians, and there is no doubt that if we compare him with his contemporary and rival potentates he appears to deserve the praises bestowed upon his mildness and moderation. But it is only with this important qualification that they can be admitted; for there are many evidences, such as the barbarous murder of Nicoles [Nicolaos], and the execution of Ptolemy, the nephew of Antigonus [see above, p. 565, No. 7], that he did not shrink from any measure that he deemed requisite in order to carry out the objects of his ambition. But the long-sighted prudence, by which he seems to have been pre-eminently distinguished among his contemporaries, led him to confine that ambition within more rational bounds than most of his rivals. He appears to have been the only one among the generals of Alexander who foresaw from the first that the empire of that conqueror must inevitably be broken up, and who wisely directed his efforts to secure for himself the possession of an important and valuable portion, instead of wasting his strength in idle attempts to grasp the whole.

But whatever were the faults of Ptolemy as an individual, as a ruler he certainly deserves the highest praise. By his able and vigorous administration he laid the foundations of the wealth and prosperity which Egypt enjoyed for a long period, and which even many successive generations of misrule were afterwards insufficient to destroy.
He restored order to the finances of the country, encouraged commerce and industry, and introduced a system of administration which appears to have been well suited to the peculiar state of society which had so long existed in Egypt, and to the religious and social prejudices of the nation. (See on this subject Droysen, Hellenismus, vol. ii.
pp. 34—52.) Under his fostering care Alexandria quickly rose to the place designed for it by its founder, that of the greatest commercial city of the world. Among other measures for the prosperity of his new capital we find Ptolemy establishing there a numerous colony of Jews, who frequently acted an important part during the reigns of his successors. (Joseph. Ant. xvi. 1.) With this exception, the policy of the king was mainly directed to the prosperity of his Greek subjects, while the native Egyptians, though no longer subjected to the oppressions they had suffered under former rulers, were kept in comparative obscurity. Nor do we find that the first Ptolemy showed any special marks of favour to their religion, though to him is ascribed the first introduction of the foreign worship of Serapis, and the foundation of the celebrated temple dedicated to that divinity at Alexandria. (Tac. Hist. iv. 84; Plut. de Isid. et Osirid. 28.) [Serpapis.]

Not less eminent or conspicuous were the sertices rendered by Ptolemy to the advancement of literature and science. In this department indeed it is not always easy to distinguish the portion of credit due to the father from that of his son: but it seems certain that to the elder monarch belongs the merit of having originated those literary institutions which assumed a more definite and regular form, as well as a more prominent place, under his successor. Such appears to have been the case with the two most celebrated of all, the Library and the Museum of Alexandria. (See Droysen, Hellenism. vol. ii. p. 43; Geier, de Ptolemaei Lagd. Vita, p. 61; Parthey, Das Alexandrinische Museum, pp. 36—49; Ritschel. Die Alexandr.
Bibliothek, pp. 14—16.)

The first suggestion of these important foundations is ascribed by some writers to Demetrius of Phalerus, who spent all the latter years of his life at the court of Ptolemy, and became one of his most confidential friends and advisers. But many other men of literary eminence were also gathered around the Egyptian king: among whom may be particularly noticed the great geomter Euclid, the philosophers Stilpo of Megara, Theodorus of Cyrene, and Diodorus surnamed Cronus; as well as the elegiac poet Philetas of Cos, and the grammarian Zenodotus. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 102, 111, 115, v. 37, 78; Plut. de Exil. 7, Apollod. Reg. p. 189; d: Suid. s. v. Φιλητας και Ζηνόδωτος.) To the two last we are told Ptolemy confided the literary education of his son Philadelphus. Many anecdotes sufficiently attest the free intercourse which subsisted between the king and the men of letters by whom he was surrounded, and prove that the easy fam-filiarity of his manners corresponded with his simple and unostentatious habits of life. We also find him maintaining a correspondence with Menander, whom he in vain endeavoured to attract to his court, and sending overtures probably of a similar nature to Theophrastus. (Suid. s. v. Μενανδρος; Diog. Laërt. v. 37.) Nor were the fine arts neglected: the rival painters Antiphus and Apelles both exercised their talents at Alexandria, where some of their most celebrated pictures were produced. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 36; Lucian. de Calumn. 2.)

But Ptolemy was not content with the praise of an enlightened patron and friend of literature; he sought for himself also the fame of an author, and composed an historical narrative of the wars of Alexander, which is frequently cited by later writers, and is one of the chief authorities which Arrian made the groundwork of his own history.
That author repeatedly praises Ptolemy for the fidelity of his narrative and the absence of all fables and exaggerations, and justly pays the greatest deference to his authority, on account of his personal acquaintance with the events which he relates. No notice of his style has been preserved to us, from which we may probably infer that his work was not so much distinguished in this respect as for its historical value. Arrian expressly tells us that it was composed by him
after he was established on the throne of Egypt, and probably during the latter years of his life.
(Arr. Anab. i. proem.) The other passages in which his authority is cited are collected, and all the information relating to his history brought thereby by Geier, de Ptolemaei Librari. Vita et Scriptis, pp. 72—77; and in his Scriptores Historiae Alex. Magni, pp. 1—26. The fragments are also given in the edition of Arrian published by Didot, at Paris, 1840.) It appears also that the letters of Ptolemy to Seleucus were extant at a later period, and were collected by one Dionysodorus, of whom nothing more is known. (Lucian. Pro Lupa. in Salute. 10.)

Ptolemy had been three times married: 1. to the Persian princess Artacamæ (see above, p. 531), by whom he appears to have had no children; 2. to Eurydice, the daughter of Antipater, who had borne him three sons—Ptolemy Ceraunus, Meleager, and one whose name is not mentioned (Paus. i. 7. § 1), and two daughters, Lysandra and Ptolemais; 3. to Berenice, who became the mother of Ptolemy Philadelphus as well as of Arsinoe, the wife of Lysimachus. For further information concerning his children by these mar-rriages, see the articles ARSINOÈ and BERENICE.
But besides these, he became the father of a nu-

COIN OF PTOLEMAEUS L, KING OF EGYPT.
PTOLEMAEUS.

PTOLEMAEUS II. (Πτολέμας Β.), king of Egypt, surnamed PHILADELPHUS, was the son of Ptolemy I. by his wife Berenice. He was born in the island of Cos, which his mother had actually pined her husband during the naval campaign of B.c. 300. (Theocr. Idyl. xvii. 58; at Schol. ad loc.; Callim. ii. ad Del. 165—190; Droysen, Hellenism. vol. i. p. 418.) We have scarcely any information concerning the period of his boyhood or youth, though we learn that he received a careful education; and Philetus, the eleagone poet of Cos, and Zenodotus the grammian, are mentioned as his literary preceptors (Suid. s. v. Φιλάτρας και Ευρυδότος). But it is probable that his own promising character and disposition combined with the partiality of his father for Berenice, to induce the aged monarch to set aside the offspring of his former marriage in favour of Philadelphus. In order to carry this project into execution, and secure the succession to this his favourite son, the king at length resolved to abdicate the sovereign power, and establish Philadelphus (at this time 24 years of age) upon the throne during his own lifetime. The young prince appears to have been personally popular with the Alexandrians, who, as we are told, welcomed the announcement with the utmost joy, and the accession of the new monarch (Nov. b. c. 285) was celebrated with festivities and proces-sions of the utmost magnificence. (Justin. xvi. 2; Athen. v. pp. 196—203; Porphyry. ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 113.) It is probable that the virtual authority of king still remained in the hands of Ptolemy Soter, during the two years that he survived this event; but no attempt was made to disturb his arrangement of the succession. Ptolemy Ceraunus and Meleager quittd Egypt, and Philadelphus found himself at his father's death (b. c. 263) the undisputed master of his wealthy and powerful kingdom. His long reign was marked by few events of a striking character, while his attention was mainly directed to the internal administration of his kingdom, and the patroguue of literature and science; his foreign policy was essentially pacific, and the few external wars which his army was involved in were of a nature to affect deeply the prosperity of his dominions. Unfortunately, our historical information concerning his reign is so scanty, that we have the greatest difficulty in arranging and connecting the few notices that have been transmitted to us. Its tranquillity appears to have been first disturbed by hostilities with his half brother Magas, who had governed Cyrene as viceroy under Ptolemy Soter, but on the death of that monarch threw off the yoke, and asserted his independence. Not content with maintaining himself in the possession of the Cyrenaica, Magas even attempted to invade Egypt, and had advanced as far as Paratonium, when he was recalled to his own dominions by a revolt of the Marmarides. A formidable mutiny among his Gaulish mercenaries prevented Ptolemy from pursuing him (Paus. i. 7. §§ 1, 2; Schol. ad Callim. ii. in Del. 170—190). Magas, however, subsequently induced Antiochus II., king of Syria, to make common cause with him against the Egyptian monarch, and himself undertook a second expedition against Egypt, in which he again advanced to the frontier, and took the fortress of Paratonium; but the efforts of Antiochus were paralysed by the address of Ptolemy, and he was able to effect nothing on the side of Syria. At length the war was terminated by a treaty, which left Magas in undisputed possession of the Cyrenaica, while his infant daughter Berenice was betrothed to Ptolemy, the son of Philadelphus. (Paus. i. 7. § 3; Polyaen. ii. 28.; Justin. xxvi. 3; Droysen, Hellenism. vol. ii. pp. 244—250.)

It was probably during the continuance of this war that we find Ptolemy also taking an active part in the affairs of Greece, by sending a fleet under Patroclus to the assistance of the Athenians against Antigonus Gonatas [PATOCLUS]. Nor was he inattentive to the events that were passing in more distant countries. After the defeat of Pyrrhus by the Romans, he had hastened to conclude a treaty with the rising republic, and during the subsequent war between Rome and Carthage, he continued faithful to his new allies, and refused to assist the Carthaginians. (Liv. Épit. xiv.; Dion Cass. fr. 146; Zonar. viii. 6; Justin. xviii. 2; Plut. Max. iv. 3. § 9; Appian. Sic. 1.) Of the subsequent relations between Egypt and Syria, we know only in general terms that hostilities between them were frequently interrupted or suspended, and as often renewed; but the wars appear to have been marked by no events of a striking character. It must have been towards the close of the reign of Philadelphus that the long protracted contest was terminated by a treaty of peace, by which Ptolemy gave his daughter Berenice in marriage to Antiochus II. The other stipulations of the peace are unknown to us, but it is certain that Phoenicia and Coele-Syria—the never-failing cause of dispute between the two monarchies—remained in the hands of Ptolemy (Hieron. ad Daniel. xi. 6; Droysen, vol. ii. p. 316.) In Greece Ptolemy appears to have continued throughout his reign on unfriendly if not directly hostile terms with Macedon; and lost no opportunity of assisting the party opposed to that power; but it was not until a few years before his death that the successes of Aratus and the rise of the Achaean league opened out to his policy fresh prospects in that quarter. He hastened to support Aratus with considerable sums of money; and received him in the most friendly manner when he visited Alexandria in person. (Plut. Arat. 1. 12.)

But while Ptolemy was thus attentive to the events that were passing among the neighbouring potentates, his chief care was directed to the internal administration of his kingdom, and to the encouragement and extension of its foreign commerce. One of the first measures of his reign was to take effectual steps for clearing Upper Egypt from the robbers and banditti by which it was infested (Theocr. Idyl. xvi. 46—49, and Schol. ad loc.), and he afterwards carried his arms far into Ethiopia, and established friendly relations with the barbarian tribes of that country. He was also the first to derive from those regions a supply of elephants for war, which had been previously procured solely from India, and so important did he deem this resource that he founded a city or fortress named Ptolemaia on the confines of Ethiopia, solely with a view to this object (Agatharchides ap. Phot. p. 441, b, 453, a; Hieronym. ad Dom. xi. 5; Plin. H. N. vi. 34; Diod. iii. 36). With Erganeemas, the Greek king of Meroë, he appears to have maintained friendly relations. In order to command the important navigation and commerce of the Red Sea, he founded the city of Arsinoë at the head of the gulf (on the site of the modern Suez), and that of Berenice on the coast almost under the tropic. The former he connected with the Nile by renewing the ancient Egyptian canal, which had been constructed by Necho, while he opened a high road from Berenice to Coptos on the Nile, which continued for ages to be the route by which all the merchandise of India, Arabia, and Ethiopia was conveyed to Alexandria. Not contented with this, we find him sending Satyrus on a voyage of discovery along the western coast of the Red Sea, and founding another city of Berenice as far south as the latitude of Meroë (Strab. xvii. pp. 770, 804, 815; Plin. H. N. vi. 34; Diod. i. 33; Droysen, Hellenism. vol. ii. p. 735—738; Leetrone, Recueil des Insér. p. 180—188). It was doubtless also with a view to the extension of his commerce with India that we find him sending an ambassador of the name of Dionysius to the native princes of that country. (Plin. H. N. vi. 21.)

But it is more especially as the patron and promoter of literature and science that the name of Philadelphus is justly celebrated. The institutions of which the foundations were laid by his father quickly rose under his fostering care to the highest prosperity. The Museum of Alexandria became the resort and abode of all the most distinguished men of letters of the day, and in the library attached to it were accumulated all the treasures of ancient learning. The first person who filled the office of librarian appears to have been Zenodotus of Ephesus, who had previously been the preceptor of Ptolemy; his successor was the poet Callimachus. (Suid. s. v. Ζνωδότος; Parthey, das Alex. Museum, p. 71; Ritschl, die Alex. Bibliothek, p. 19.) Among the other illustrious names which adorned the court and reign of Ptolemy, may be mentioned those of the poets Philetas and Theocritus (the last of whom has left us a laboured panegyric upon the Egyptian monarch, which is of some importance in an historical point of view), the philosophers Hegesias and Theodorus, the mathematician Euclid, and the astronomer Timocharis. Aristarchus of Samos, and Aratus. It was not merely by his munificence, or the honours which he bestowed upon these eminent men that Ptolemy was able to attract them to his court: he had himself received a learned education, and appears to have possessed a genuine love of literature, while many anecdotes attest to us the friendly and familiar terms upon which he associated with the distinguished strangers whom he had gathered around him. Nor was his patronage confined to the ordinary cycle of Hellenic literature. By his interest in natural history he gave a stimulus to the pursuit of that science, which gave birth to important works, while he himself formed collections of rare animals within the precincts of the royal palace. It was during his reign also, and perhaps at his desire, that Menetho gave to the world in a Greek form the historical records of the Egyptians; and according to a well-known tradition,—which, disguised as it has been by fables, may not be without an historical foundation,—it was by his express command that the Holy Scriptures of the Jews were translated into Greek (Joseph. xii. 2. For the fuller investigation of this subject, see Aristaeus). Whatever truth there may be in this tale, it is certain that he treated the Jewish colonists, many of whom had already settled at Alexandria under Ptolemy Soter, with much favour, and not only allowed them perfect toleration for their religion, but appears to have placed them in many respects on a par with the Greek colony of Alexandria. (J. G. Frazer, op. cit.)

The fine arts met with scarcely less encouragement under Ptolemy than literature and science, but his patronage does not appear to have given rise to any school of painting or sculpture of real merit; and we are told that Aratus gained his favour by presents of pictures of the Sicyonic school. (Plut. Arat. 12.) His architectural works, on the contrary, were of a superior order, and many of the most splendid buildings at Alexandria were erected or completed under his reign, especially the museum, the lighthouse on the island of Pharos, and the royal burial place or sepulchre, to which he removed the body of Alexander from Memphis, while he deposited there the remains of his father and mother (Paus. i. 7. § 1; Strab. xvii. p. 791). As a further proof of his filial piety he raised a temple to the memory of Ptolemy and Berenice, in which their statues were consecrated as tutelary deities of Egypt (Theocr. ld. xvii. 123). The new cities and colonies founded by Philadelphus in different parts of his dominions were extremely numerous. On the Red Sea alone we find at least two bearing the name of Arsinoë, one called after another of his sisters Philotem and the cities named in honour of his mother Berenice. The same names occur also in Cilicia and Syria: and in the latter country he founded the important fortress of Ptolemais in Palestine. (Concerning these various foundations, see Droysen, Hellenism. vol. ii. pp. 678, 699, 721, 731, &c.; Leetrone, Recueil des Insér. pp. 180—188.)

All authorities concur in attesting the great power and wealth, to which the Egyptian monarchy was raised under Philadelphus. We are told that he possessed at the close of his reign a standing army of 200,000 foot and 40,000 horse, besides war-chariots and elephants; a fleet of 1500 ships, among which were many vessels of stupendous size; and a sum of 740,000 talents in his treasury; while he derived from Egypt alone an annual revenue of 14,800 talents (Appian. praef. 10; Hieronym. ad Daniel. xi. 5). His dominions comprised, besides Egypt itself, and portions of Ethiopia, Arabia, and Libya, the important provinces of Phoenicia and Coele-Syria, together with Cyprus, Lycia, Caria, and the Cyclades: and during a great part at least of his reign, Cilicia and Pamphylia also (Theocr. Idyl. xvii. 86—90; Droysen, l. c. p. 316). Before his death Cyrene was reunited to the monarchy by the marriage of his son Ptolemy with Berenice, the daughter of Magas.

The private life and relations of Philadelphus are far from displaying his character in as favourable a light as we might have inferred from the splendour of his administration. Almost immediately on his accession he had banished Demetrius Phalerus, the friend and counsellor of his father, who was believed to have advised the latter against altering the succession in favour of his younger son; and it was probably not long afterwards that he put to death his brother Argeus, who was accused of conspiring against his life. Another of his brothers, who had attempted to excite a revolt in Cyprus, subsequently shared the same fate; and his first wife Arsinoë, the daughter of Lysimachus, was banished to Cypros in Upper Egypt on a similar charge (Paus. i. 7. § 1; Dio. Liert. v. 70; Schol. ad Theocr. Id. xvii. 128). After her removal Ptolemy II. had on the straignt resolution of marrying his own sister Arsinoë, the widow of Lysimachus; a flagrant violation of the religious notions of the Greeks, and which gave rise to severe animosities. Though she must have been many years older than himself, he appears to have continued tenderly attached to her throughout her life, and evinced his affection not only by bestowing her name upon many of his newly-founded colonies, but by assuming himself the surname of Philadelphia, a title which some writers referred in derision to his unnatural treatment of his two brothers. After her death he erected a temple to Arsinoë, and caused divine honours to be paid to her memory, (Paus. i. 7. §§ 1, 3; Theocrit. Idyll. xvi. 130, and Schol. ad loc.; Athen. xiv. p. 621.) By this second marriage Ptolemy had no issue: but his first wife had borne him two sons—Ptolemy, who succeeded him on the throne, and Lysimachus; and a daughter, Berenice, whose marriage to Antiochus IV., king of Syria, was privately arranged by the two brothers. Ptolemy died a natural death before the close of the year B.C. 247; having reigned thirty-eight years from his first accession, and thirty-six from the death of his father (Euseb. Arm. p. 114; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 379). He had been always of a feeble and sickly constitution, which prevented him from ever taking the command of his armies in person; and he led the life of a refined voluptuary, combining sensual and disgustful pleasures with the more elevated gratifications of the taste and understanding. (Strab. xvi. p. 789; Athen. xiii. p. 576.) The great defects of his character as an individual have been already adverted to, but there can be no doubt that his dominions enjoyed the utmost prosperity under his mild and pacific rule, and his skilful policy added as much to the greatness and strength of his empire as could the arms of a more warlike monarch.

The coins of Ptolemy Philadelphia are only to be distinguished from those of his father by the character of the countenance, and in some instances by their dates; none of them bearing the epithet of Philadelphia.

COIN OF PTOLEMAEUS II., KING OF EGYPT.

PTOLEMAEUS III. (Ptolemaios), king of Egypt, surnamed Euergetes, was the eldest son and successor of Ptolemy II., Philadelphia. When a mere child he was betrothed to Berenice, the daughter of Magas; but it was not till after the death of Magas, and the assassination of Demetrius the Handsome, who had made himself master of Cyrene (Berrin. c. 483), that their nuptials were solemnised. The date of these events is uncertain; but the marriage cannot have long preceded the death of Philadelphia, B.C. 247. On that event Ptolemy succeeded quietly to the extensive dominions of his father; to which he now reunited Cyprus, right of his wife. But a still wider field was opened to his ambition. On learning the death of Philadelpbus, Antiochus II., king of Syria, put aside his wife Berenice, the daughter of the Egyptian king, and recalled his former wife, Laodice, who soon sacrificed to her resentment both her faithless husband and her rival, Berenice, with her infant son. Ptolemy appears to have taken up arms on receiving the first news of the death of his sister; but finding that he was too late to save her, he determined at least to avenge her fate. and invaded Syria in person at the head of a numerous army. The cruelties of Laodice, and the unhappy fate of Berenice, had already excited general dissatisfaction; many cities voluntarily joined Ptolemy, and either the youthful Seleucus nor his mother were able to oppose the progress of the Egyptian king, who advanced apparently without opposition as far as Antioch, and made himself master of the whole country south of Mount Taurus. But instead of crossing the Euphrates, and pursuing Seleucus himself, he turned his arms eastward, advanced as far as Babylon and Susa, and after reducing all Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Susiana, received the submission of all the upper provinces of Asia as far as the confines of Bactria and India. From this career of conquest he was recalled by the news of seditions in Egypt, and returned to that country, carrying with him an immense booty, comprising, among other objects, all the statues of the Egyptian deities which had been carried off by Cambyses to Babylon or Persia. These he restored to their respective temples, an act by which he earned the greatest popularity with his native Egyptian subjects, who bestowed on him in consequence the title of Euergetes (the Benefactor), by which he is generally known. While the arms of the king himself were thus successful in the East, his fleets reduced the maritime provinces of Asia, including Cilicia, Pamphylia, and Lycia, as far as the Hellespont, together with Lysimachia and other small coasts on the coast of Thrace which continued for a long period subject to the Egyptian rule. (Mommsen. Adultan. op. Clinton. F. H. vol. iii. p. 362; Hieronym. ad Davian. xi. 7; Justin. xxiv. 1; Appian. Spr. 65; Poliby. v. 58.) Concerning the events which followed the return of Euergetes to his own dominions (probably in B.C. 243) we are almost wholly in the dark; but it appears that the greater part of the eastern provinces speedily fell again into the hands of Seleucus, while Ptolemy retained possession of the maritime regions and a great part of Syria itself. He soon obtained a valuable ally in the person of Antiochus Hierax, the younger brother of Seleucus, whom he uniformly supported in his wars against his elder brother, and by this diversion effectually prevented Seleucus from prosecuting active hostilities against Egypt. The war was at length terminated, or rather suspended by a truce for ten years; but the contest between the two brothers soon broke out afresh, and continued until the total defeat of Antiochus compelled him to take refuge in Egypt. Here, however, he was received rather as a captive than an ally; probably because it did not suit Ptolemy to renew hostilities with Syria. (Justin, xxvii. 2. 3.)

In regard to the remainder of the reign of Euergetes we have scarcely any information. It appears, however, that in his foreign policy he followed the same line as his father. We find him generally unfriendly to Macedon, and on one occasion at least in open hostility with that power, as we are told that he defeated Antigonus ( Gonatas) in a great sea-fight off Andros (Trog. Pomp. Proxvii.) but the date and circumstances of this action are wholly uncertain. (See on this subject, Niebuhr, Kt. Schrift. p. 297; Droysen, vol. ii. p. 364.) With the same views he continued to support Aratus and the Achaean league, until the sudden change of policy of the former, and his unnatural alliance with Macedon, led to a corresponding change on the part of Ptolemy, who thenceforth threw all the weight of his influence in favour of Cleomenes, to whom he afforded an honourable retreat after his decisive defeat at Sellasia, B.C. 292. (Plut. Aret. 24. 41, Cleom. 22. 32; Paus. ii. 8. 5.) We find him also maintaining the same friendly relations as his father with Rome, though he declined the offers of assistance made him by that powerful republic during his war with Syria. (Eutrop. iii. 1.) During the latter years of his reign Euergetes took advantage of the state of peace in which he found himself with his neighbours to turn his arms against the Ethiopian tribes on his southern frontier, whom he effectively reduced to submission, and advanced as far as Adulē, a port on the Red Sea, where he established an emporium, and set up an inscription commemorating the exploits of his reign. To a copy of this, accidentally preserved to us by an Egyptian monk, Cosmas Indicopleustes, we are indebted for much of the scanty information we possess concerning his reign. (See Buttman's Museum f. Alterthumswisselhaft, vol. ii. pp. 105—106; the inscription itself is also given by Chishull, 1. c. 292. 41; and in the Traveles in Aegyptia (1814), p. 453, as well as by Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 362, note.)

Ptolemy Euergetes is scarcely less celebrated than his father for his patronage of literature and science: he added so largely to the library at Alexandria that he has been sometimes erroneously deemed its founder, and the well-known anecdote of the stratagem by which he possessed himself of the original manuscripts of Aesculapius, Sophocles, and Euripides, sufficiently attests the zeal with which he pursued this object. (Galen, Comm. ad Hippoc. lib. iii. Epidem. p. 411; Parthey, Das Alex. Mus. p. 88.) Among the distinguished men of letters who flourished at Alexandria during his reign, the names of Eratosthenes, Apollonius Rhodius, and Aristophanes, the grammarian, are alone sufficient to prove that the literature and learning of the Alexandrian school still retained their former eminence.

The reign of Euergetes may undoubtedly be looked upon as the most flourishing period of the Egyptian kingdom. (See Polyb. v. 34.) His brilliant military successes in the first years after his accession not only threw a lustre over his reign, but added some important and valuable acquisitions to his territories; while his subjects continued to enjoy the same internal tranquillity as under his predecessors. He appears also to have shown more favour than the two former monarchs towards the native-born Egyptians; and he evinced a desire to encourage their religious feelings, not only by bringing back the statues of their gods out of Asia, but by various architectural works. Thus we find him making large additions to the great temple at Thebes, erecting a new one at Eme, and dedicating a temple at Canopus to Osiris in the names of himself and his queen Berenice. (Wilkinson's Thebes, p. 425; Letronne, Recueil, pp. 2—6.) On the other hand, his foundations of new cities and colonies were much less numerous than those of his father, though that of Berenice in the Cyrenaica may in all probability be ascribed to him. (See Droysen, vol. ii. pp. 723—726.) Among the last events of his reign may be mentioned the magnificent presents with which he assisted the Rhodians after their city had been overthrown by an earthquake; the amount of which is in itself a sufficient proof of the wealth and power which he possessed. (Polyb. v. 89.)

The death of Euergetes must have taken place before the end of B.C. 222: it is clearly ascribed by Polibius (ii. 71) to natural causes, though a rumour followed by Justin (xxix. 1) asserted that he was poisoned by his son, a suspicion to which the character and subsequent conduct of the young man lent sufficient countenance. He had reigned twenty-five years in uninterrupted prosperity. By his wife Berenice, who survived him, he left three children: 1. Ptolemy, his successor; 2. Magas; and 3. Arsinoē, afterwards married to his brother Ptolemy Philopator.

Trogus Pompeius twice designates Ptolemy Euergetes by the epithet of Tryphon (Prol. xxvii. and xxx.), an appellation which is also found in Eusebius (p. 165, ed. Arm.). Neither this nor the title of Euergetes appears on his coins, which can only be distinguished from those of his two predecessors by the difference of physiognomy. [E.H.D.]

PTOLEMAEUS.

PTOLEMAEUS IV. (Πτολεμαῖος), king of Egypt, surnamed PHILOPATOR, was the eldest son and successor of Ptolemy Euergetes. He was very far from inheriting the virtues or abilities of his father and his reign was the commencement of the decline of the Egyptian kingdom, which had been raised to such a height of power and prosperity by his three predecessors. Its first beginning was stained with crimes of the darkest kind. COIN OF PTOLEMAEUS III., KING OF EGYPT.

PTOLEMAEUS IV. (Πτολεμαῖος), king of Egypt, surnamed PHILOPATOR, was the eldest son and successor of Ptolemy Euergetes. He was very far from inheriting the virtues or abilities of his father and his reign was the commencement of the decline of the Egyptian kingdom, which had been raised to such a height of power and prosperity by his three predecessors. Its first beginning was stained with crimes of the darkest kind. Among his earliest acts, on assuming the sovereign power (B.C. 222), was to put to death his mother, Berenice, and his brother, Magas, of whose influence and popularity with the army he was jealous, as well as his uncle Lysimachus, the brother of Ptolemy Euergetes. In all these murders his minister Sosibius was his ready and dextrous instrument, and probably the first to advise their perpetration. Cleomenes, the exiled king of Sparta, of whose influence with the mercenary troops Sosibius had skilfully availed himself, soon became in his turn an object of suspicion, and was placed in confinement, from which he sought to escape by raising a revolt in Alexandria, and failing in this put an end to his own life. (Polyb. v. 34—39; Plut. Cleom. 33—37.)

Having thus, as he conceived, secured himself from all danger from domestic enemies, Ptolemy gave himself up without restraint to a life of indolence and luxury, and to every kind of sensual indulgence, while he abandoned to his minister Sosibius the care of all political affairs. The latter seems to have been as incapable as his master: the discipline of the army was neglected, and the kingdom was allowed to fall into a state of the utmost disorder, of which Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, was not slow to avail himself. The defection of Theodotus, the governor of Coele-Syria and Cappadocia (Polyb. xiv. 106.), afforded the first opening to the ambitious designs of the Syrian king, who turned his arms in the first instance against Seleucia in Pieria; and after reducing that important fortress (which had been held by the kings of Egypt since the invasion of Syria by Euergetes) advanced into Phoenicia, where the two strong fortresses of Tyre and Ptolemais were betrayed into his hands by Theodotus. These tidings at length aroused Ptolemy and his ministers from their apathy, and while they sought to amuse Antiochus with pretended negotiations they began to assemble Greek mercenaries, as well as to arm and train Egyptian troops after the Macedonian fashion. With the approach of spring (b. c. 218) they were able to oppose an army under Nicolaus and a fleet under Perigenes to the arms of Antiochus; but Nicolaus was defeated near Parphyreon, and the Syrian king made himself master, with little difficulty, of the great port of Coele-Syria andPalestine. But the next year (b. c. 217) Ptolemy in person took the command of his forces, and set out from Alexandria at the head of an army of 70,000 foot and 5000 horse. He was met by Antiochus with a nearly equal force at Raphia, on the borders of the desert, and a pitched battle ensued, in which the Egyptian army was completely victorious, and Antiochus lost more than 14,000 men. This decisive success was followed by the immediate submission of the whole of Coele-Syria; and Antiochus, apprehensive of farther defections, hastened to sue for peace, which was readily granted by the indolent Ptolemy, who was anxious to return to his life of ease and luxury at home. (Polyb. v. 40, 50—71, 79—87; Justin. xxx. 1.)

It was on his return from this expedition that he visited Jerusalem; on which occasion the refusal of the high priest to admit him to the sanctuary of the temple, is said to have excited in his mind an implacable animosity against the Jewish nation, which led him on his return to Alexandria not only to withdraw from the Jews of that city the privileges they had enjoyed under his predecessors, but to subject them to the most cruel persecutions. (iii. MacC.) The tranquillity of Egypt was further disturbed at the same period by a revolt of the native Egyptians — the first that had occurred under their Greek rulers — which appears to have lasted a considerable time, and not to have been suppressed without much bloodshed. (Polyb. v. 107, xiv. 12.)

Meanwhile, the king, after his return from his Syrian expedition, gave himself up more and more to every species of vice and debauchery. His mistress Agathoclea, and her brother Agathocles, became not only the abandoned ministers of his pleasures, but were admitted to a large share in the direction of affairs, and divided with Sosibius the patronage and distribution of all places of honour or profit. The latter minister, however, continued till near the close of the reign of Ptolemy to preside over the chief administration of the state; and as he had been the instrument of Ptolemy in the murders which disgraced the early part of his reign, so he again lent him his assistance in putting to death his queen Arsinoé, who had become obnoxious to his profligate husband. (Polyb. xiv. 11, 12, xv. 25, 33; Justin. xxx. 1, 2.) After her death Ptolemy gave himself up without restraint to the career of vice which probably contributed to shorten his life. He died in b. c. 204, after the reign of seventeen years, leaving only one son, a child of five years old. (Euseb. Arm. p. 114; Justin. xxx. 2.)

The character of Ptolemy Philopator — seeble, effeminate, and vicious — is sufficiently attested by ancient authorities; and from his reign may be dated the commencement of the decline of the kingdom of Egypt, which thenceforth proceeded by rapid strides. Externally, however, its decay was not yet visible: it still retained all its former possessions and commanded the respect of foreign powers. We find Ptolemy, during the earlier years of his reign, still following up the policy of his predecessors; in Greece, cultivating the friendship of the Athenians, and interposing his mediation to bring about a peace between Philip and the Aetolians. (Polyb. v. 100, 106.) He continued also steadfastly attached to the alliance of the Romans, to whom he furnished large supplies of corn during their struggle with Carthage. (Polyb. ii. 44; Liv. xxiv. 4.) Philopator is also mentioned as striving to display his wealth and power by the construction of ships of the most gigantic and unwieldy size, one of which is said to have had forty banks of oars. (Athen. v. pp. 203—206.)

Plunged as he was in vice and debauchery, Philopator appears to have still inherited something of the love of letters for which his predecessors were so conspicuous. Not only did the literary schools and institutions of Alexandria continue to flourish under his reign, but we find him associating on familiar terms with philosophers and men of letters, and especially patronising the distinguished grammarian Aristarchus. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 177; Suid. COIN OF PTOLEMAEUS IV., KING OF EGYPT.
Liv. Justin, take measures clades vaded the who were protection their selves while their were father, between were compelled kingdom the soldier, assumed immediately the demand of the monarchy. He had checked the possessions of the king himself thus was the king's authority to dispossess his former dominions from the king was assumed by the army, which, under his wise and vigorous government, the taxes were reduced, order restored, and the country recovered, in great measure, from the disorders of the reign of Philopator. Yet the period of his administration was not unmarked by civil troubles: a formidable revolt broke out in Lower Egypt, and it was not till after a long and arduous siege that Lycopolis, where the rebels had established their head-quarters, was taken, and the insurrection suppressed (Inscr. Rosett. pp. 3, 23. ed. Letronne; Polyb. xv. 31; Diod. Exc. Vales. p. 574). At a subsequent period Scopas, the general who had opposed Antiochus, appears to have attempted to follow the example of Cleomenes, and excite a revolt in Alexandria itself, but his designs were discovered, and he was immediately put to death (Polyb. xviii. 36, 37). It was in consequence of this last attempt that the guardsians or ministers of the young king determined to declare him of full age, and the ceremony of his Aneuleteria, or coronation, was solemnised with great magnificence, n. c. 196. It was on this occasion that the decree was issued which has been preserved to us in the celebrated inscription known as the Rosetta stone, a monument of great interest in regard to the internal history of Egypt under the Ptolemies, independent of its importance as having afforded the key to the discovery of hieroglyphics. (Polyb. xviii. 38; Inscr. Rosett. ed. Letronne, Paris, 1841, published with the Fragmenta Historiocrum Graecorum, by Didot.)

Three years afterwards (in the winter of n. c. 193—192) the marriage of Ptolemy with the Syrian princess Cleopatra was solemnised at Raphia, (Hieronym. ad Daniel. xi. 17; Liv. xxxv. 13.) The war between Antiochus and the Romans was at this time on the eve of breaking out, and the former had doubtless hoped to attach the Egyptian king to his cause. But Cleopatra regarded the interests of her husband more than those of her father; and Ptolemy continued steadfast in his alliance with Rome. On the outbreak of the war he sent an embassy to the senate, with a large present of money and offers of assistance, both of which were, however, declined: and again in the following year (n. c. 190) we find him sending a fresh embassy to congratulate the Romans on their victory over Antiochus (Liv. xxxvi. 4, xxxvii. 3.) But though the encroachments of the Syrian king upon his Egyptian neighbour had been one of the pretexts of the war, Ptolemy derived no advantage from the treaty which concluded it, and Antiochus, in default of a promise still retained possession of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia.

We know very little of the reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes from the time that he himself assumed the government: but we are told that as long as he continued under the guidance and influence of Aristocthenes, his administration was equitable and receive back the Syrian provinces as her dower. (Polyb. iii. 2, xv. 20, xvi. 39, xvi. 33, 34, xxvii. 17; Justin. xxx. 2, 3, xxxi. 1; Liv. xxxi. 2, 9; Appian, Syr. 1—3, Mac. 3; Hieronym. ad Daniel. xi. 14—17; Joseph. Ant. xii. 4, § 1.)
popular. Gradually, however, he became estranged from his able and virtuous minister, and threw himself more and more into the power of flatterers and vicious companions, until at length he was induced to rid himself of Aristeomenes, who was compelled to take poison. Polycrates, who appears to have enjoyed great influence with the king after this period, shared in his vices and encouraged him in his effeminacy, studiously keeping him aloof from all part in military affairs. The only event which is recorded to us of this period is a second revolt in Lower Egypt, which was successfully put down by Polycrates, and the leaders of the insurrection (who from their names must have been native Egyptians) were barbarously put to death by Ptolemy himself, n. c. 168. (Diod. Exc. Vales. p. 574; Polyb. xxiii. 16; and see Letronne, ad Inscr. Rosell. p. 23.)

Towards the close of his reign Ptolemy appears to have conceived the project of recovering Coele-Syria from Seleucus, the successor of Antiochus, and had assembled a large mercenary force for that purpose: but having, by an unguarded expression excited the apprehensions of some of his friends, he was cut off in poison by the 24th year of his reign and the 29th of his age, n. c. 181. (Hieronym. ad Daniel. xi. 20; Diod. Exc. Vat. p. 71; Porphyry, ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 114; Joseph. Ant. xii. 4. § 11.)

He left two sons, both named Ptolemy, who subsequently ascended the throne, under the names of Ptolemy Philometor and Euergetes II., and a daughter, who bore her mother's name of Cleopatra. The auspicious beginning of his rule and his subsequent degeneracy have been already noticed. His reign was marked by the rapid decline of the Egyptian monarchy, for the provinces and cities wrested from it during his minority by Antiochus and Philip were never recovered, and at his death Cyprus and the Cyrenaica were almost the only foreign possessions still attached to the crown of Egypt. But he had not yet abandoned the part assumed by his predecessors in the affairs of Greece, and we find him still maintaining a close alliance with the Achaeans, and sending just before his death, to offer them the assistance of an Egyptian squadron. (Polyb. xxiii. 1, 7, xxv. 7.) [E. H. B.]

had the rashness to engage in war with Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, in the vain hope of recovering the provinces of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia, which had been wrested by his father from the Egyptian monarchy. But their presumption met with a speedy punishment; their army was totally defeated by Antiochus, near Pelusium, and this victory laid open to him the whole of Lower Egypt, so that he was able to advance without opposition as far as Memphis, b. c. 170. The young king himself fell into his hands, but was treated with kindness and distinction, as Antiochus hoped by his means to make himself master of Egypt. To this design Philometer appears to have lent himself a willing instrument; but on learning the captivity of his brother, the younger Ptolemy, who was then at Alexandria with his sister Cleopatra, immediately assumed the title of king, under the name of Euergetes II., and prepared to defend the capital to the utmost. Antiochus hereupon advanced to Alexandria, to which he laid vigorous siege; but was unable to make much progress, and the intervention of deputies from the Roman senate soon after induced him to retire from before the walls. He established the young Philometer as king at Memphis, while he himself withdrew into Syria, retaining, however, in his hands the frontier fortress of Pelusium. This last circumstance, together with the ravages committed by the Syrian troops, awakened Philometer, who had hitherto been a mere puppet in the hands of the Syrian king, to a sense of his true position, and he hastened to make overtures of peace to his brother and sister at Alexandria. It was agreed that the two brothers should reign together, and that Philometer should marry his sister Cleopatra. But this arrangement did not suit the views of Antiochus, who immediately renewed hostilities, and while he sent a large fleet to reduce Cyprus, advanced in person against Egypt. The two brothers were unable to offer any effectual opposition, and he had advanced a second time to the walls of Alexandria, when he was met by a Roman embassy, headed by M. Popilius Laenas, who haughtily commanded him instantly to desist from hostilities. The arrogance of the Roman deputy produced its effect; the capital of Egypt was saved, and Antiochus withdrew to his own dominions, n. c. 168. (Porphyry, ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 114; Hieronym. ad Daniel. xi. 21—30; Polyb. xxvii. 17, xxviii. 1, 16, 17, 19, xxix. 8, 11; Diod. Exc. Vales. p. 579, 580, Exc. Legat. p. 634, Exc. Vat. pp. 75, 76; Liv. xlii. 29, xlv. 19, xi. 11—13; Justin. xxxiv. 2, 3; Appian. Syr. 66; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 318—320, 366.)

Shortly after these events we find the two brothers sending a joint embassy to Rome to express their gratitude to the senate for their deliverance (Liv. xlv. 13; Polyb. xxx. 11). But this concord did not last long; dissensions broke out between them, and Euergetes, who at first obtained the advantage, expelled his brother from Alexandria. Hereupon Philometer repaired in person to Rome, n. c. 164, where he was received by the senate with the utmost honour, and deputies were appointed to accompany him to Egypt, and reestablish in him the sovereign power. This they appear to have effected with little opposition; and Euergetes, whose tyrannical government had already alienated the minds of the Alexandrians, was dethroned, and fell into the power of his elder brother. Philometer, however, had the magnanimity to pardon him, and it was arranged by the Roman deputies that the two brothers should divide the monarchy; Euergetes obtaining Cyrene as a separate kingdom, while Philometor retained Egypt itself. The former, however, could not long remain contented with the portion allotted him: he repaired to Rome in person, and succeeded in persuading the senate, in contravention of their own arrangement, to add Cyprus to his share. Three Roman ambassadors accompanied Euergetes to enforce these new terms, but they prevented that monarchical from asserting his claim to Cyprus by arms, and sent him to Cyrene to await the result of their negotiations with Philometor. The latter, however, contrived to amuse the deputies with fair words, and detained them at Alexandria a considerable time without making any concessions. Euergetes meanwhile had assembled an army, and advanced to the confines of Egypt, but an insurrection at Cyrene itself, which nearly cost him both his throne and his life, prevented him from prosecuting his cause by arms. The next year both brothers again sent ambassadors to Rome, but the result Philometor desired. (Polyb. xii. 18, 21, 27, xxxii. 1, xxxiii. 5, x. 112; Dio, Exc. Vales. pp. 584, 588, Exc. Vat. p. 84, Exc. Legat. p. 626; Liv. Epit. xlvii.; Porphyri. ap. Euseb. Arm. pp. 114, 115.)

The attention of Philometor appears to have been, from this time, principally directed to the side of Syria. Demetrius Soter, who was then established on the throne of that country, had sought during the dissensions between the two brothers to make himself master of Cyprus; and in return for this act of hostility Philometor now lent his support to the pretensions of Alexander Balas, and when the latter had established himself on the throne of Syria, bestowed on him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, n. c. 150. But the usurper repaid this favour with the blackest ingratitude. For Demetrius, the son of the deposed monarch, having landed in Syria to assert his claim to the crown, Ptolemy immediately assembled a large fleet and army, with which he advanced to the support of his son-in-law; but on arriving at Ptolemais, he was near falling a victim to an attempt on his life, made by Ammonius, the favourite and minister of Alexander, and there is little doubt that the king himself was a partner in the design. At all events, by protecting his favourite, and refusing to punish him, he justly alienated the mind of Ptolemy, who hastened to conclude a peace with Demetrius, and give him the support of the very forces which he had brought to oppose him. Having taken away his daughter Cleopatra from her faithless husband, he now bestowed her hand on his new ally Demetrius. The disaffection of the Syrians towards Alexander quickly enabled Ptolemy to subdue the whole country, and he entered Antioch without opposition; where he was himself declared, by the acclamations of the people, king of Syria as well as Egypt. But his natural moderation concurred with policy in leading him to decline the proffered honour, and establish Demetrius on the throne. Meanwhile Alexander, having assembled an army in Cilicia, again invaded Syria. He was met by the combined forces of Demetrius and Ptolemy, and totally defeated; but Philometor himself was thrown from his horse during the battle, and fractured his skull so severely, that he died a few days after, n. c. 146. (Polyb. xl. 12; Justin. xxxiv. 1, 2; Joseph. xiii. 4; Liv. Epit. liii.; Appian. Syr. 67; Ruseb. Arm. p. 166.) He had reigned 33 years from the period of his first accession, and 18 from his restoration by the Romans. (Porphyri. ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 115.)

During the reign of Philometor the number of Jews in Egypt received a large augmentation by the emigration of a numerous body who were driven out of Judaea by the opposite faction, and established themselves at Heliopolis with the permission and under the protection of the Egyptian king. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 3, B. J. i. 1. § 1.) We learn also that Philometor followed the example of his predecessors in dedicating new temples, or repairing and augmenting the old ones to the Egyptian divinities. (Letronne, Rec. des Inscri. pp. 10, 24; Wilkinson's Theb. p. 82.)

Philometor is praised for the mildness and humanity of his disposition, qualities which distinguish him not only by comparison with his brother, but even beyond most of his predecessors. Polyaenus even tells us that not a single citizen of Alexandria was put to death by him for any political or private offence. In the earlier years of his reign he allowed himself to fall into weakness and indulgence, but his subsequent conduct in the wars of Cyprus and Syria shows that he was by no means deficient in occasional energy. On the whole, if not one of the greatest, he was at least one of the best of the race of the Ptolemies. (Polyb. xl. 12; Dio, Exc. Vales. p. 594.)

He left three children: 1. A son, Ptolemy, who was proclaimed king after his father's death, under the name of Ptolemy Epator, but was put to death almost immediately after by his uncle Euergetes. 2. A daughter, Cleopatra, married first to Alexander Bala, then to Demetrius II. king of Syria; and

PTOLEMAEUS.

3. Another daughter, also named Cleopatra, who was afterwards married to her uncle Ptolemy Euergetes. [E. H. B.]

PTOLEMAEUS VII. (Πτολεμαίος) king of Egypt, bore the surname of Euergetes, whence he is styled Euergetes II., to distinguish him from Ptolemy III., but he is more commonly known by the name of Physcon (Φυσκόν), an appellation bestowed on him by the Alexandrians on account of his bloated and unwieldy appearance. He was the second son of Ptolemy Epiphanes, and continued in a private station during the regency of his mother Cleopatra and the first years of the reign of his brother Philometor. But when the latter had fallen into the hands of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Alexandrians declared the younger brother king, and he assumed the title of Euergetes, together with the royal diadem, b.c. 170. The sub-sophew was to be put to death. (Justin. xxxviii. 6.) The reconciliation of the two brothers, their joint reign, and their subsequent dissensions have been already related in the preceding article. From the time of his last defeat in Cyprus, n.c. 154, Ptolemy Physon appears to have acquiesced in the arrangement then concluded, and remained quiet in the government of Cyrene until the death of his brother Philometor, b.c. 146. On that event Cleopatra, the sister and widow of the late king, proclaimed her infant son king of Egypt, by the title of Ptolemy Eupator, and assumed the reins of government in his name. But her brother immediately assembled an army, and marched against Alexandria. Hostilities were, however, prevented by the intervention of Roman deputies, and it was agreed that Euergetes should obtain the crown of Egypt, and marry his sister Cleopatra. Their nuptials were solemnized accordingly, and on the very day of their celebration the king caused his unfortunate nephew to be put to death. (Justin. xxxviii. 6.) A reign thus commenced in blood was continued in a similar spirit. Already during his former brief rule at Alexandria, as well as in his separate kingdom of Cyrene, Euergetes had given abundant proofs of his tyrannical and cruel disposition, which had alienated the minds of his subjects, and led them to term him in derision Kakergetes. But when he found himself established on the throne of Egypt, he gave free scope to his sanguinary disposition. Many of the leading citizens of Alexandria, who had taken part against him on the death of his brother, were put to death without mercy, while the populace were given up without restraint to the cruelties of his mercenary troops, and the streets of the city were repeatedly deluged with blood. Thousands of the inhabitants fled from the scene of such horrors, and the population of Alexandria was so greatly thinned that the king found himself compelled to invite foreign settlers from all quarters to re-peopling his deserted capital. At the same time that he thus incurred the hatred of his subjects by his cruelties, he rendered himself an object of their aversion and contempt by abandoning himself to the most degrading vices. In consequence of these, he had become bloated and deformed in person, and so enormously corpulent, that he could scarcely walk. (Justin. L. c. — Diod. xxxiiii. Exc. Vales. p. 594; Athen. iv. p. 184, c. vi. p. 252, e. xii. p. 549, d.)

His union with Cleopatra was not of long duration. At first, indeed, he appears to have lived on good terms with her, and she bore him a son, to whom he gave the name of Memphis. But he afterwards became enamoured of his niece Cleopatra (the offspring of his wife by her former marriage with Philometor), and he did not hesitate to divorce the mother, and receive her daughter instead, as his wife and queen. By this proceeding he alienated still more the minds of his Greek subjects; but the abilities and vigour of his general Hierax enabled him for a time to defy the popular discontent. Meanwhile he was careful still to court the alliance of Rome, and received Scipio Africanus and his colleagues, when they visited Egypt, with every demonstration of respect. (Justin. xxxviii. 8; — Diod. Exc. Vales. xxxiii. pp. 593—595, 598, xxxiv. 602, Exc. Leg. p. 630; Liv. Epit. liv. — Ors. v. 10; Athen. xii. p. 549, d.)

At length, however, his vices and cruelties became too much for his subjects to bear. His palace was xxxv. Exc. Vales. p. 602, 608; Val. Max. ix. 2, ext. § 5.)

From this time he appears to have adopted a milder and more moderate system of government. His first act of clemency was to pardon Marseys, who had been the general of the revolted Alex-andrians (Diod. Exc. Vales. p. 603) and though we have little information concerning the remaining events of his reign, we do not find that it was again disturbed by any civil disorders. His attention was principally directed to the affairs of Syria, where Demetrius had espoused the cause of Cleopatra, and advanced as far as Pelusium to her support, but was compelled, by the disaffection of his own troops, to retire without effecting anything. In order to revenge himself for this attempt, Ptolemy now set up against him a new pretender in the person of a youth named Zabina or Zebina, who assumed the title of Alexander II., and with the support of the king himself, was able to establish himself for a time on the throne of Syria. But inflated with this success, the usurper forgot his obligations to Ptolemy, and behaved with such haughtiness to his benefactor, that the latter suddenly changed his policy, became reconciled to his sister Cleopatra, whom he permitted to return to Egypt, and gave his daughter Tryphena in marriage to Antiochus Gymus, the son of Demetrius, whom he also supported with a large auxiliary force. Antiochus was thus enabled to recover possession of the throne of his forefathers, b.c. 123, and from this time the friendly relations between Syria and Egypt continued

The character of Ptolemy Physcon has sufficiently appeared from the foregoing narrative. But stained as he was at once by the most infamous and degrading vices, and by the most sanguinary and unsparing cruelty, he still retained in a great degree that love of letters which appears to have been hereditary in the whole race of the Ptolemies. He had in his youth been a pupil of Aristarchus, and not only courted the society of learned men, but was himself the author of a work called Τύρωνατος, or memoirs, which extended to twenty-four books. It is repeatedly cited by Athenaeus (ii. p. 43, c, 71, b, ix. p. 367, x. p. 438, xiv. p. 654, &c.), but the quotations refer to minute and miscellaneous points from which it is impossible to judge of the general character of the work. It would seem, however, to have been a sort of general natural history, rather than an historical narration of events. But even in his patronage of literature Ptolemy displayed his capricious and tyrannical character: and during the first years of his sole reign his cruelties appear to have produced a general consternation among the philosophers and men of letters at Alexandria, many of whom fled from Egypt, and took refuge in other countries, where they opened schools, and thus introduced the learning and science of Alexandria (Athen. iv. p. 184). Ptolemy endeavoured in the later years of his reign to repair the mischief he had thus caused, and again draw together an extensive literary society in his capital. To him also is ascribed, with some probability, the prohibition of the export of papyrus, a measure which was dictated by jealousy of the growing literary riches of the kings of Pergamus, and led, as is well known, to the invention of parchment (Plin. H.N. xiii. 11 (21)). Some writers, however, refer this statement to Euergetes I. (See Parthey, Das Alex. Museum, p. 48.).

Euergetes II. left two sons; Ptolemy, afterwards known as Soter II., and Alexander, both of whom subsequently ascended the throne of Egypt; and three daughters: 1. Cleopatra, already married to her brother Ptolemy; 2. Tryphæna, the wife of Antiochus Grypus, king of Syria; and 3. Selene, who was still unmarried at her father's death. To his natural son Ptolemy surnamed Apion, he bequeathed by his will the separate kingdom of Cyrene [POILEMAS APION]. [E.H.B.]

PTOLEMAEUS VIII. (ΠΟΙΛΕΜΑΟΣ), king of Egypt, surnamed Soter II., and also Philometor, both of which titles he bears on inscriptions, but more often distinguished by historians by the appellation of Lathyrus or Lathurus (Δαυδος). He was the eldest son of Ptolemy Physcon, by his niece Cleopatra, and was already of full age at the time of his father's death, b.c. 117. Cleopatra, however, who had been appointed by the will of her late husband to succeed him on the throne, was desirous to associate with herself her younger son, Ptolemy Alexander, to the exclusion of his brother. But the latter was popular with the Alexandrians, and the queen was obliged to give way. She accordingly sent Alexander to Cyprus, while she declared Lathyrus king, with the titles of Soter and Philometor. But, in order to retain her influence over him undivided, she compelled him to repudiate his sister Cleopatra, to whom he had been previously married and was tenderly attached, and marry his younger sister Selene in her stead (Justin. xxxix. 3; Paus. i. 9. § 1). This arrangement seems to have in some degree produced its intended effect; at least the mother and son were able to rule conjointly for near ten years before they came to any open rupture. But they were on many occasions opposed to one another, in their foreign as well as domestic policy, and we find Ptolemy sending assistance to Antiochus Cyzicenus in his wars against the Jews, in direct opposition to the will of his mother, who had uniformly favoured the latter, and had placed two officers of that nation at the head of her army. But Cleopatra could ill brook such resistance to her authority: and by accusing Ptolemy of a design against her life, she excited such an insurrection in Alexandria that the king was forced to seek safety in flight, b.c. 107. (Justin. xxxix. 4; Paus. i. 9. § 2; Joseph. Ant. xiii. 10. §§ 2, 4.; Porphyry. ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 115.)

His brother Alexander now assumed the sovereignty of Egypt, in conjunction with his mother; while Lathyrus was able to establish himself in the possession of Cyprus. Cleopatra indeed attempted to dispossess him of that island also, but without success, and Ptolemy held it as an independent kingdom for the eighteen years during which Cleopatra and Alexander reigned in Egypt. His wars in Syria were the only events which have been recorded to us of this period. In b.c. 103 he landed in Syria with a large army, in order to support the citizens of Ptolemais and Gaza against Alexander Jannaeus, king of the Jews, defeated that monarch in a great battle on the banks of the Jordan, and made himself master of Ptolemais, Gaza, and other cities. Hereupon Cleopatra hastened with an army to oppose him, and reduced Phoenicia and Ptolemais, while Lathyrus, after an unsuccessful attempt to march upon Egypt itself, retired to Gaza, and the following spring withdrew to Cyprus, b.c. 101 (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 12. 13). In the subsequent disputes of the Syrian princes he and his brother, as was to be expected, took opposite sides, Ptolemy being in close alliance with Antiochus Cyzicenus, while Cleopatra supported his brother Antiochus Grypus (Justin. xxxix. 4). At a later period (in b.c. 94) we find Ptolemy again taking part in the civil wars which followed.

PTOLEMAEUS.
PTOLEMAEUS.

The death of Antiochus Grypus, and setting up Demetrius Eucerus, the youngest son of that monarch, as a claimant to the throne. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 13. § 4.)

After the death of Cleopatra and the expulsion of Alexander in B. C. 69 [PTOLEMAEUS IX.], Ptolemy Lathyrus was recalled by the Alexandrians and established anew on the throne of Egypt, which he occupied thenceforth without interruption till his death in B. C. 81 (Justin. xxxix. 5.; Porphyry. l. c. p. 116). The most important event of this period was the revolt of the once mighty city of Thebes, in Upper Egypt, which was still powerful enough to hold out for nearly three years against the arms of Ptolemy, but at the end of that time was taken and reduced to the state of ruin in which it has ever since remained (Paus. i. 9. § 8). With this exception the eight years of the second reign of Ptolemy Lathyrus appear to have been a period of internal tranquillity, while his prudent policy regained for him in some degree that consideration abroad which Egypt had nearly lost. We find the Athenians, in return for some benefits which he had conferred upon them, erecting statues to him and his daughter Berenice (Paus. l. c.); and during the Mithridatic war, B. C. 87, Lucullus was sent by Sulla to request from him the assistance of the Egyptian fleet. But Lathyrus was desirous to remain neutral during that contest, and, while he received Lucullus with every demonstration of honour he declined to furnish the required assistance. (Plut. Lucull. 2, 3.)

The character of Lathyrus appears to have been mild and amiable, even to a degree bordering upon weakness; but it shows in a favourable light when contrasted with those of his mother and brother, and he appears to have been free from the vices which degraded so many of the Egyptian kings. He reigned in all thirty-five years and a half; ten in conjunction with his mother (B. C. 117—107), eighteen in Cyprus (107—89), and seven and a half as sole ruler of Egypt (Porphyry. ap. Eusob. Arm. p. 116). After his restoration in B. C. 89 he appears to have assumed the additional title of Philadelphus, whence he is sometimes distinguished as PTOLEMY PHILADELPHUS II. (Letronne, Rec. des Inscr. pp. 64—66; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 393.) He left only one daughter Berenice, called also Cleopatra, who succeeded him on the throne; and two sons, both named Ptolemy, who, though illegitimate, became severally kings of Egypt and Cyprus.

[PTOLEMAEUS VIII., KING OF EGYPT.]

PTOLEMAEUS IX. (Πτολεμαίος), king of Egypt, surnamed Alexander, whence he is generally distinguished as Alexander I., was the youngest son of Ptolemy VII. by his niece Cleopatra. His mother's partiality led her to desire to place him on the throne in conjunction with her son, on the death of Euergetes, B. C. 117, in preference to his elder brother. But the will of the Alexandrians having compelled her to assume Lathyrus as her colleague, she sent Alexander to Cyprus with the title of general or governor of that island. Three years later, however (B. C. 114), he assumed the title of king, on what pretext we know not, and reckoned the years of his reign from this date (Porphyry. ap. Eusob. Arm. p. 116). But he appears to have remained content with the possession of Cyprus till B. C. 107, when Cleopatra, having expelled Ptolemy Lathyrus, recalled her favourite son to occupy the vacant throne of Egypt. Alexander reigned conjointly with his mother from this time till B. C. 90: but it is probable that her haughty and imperious character left him little real part in the administration of affairs. The only occasion on which we meet with his name in this interval is in B. C. 102, when he commanded the Egyptian fleet which attacked Phoenixia by sea, while Cleopatra with the army marched against Palestine (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 13. § 1). But at length the violence and cruelties of his mother terrified Alexander to such a degree that he determined to free himself from her power, and made his escape secretly from Alexandria. Hereupon Cleopatra, fearing lest her sons should make common cause against her, sent an embassy to Alexander to entreat his return. With this request he was induced to comply; but soon found reason to suspect that she was forming designs against his life, and immediately determined to anticipate them by causing her to be assassinated, B. C. 90. But he did not long enjoy the fruits of this crime. Cleopatra had been popular with the army, and the soldiers in consequence hated Alexander, who had not reigned alone a year, when he was compelled by a general sedition of the populace and military to quit Alexandria. He however raised fresh troops, and attempted to overcome the insurgent soldiers, but was totally defeated in a sea-fight by the rebels under Tyrrhus, and fled for refuge to Myra in Lycia, B. C. 89. His brother Lathyrus was now recalled by the Alexandrians to Egypt, a circumstance which led Alexander to hope that he might make himself master of Cyprus, and he accordingly assembled some forces, and invaded that island, but was defeated in a naval action by Chneares, and fell in the battle. (Justin. xxxix. 4, 5; Porphyry. ap. Eusob. Arm. p. 116.) He left two children: a son, Alexander, who afterwards ascended the throne of Egypt, and a daughter, of whom nothing more is known. (Porphyry. l. c.)

[PTOLEMAEUS X., KING OF EGYPT.]

PTOLEMAEUS X. (Πτολεμαίος), king of Egypt, son of the preceding, bore his father's name of Alexander, whence he is styled PTOLEMAEUS ALEXANDER II. When a mere child, he was sent by his grandmother Cleopatra for safety to the island of Cos, probably as early as n. c. 102 (see Joseph. Ant. xii. 13, § 1), where he remained till the year n. c. 88, when that island was taken by Mithridates the Great. On this occasion Alex- ander fell into the hands of the conqueror, who treated him with the utmost distinction, and retained him at his own court. But the young prince soon after found an opportunity to escape, and took refuge with Sulla, whom he accompanied on his return to Rome. Here he remained till n. c. 81, when the death of Ptolemy Lathyrous without male issue having left the throne of Egypt vacant, Sulla, who was then dictator, nominated the young Alexander (who had obtained a high place in his favour) king of Egypt, and sent him to take possession of the crown. It was, however, agreed, in deference to the claims of Cleopatra Berenice, the daughter of Lathyrous, whom the Alexandrians had already placed on the throne, that Alexander should marry her, and admit her to share the sovereign power. He complied with the letter of this treaty by marrying Cleopatra immediately on his arrival in Egypt, but only nineteen days afterwards caused her to be assassinated: an act of cruelty with all the indifference, that a Ciceronian, who in consequence of his new monarch, dragged him to the gymnasium, and there put him to death, n. c. 80. (Porphyry. ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 117; Appian. Mithr. 28, II. C. 102; Cic. Frag. Or. de rege Alexandr. p. 352, ed. Orell.; Trog. Pomp. Prolog. xxxix.)

Much difficulty and perplexity have arisen in regard to an Alexander king of Egypt, who is alluded to in more than one passage by Cicero, as having bequeathed his dominions by will to the Roman people (Cic. de Leg. agrar. i. 1, ii. 16, 17; Fr. de reg. Alexandrin. p. 350). It appears that the fact of this bequest was by no means very certain, and that it never was acted upon by the Roman senate. But authors are not at all agreed which of the two Alexanders is here meant; and some writers have even deemed it necessary to admit the existence of a third king of the name of Alexander, who died about n. c. 65. The silence of the chronographers seems, however, conclusive against this hypothesis. Niebuhr, on the contrary, considers Trogus Alexander L. to have lived in exile till the year 65, and to have been the author of this testament: but this is opposed to the direct testimony of Porphyry as to his death. Other writers suppose Alexander II. to be the person designed, and adopt the statement of Trogus Pompeius that he was only expelled by the Alexandrians, in opposition to the authority of Porphyry and Appian, confirmed as they are by a passage in Cicero, in regard to his death. (See on this subject Clinton. F. II. vol. iii. p. 392; Champollion-Figeac. Annales des Lagides, vol. ii. p. 247; Visconti. Iconographie Grecque, vol. iii. p. 251; Niebuhr. KL. Schriften, p. 302; Orelli. Onomast. Tulsian. p. 98.) The fragmentary and imperfect nature of our authorities for this period of Egyptian history renders it scarcely possible to arrive at a satisfactory solution of this question. (Tr. H. B.)

PTOLEMAEUS XI. (Πτολεμαῖος), king of Egypt, assumed the surnames or titles of Νέως Διονύσου (Νέως Διόνυσως), but is more commonly known by the appellation of AULETES (the flute-player). He was an illegitimate son of Ptolemy Lathyrous, and, on account of his spurious birth, his pretensions to the throne appear to have altogether passed over at his father's death: but when the assassination of Berenice and the death of Alexander II. had completed the extinction of the legitimate race of the Lagides (n. c. 80), Ptolemy was proclaimed king by the Alexandrians (Porphyry. ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 117). So imperfect is our knowledge of this period that we know nothing concerning the first twenty years of his reign. But of his character in general we are told that he was given up to every kind of vice and debauchery, and his name is associated with those of Philopator and Physcon, as one of the worst rulers of the whole race of the Ptolemies (Strab. xvii. p. 796). He appears to have assumed the name of Dionysus as a sort of authority for his orgies, and is said to have been on the point of putting to death the Platonic philosopher Demetrius, for refusing to join in his drunken revels (Lucian, de Calumnia. 16). His passion for playing on the flute, to which he owed his popular appellation, led him to institute musical contests, in which he himself condescended to appear as a competitor. (Strab. l. c.; Plut. de Aul. et Anim. 12.)

But it was not his vices alone which served to disgust and alienate the minds of his subjects. It had been a natural object of his policy to irritate the counterprises and pretensions of the Roman senate; but, for some reason or other, it was long before he could obtain their ratification of his title to the crown, and it was not till the consulship of Caesar that he was able to purchase by vast bribes the desired privileges (Suet. Cæs. 54). But he had expended immense sums in the pursuit of this object, which he was compelled to raise by the imposition of fresh taxes, and the discontent thus excited combining with the contempt entertained for his character, led to his expulsion by the Alexandrians, in n. c. 58. On this he determined to proceed in person to Rome to procure from the senate his restoration. On his way thither he had an interview at Rhodes with Cato, who endeavoured, but in vain, to dissuade him from his purpose (Plut. Cat. Min. 35). His first reception was promising; and by a lavish distribution of bribes, combined with the influential support of Cicero, whom he announced in his favour (Pro Rege Alexandrin.), he procured a decree from the senate, commanding his restoration, and entrusting the charge of effecting it to P. Lentulus Spinther, then proconsul of Cilicia. Meanwhile, the Alexandrians sent an embassy of a hundred of their leading citizens to plead their cause with the Roman senate: but Ptolemy had the audacity to cause the deputies, on their arrival in Italy, to be waylaid, and the greater part of them murdered, while the rest were prevented, either by threats or bribes, from coming forward against him. The indignation excited at Rome by this proceeding, however, produced a reaction: the tribunes took up the matter against the nobility, while a party in the senate strove to get the commission transferred from Lentulus to Pompey, and an order was transmitted from the Sibylline books, forbidding the restoration of the king by an armed force. The intrigues and disputes thus raised were protracted throughout the year 56, and at length Ptolemy, despairing of a favourable result, quitted Rome in disgust, and withdrew to Ephesus. (Dion Cass. xxxix. 12—16; Cic. ad Fam. i. 1—7, ad Q. Fr. ii. 2, 3, pro Rabir. 2, 3, pro Caec. 10; Porphyry. ap. Euseb. Arm. pp. 117, 118; Plut. Pompe. 49.)
PTOLEMAEUS.

Some years afterwards, however, he obtained from private individuals what he had in ducing the senate to accomplish: and in B.C. 55 A. Gabinius, who was proconsul in Syria, was induced, by the influence of Pompey, aided by the enormous bribe of ten thousand talents from Ptolemy himself, to undertake his restoration. The Alexandrians had in the meantime placed on the throne of Egypt, Berenice, the eldest daughter of Ptolemy, who had married Archelaus, the son of the general of Mithridates [ARCHELAUS, No. 2]; and they opposed Gabinius with an army on the confines of the kingdom. They were, however, defeated in three successive battles, Archelaus slain, and Ptolemy once more established on the throne, B.C. 55. One of his first acts was to put to death his daughter Berenice, and many of the leading citizens of Alexandria. (Dion Cass. xxxix. 55-58; Liv. Epit. cv.; Plut. Ant. 3; Strab. xvii. p. 796; Cic. in Pison. 21, pro Rubir. Post. 6; Porphy. l. c.)

He survived his restoration only three years and a half (Porphyr. l. c.); of the events of which period we have no information; but as Ptolemy was now supported by a large body of Greek and Macedonian soldiers who had been left behind by Gabinius for his protection, he was safe from any outbreak of popular discontent. On the other hand seditions and tumults of the soldiers themselves became frequent, and the king was repeatedly compelled to give way to their demands (Caes. B. C. iii. 103, 110; Dion Cass. xliii. 5). The immense sum exacted from him by Gabinius had also involved him in pecuniary embarrassments, and he was compelled to surrender the whole finances of his kingdom into the hands of Rabrius Postumus. (Cic. pro Rubir. 10.)

His death took place in May B.C. 51 (see Cic. ad Fam. viii. 4), after a reign of twenty-nine years from the date of his first accession. He left two sons, both named Ptolemy, and two daughters, Cleopatra and Arsinoë. Two other daughters, Tryphaena and Berenice, had died before him (Porphyr. l. c. p. 118). Besides the titles already mentioned, Ptolemy Akletes bears, in inscriptions, both Greek and hieroglyphic, those of Philopator and Philopator Asclepiodorus. None of these, however, appear on his coins.

COIN OF PTOLEMAEUS XI., KING OF EGYPT.

PTOLEMAEUS XII. (Πτολεμαίος), king of Egypt, was the eldest son of Ptolemy XI. Auletes. He is commonly said to have borne the surname of Dionysus, in imitation of his father, but there appears to be no authority for this assertion. By his father's will the sovereign power was left to himself and his sister Cleopatra jointly, and this arrangement was carried into effect without opposition, B.C. 51. Auletes had also referred the execution of his will to the Roman senate, and the latter accepted the office, confirmed its provisions and bestowed on Pompey the title of guardian of the young king (Caes. B. C. iii. 108; Eutrop. vi. 21). But the approach of the civil war prevented them from taking any active part, and the administration of affairs fell into the hands of an eunuch named Pothinus. It was not long before dissensions broke out between the latter and Cleopatra, which ended in the expulsion of the princess, after she had reigned in conjunction with her brother for three years, B.C. 48. Hereupon she took refuge in Syria, and assembled an army with which she invaded Egypt. The young king, accompanied by his guardians, met her at Pelusium, and it was while the two armies were here encamped opposite to one another, that Pompey landed in Egypt, to throw himself as a suppliant on the protection of Ptolemy; but was assassinated by the orders of Pothinus and Achillas before he could obtain an interview with the king himself. (Caes. B. C. iii. 105, 104; Dion Cass. xliii. 3, 4; Plut. Pomp. 77-79; Appian, B. C. ii. 84, 85; Strab. xvii. p. 797.) Shortly after, Caesar arrived in Egypt, and took upon himself to regulate the affairs of that kingdom, and settle the dispute between Ptolemy and his sister. But Cleopatra, who now hastened to return to Alexandria, afterwards obtained so powerful a hold over the conqueror by the influence of her personal attractions, that it was evident the latter would decide the controversy in her favour. Hereupon Pothinus determined to excite an insurrection against Caesar, and secretly summoned the army from Pelusium under Achillas. Caesar was taken by surprise, and had to maintain his ground with very inadequate forces in a part of the city where he was vehemently assailed both by the army and the populace. Ptolemy himself was at this time in the power of the conqueror, but after the contest had continued for some time, he obtained permission to repair to the camp of the insurgents, under pretence of exercising his authority to reduce them to submission; instead of which he immediately put himself at their head. Caesar, however, still defied all their efforts; and, meanwhile, Mithridates of Pergamus had assembled an army in Syria, with which he advanced to the relief of the king. Ptolemy now turned his arms against this new enemy, and took up a strong position on the banks of the Nile to prevent Mithridates from crossing that river. Caesar himself, however, quickly arrived from Alexandria, landed near the mouth of the Nile, attacked and defeated the forces of the young king, and followed up his advantage by storming his camp. Ptolemy himself endeavoured to escape by the river, but was drowned in the attempt. His death occurred either before the close of B.C. 48, or early in the following year. (Caes. B. C. iii. 106-112; Hirt. B. Alter. 1-31; Dion Cass. xliii. 7-9, 34-43; Plut. Caes. 48, 49; Liv. Epit. exil.; Appian, B. C. ii. 69, 90; Porphyr. ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 118.)

PTOLEMAEUS.

PTOLEMAEUS XIII. (Πτολεμαϊδος), king of Egypt, was the youngest son of Ptolemy Aleutes. He was declared king by Caesar in conjunction with Cleopatra, after the death of his elder brother Ptolemy XII., b. c. 47: and although he was a mere boy, it was decreed that he should marry his sister, with whom he was thus to share the power. Both his marriage and regal title were, of course, purely nominal: in b. c. 45, Cleopatra took him with her to Rome, but shortly after the death of Caesar she put the poor boy to death, after he had enjoyed his titular sovereignty a little more than three years, b. c. 43. (Porphyry, op. Euseb. Arm. p. 118; Hirt. B. Alex. 33; Dion Cass. xiii. 44, xiii. 27; Strab. xvii. p. 797; Suet. Cae. 35.)

Concerning the history of the Ptolemies in general, see Vaillant, Historia Ptolemaeorum Regum Aegypti, vol. Amatul. 1701; Champollion-Figeac, Annales des Lagides, 2 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1815; Leetonne, Recherches pour servir à l'histoire d'Egypte, 8vo. Paris, 1823, and Recueil des Inscriptions Grecques en Égypte, 4to. Paris, 1842; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. Appendix, ch. 5. Much light has been thrown upon the history of the earlier Ptolemies by Niebuhr, Kleine Schriften, pp. 179—305, and by Droysen, Hellenismus, vol. ii., but a good history of this dynasty is still a desideratum.

Of the coins of the Ptolemies it may be observed, that most of them can only be assigned to the several monarchs of the name by conjecture; very few of them bearing any title but those of PTOLEMAIUS BAZIASES. Hence they are of little or no historical value. (See on this subject Eckhel, vol. iv. pp. 4—25; Visconti, Iconographie Grecque, vol. iii. chap. 18.)

PTOLEMAEUS (Πτολεμαϊδος), king of EPHIRUS, was the second son of Alexander II., king of Epirus, and Olympias, and grandson of the great Pyrhus. He succeeded to the throne on the death of his elder brother, Pyrrhus II., but reigned only a very short time, having set out on a military expedition, during the course of which he fell sick and died. (Justin. xxvii. 1, 3; Paus. iv. 33. § 3.) The date of his reign cannot be fixed with certainty, but as he was contemporary with Demetrius II. king of Macedonia, it may be placed between 239—229, b. c.

PTOLEMAEUS, kings of Macedon. [PTOLEMAEUS OF ALORUS, and PTOLEMAEUS CHAUERUS.]

PTOLEMAEUS (Πτολεμαϊδος), king of MAURITANIA, was the son and successor of Juba II. By his mother Cleopatra he was descended from the kings of Egypt, whose name he bore. The period of his accession and the death of his father cannot be determined with certainty, but we know that Ptolemy was already on the throne when Strabo wrote, about 18 or 19, a. D. (Strab. xvii. pp. 828, 810; Clinton. F. H. vol. iii. p. 203.) He was at this time very young, and the administration of affairs fell in consequence, in great measure, into the hands of his freedmen. Great disorders ensued, and many of the Mauritanians joined the standard of the Numidian Tafarinas, who carried on a predatory warfare against the Romans. But in a. D. 24 Tafarinas himself was defeated and killed by P. Dolabella, and Ptolemy himself rendered such efficient assistance to the Roman general in his campaign, that an embassy was sent to reward him, after the ancient fashion, with the presents of a toga picta and sceptre, as a sign of the friendship of the Roman people. (Tac. Ann. iv. 23—26.) He continued to reign without interruption till a. D. 40, when he was summoned to Rome by Caligula, and shortly after put to death, his great riches having excited the cupidity of the emperor. (Dion Cass. lxx. 25; Suet. Cal. 26; Senec. de Tranquit. 11.) We learn nothing from history of his character; but from the circumstance that a statue was erected in his honour by the Athenians (Stuart's Antig. of Athens, vol. iii. p. 55; Visconti, Iconographie Grecque, vol. iii. p. 275), we may probably infer that he inherited something of his father's taste for literature. The annexed coin belongs to this Ptolemy; the curule chair and sceptre, on the reverse, probably refer to the honours decreed him by the Roman senate, as already mentioned.

PUBLICIA.

COIN OF PTOLEMAEUS, KING OF MAURITANIA.

PTOLEMAEUS, son of Mnesaurus. [PTOLEMAEUS, laterarch of CHALCIS.]

PTOLICLICHUS (Πτόλικλης), statuary. 1. Of Aegina, the son and pupil of Symmón, flourished from about Ol. 75 to about Ol. 82, b. c. 480—448. [ARISTOCLES.] The only works of his, which are mentioned, are the statues of two Olympic victors, Theognetus of Aegina, and Epicadius of Mantinea (Paus. vi. 9. § 1, 10. § 2).

2. Of Corycea, the pupil of Critios of Athens (Paus. vi. 3. § 2. a. 5). Pausias does not mention any work of his, but merely gives his name as one of the following artistic genealogies of teachers and pupils: Critios of Athens, Ptolichus, Amphion, Pison of Calauria, Damocritus of Sicyon. As Critios flourished chiefly about Ol. 75, b. c. 477, we may place Ptolichus about Ol. 83, b. c. 418. He was therefore a contemporary of Pheidias. [P. S.]

PTOUS (Πτόους), a son of Athamnas and The- misto, from whom mount Ptoon and the sanctuary of Apollo, which was situated upon it, were believed to have derived their name. (Paus. ii. 23. § 3; Apollod. i. 9. § 2.) Ptoous also occurs as a surname of Apollo. (Paus. iv. 32. § 5, iv. 23. § 3.)

PUBLICIA. 1. The wife of L. Postumius Albinus, consul b. c. 154, was accused of murdering her husband. She gave bail to the praetor for her appearance, but was put to death by order of her relations, consequently by a judicium domesti- cam. (Val. Max. vi. 3. § 8; Liv. Epit. 43; Rein, q q 4 PUBLICIUS.

2. The wife of Lentulus, the flamen Martialis. (Macrob. Sat. ii. 9.)

PUBLICIA GENS, plebeian. The ancient form of the name was Publicius, which we find on coins and in the Fasti Capitolini. This gens rose into importance in the time between the first and second Punic wars, and the first member of it who obtained the consulship was M. Publicius Malleolus, in a. c. 292. During the republic it was divided into two families, that of Malleolus, which was the most important, and that of Bibulus, which has been accidentally omitted under that head, and is therefore given below. Besides these names, there are a few cognomina of freedmen and of persons in the imperial period, which are likewise given below. The cognomen Malleolus is the only one that appears on coins of this gens, and there are also other coins which bear no surname. Of the latter we subjoin a specimen. The obverse represents a female head covered with a helmet, the reverse Hercules strangling a lion, with the legend c. Publicius c. p. It is not known who this C. Publicius was. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 279.)

COIN OF PUBLICIA GENS.

PUBLICIUS. 1. Publicius, an Italian seer, is mentioned twice by Cicero along with the Marci. (Cic. de Div. i. 50, ii. 53.) [See Vol. II. p. 544, b.]

2. L. Publicius Bibulus, tribunus militum of the second legion, b. c. 216. (Livy. xxii. 53.)

3. C. Publicius Bibulus, tribune of the plebs b. c. 209, distinguished himself by his hostility to M. Claudius Marcellus, whom he endeavoured to deprive of his imperium; but Marcellus made such a triumphant reply to the accusations of Publicius, that not only was the bill for taking away his imperium rejected, but he was elected consul on the next day. (Livy. xxvii. 20, 21.)

4. C. Publicius, whose saying respecting P. Mummium is mentioned by Cicero (de Orat. ii. 67), on the authority of Cato. He may have been the same person as No. 3, as Gildorp has conjectured.

5. L. Publicius, an intimate friend of Sex. Naevius, and a slave-dealer, mentioned by Cicero in b. c. 81. (Cic. pro Quint. 6.)

6. Publicius, a Roman eques, celebrated for conducting bribery at the elections at Rome, about b. c. 70. (Pseudo-Ascon. in Ferr. p. 135.)

7. Q. Publicius, praetor b. c. 69, before whom Cicero defended D. Matrinus. (Cic. pro Cluent. 45.)

8. Publicius, one of Catiline's crew, b. c. 63. (Cic. in Cat. ii. 2.)

9. Publicius, a tribune of the plebs, of uncertain date, brought forward a law that presents of wax-candles (corvi) at the Saturnalia should be made to the patrons only by those clients who were in good circumstances, as the making of these presents had become a very burdensome obligation to many clients. (Macrob. Sat. i. 7.)

PUBLICOLA.

PUBLICIUS CELSUS. [Celsus.]

PUBLICIUS CERTUS, was the accuser of the younger Helvidius, who was slain by Domitian. As a reward for this service he was nominated praefectus aerarii and was promised the consulship; but after the death of the tyrant, he was accused by the younger Pliny in the senate, a. d. 96, of the part he had taken in the condemnation of Helvidius. The emperor Nerva did not allow the senate to proceed to the trial of Publicius; but Pliny obtained the object he had in view, for Publicius was deprived of his office of praefectus aerarii, and thus lost all hope of the consulship. The account of his impeachment, which was afterwards published, is related by Pliny in a letter to Quadratus (Ep. ix. 13). Publicius died a few days after the proceedings in the senate, and it was supposed by some that his death was hastened by fear.

PUBLICIUS GELLIIUS. [Gellius.]

CN. PUBLICIUS MENANDER, a freedman mentioned by Cicero, in his oration for Balbus (c. 11).

PUBLICOLA, or POPULICULA, or POPLICOLA, a Roman cognomen, signified "one who courts the people" (from populus and colo), and thus "a friend of the people." The form Poplicula or Poplicola was the most ancient. Poplicola generally occurs in inscriptions, but we also find Poplicula (Orelli, Inscr. No. 547). Publicola was the more modern form, and seems to have been the one usually employed by the Romans in later times. We find it in the best manuscripts of Livy, and in the palimpsest manuscript of Cicero's De Republica.

PUBLICOLA, GELIUS. 1. L. Gellius Publicola, was the contubernalis of the consul C. Papirius Carbo, b. c. 120 (Cic. Brut. 27).

None of his family had held any of the higher offices of the state before him, and we do not know how he rose into distinction. He must, at all events, have been far advanced in years when he attained the consulship. The year of his praetorship is not mentioned; but after his praetorship he received the province of Achaea, with the title of proconsul; and during his government he offered, in mockery, his mediation to the rival philosophers of Athens, to reconcile their disputes (Cic. de Leg. i. 20). In b. c. 74 he defended the cause of M. Octavius Ligur, whose adversary was unjustly favoured by the praetor Verres (Cic. Ferr. i. 48). In b. c. 72 Gellius was consul with Cn. Cornelius Lentulus Claudianus. The two consuls carried on war against Spartacus. Gellius at first defeated Crixus, one of the principal generals of Spartacus, near mount Igaranus in Apulia, and Crixus lost his life in the battle. The two consuls then marched against Spartacus, who was attempting to escape across the Alps into Gaul. But they were not many in number for the leader of the gladiators, Spartacus attacked each of them separately in the Apennines, and conquered them in succession. The two consuls then united their forces, but were again defeated in Piconum, by their indefatigable adversary. It was about this time that Pompey had brought the war in Spain to a conclusion; and as he had conferred the Roman citizenship upon many persons in that country, the consuls brought forward a law to ratify his acts (Cic. pro Balb. 8. 14). The consuls also proposed in the senate, that no one in the provinces should be accused of capital crimes in their absence. This was directed against Verres. (Cic. Ferr. ii. 33.)
PUBLICOLA.

Two years afterwards, B.C. 70, Gellius was censor with Lentulus, his former colleague in the consulate. They exercised their office with great severity, and expelled many persons from the senate, among whom was C. Antonius. It was during their censorship that Pompey, who was then consul, appeared as an ordinary aequus at the solemn muster of the equites, and, amid the applause of the spectators, led his horse by the carule chair of the censors, and answered the ordinary questions. In B.C. 67 and 66 Gellius served as one of Pompey's legates in the war against the pirates, and had the charge of the Tuscan sea. In the first conspiracy of Catiline an attempt was made to obtain possession of his fleet, and, though the mutiny was put down, Gellius had a narrow escape of his life. In consequence of the attempt, he had previously incurred, he was one of the warmest supporters of Cicero in his suppression of the second conspiracy, and accordingly proposed that Cicero should be rewarded with a civic crown. From this time he appears as a steady friend of Cicero and the aristocratic party. In B.C. 59 he opposed the agrarian law of Caesar, and in B.C. 57 he spoke in favour of Cicero's recall from exile. He was alive in B.C. 55, when Cicero delivered his speech against Piso, but probably died soon afterwards. He was married twice. (Appian, B. C. i. 117; Plut. Cress. 9; Oros. v. 24; Flor. iii. 20. § 10; Estor. vi. 7; Liv. Epit. 96, 98; Plut. Pomp. 22; Cic. pro Client. 42; Ascon. in Tog. Can. p. 84, ed. Orelli; Appian, Mithr. 93; Flor. iii. 6. § 8; Cic. post Red. ad Quir. 7; Gell. v. 6; Cic. ad att. xili. 21; Plut. Cæc. 26; Cic. in Pis. 3; Val. Max. v. 9. § 1.) Orelli, in his Onomasticon, vol. ii. p. 263, makes L. Gellius, the consularibus of Carbo, a different person from the consul of B.C. 72; but this is clearly an error, for Cicero speaks of the consularibus of Carbo as his friend (Brut. 27), and that he reached a great age is evident from many passages. (Cic. Brut. 47; Plut. Cic. 26.)

2. L. GELLIIUS PUBLICOLA, the son of the preceding by his first wife. He was accused of committing incest with his step-mother, and of conspiring against his father's life; but although the latter was nearly convinced of his guilt, he allowed him to plead his cause before a large number of senators, and, in consequence of their opinion, declared him innocent (Val. Max. v. 9. § 1). After the death of Caesar in B.C. 44, Gellius espoused the republican party, and went with M. Brutus to Asia. Here he was detected in plotting against the life of Brutus but was pardoned at the intercession of his brother, M. Valerius Messalla. Shortly afterwards he was chosen to a consulship, to take away the life of Cassius, but again escaped unpunished, through the intercession of his mother Polla. It would hence appear that Polla had been divorced from her first husband Gellius, and had subsequently married Messalla. Gellius, however, showed no gratitude for the leniency which had been shown him, but deserted to the triumvirs, Octavian and Antony; and while in their service he had coins struck, on which he appears with the title of Q. P., that is, Quaestor Propradore (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 223). He was rewarded for his treachery by the consulsiphip in B.C. 36. In the war between Octavian and Antony, he espoused the side of the latter, and commanded the right wing of Antony's fleet at the battle of Actium. As he is not mentioned again, he probably perished in the action. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 24; Liv. Epit. 122; Dion Cass. xlix. 24; Plut. Ant. 65, 66; Vell. Pat. ii. 83.)

3. GELLIIUS PUBLICOLA, probably a brother of No. 1, is called a step-son of L. Marcus Philippus, consul B.C. 91, and a brother of L. Marcus Philippus, consul B.C. 56. According to Cicero's account he was a profligate and a spendthrift, and having dissipated his property, united himself to P. Clodius. As an intimate friend of the latter, he of course incurs the bitterest enmity of Cicero, whose statements with respect to him must, therefore, be received with caution. (Cic. pro Scot. 51, 52, in Vatin. 2, de Harusp. Resp. 27, ad Att. iv. 3, 2, ad Q. Fr. ii. 1, § 1; Schol. Dob. pro Scot. p. 504, ed. Orelli.)

4. GELLIIUS PUBLICOLA, had been the quasator of Junius Silanus in Asia, in the reign of Tiberius, and was subsequently one of his accusers in A.D. 22. (Tac. Ann. iii. 67.)

5. L. GELLIIUS PUBLICOLA, one of the consuls subject in the reign of Caligula, A.D. 40 (Fasti). (For an account of the Gellii see Drumm. Geschichtc Roma, vol. ii. pp. 64—67."

PUBLICOLA. 1. P. VALENIUS VOLUSI F. PUBLICOLA, the colleague of Brutus in the consulate in the first year of the republic. The account given of him by Livy, Plutarch, and Dionysius cannot be regarded as a real history. The history of the expulsion of the Tarquins and of the infancy of the republic has evidently received so many poetical embellishments, and has been so altered by successive traditions, that probably we are not warranted in asserting anything more respecting Publicola than that he took a prominent part in the government of the state during the first few years of the republic. The common story, however, runs as follows. P. Valerius, the son of Volusius, belonged to one of the noblest Roman houses, and was a descendant of the Sabine Volusius, who settled at Rome with Tatus, the king of the Sabines. [VALERIA GENS.] When Lucretia summoned her father from the camp, after Sextus Tarquiniius had wrought the deed of shame, P. Valerius accompanied Lucretius to his daughter, and was by her side when she disclosed the villainy of Sextus and stabbed herself to the heart. Valerius, in common with all the others who were present, swore to avenge her death, which they forthwith accomplished by expelling the Tarquins from the city. Junius Brutus and Tarquinius Collatinius were first elected consuls, B.C. 509; but as the very name of Tarquiniius made Collatinius an object of suspicion to the people, he was obliged to resign his office and leave the city, and Valerius was chosen in his stead. Shortly afterwards the people of Veii and Tarracini espoused the cause of the Tarquins, and marched with them against Rome, at the head of a large army. The two consuls advanced to meet them with the Roman forces. A bloody battle was fought, in which Brutus fell; and both parties claimed the victory, till a voice was heard in the dead of the night proclaiming that the Romans had conquered, as the Etruscans had lost one man more. Alarmed at this, the Etruscans fled, and Valerius entered Rome in triumph. Valerius was now left without a colleague; and as he began at the same time to build a house on the top of the hill Velia, which looked down upon the forum, the people feared that he was aiming at kingly power. As soon as Valerius became aware of these suspicions, he stoop the building; and the people, ashamed of their conduct, granted him a piece of ground at the foot of the Velia, with the privilege of having the door of his house open back into the street. When Valerius appeared before the people he ordered the lectors to lower the fasces before them, as an acknowledgment that their power was superior to his. Not content with this mark of submission, he brought forward laws in defence of the republic and in support of the liberties of the people. One law enacted that whenever anyone attacked to make himself a king, his action should be devoted to the gods, and that any one who liked might kill him; and another law declared, that every citizen who was condemned by a magistrate should have the right of appeal to the people. Now as the patricians possessed this right under the kings, it is probable that the law of Valerius conferred the same privilege upon the plebeians. By these laws, as well as by the lowering of his fasces before the people, Valerius became so great a favourite, that he received the surname of Publicola, or 'the people's friend,' by which name he is more usually known. As soon as these laws had been passed, Publicola held the comitia for the election of a successor to Brutus; and Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus was appointed as his colleague. Lucretius, however, did not live many days, and accordingly M. Horatius Pulvillus was elected consul in his place. Each of the consuls was anxious to dedicate the temple on the Capitol, which Tarquin had left unfinished when he was driven from the city, and the lot was cast to Horatius, to the great mortification of Publicola and his friends. [PULVILLUS.] Some writers, however, place the dedication of the temple two years later, in B.C. 507, in the third consulsiphip of Publicola, and the second of Horatius Pulvillus. (Dionys. v. 21; Tac. Hist. iii. 72.)

Next year, which was the second year of the republic, B.C. 508, Publicola was elected consul again with T. Lucretius Tricipitinus. In this year most of the annalists place the expedition of Persia against Rome, of which an account has been given elsewhere [PORSENA]. In the following year, B.C. 507, Publicola was elected consul a third time with M. Horatius Pulvillus, who had been his colleague in his first consulship, or according to other accounts, with P. Lucretius; but no event of importance is recorded under this year. He was again consul a fourth time in B.C. 504 with T. Lucretius Tricipitinus, his colleague in his second consulship. In this year he dedicated the temple to the Goddess of Rome a second time in triumph. His death is placed in the following year (B.C. 503) by the annalists (Liv. ii. 16), probably, as Niebuhr has remarked, simply because his name does not occur again in the Fasti. Niebuhr supposes that the ancient lays made him perish at the lake Regillus, at which two of his sons were said to have been killed (Dionys. vi. 12), and at which so many heroes of the infant commonwealth met their death. He was buried at the public expense, and the matrons mourned for him ten months, as they had done for Brutus. (Liv. i. 58, 59, ii. 2, 6–8, 11, 15, 16; Dionys. iv. 67, v. 12, &c. 29, 21, 40, &c.; Plut. Public. passim; Cie. de Rep. ii. 31; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. pp. 498, &c. 525, 529, &c. 538, 559.)

2. P. Valerius P. F. Volusia n. Publicola, son of the preceding, was consul for the first time B.C. 475, with C. Nautilus Rutulus, conquered the Veientines and Sabines, and obtained a triumph in consequence. He was interrex in B.C. 462, and consul a second time in B.C. 460, with C. Claudius Sabinus Regillensis. In the latter year Publicola was killed in recovering the Capitol, which had been seized by Herdonius. The history of this event is related under HERDONIUS. (Liv. ii. 52, 15–19; Dionys. ix. 28, x. 14–17.)

3. P. Valerius Publicola Pottius, consul B.C. 449, is represented by many writers as the son of 49, preceding, and the grandson of No. The improbability of this account is pointed out under POTTIUS, No. 2, to which family he probably belongs.

4. L. Valerius Publicola, was consul tribune five times, namely, in B.C. 394, 389, 387, 383, 330. (Liv. v. 26, vi. 1, 5, 21, 27.)

5. P. Valerius Pottius Publicola, who was consul tribune six times, belongs to the family of the Potti. (POTTIUS, No. 5.)

6. M. Valerius Publicola, magistrate equitum to the dictator C. Sulpicius Peticus in B.C. 358, and twice consul, namely, in B.C. 355, with C. Sulpicius Peticus, and in 353, with the same colleague. On the history of the three years above-mentioned see PETICUS. (Liv. vii. 12, 17–19.)

7. P. Valerius Publicola, consul B.C. 352, with C. Marcius Rutilius, and praetor two years afterwards, B.C. 350, in which year he had the command of the army of reserve in the war against the Gauls. In B.C. 344 he was appointed dictator, for the purpose of celebrating games in consequence of the appearance of prodigies. (Liv. vii. 21, 23, 28.)

8. P. Valerius Publicola, magistrate equitum to the dictator M. Papirius Crassus, in B.C. 332. (Liv. viii. 17.)
no small difficulty in raising the money to pay this dowry; and his letters to Atticus frequently allude to his negotiations on this subject with Publius, the brother of his late wife. (Cic. ad Fam. iv. 14, ad Att. xii. 32, xiii. 34, 47, xiv. 19, xvi. 2, 6; Dion Cass. xiv. 18; Plut. Cic. 41; Quintil. vi. 3, § 75.) Dion Cassius states (vii. 15) that Vibius Rufus, in the reign of Tiberius, married Cicero's widow, by whom he was father to no less than two sons, Publius, and not Terentius, as many have done. (Drumm, Geschichtle Rome, vol. vi. pp. 694—696.)

PUBLILIA GENS, plebeian. The ancient form of the name was Publilia, which we find in the Capitoline Fasti. In many manuscripts and editions of the ancient writers we find the name of Publilii corrupted into Publius; and Glandor, in his Onomasticon, has fallen into the mistake of giving most of the Publilii under the head of Pubili (pp. 727, 728). The Publilii were first brought into notice as early as b.c. 472, by the celebrated tribune Volero Publilii, and they subsequently obtained the highest dignities of the state. The only family of this gens that bore a separate cognomen was that of Philo; and it was one of this family, Q. Publilii Philo, who obtained the consulship in b.c. 339. The greatness of the Publilii was not, however, long to endure; for after his death we do not read of any persons of the name who attained to importance in the state. Volero was an agnomen of the Philones. [Philos, No. 1.]

PUBLILII. 1. Volero Publilii, the author of an important change in the Roman constitution. He had served with distinction as a first centurion, and, accordingly, when he was called upon to enlist as a common soldier at the levy in b.c. 473, he refused to obey. The consuls ordered the lictors to seize him and scourge him. He appealed to the tribunes, but as they took no notice of the outrage, he resisted the lictors, and was supported by the people. The consuls were driven out of the forum, and the senate was obliged to bow before the storm. Publilii had acquired so much popularity by his courageous conduct, that he was elected tribune of the plebs for the following year, b.c. 472. He did not, however, obtain the consuls of the previous year to trial, as had been expected, but, sacrificing his private wrongs to the public welfare, he brought forward a measure to secure the plebeians greater freedom in the election of the tribunes. They had been previously elected in the comitia centuriata, where the patricians had a great number of votes; and Publius accordingly proposed that they should be elected in future by the comitia tributa. This measure was undoubtedly proposed to the comitia tributa, but the patricians, by their violent opposition, prevented the tribes from coming to any vote respecting it this year. In the following year, b.c. 471, Publius was re-elected tribune, and together with him C. Laetusius, a man of still greater resolution. He now brought forward fresh measures. He proposed that the aediles, as well as the tribunes, should be elected by the tribes, and, what was still more important, that the tribes should have the power of deliberating and determining in all matters affecting the whole nation, and not such only as might concern the plebs. These measures were still more violently resisted by the patricians; but though the consul Ap. Claudius had recourse to force he could not prevent the tribes from passing them. Some said that the number of the tribunes was now for the first time raised to five, having been only two previously. (Liv. ii. 55—58; Dionys. ix. 41, &c.; Zonar. vii. 17; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 211, &c.)

2. Q. Publilii, tribune of the plebs b.c. 384, in which year, in conjunction with his colleague, M. Maelius or Menenius, he accused Manlius. (Liv. vii. 21.)

3. Q. Publilii, was appointed one of the triumviri mensarii in b.c. 352. (Liv. vii. 21.)

4. C. Publilii, a youth who had given himself up to slavery (as a nescus), in order to pay the debts of his father, and whose cruel treatment by the usurer, L. Papirius, so roused the indignation of the people, as to lead to the enactment, in b.c. 326, of the Lex Poetelia Papiria, which abolished imprisonment for debt in the case of the nexi (Liv. viii. 28). Valerius Maximus (vi. 1. § 9) calls this youth T. Veturius.

5. T. Publilii, one of the first plebeian augurs created on the passing of the Oogulina lex, in b.c. 300. (Liv. x. 9.)

6. Publilii, the brother of Cicero's second wife, with whom Cicero had considerable negotiation respecting the repayment of Publilii's dowry, after he had divorced her in b.c. 45. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 43, viii. 15, xix. 19, xvi. 2, 6.)

7. Publilii, a Roman comic poet, only known by the quotation of a single line by Nonius (e. u. latibulet), from one of his comedies entitled Putatores. As he is not mentioned elsewhere, it has been supposed that we ought to read Publius (that is, Publius Syrus) in this passage of Nonius. [PUBLILIA GENs.]

Publilii, a Roman praenomen, is found in many manuscripts and editions instead of Publilii. [PUBLILIA GENs.]

Publilii, is placed in the lists of artists as a Roman painter of animals, on the strength of an epigram of Martial (i. 109), in which the poet celebrates the beauty of an Issian bitch, and of its portrait; but whether Publius was the owner or the painter of the animal, or both, is not perfectly clear. [P. S.]

Publilii, a physician who is quoted by Andromachus (ap. Galen. De Compos. Medicam, sec. Gen. iii. 4, De Compos. Medicam, sec. Gen. ii. 15, v. 13, vol. xiii. pp. 381, 533, 842), and who must therefore have lived in or before the first century after Christ. He is by some persons supposed to have been one of Galen's tutors, but this is undoubtedly a mistake; as, besides the chronological difficulty, it is probable that in the passage which has given rise to this opinion (De Compos. Medicam, sec. Gen. v. 14, vol. xiii. p. 852) Galen is quoting the words of Asclepiades Pharmacien, and not speaking in his own person; and also that the term δαφαγηγησε is used merely as a sort of honorary title (comp. Lucius, p. 827). He is quoted also by Marcellus Empiricus, De Medicam. c. 29, p. 376. [W. A. G.]

Publilii Syrus. [Syrus.]

Pudens, L. Arollius, consul a. D. 165, with M. Gavius Oritius (Fasti).

Pudens, Mævius, was employed by Otho, to corrupt the soldiers of Galba. (Tac. Hist. i. 24.)

Pudens, Q. Servilius, consul a. D. 166, with L. Puidius Pollio. (Lamprid. Commod. 11; Fasti.)

Pudicitia (Ald's), a personification of modesty, was worshipped both in Greece and at of it devolved upon him. Pulcheria brought about the marriage between her brother and the beautiful and virtuous Athenais (Eudoxia), and she performed her task in so charming a manner that many a modern chaperone would do well to take her for a model. (A. d. 421). Theodosius died in 450, and, leaving only a daughter, was succeeded by her husband Valentinian III., who also was unfit for the throne. Pulcheria consequently remained at the head of affairs, and began her second reign by inflicting the punishment of death upon the dangerous and rapacious enuch Chrysaphius. Fearful lest the ambition of that haughty intriguer should be irritated by others, she resolved to marry, and of course was released from her vows of chastity. The object of her choice was the excellent Marcian, with whom she continued to reign in common till her death, which took place on the 18th of February, 453, at the age of 54 years and one month. She was lamented by every body, and was afterwards canonised; her feast is still celebrated in the Greek church. There is a story told by Suidas that Pulcheria had a lover, Paulinus, and that she had lived in incestuous intercourse with her brother; but we doubt the first, and do not believe the second, because it is not to be reconciled with the well-known character and principles of both Pulcheria and Theodosius. (For authorities see those quoted in the lives of Marcus; Theodosius II.; and Valentinianus III.) [W. P.]

COIN OF PULCHERIA.

PULEX, a surname of M. Servilius Geminus. [Geminius, Servilius, No. 3.]

T. PULVIIUS, a centurion in Caesar’s army in Gaul, distinguished himself, along with L. Varesus, by a daring act of bravery, when the camp of Q. Cicero was besieged by the Nervii in B.C. 54. In the civil war he deserted his old commander, betrayed the army of C. Antonius, one of Caesar’s legates, and fought on the side of the Pompeians. (Caes. B. G. v. 44, D. C. iii. 67.)

PULLUS, L. JUNIUS, C. F. C. N., consul B.C. 249, with P. Claudius Pulcher, in the first Punic war. His fleet was entirely destroyed by a storm, on account, as it was said, of his neglecting the auspices, and in despair he put an end to his own life. (Polyb. i. 52—53; Diod. Pagi. xxiv. 1; Fest. ii. 15. s. 26, Oros. iv. 10; Val. Max. i. 4. § 3; Cic. de Div. i. 16. ii. 8. 33, de Nat. Deor. ii. 3; Censorin. de Die Nat. 17.)

PULLUS, NUMITORIIUS. [Numitorius, No. 3.]

PULVILLUS, the name of a distinguished family of the Horatia gens.

1. M. HORATIUS M. P. PULVILLUS, according to Dionysius, played a distinguished part in the expulsion of the Tarquins, and according to all authorities was one of the consuls elected in the first year of the republic, B.C. 509. Most ancient writers state that Horatius was appointed consul in the place of Sp. Lucretius Tricipitius, who suc-was elected emperor with Balbinus, in A.D. 238 when the senate received intelligence of the death of the two Gordians in Africa. For particulars, see Balbinus.
PYGMALION.

3. 1. 4. 184, when L. Valerius Flaccus and M. Porcius Cato were elected. In the following year, b.c. 183, he was sent, with two other senators, as ambassador to Trajan at Gades; and this is the last time that his name occurs. (Liv. xxi. 2. xxxi. 4, 6, 10, 11, 21, 47—49, xxxii. 24. 37, xxxiv. 53, xxxv. 41, xxxvii. 55, xxxviii. 44, 54, xxxix. 40, 54.)

PUSIO, C. FLAVIUS, is mentioned by Cicero (pro Cluent. 56) as one of the Roman equites, who opposed the tribune M. Drusus.

PUTON. [PULISON.]

PYGMAEAUS (Πυγμαίαος), a being whose length is a πυγμή, that is, from the elbow to the hand. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 372.) The Pyrgmaei, in the plural, is the name of a fabulous nation of dwarfs, the Liliputians of antiquity, who, according to Homer, had every spring to sustain a war against the cranes on the lanks of Oceanus. (Hom. H. iii. 5, &c.) They were believed to have been descended from Pygmaeus, a son of Dorus and grandson of Epaphus. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Πυγμαίαος.) Later writers usually place them near the sources of the Nile, whether to make them early farmers, or to have needed an extra people to take possession of the fields of the pygmies. (Eustath. p. 372; Aristot. Hist. Animal. viii. 12; Strab. i. p. 42, xvii. p. 821.) The reports of them have been embellished in a variety of ways by the ancients. Hecataeus, for example, related that they cut down every corn ear with an axe, for they were conceived to be an agricultural people. When Hercules came into their country, they climbed with ladders to the edge of his goblet to drink from it; and when they attacked the hero, a whole army of them made an assault upon his left hand, while two others made the attack on his right hand. (Philon. Ieron. ii. 21.) Aristot. did not believe that the accounts of the Pygmies were altogether fabulous, but thought that they were a tribe in Upper Egypt, who had exceedingly small horses, and lived in caves. (Hist. Animal. viii. 14.) In later times we also hear of northern Pygmies, who lived in the neighbourhood of Thule; they are described as very short, very brave, and armed with spears like needles. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 372.) Lastly, we also have mention of Indian pygmies, who lived under the earth on the coast of the river Ganges. (Ctesias, Ind. ii. pp. 250, 294; Philostr. Vit. Apollon. iii. 47; Plin. H. N. vi. 22.) Various attempts have been made to account for the singular belief in the existence of such a dwarfish nation, but it seems to have its origin in the love of the marvellous, and the desire to imagine human beings, in different climes and in different ages, to be either much greater or much smaller than ourselves. (Comp. Ov. Fast. vi. 176, Met. vi. 90; Aelian, Hist. An. xxv. 29.) [L. S.]

PYGMAELION (Πυγμαέλιον). 1. A king of Cyprus and father of Metharme. (Apollos. ii. 14. § 5.) He is said to have fallen in love with the very image of a maiden which he himself had made, and therefore to have prayed to Aphrodite to breathe life into it. When the request was granted, Pygmaelion married his beloved, and became by her the father of Paphus. (Ov. Met. x. 243, &c.)

PYGMON (Πυγμών), the engraver of a gem in the Florentine Museum, the inscription on which has variously been read ΠΕΙΤΟΜΟ, ΠΕΙΓΜΟΝ, and ΠΥΓΜΟΝ, but the latter appears to be the true form. The Greek name of Peryamus is found distinctly inscribed. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 149, 2d ed.; comp. Pergamus.)

PYLÆDES (Πυλάδης), a son of Strophius and Anaxibia, Cydmorea or Astyochea. (Paus. ii. 29. § 4; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 33, 753; Hygin. Fab. 117.) He was a friend of Orestes, who was received by him in Phocis in a brotherly manner. (Pind. Pyth. xi. 23.) He afterwards married Electra, the sister of Orestes, and became by her the father of Helenicus, Medon, and Strophius. (Paus. ii. 16. § 5; Orestes, Electra.) [L. S.]

PYLÆDES, the pantomime dancer in the reign of Augustus, is spoken of under BATHYLLUS. He was banished on one occasion by Augustus, but afterwards restored to the city (Dion Cass. liv. 17; Suet. Aug. 45.)

PYLÆDES (Πυλάδης), the engraver of a beautiful gem in the Museum of the King of the Netherlands, representing an eagle, carrying a snake in his beak. It is described as Pylaemon (Catalog. Muse. Paton. p. 167, n. 4), and more minutely by Visconti (Op. Var. vol. ii. p. 162, n. 21), who, without assigning any reason for his opinion, supposes the inscription ΠΥΛΑΔΟΥ to denote the owner rather than the artist. It has been engraved by Venuti (Collect. Antiq. Roman. tab. lxxiv. Rom. 1736, folio), and in the work of the Count de Thoms, pl. xii. n. 5. (Compare R. Rochette, Letter à M. Schorn, p. 150, 2nd ed.)

PYLAEMENES (Πυλαίμην), a king of the Paphlagonians and an ally of Priam in the Trojan war. (Hom. II. ii. 831; Strab. xxi. pp. 541, 543.)

PYLAEMENES (Πυλαιμήν), appears to have been the name of many kings of Paphlagonia, so as to have become a kind of hereditary appellation, like that of Ptolemy in Egypt, and Araxes in Parthia. The only ones concerning whom we have any definite information are the following:

1. A king of Paphlagonia, who in b.c. 131 assisted the Romans in the war against Aristicus, the pretender to the throne of Pergamus. (Eutrop. iv. 20.) At his death the race of the ancient kings of Paphlagonia appears to have become extinct, and it was asserted that he had by his testament bequeathed his kingdom to Mithridates V., king of Pontus. (Justin. xxxviii. 5.)

2. A son of Nicomedes II., king of Bithynia, who was placed by his father on the throne of Paphlagonia, and made to assume the name of Pylaemenes, in order that he might appear to belong to the rightful line of the kings of that country. (Justin. xxxvii. 4.) He was afterwards expelled by Mithridates the Great, in b.c. 90 (Eutrop. v. 5), and it does not appear that he or his son recovered his throne: but after the final overthrow of Mithridates, the sons of Pylaemenes were reinstated by Pompey in the possession of some part of their father's dominions with the title of king. (Strab. xii. p. 541.)

There are extant coins bearing the titles ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΠΥΛΑΙΜΕΝΟΥ ΕΥΕΡΓΕΤΟΥ, which may probably be ascribed to one of the two pro-PYRICUS.

ceding kings, but it is impossible to say to which

COIN OF PYLAEMENES.

PYLAS (Πυλας), a son of Cteson, and king of Megara, who, after having slain Bias, his own father’s brother, founded the town of Pylos in Peloponnese, and gave Megara to Pandion who had married his daughter Pyla, and accordingly was his son-in-law. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 5; Paus.
i. 39. § 6, where he is called Pylos, and vi. 22.
§ 3, where he is called Pylon.)

PYRAECHARMES (Πυραεχαρμης), an ally of the Trojans and commander of the Paeonians, was slain by Patroclus. (Hom. ii. ii. 615, xvi. 207; Dict.
Crit. iii. 4; comp. Paus. v. 4. § 2; Strab. viii.
p. 357.) [L. S.]

PYRANDE (Πυρανδε), wrote a work on the history of the Peloponnese. (Plut. Parall. Min. c. 37; Schol. ad Leocr. 1439.)

PYREICUS, a Greek painter, who probably lived about or soon after the time of Alexander the Great, since Pliny mentions him immediately after the great painters of that age, but as an artist of a totally different style. He devoted himself entirely to the production of small pictures of low and mean subjects; “troniusraria surnixaquse pinaxet at essetils et obxproia et simili,” says Pliny; where we take the first two words to mean, not that he decorated the walls of the barbers’ and shoemakers’ shops with his pictures, but that he made pictures of them.
It may also be taken for granted that these were treated in a quaint, or even a grotesque manner.
His paintings were a source of great delight (con-sumptione voluptatis), and commanded higher prices than the greatest works of many painters. (Plin.
H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 37.)

The ancients gave a name to this kind of painting, respecting the true form of which there is a difference of opinion. Pliny says that Pyreicus was called, on account of the subjects of his pictures, Rhapgographos (the reading of all the MSS.), instead of which Salmusius proposed to read RhChographos, as better suited to the sense, and Weikar adopts the correction (ad Philor. 396), while Siliig and others are satisfied with the former reading.
The difference is hardly important enough to be discussed here. (See Siliig, Cat. Artif. s. v.; Döderlein, Lat. Synon. vol. ii. p. 38; and the Greek Lexicon, s. ev.)

There is a line of Propertius (iii. 9. 12. s. 7. 12, Burmann) in which Burmann reads, on the authority of two MSS.,—

Pyreicus parva vindicte arte locum,
where the great majority of the MSS. have Par-rhous, a reading which would easily be inserted by a transcriber ignorant of the less known name of Pyreicus. In connection with Pyreicus the phrase parva arte has a clear meaning; whereas it is difficult to explain it as referring to Parrhasius.
It is, however, uncertain which is right. Herzberg keeps to the common reading. (See Siliig, Cat.
Artif. s. v.; and Herzberg, Comment. ad loc.) [P. S.]

PYRES (Πυρης), of Miletus, a writer of that lavish species of poetry denominated Ione, and in which Socrates, of Samos, who lived before Pyres, was principally conspicuous. As Socrates lived in the time of Ptolemy Philadephus, Pyres must have lived previous to b. c. 285. (Atten.
xiv. p. 620, e.) Suidas (s. v. Πυρης) erroneously calls him Pycbos. [W. M. G.]

PYRGENSIS, M. POSTUMIUS, one of the farmers of the public taxes in the second Punic war, was brought to trial in b. c. 212, for his re-colations and fraud; and was condemned by the people, though not without great opposition, as he was supported by the rest of the publicani and one of the tribunes. Postumius went into exile before his condemnation. (Liv. xxv. 3. 4.)

PYRGION (Πυργιος), wrote a work on the laws and institutions of the Cretans, of which the third book is quoted by Athenaeus (iv. p. 145 b. i.)

PYRGOTELES (Πυργοτηλης), one of the most celebrated gem-engravers of ancient Greece, lived in the latter half of the fourth century b. c.
The esteem in which he was held may be inferred from that edict of Alexander, which placed him on a level with Apelles and Lyssippus, by naming him as the only artist who was permitted to engrave seal-rings for the king. (Plin. N. H. vii. 37. s. 38, xxxvii. 1. s. 4.) Unfortunately, however, beyond this one fact, every thing else respecting the artist is involved in that obscurity, to which the neglect of ancient writers and the impudence of ancient as well as modern forgers have conspired to doom
one of the most interesting branches of Greek art.
Several works are extant under the name of Pyrgoteles, but of these the best known have been demonstrated by Winckelmann to be forgeries, and very few of the others have any pretensions to authenticity. For the full discussion of the genuineness or spuriousness of the several gems ascribed to Pyrgoteles, the reader is referred to Winckelmann (Herm. vi. p. 107, &c.), and Raoul-Rochette (Lettre à M. Schorff, pp. 150—152, 12 ed.) [P. S.]

PYRILLAMES (Πυριλαμης), a statuary of Messene, of whom nothing more is known than that he was the maker of the statues of three Victory omens, namely, Pyrillames of Ephesos, Xenon of Lepreon, and Asamon. (Paus. vi. 3. § 5.
s. 12. 15. § 1, 16. § 4. s. 5.) [P. S.]

PYRIPHELGEOTH (Πυριφεληγθων), flaming with fire, is the name of one of the rivers in the lower world. (Hom. Od. x. 513; Strab. v.
p. 244.) [L. S.]

PYROMACHUS, artists. This name has been the occasion of much confusion, owing to its occurring in four different forms, namely, Pyromachus, Phylomachus, Phylonomachus, and Pyromachus, and owing also to the fact that there were two artists, who bore one or other of these three names.

1. We have already noticed the Athenian sculptor, who executed the bas-reliefs on the frieze of the temple of Athnas Polias, about Ol. 91, b. c.
415, and the true form of whose name was Phyromachus. [Phyromachus.] This artist is evidently the same whom Pliny mentions, in his list of statuaries, as the maker of a group representing PYRRHON.

The other of the two statues referred to is a kneeling Priapus, described in an epigram of Apollonidas of Smyrna, where the old reading Φυλόμαχος is altered by Brunck to Φιρύρμαχος. (No. 9, Brunck, Arch., vol. ii. p. 134, Anth. Plut. iv. 239, Jacobs, Append. Anth. Pal. vol. ii. p. 698.) Here again, R. Rochette (p. 309, n. 2) attacks Wesseling and Brunck (ad loc.) for identifying the maker of this statue with the Pyromachus of Pliny, when in fact he has made his own identification of him with Pyromachus I. His reason is probably the assumption that Auxaxomas, who is mentioned in the epigram as dedicating the statue, is the great philosopher; which is altogether uncertain. On the other hand, the work itself, as described in the epigram, seems to belong to a late period of the art. We think it doubtful, in this case, to which of the two artists the work should be referred. [P.S.]

PYRRHA. [DEUCALION.]

PYRRHIAΣ (Πυρρίας), an Aetolian, who was sent by his countrymen during the Social War (B.C. 218), to take the command in Elis. He took advantage of the absence of Philip, and the incapacity of Eperntus the Achaean praeceptor, to make frequent incursions into the Achaean territories, and having established a fortified post on Mount Panachaia, laid waste the whole country as far as Rhium and Aegium. The next year (B.C. 217) he was succeeded in his post by the king of Sparta for the invasion of Messenia, but failed in the execution of his part of the scheme, being repulsed by the Cyprians before he could effect a junction with Lycurgus. He in consequence returned to Elis, but the Eleans being dissatisfied with his conduct, he was shortly after recalled by the Aetolians, and succeeded by Eu-ripidas. (Polyb. v. 30, 91, 92, 94.) At a later period he obtained the office of praeceptor, or chief magistrate of the Aetolians, in the same year that the honorary title of that office was bestowed upon Attalus, king of Pergamus, B.C. 208. In the spring of that year he advanced with an army to Lamia to oppose the passage of Philip towards the Peloponnesse, but though supported with an auxiliary force both by Attalus and the Roman praetor Sulpiicus, he was defeated by Philip in two successive battles, and forced to retire within the walls of Lamia. (Liv. xxvii. 90.) It is not improbable that Superbus, a poem appearing in Livy (xxxiv. 46) as chief of the Aetolian deputation, which met Attalus at Heraclea, is only a false reading for Pyrrhas. (Brandstätter, Gesch. des Aetolischen Bundes, p. 412.) [E. H. B.]

PYRRHION (Πυρρήων), a celebrated Greek philosopher, a native of Elis. He was the son of Pleistarchus (Diog. Laërt. ix. 61), or Pistrocrates (Paus. vi. 24, § 5), and is said to have been poor, and to have followed, at first, the profession of a painter. His contemporary and biographer, Antigonus of Carystus (Aristocles, ap. Euseb. Praep. Ev. xiv. 18, p. 763), mentioned some torch-bearers, tolerably well executed, painted by him in the gymnasion of his native town (Diog. Laërt. ix. 62, comp. 61; Aristoc. l.c. Lucian, bis Aet. 25). He is then said to have been attracted to philosophy by the books of Democritus (Aristoc. l.c.; comp. Diog. Laërt. ix. 62), to have attended the lectures of Bryson, a disciple of Stheno, to example, that in the Florentine Gallery, No. 27. (Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, §§ 157*, 394*.)

have attached himself closely to Anaxarchus, a disciple of the Democritean Metrodorus, and with him to have joined the expedition of Alexander the Great (Diog. Laërt. l. c. ix. 63; Suid. s. v. Aristocles describes Anaxarchus as his teacher, l. c.), and on the expedition to have become acquainted with the Magians and the Indian gymnosophists. That his sceptical theories originated in his intercourse with them was asserted by Asennius of Abdera (a writer, with whom we are otherwise unacquainted), probably without any reason (Diog. Laërt. ix. 61). It is more likely that he derived from them his endeavours after imperturbable equanimity, and entire independence of all external circumstances, and the resistance of that mobility which is said to have been natural to him (ib. 62, 63, comp. 66, 68; Timon, ibid. c. 65). It is manifest, however, that his biographer Antigonus had already invented fables about him. (Diog. Laërt. l. c.; Aristoc. ap. Euseb. p. 763; Plut. de Prof. in Vitr. c. 9.) A half insane man, such as he depicted him, the Eleans assuredly would never have chosen as his high priest (Diog. Laërt. ix. 64; comp. Hezych. Miles. p. 50, ed. Orell.). and Aenesidemus, to confute such stories, had already maintained that Pyrrhon had indeed in philosophy refrained from decision, but that in action he by no means blindly abandoned himself to the sopor of circumst ances. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 64.) The young Nausiphanes (probably a later contemporary of Epicurus) Pyrrhon won over, not indeed to his doctrine, but to his disposition (παθητικον), to which Epicurus also could not refuse a lively recognition. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 64.) Pyrrhon's disciple Timon, who, in his Python, had detailed long conversations which he had with Pyrrhon (Aristoc. l. c. p. 761; comp. Diog. Laërt. ix. 67), extolled with admiration his divine repose of soul, his independence of all the shackles of external relations, and of all deception and sophistical obscurity. He compared him to the imperturbable sun-god, who hangs aloft over the earth (ib. 65, comp. 67; Sext. Emp. adv. Math. i. 305; Aristoc. ap. Euseb. l. c. p. 761, &c.). What progress he had made in laying a scientific foundation for his specics cannot be determined with accuracy, but it is probable that Timon, who, as it appears, was more a poet than a philosopher [TIMON], was indebted to him for the essential features of the reasons for doubt which were developed by him. Just as later sectaries saw the beginnings of their doctrines in the expressions of the poets and most ancient philosophers on the insufficiency of human knowledge and the uncertainty of life, so Pyrrhon also interpreted lines of his favourite poet Homer in the sceptical sense. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 67; comp. Sext. Emp. adv. Math. i. 272, 281.) That dogmatic convictions lay at the foundation of the scepticism of Pyrrhon, was maintained only by Numenius. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 63.) Still more groundless, without doubt, is the statement of the Abderite Asennius, that Pyrrhon would recognize neither Beautiful nor Ugly, Right nor Wrong, and maintained that as nothing is according to truth, so the actions of men are determined only by law and custom. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 61; comp. Aristoc. ap. Euseb. l. c. p. 761.) That, on the contrary, he left the validity of moral requirements unassailed, and directed his endeavours to the production of a moral state of disposition, is attested not only by individual, well-authenticated traits of character (Diog. Laërt. ix. 66, after Eunu- totheness, comp. c. 64) and expressions (ib. 64), but also by the way in which Timon expressed himself with respect to the moral (Sext. Emp. adv. Math. x. 1), and by the respect which the Pyrrhonians cherished for Socrates (ib. 2; comp. Cic. de Orat. iii. 17). The conjecture is not improbable that Pyrrhon regarded the great Athenians as his pattern. The statement that the Athenians conferred upon Pyrrhon the rights of citizenship sounds suspicious on account of the reason which is appended, for according to the unanimous testimony of the ancients, Pyrrhon, the disciple of Plato, had slain the Thracian Cotes (Diog. Laërt. ix. 65, ib. Menage); it probably rests upon some gloss.

No books written by Pyrrhon are quoted (comp. Aristoc. l. c. p. 763, &c), except a poem addressed to Alexander, which was rewarded by the latter in so royal a manner (Sext. Emp. adv. Math. i. 282; Plut. de Alex. Fortuna, i. 10), that the statements respecting the poverty of the philosopher's mode of life are not easily reconcilable with it. We have no mention of the year either of the birth or of the death of Pyrrhon, but only that he reached the age of 80 years (Diog. Laërt. ix. 62); nor do we learn how old he was when he took part in Alexander's expedition. But Arcelesias, who in his turn was late enough to be quoted by Timon, is said to have been one of his associates (σπουδαιος Πυρρωχος, Numen. in Euseb. Praep. Evang. xii. 6). Among the disciples of Pyrrhon, besides those already mentioned, were also Eurylochos, Philo the Athenian, and Hectaeus of Abdera. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 68, 69; comp. Lucian, Vib. Auct. 27.) The Eleans honoured the memory of their philosophical countryman even after his death. Pausanias saw his likeness (a bust or statue) in a stoa by the agora of Elis, and a monument dedicated to him outside the city (vi. 24, § 5). [Ch. A. B.]

PYRRHON. artists. Besides the celebrated philosopher of Elis, who was also distinguished as a painter, there was an Ephyesian sculptor, the son of Hectalexos, whose name occurs on an inscription as the maker of a statue of honour, of the Roman age. (Böckh, Corp. Inscrip., No. 2987; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 295, 2d edit.) [P. S.]

PYRRHUS, mythological. [ΝΕΟΡΟΤΛΕΙΜΟΣ.] PYRRHIUS, artists. 1. An architect of an unknown age, who, with his sons Laecrates and Hermon, built the treasury of the Epi daemonians at Olympia. (Paus. vi. 19, § 5. s. 3.)

2. A statuary, who is mentioned in the list of Pliny as the maker of bronze statues of Hygie and Minerva. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19, § 20.) Pliny tells us nothing more of the artist; but, in the year 1840, a base was found in the Acropolis at Athens, bearing the following inscription—

ΑΘΕΝΑΙΟΤΕΙΤΕΙΘΑΘΕΝΑΙΑΤΕΙΤΕΙΤΙΑΙ
ΠΥΡΡΟΣΕΡΟΙΣΗΣΑΝΑΛΟΙΟΣ
and near it were the remains of another base. It can scarcely be doubted that these bases belonged to the statues of Hygieia, the daughter of Asclepius, and of Athena, surrounded by Hygie, which Pausanias mentions (l. c. 24, § 4. s. 5), as among the most remarkable works of art in the Acropolis, and as standing in the very place where these bases were found; and furthermore, that the statues are the same as those referred to by Pliny; and that his Pyrrhus is the same as Pyrrhus the Athenian, who is mentioned in the above inscription as the maker of the statue of Athena Hygieia, which was de-

Dated by the Athenians. The letters of the inscription evidently belong to about the period of the Peloponnesian war. (Ross, in the _Kunstblatt_, 1840, No. 37; Scholl, Archz., Mittheil. aus Griechenland, p. 126; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorrn, pp. 396, 397, 2d ed.) Raoul-Rochette makes the very ingenious suggestion that the statue of Athena Hygiena by Pyrrhus should be identified with that statue which was dedicated by Pericles to the goddess in gratitude for the recovery of his favourite Mnesicles from the injuries received by a fall during the building of the Propylaea. [MNSICLES.] Be this as it may, it is clear that Pyrrhus was an eminent artist of the Athenian school at the middle of the fifth century. B.C.

3. Agathobulus F. L. Pyrrhus, a Greek freem-man of the Roman era, whose name occurs in an inscription found at Pesaro, as _Ficus Sigillator_, that is, a maker of the small terra-cotta images called _sigilla_. (Orelli, _Inscr. Lat. Select_. No. 4191;

PYRRHUS (Nópos), king of Epeirus, born about the year B.C. 318, was the son of Aeacides and Pithia, the daughter of Menon of Pharsalus, a distinguished leader in the struggle between Macedonia and Greece after the death of Alexander, usually called the Lamanian war. The ancestors of Pyrrhus claimed descent from Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles, who was said to have settled in Epeirus after the Trojan war, and to have become the founder of the race of Molossian kings. His father had succeeded to the throne on the death of his cousin Alexander, who was slain in Italy in B.C. 326.
Alexander was the brother of Olympias, the wife of Philip and the mother of Alexander the Great; and it was this connection with the royal family of Macedonia, which brought misfortune upon the early years of Pyrrhus. His father Aeacides had taken part with his relative Olympia, and had marched into Macedonia to support her against Cassander; but when the latter proved victorious, and Aeacides and Olympias were obliged to take to flight, the Epeirots, who disliked their king and were unwilling to be any longer involved in war with Cassander, met in a general assembly, and deprived Aeacides of the throne. Aeacides himself was out of the way; but many of his friends were put to death, and Pyrrhus, who was then a child of only two years old, was with difficulty saved from destruction by the faithful adherents of the king. They escaped with the child to Glauca, the king of the Taulantians, an Illyrian people, who afforded him protection, and nobly refused to surrender him to Cassander. Aeacides died soon afterwards in battle, and Pyrrhus was brought up by Glauca along with his own children.

About ten years afterwards, when Demetrius had shaken the power of Cassander in Greece, Glauca restored Pyrrhus to the throne; but as he was then only twelve years old, the kingdom was governed by guardians. But Pyrrhus did not long remain in possession of his hereditary dominions. Demetrius was obliged to abandon Greece, in order to cross over to Asia to the assistance of his father, Antigonus, who was menaced by the united forces of Cassander, Ptolemy, Seleucus, and Lysimachus; and as Cassander had now regained his supremacy in Greece, he prevailed upon the Epeirots to expel their young king a second time. Pyrrhus, who was still only seventeen years of age, joined Demetrius, who had married his sister Deidameia, accompanied him to Asia, and was present at the battle of Ipsus, B.C. 301, in which he gained great renown for his valour. Though so young, he bore down for a time every thing before him with that impetuous courage, which always distinguished him in his subsequent engagements. But his efforts could not restore the day, and he was obliged to fly from the field. Antigonus fell in the battle, and Demetrius became a fugitive; but Pyrrhus did not desert his brother-in-law in his misfortunes, and shortly afterwards went for him as a hostage into Egypt, when Demetrius was slain in the victory over Ptolemy. Here Pyrrhus was fortunate enough to win the favour of Berenice, the wife of Ptolemy, and received in marriage Antigone, her daughter by her first husband. Ptolemy now supplied him with a fleet and men, and he was thus once more able to return to Epeirus. Neoptolemus, probably the son of Alexander who died in Italy, had reigned from the time that Pyrrhus had been driven from the king-don; but as he had made himself unpopular by his harsh and tyrannical rule, Pyrrhus found many partisans. The two rivals consented to a compromise and agreed to share the sovereignty between them.
But such an arrangement could not last long; and Pyrrhus anticipated his own destruction by putting his rival to death. This appears to have happened in B.C. 295, in which year Pyrrhus is said to have begun to reign (Vell. Pat. i. 14. § 8); and as Cas-sander did not die till the end of B.C. 297, the joint sovereignty of Pyrrhus and Neoptolemus could have lasted only a short time, as it is improvable that Pyrrhus ventured to return to his native country during the lifetime of his great enemy Cassander.

Pyrrhus was twenty-three years of age when he was firmly established on the throne of Epeirus (B.C. 295), and he soon became one of the most popular princes of his age. His daring courage made him a favourite with his troops, and his affia-bility and generosity secured the love of his people.
His character resembled in many respects that of his great kinsman, the conqueror of Persia; and he seems at an early age to have made Alexander his model, and to have been fired with the ambition of imitating his exploits and treading in his footsteps.
His eyes were first directed to the conquest of Macedonia. Master of that country, he might hope to obtain the sovereignty of Greece; and with the whole of Greece under his sway, there was a boundless prospect for his ambition, terminating on the one hand in the conquest of Italy, Sicily, and Carthage, and on the other with the dominions of the Greek monarchs in the East. The unsettled state of Macedonia after the death of Cassander soon placed the first object of his ambition within his grasp. Antipater, the sons of Cassander, quailed for the inheritance of their father; and Alexander, unable to maintain his ground, applied to Pyrrhus for assistance. This was granted on condition of Alexander's ceding to Pyrrhus the whole of the Macedonian dominions on the western side of Greece. These were Acarnania, Amphilochia, and Ambracia, and likewise the districts of Tymphaea and Parauaea, which formed part of Macedonia itself. (Plut. _Pyrrh. 6, with the emendation of Niebuhr, _Hist. of Rome_,
vol. iii. note 311, _Patarval_ instead of _Paretin_.) Pyrrhus fulfilled his engagements to Alexander and drove his brother Antipater out of Macedonia, B. c. 294, though it appears that the latter was subsequently allowed to retain a small portion of the country. (Thirlwall's Greece, vol. vii. p. 16.)

Pyrrhus had greatly increased his power by the large accession of territory which he had thus gained, and he still further strengthened himself by forming an alliance with the Aeoltians; but the rest of Macedonia unexpectedly fell into the hands of a powerful neighbour. Alexander had applied to Demetrius for assistance at the same time as he sent to Pyrrhus for the same purpose; but as the latter was the nearest at hand, he had restored Alexander to his kingdom before Demetrius could arrive at the scene of action. Demetrius, however, was unwilling to lose such an opportunity of aggrandizement; he accordingly left Athens, and reached Macedonia towards the end of the year B. c. 294. He had not been there many days before he put Alexander to death, and thus became king of Macedonia. Between two such powerful neighbours and such restless spirits, as Demetrius and Pyrrhus, jealousies and contentions were sure to arise. Each was anxious for the dominions of the other, and the two former friends soon became the most deadly enemies. Deidameia, who might have acted as a mediator between her husband and her brother, was now dead. The jealousies between the two rivals at length broke out into open war in B. c. 291. It was during this year that Thebes revolted a second time against Demetrius, probably at the instigation of Pyrrhus; and while the Macedonian monarch proceeded in person to chastise the rebellious inhabitants, Pyrrhus effected a diversion in their favour by invading Thessaly, but was compelled to retire into Epirus before the superior forces of Demetrius. In B. c. 290 Thebes surrendered, and Demetrius was thus at liberty to take vengeance on Pyrrhus and his Aeolian allies. Accordingly, he invaded Aetolia in the spring of B. c. 289, and after overrunning and ravaging the country almost without opposition, he marched into Epirus, leaving Pantauchus with a strong body of his troops to keep the Aeoltians in subjection. Pyrrhus advanced to meet him; but as the two armies took different roads, Demetrius entered Epirus and Pyrrhus Aetolia almost at the same time. Pantauchus immediately offered him battle, in the midst of which he challenged the king to single combat. This was immediately accepted by the youthful monarch; and in the conflict which ensued, Pyrrhus bore his enemy to the ground, and would have killed him on the spot, had he not been rescued by his friends. The Macedonians, dismayed by the fall of their leader, took to flight and left Pyrrhus master of the field. This victory, however, was attended with more important advantages than its immediate fruits. The impetuous movements and daring valour of the Epeirotic king reminded the veterans in the Macedonian army of the great Alexander, and thus paved for Pyrrhus his accession to the Macedonian throne. Demetrius meantime had found no one to resist him in Epirus, and during his expedition into this country he also obtained possession of Corcyra. After the death of Antigone, Pyrrhus, in accordance with the custom of the monarchs of his age, had married three wives, in order to strengthen his power by a close connection with foreign princes. Of these wives one was a Paeonian princess, another an Illyrian, and a third Lanassa, the daughter of Agathocles of Syracuse, who brought him the island of Corcyra as a dowry. But Lanassa, offended with the attention which Pyrrhus paid to his barbarian wives, had withdrawn to her principality of Corcyra, which she now bestowed upon Demetrius together with her hand. Pyrrhus accordingly returned to Epirus more incensed than ever against Demetrius. The latter had previously withdrawn into Macedonia.

At the beginning of the following year, B. c. 288, Pyrrhus took advantage of a dangerous illness of Demetrius to invade Macedonia. He advanced as far as Edessa without meeting with any opposition; but when Demetrius was able to put himself at the head of his troops, he drove his rival out of the country without difficulty. But as he had now formed the vast design of recovering the whole of his father's dominions in Asia, he hastened to conclude a peace with Pyrrhus, in order to continue his preparations undisturbed. His old enemies, Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Lysimachus, once more entered into a league against him, and resolved to crush him in Europe before he had time to cross over into Asia. They easily persuaded Pyrrhus to break his recent treaty with Demetrius, and join the coalition against him. Accordingly, in the spring of B. c. 287, while Ptolemy appeared with a powerful fleet off the coasts of Greece, Lysimachus invaded the upper and Pyrrhus the lower provinces of Macedonia at the same time. Demetrius marched against Lysimachus, but alarmed at the growing disaffection of his troops, and fearing that they might go over to Lysimachus, who had been one of the veteran generals and companions of Alexander, he suddenly retraced his steps and proceeded against Pyrrhus, who had already advanced as far as Beroea and had taken up his quarters in that city. But Pyrrhus proved a rival as formidable as Lysimachus. The kindness with which he had treated his prisoners, and his condescension and affability to the inhabitants of Beroea, had won all hearts; and accordingly, when Demetrius drew near, his troops deserted him in a body and transferred their allegiance to Pyrrhus. Demetrius was obliged to fly in disguise, and leave the kingdom to his rival. Pyrrhus, however, was unable to obtain possession of the whole of Macedonia: Lysimachus claimed his share of the spoil, and the kingdom was divided between them. But Pyrrhus did not long retain his portion; the Macedonians preferred the rule of their old general Lysimachus; and Pyrrhus was accordingly driven out of his newly acquired kingdom; thus leaving Lysimachus master of the entire country. It is doubtful how long Pyrrhus reigned in Macedonia. Dexeippus and Porphyry (apud Euseb. Arm. p. 829, ed. Anchor; apud Syncell. p. 266, a.) state that it was only seven months, which would place the expulsion of Pyrrhus at the end of B. c. 287, or the beginning of 286; but as other writers relate (Plut. Pyrr. 12; Paus. i. 10. § 2) that this happened after the defeat of Demetrius in Syria, which did not take place till the middle of 286, the reign of Pyrrhus in Macedonia was probably something longer. (Comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. note 813.)

For the next few years Pyrrhus appears to have reigned quietly in Epirus without embarking in any new enterprise. But a life of inactivity was insupportable to him, and he pinned for fresh scenes of action in which he might gain glory and acquire dominion. At length, in B. c. 281, the long PYRRHUS.

wished for opportunity presented itself. The Tau-rentines, against whom the Romans had declared war, sent an embassy to Pyrrhus in the summer of this year, begging him in the name of all the Italian Greeks to cross over to Italy in order to conduct the war against the Romans. They told him that they only wanted a general, and that they would supply him with an army of 350,000 foot, and 20,000 horse, as all the nations of southern Italy would flock to his standard. This was too tempting an offer to be resisted. It realized one of the earliest dreams of his ambition. The conquest of Rome would naturally lead to the sovereignty of Sicily and Africa; and he would then be able to return to Greece with the united forces of Italy, Sicily, and Carthage, to revenge his rivals in Greece, and reign as master of the world.
He therefore eagerly promised the Tarentines to come to their assistance, notwithstanding the remonstrances of his wise and faithful counsellor Cinna; but as he would not trust the success of his enterprise to the valour and fidelity of Italian troops, he began to make preparations to carry over a powerful army with him. These preparations occupied him during the remainder of this year and the beginning of the next. The Greek princes did everything to favour his views, as they were glad to get rid of so powerful and dangerous a neighbour.
Antigonus supplied him with ships, Antiochus with money, and Ptolemy Cerranus with troops. He left as guardian of his kingdom his son Ptolemy by his first wife Antigone, who was then only a youth of fifteen years of age. (Justin. xvi. 2, xvii. 1.)
Pyrrhus crossed over to Italy early in n. c. 280, in the thirty-eighth year of his age. He took with him 20,000 foot, 3000 horse, 2000 archers, 500 slingers, and either 50 or 20 elephants, having previously sent Milo, one of his generals, with a detachment of 3000 men. (Plut. Pyrr. 15; Justin. xvii. 2.) Such was his impatience to arrive at Tarentum in time to enter upon military operations early in the spring, that he set sail before the stormy season of the year had passed; and he had scarcely put out to sea before a violent tempest arose, which dispersed his fleet. He himself hardly escaped with his life, and arrived at Tarentum with only a small part of his army.
After a time the scattered ships gradually made their appearance; and after collecting his troops, his began to make preparations to carry on the war with activity. The inhabitants of Tarentum were a giddy and licentious people, unaccustomed to the toils of war, and unwilling to endure its hardships. They accordingly attempted to evade entering the ranks of the army, and began to make complaints in the public assemblies respecting the demands of Pyrrhus and the conduct of his troops; but Pyrrhus withstood treated them as their master rather than as their ally, shut up the theatre and all other public places, and compelled their young men to serve in his ranks.
Notwithstanding all the activity of Pyrrhus the Romans were the first in the field. The consul
M. Valerius Laevinus marched into Lucania; but as the army of Pyrrhus was inferior to that of the Romans, he attempted to gain time by negotiation, in order that he might be joined by his Italian allies. He accordingly wrote to the consuls, offering to arbitrate between Rome and his Italian allies; but Laevinus bluntly told him to mind his own business and retire to Epirus. Fearing to remain inactive any longer, although he was not yet joined by his allies, Pyrrhus marched out against the Romans with his own troops and the Tarentines. He took up his position between the towns of Pandosia and Herculanea, on the left or northern bank of the river Siris. The Romans were encamped on the southern bank of the river, and they were the first to begin the battle. They crossed the river and were immediately attacked by the cavalry of Pyrrhus, who led them to the charge in person, and distinguished himself as usual by the most daring acts of valour. The Romans, however, bravely sustained the attack; and Pyrrhus, finding the combat too severe, ordered his infantry to advance. The battle was still contested most furiously; seven times did both armies advance and retreat; and it was not until Pyrrhus brought forward his elephants, which drove down every thing before them, that the Romans took to flight. The Thessalian cavalry completed the rout. The Romans fled in the utmost confusion across the river Siris, leaving their camp to the conqueror. The battle had lasted all day, and it was probably the fall of night alone which saved the Roman army from complete destruction.
Those who escaped took refuge in an Apulian town, which Niebuhr conjectures to have been Venusia.
The number of the slain in either army is differently stated; but the loss of Pyrrhus, though inferior to that of the Romans, was still very considerable,
and a large proportion of his officers and best troops had fallen. He is reported to have said, as he viewed the field of battle, "Another such victory, and I must return to Epirus alone." He acted with generosity after the battle, burying the dead bodies of the Romans like those of his own troops, and treating his prisoners with kindness.

This victory was followed by important results.
The allies of Pyrrhus, who had hitherto kept aloof, joined him now; and even many of the subjects of Rome espoused his cause. But Pyrrhus had bought his victory dearly, and must have learnt by the experience of the late battle the difficulty he would have to encounter in conquering Rome. He therefore sent his minister Cinna to Rome with proposals of peace, while he himself collected the forces of the allies and marched slowly towards Central Italy. The terms which he offered were those of a conqueror. He proposed that the Romans should recognize the independence of the Greeks in Italy, should restore to the Samnites, Lucanians, Apulians, and Bruttians, all the possessions which they had lost in war, and should make peace with himself and the Tarentines. At soon as peace was concluded on these terms he promised to return all the Roman prisoners without ransom. Cinna, whose persuasive eloquence was said to have won more towns for Pyrrhus than his arms, neglected no means to secure the favour of the Romans for his master, and to induce them to accept the peace. The prospects of the republic seemed so dark and threatening that many members of the senate thought that it would be more prudent to comply with his demands; and this party would probably have carried the day, had it not been for the patriotic speech of the aged
A. Claudius Caeus, who denounced the idea of a peace with a victorious foe with such effect, that the senate resolved to decline the proposals of Pyrrhus, and commanded Cinneas to quit Rome on the same day.

Cinneas returned to Pyrrhus, and told him he must hope for nothing from negotiation. The king accordingly resolved to prosecute the war with vigour. He advanced by rapid marches towards Rome, plundering the country of the Roman allies as he went along. He was followed by the consul Lævinus, whose army had been reinforced by two legions, which had been levied in the city while the senate was considering the king's proposals of peace. Lævinus, however, did not venture to attack the superior forces of the enemy, but contented himself with harassing their march and delaying their advance by petty skirmishes. Pyrrhus, therefore, continued to advance steadily without meeting with any serious opposition, and at length arrived at Prænestes, which fell into his hands. He was now only twenty-four miles from Rome, and his outposts advanced six miles further. Another march would have brought him under the walls of the city; but here his progress was stopped. At this moment he was informed that peace was concluded with the Etruscans, and that the other consul, T. Coruncanius, had returned with his army to Rome. All hope was now gone of compelling the Romans to accept the peace, and he therefore resolved to retreat. He retired slowly into Campania, and from thence withdrew into winter-quarters to Tarentum. No other battle was fought this year.

As soon as the armies were quartered for the winter, the Romans sent an embassy to Pyrrhus, to endeavour to obtain the ransom of the Roman prisoners or their exchange for an equal number of the Tarentines or their allies. The ambassadors were received by Pyrrhus in the most distinguished manner; and his interviews with C. Fabricius Luscus, who was at the head of the embassy, form one of the most celebrated stories in Roman history, and have been briefly related elsewhere. [Vol. II. p. 842, a.] He refused, however, to comply with the request of the Romans; but at the same time to show them his trust in their honour, and his admiration of their character, he allowed them to go to Rome in order to celebrate the Saturnalia, stipulating that they were to return to Tarentum if the senate would not accept the terms which he had previously offered them through Cinneas. The senate remained firm in their resolve, and all the prisoners returned to Pyrrhus, the punishment of death having been denounced against those who should remain in the city. This is the account in Appian (Sann. x. 4, 5), and Plutarch (Pyrrh. 20); but other writers state with less probability that the prisoners were set free by Pyrrhus unconditionally and without ransom. (Liv. Épit. 13; Zonar. viii. 4; Flor. i. 18, ii. 18; comp. Mus., Deictus, No. 3.) The victory however yielded Pyrrhus no advantage, and he was obliged to retire to Tarentum for the winter without effecting any thing more during the campaign. In the last battle, as well as in the first, the brunt of the action had fallen almost exclusively on the Greek troops of the king; and the state of Greece, which was overrun by the Gauls in this year, made it hopeless for him to obtain any reinforcements from Epeirus. He was therefore unwilling to hazard his surviving Greeks by another campaign with the Romans, and accordingly lent a ready ear to the invitations of the Greeks in Sicily, who begged him to come to their assistance against the Carthaginians. This seemed an easier enterprise than the one he was already engaged in, and it had moreover the charm of novelty, which always had great attractions for Pyrrhus. It was necessary, however, first to suspend hostilities with the Romans, who were likewise anxious to get rid of so formidable an opponent that they might complete the subjugation of southern Italy without further interruption. When both parties had the same wishes, it was not difficult to find a fair pretext for bringing the war to a conclusion. This was afforded at the beginning of the following year, 278, by one of the servants of Pyrrhus deserting to the Romans and supplying to the consuls the means of poisoning his master. The consuls Fabricius and Aemilius sent back the deserter to the king, stating that they abhorred a victory gained by treason. Thereupon Pyrrhus, to show his gratitude, sent Cinneas to Rome with all the Roman prisoners without ransom and without conditions; and the Romans appear to have granted him a truce, though not a formal peace, as he had not consented to evacuate Italy.

Pyrrhus was now at liberty to cross over into Sicily, which he did immediately afterwards, leaving Milo with part of his troops in possession of Tarentum, and his son Alexander with another garrison at Locri (Justin, xviii. 2; Zonar. viii. 3.) The Tarentines had demanded that his troops should be withdrawn, if he would not assist them in the field; but Pyrrhus paid no heed to their remonstrances, and retained possession of their town, as well as of Locri, in hopes of being soon able to return to Italy at the head of the Greeks of Sicily, of which island his warm imagination had already pictured him as the sovereign.

Pyrrhus remained in Sicily upwards of two years, namely from the middle of n. c. 476, to the latter end of n. c. 476. At first he met with brilliant success in Sicily. He drove the Carthaginians before him, and took the strongly fortified city of Eryx, in the assault of which he was the first to mount the scaling ladders, and distinguished himself as usual by his daring and impetuous spirit. The Carthaginians became so alarmed at his success, that they disbanded their ships and money on condition of his forming an alliance with them, although they had only a short time before made a treaty with the Romans. Pyrrhus was foolish enough to reject this offer, which would have afforded him immense advantages for the prosecution of the war with Rome; and at the instigation of the Sicilian Greeks he refused to come to any terms with the Carthaginians unless they would evacuate Sicily altogether. Shortly after Pyrrhus received a severe repulse in an attempt which he made upon the impenetrable town of Lilybaeum. The prestige of success was now gone. The Greeks, who had visited him to the island, were desirous to see him depart, and began to form cabals and plots against him. This led to retaliation on the part of Pyrrhus, and to acts which were deemed both cruel and tyrannical by the Greeks. He was involved in plots and insurrections of all kinds, and soon became as anxious to abandon the island as he had been before to leave Italy. Accordingly, when his Italian allies again begged him to come to their assistance, he readily accepted their appeal; and he now found himself in great difficulties for want of money to pay his troops, and could obtain none from his allies, he was induced at the advice of some Epicureans to take possession of the treasures of the temple of Proserpine in that town. The ships in which the money was to be embarked to be carried to Tarentum, were driven back by a storm to Locri. This circumstance deeply affected the mind of Pyrrhus; he ordered the treasures to be restored to the temple, and put to death the unfortunate men who had advised him to commit the sacrilegious act; and from this time he became haunted by the idea, as he himself related in his memoirs, that the wrath of Proserpine was pursuing him and dragging him down to ruin. ( Dionys. xix. 9, 10; Appian, Sann. xii.)

The following year, b. c. 274, closed the career of Pyrrhus in Italy. The consuls were Curius Dentatus and Servilius Mercurialis; of whom the former commanded the fleet, and the latter the island of Locri. Pyrrhus advanced against Curius, who was encamped in the neighbourhood of Beneventum, and resolved to attack him before he was joined by his colleague. As Curius, however, did not wish to risk a battle with his own army alone, Pyrrhus planned an attack upon his camp by night. But he miscalculated the time and the distance; the torches burnt out, the men missed their way, and it was already broad daylight when he reached the heights above the Roman camp. Still their arrival was quite unexpected; but as a battle was now inevitable, Curius led out his men. The troops of Pyrrhus, exhausted by fatigue, were easily put to the rout; two elephants were killed and eight more taken. Encouraged by this success, Curius no longer hesitated to meet the king in the open plain. One wing of the Romans was victorious. The other was driven back by the phalanx and the elephants to their camp, but their retreat was covered by a shower of missiles from the ramparts of the camp, which so annoyed the elephants that they turned round and trod down all before them. The Romans now returned to the charge, and easily drove back the enemy which had been thus thrown into disorder. The rout was complete, and Pyrrhus arrived at Tarentum with only a few horsemen. It was now impossible to continue the war any longer without a fresh supply of troops, and he therefore applied to the kings of Macedonia and Syria for assistance; but as they turned a deaf ear to his requisition, he had no alternative but to quit Italy. He crossed over to Greece towards the end of the year, leaving Milo with a garrison at Tarentum, as if he still clung to the idea of returning to Italy at some future time.

Pyrrhus arrived in Epirus at the end of b. c. 274, after an absence of six years. He brought back with him only 8000 foot and 500 horse, and had not money to maintain even these without undertaking new wars. Accordingly, at the beginning of the following year, b. c. 273, he invaded Macedonia, of which Antigonus Gonatas, the son of Demetrius, was at that time king. His army had been reinforced by a body of Gallic mercenaries, and his only object at first seems to have been plunder. But his success far exceeded his expectations. He obtained possession of several towns without resistance; and when at length Antigonus advanced to meet him, the Macedonian monarch was deserted by his own troops, who welcomed Pyrrhus as their king. Pyrrhus thus became king of Macedonia in the second time, but had feared to be involved possession of the kingdom before his restless spirit drove him into new enterprises. Cleonymus had many years before been excluded from the Spartan throne; and he had recently received a new insult from the family which was reigning in his place. Acrotatus, the son of the Spartan king Areus, had seduced Cleidonia, the young wife of Cleonymus, and the latter, now burning for revenge, repaired to the court of Pyrrhus, and persuaded him to make war upon Sparta. This invitation was readily complied with; and Pyrrhus accordingly marched into Laconia in the following year, b. c. 272, with an army of 25,000 foot, 2000 horse, and 24 elephants. Such a force seemed irresistible; no preparations had been made for defence, and king Areus himself was absent in Crete. As soon as Pyrrhus arrived, Cleonymus urged him to attack the city forthwith. But as the day was far spent, Pyrrhus resolved to delay the attack until the next day; his soldiers would pillage the city, if it were taken in the night. But during the night the Spartans were not idle. All the inhabitants, old and young, men and women, laboured incessantly in digging a deep ditch opposite the enemy's camp, and at the end of each ditch formed a strong barricade of wagons. The next day Pyrrhus advanced to the assault, but was repulsed by the Spartans, who fought under their youthful leader Acrotatus in a manner worthy of their ancient courage. The assault was again renewed on the next day, but with no better success; and the arrival of Areus with 2000 Cretans, as well as of other auxiliary forces, at length compelled Pyrrhus to abandon all hopes of taking the city. He did not, however, relinquish his enterprise altogether, but resolved to winter in Peloponnesus, that he might be ready to renew operations at the commencement of the spring. But while making preparations for this object, he received an invitation from Ariston, one of the leading citizens at Argos, to assist him against his rival Aristippus, whose cause was espoused by Antigonus. Pyrrhus forthwith commenced his march from the neighbourhood of Sparta, but did not reach Argos without some sharp fighting, as the Spartans under Areus both molested his march and occupied some of the passes through which his road lay. In one of these encounters his eldest son Ptolemy fell, greatly to the grief of his father, who avenged his death by killing with his own hand the leader of the Lacedaemonian detachment which had destroyed his son. On arriving in the neighbourhood of Argos, he found Antigonus encamped on one of the heights near the city, but he could not induce him to risk a battle. There was a party at Argos, which did not belong to either of the contending factions, and which was anxious to get rid both of Pyrrhus and Antigonus. They accordingly sent an embassy to the two kings, begging them to withdraw from the city. Antigonus promised compliance, and sent his son as a hostage; but though Pyrrhus did not refuse, he would not give any hostages. In the night-time Ariston admitted Pyrrhus into the city, who marched into the market-place with part of his troops, leaving his son Helenus with the main body of his army on the outside. But the alarm having been given, the citadel was seized by the Argives of the opposite faction. Areus with his Spartans, who had followed close upon Pyrrhus, was admitted within the walls, and Antigonus also sent a portion of his troops into the city, under the command of his son Hælycones, while he himself remained without with the bulk of his forces. On the dawn of day Pyrrhus saw that all the strong places were in the possession of the enemy, and that it would be necessary for him to retreat. He accordingly sent orders to his son Helenus to break down part of the walls, in order that his troops might retire with more ease; but in consequence of some mistake in the delivery of the message, Helenus attempted to enter the city by the same gateway through which Pyrrhus was retreating. The two sides encountered one another, and to add to the confusion one of the elephants fell down in the narrow gateway, while another becoming wild and ungovernable, trod down every one before him. Pyrrhus was in the rear, in a more open part of the city, attempting to keep off the enemy. While thus engaged, he was slightly wounded through the breast-plate with a javelin; and, as he turned to take vengeance on the Argive who had attacked him, the mother of the man, seeing the danger of her son, hurled down from the house-roof where she was standing a ponderous tile, which struck Pyrrhus on the back of his neck. He fell from his horse stunned with the shock, and being recognized by some of the soldiers of Antigonus, was quickly despatched. His head was cut off and given to Hælycones, who carried the bloody trophy with exultation to his father Antigonus. But the latter turned away from the sight, and ordered the body to be interred with becoming honours. His remains were deposited by the Argives in the temple of Demeter. (Paus. i. 13. § 8.)

Pyrrhus perished in n. c. 272, in the forty-sixth year of his age, and in the twenty-third of his reign. He was the greatest warrior and one of the best princes of his time. If judged by a righteous standard of public morality, he will appear as a monarch intent only upon his personal aggrandisement, and ready to sacrifice the rights of other nations to the advancement of his glory and the gratification of his ambition. But if judged by the moral character of the age in which he lived, when every Greek prince thought he had a right to whatever dominions his sword could win, we shall see more to admire than to censure in his conduct. His government of his native dominions seems to have been just and lenient, for his Epeirots always remained faithful to him even during his long absence in Italy and Sicily. His foreign wars were carried on with no unnecessary cruelty and oppression, and he is accused of fewer crimes than any of his contemporaries. The greatest testimony to the excellence of his private life is, that in an age of treachery and corruption he ever retained the affection of his personal attendants; and hence, with the solitary exception of the physician who offered to poison him, we read of no instance in which he was deserted or betrayed by any of his officers or friends. With his daring courage, his military skill, his affable deportment, and his kindly bearing, he might have become the most powerful monarch of his day, if he had steadily and perseveringly pursued the immediate object before him. But he never rested satisfied with any acquisition, and was ever grasping at some fresh object: hence Antigonus compared him to a gambler, who made many good throws with the dice, but was unable to make the proper use of the game. Pyrrhus was regarded in subsequent times as one of the greatest generals that had ever lived. Procles, the Carthaginian, thought him superior even to Alexander in the military art (Paus. iv. 35. § 4); and Hannibal said that of all generals Pyrrhus was the first, Scipio the second, and himself the third (Plut. Pyrrh. 8), or, according to another version of the story, Alexander was the first, Pyrrhus the second, and himself the third (Plut. Flamin. 21). Pyrrhus wrote a work on the art of war, which was read in the time of Cicero (ad Fam. ix. 25, comp. Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iv. p. 843); and his commentaries are quoted both by Dionysius and Plutarch.

PYTHAGORAS.

PYRRHUS (Πυρρός), a Greek poet mentioned by Theocritus, is said by the Scholast to have been a melic poet, and a native of Erythrae or Lesbos. (Theocr. iv. 31; Schol. ad loc. et ad iv. 20.)

PYTHAE'NETUS (Πυθαίνετος), wrote a work on Aegina. (Athen. xiii. p. 589, f; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. iv. 1712; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. iv. 107, ad Nem. v. 81, v. 53; Schol. ad Lycoph. 175.)

PYTHA'GORAS (Πυθαγόρας). The authentic facts in the history of Pythagoras are so few, and the sources from which the greater part of our information respecting him is derived are of so late a date, and so untrustworthy, that it is impossible to lay down more than an outline of his personal history with any approximation to certainty. The total absence of written memorials proceeding from Pythagoras himself, and the paucity of the notices of him by contempararies, coupled with the secrecy which was thrown around the constitution and actions of the Pythagorean brotherhood, held out strong temptations for invention to supply the place of facts, and the stories which thus originated were eagerly caught up by the Neo-Platonic writers who furnish most of the details respecting Pythagoras, and with whom it was a recognised canon, that nothing should be accounted incredible which related to the gods or what was divine. (Iamb. Adhort. ad Philos. p. 324, ed. Kiessling.) In this way a multitude of the most absurd fictions took their rise — such as that Apollo was his father; that his person gleaned with a supernatural brightness; that he exhibited a golden thigh; that Alaric came flying to him on a golden arrow; that he was seen in different places at one and the same time. (Comp. Herod. iv. 94, &c.) With the exception of some scanty notices by Xenophanes, Heraclitus, Herodotus, Plato, Aristotle, and Isocrates, we are mainly dependent on Diogenes Laëretus, Porphyrius, and Iamblichus for the materials out of which to form a biography of Pythagoras. Aristotle had written a separate work on the Pythagoreans, which is unfortunately not extant. (He alludes to it himself, Met. i. 5, p. 386. 12, ed. Bekker.) His disciples Diænearchus, Aristoxenus, and Heracleides Ponticus had written on the same subject. These writers, late as they are, are among the best from whom Porphyrius and Iamblichus drew: their chief sources besides being legends and their own invention. Hence we are reduced to admit or reject their statements mainly from a consideration of their inherent probability, and even in that point of view it is not enough to look at each separately, for if all the separately credible narratives respecting Pythagoras were supposed true, they would extend the sphere and amount of his activity to an utterly impossible extent. (Krise, de Societatis a Pythagora condita Scopo politico, Praef.; Brandis, Geschichte des Griech. Rom. Philosophie, p. 440; Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. iv. p. 540.)

That Pythagoras was the son of Mnesarchus, who was either a merchant, or, according to others, an engraver of signets (Diog. Laëret. vii. 1), may be safely affirmed on the authority of Herodotus (iv. 95); that Samos was his birth-place, on that of Isocrates (Basil. p. 227, ed. Steph.). Others called him a Tyrrenhian or Phliasian, and gave Marnicus, or Demaratus, as the name of his father (Diog. Laëret. l. c.; Porph. Vit. Pyth. l. 2; Justin, xx. 4; Paus. ii. 13.) It is quite possible that though born in Samos, he may have been connected in race with those Tyrrenhian or Cæsarians who were scattered over various parts of the Aegean Sea. There are but few chronological data, and those for the most part indistinct, for fixing the date of the birth of Pythagoras. Antilochus (ap. Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 309) reckoned 312 years from the ηλεία of Pythagoras to B. C. 270. This would place the date of his birth at the close of the seventh century B. C. (B. C. 608.) Nearly the same date results from the account of Eratosthenes (ap. Diog. Laëret. viii. 47), and this is the date adopted by Bentley among others. On the other hand, according to Aristoxenus (Porph. l. c. 9), Pythagoras quitted Samos in the reign of Polycrates, at the age of 40. According to Iamblichus he was 57 years of age in B. C. 513. This would give B. C. 570 as the date of his birth, and this date coincides better with other statements. All authorities agree that he flourished in the times of Polycrates and Tarquinus Superbus (B. C. 540—510, See Clinton, Fasti Hellen. s. a. B. C. 559, 553, 531, 510). The war between Sybaris and Crotona might furnish some data bearing upon the point, if the connection of Pythagoras with it were matter of certainty.

It was natural that men should be eager to know, or ready to conjecture the sources whence Pythagoras derived the materials which were worked up into his remarkable system. And as, in such cases, in the absence of authentic information, the conjectures of one become the belief of another, the result is, that it would be difficult to find a philosopher to whom such a variety of teachers is assigned as to Pythagoras. Some make his training almost entirely Grecian, others exclusively Egyptian and Oriental. We find mentioned as his instructors Creophilus (Iamb. Vit. Pyth. 9), Hermodorus (Porph. 2., Diog. Laëret. vii. 2). Bias (Iamb. l. c.), Thales (ibid.), Anaximander (Iamb. l. c.), Anaximenes (Iamb. l. c.), and the judges of Syros (Aristoxenus and others in Diog. Laëret. i. 118, 119; Clem. de Dee. i. 49). The Egyptians are said to have taught him geometry, the Phoenicians arithmetic, the Chaldæans astronomy, the Magians the formulae of religion and practical maxims for the conduct of life (Porph. l. c. 6). Of the statements regarding his Greek instructors, that about Pherecydes comes to us with the most respectable amount of attestation.

It was the current belief in antiquity, that Pythagoras had undertaken extensive travels, and had visited not only Egypt, but Arabia, Phœnicia, Neither as to the kind and amount of knowledge which Pythagoras acquired, nor as to his definite philosophical views, have we much trustworthy direct evidence. Every thing of the kind mentioned by Plato and Aristotle is attributed not to Pythagoras, but to the Pythagoreans. We have, however, the testimony of Heracleitus (Diog. Laërtr. viii. 6, ix. 1, comp. Herod. i. 29, ii. 49, iv. 95), that he was a man of extensive acquirements; and that of Xenophanes, that he believed in the transmigration of souls. (Diog. Laërtr. viii. 36, comp. Arist. de Anim., i. 3; Herod. ii. 123. Xenophanes mentions the story of his interceding on behalf of a dog that was being beaten, professing to recognise in its cries the voice of a departed friend, comp. Grote, L. c. vol. iv. p. 528, note.) Pythagoras is said to have pretended that he had been Euphorbus, the son of Panthus, in the Trojan war, as well as various other characters, a tradesman, a courtezan, &c. (Porph. p. 26; Paus. ii. 17; Diog. Laërtr. viii. 5; Horace, Od., i. 23, l. 10.) He is said to have discovered the propositions that the triangle inscribed in a semi-circle is right-angled (Diog. Laërtr. i. 29), that the square on the hypotenuse of a right-angled triangle is equal to the sum of the squares on the sides (Diog. Laërtr. viii. 12; Plut. Non posse suav. vivi sec. Ep. p. 1094). There is a celebrated story of his having discovered the arithmetical relations of the musical scale by observing accidentally the various sounds produced by hammers of different weights striking upon an anvil, and suspending by strings weights equal to those of the different hammers (Porph. in Pol. Harm. p. 213; Diog. Laërtr. viii. 12; Nicom. Harm. i. 2, p. 10, Meib.). The retailers of the story of course never took the trouble to verify the experiment, or they would have discovered that different hammers do not produce different sounds from the same anvil, any more than different clappers do from the same bell. Discoveries in astronomy are also attributed to Pythagoras (Diog. Laërtr. viii. 14; Plin. H.N. ii. 8). There can be little doubt that he paid great attention to arithmetic, and its application to weights, measures, and the theory of music; medicine also is mentioned as included in the range of his studies (Diog. Laërtr. viii. 12, 14, 32). Apart from all direct testimony, however, it might safely have been affirmed, that the very remarkable influence exerted by Pythagoras, and even the fact that he was the hero of so many marvellous stories, prove him to have been a man both of singular capabilities and of great acquirements. The general tendency of the speculations of the Pythagorean school is evident that the statements with regard to his mathematical researches are well founded; and the accounts rather confirm the conjecture of Ritter, that through his descent from the Tyrrhenian Pelasgians Pythagoras derived by tradition a peculiar and secret cultus, which he needed not so much to alter, as to develop so as to suit his peculiar aims, there can be little doubt that the above-named author is correct in viewing the religious element as the predominant one in his character, and a religious ascendency in connection with a certain mystic religious system as that which it was his immediate and chief object to secure. And it was this religious element which made the profoundest impression upon his contemporaries. That they regarded him as standing in a peculiarly close connection with the gods is certain. The Crotoniates even identified him.
with the Hyperborean Apollo. (Porphy. l. c. 20; Iamb. l. c. 31, 140; Aelian, V. H. ii. 26; Diog. Laërt. viii. 36.) And without viewing him as an impostor, we may easily believe that he himself to some extent shared the same views. He is said to have pretended to divination and prophecy. (Cic. de Divin. i. 3, 46; Porphy. l. c. 29.) "In his prominent vocation, analogous to that of Epeimenes, Orpheus, or Melampus, he appears as the revealer of a mode of life calculated to raise the level of mankind, and to recommend them to the favour of the gods." (Grote, vol. iv. p. 529.)

No certainty can be arrived at as to the length of time spent by Pythagorians in Egypt or the East, or as to his residence and efforts in Samos or other Grecian cities, before his removal to Italy. Ritter is inclined to believe from the expressions of Herodotus that the secret cultus or orgies of Pythagorians had gained some footing in Greece or Ionia, even before Crotona became the focus of his influence (Gesch. der Phil. vol. i. p. 364, Gesch. der Pyth. Phil. p. 31). In the visits to various places in Greece—Delos, Sparta, Phlius, Crete, &c. which are ascribed to him, he appears commonly either in his religious or priestly character, or else as a lawyer (Iamb. l. c. 25; Porphy. l. c. 17; Diog. Laërt. viii. 3, 13; Cic. Tusc. Qu. v. 3.)

It is in the highest degree probable that the reason why Pythagoras removed to Crotona is to be found in the same causes which impel his disciples abroad. He is the native country, while under the tyranny of Polykrates, for the realisation of his schemes. Later admirers were content to believe that, from the high estimation in which he was held by his fellow-citizens, he was so overburdened with public duties, as to have no time to bestow upon philosophy, and so withdrew from Samos (Iamb. l. c. 26; Porphy. 9.)

The reason why he selected Crotona as the sphere of his operations, it is impossible to ascertain from any existing evidence. All that is added on this head by K. O. Müller (Dorians, iii. 9, § 17, vol. ii. p. 189, &c,) is mere conjecture, and is of the most unsatisfactory kind. Grote (vol. iv. p. 538) supposes that the celebrity of Crotona for the cultivation of the art of medicine may possibly have had some influence with him. That on his arrival there he speedily attained extensive influence, and gained over great numbers to enter into his views, is all that can safely be affirmed in the midst of the marvellous stories told by later biographers of the effects of his eloquent discourses in leading the Crotoniates to abandon their luxurious and corrupting manner of life and devote themselves to that purer system which he came to introduce. (Porphy. 18; Iamb. 37, &c.) His adherents were chiefly of the noble and wealthy classes. Three hundred of these were formed into a select brotherhood or club, bound by a sort of vow to Pythagoras and each other, for the purpose of cultivating the religious and ascetic observances enjoined by their master, and of studying his religions and philosophical theories. The statement that they threw all their property into a common stock has not sufficient evidence to support it, and was perhaps in the first instance only an inference from certain Pythagorean maxims and practices (comp. Cic. de Leg. i. 12, de Off. i. 7; Diog. Laërt. viii. 10; Krische, l. c. p. 27, &c.; Ritter, l. c. p. 35). That there were several women among the adherents of Pythagoras is pretty certain. Any that were members of the club of 300 is not so probable. Krische (l. c. p. 45) considers that these female Pythagorians were only the wives and relations of members of the brotherhood, who were instructed in some of the Pythagorean doctrines. These would doubtless be mainly those connected with the religious part of his system. (Comp. Menage, Hist. de Mul. Philos.)

With respect to the internal arrangements and discipline of this brotherhood, a few leading features seem to rest upon a basis of divination, though the probability sufficient to warrant our bestowing any attention upon them. All accounts agree that what was done and taught among the members was kept a profound secret towards all without its pale. But we are also told that there were gradations among the members themselves. It was an old Pythagorean maxim, that every thing was not to be told to every body (Diog. Laërt. viii. 15; Arist. ap. Iamb. 31, εις τοις παντι άφοβητός.) The division of classes is usually described as one into ἕσωτεροι and ἕξωτεροι, though these terms themselves are probably of later origin. Other names given to corresponding divisions are, Πυθαγόρειοι and Πυθαγορισταὶ (Iamb. 60.) Other accounts, again, speak of a division into three classes, Πυθαγόρικοι, Πυθαγόρειοι, and Πυθαγορισταὶ, according to the degree of intimacy which they enjoyed with Pythagoras; the first class being those who held the closest communion with him; or into οἱ ἔσωτεροι, οἱ ἕξωτεροι, and οἱ ἄνωτεροι, according as the subject of their studies related mainly to religion, to politics, or to mathematical and physical science (Phot. Cod. 249.) Other authorities speak of ἀκοινοτικοὶ and μαθησιακοὶ (Iamb. l. c.), or Acustici, Mathematici, and Physici (Gell. N. A. i. 9.) Most of these divisions, however, presuppose a more marked separation between the different branches of human knowledge, or between philosophical training and political activity, than existed at that time. In the admission of candidates Pythagoras is said to have placed great reliance on his physiognomical discernment (Gell. l. c.). If admitted, they had to pass through a period of probation, in which their powers of maintaining silence (ἐχειμεύωδα) were especially tested, as well as their general temper, disposition, and mental capacity (Ariston. ap. Iamb. 94.) That they had to maintain silence for five years, and during the whole of that period were never allowed to behold the face of Pythagoras, while they were from time to time exposed to various severe ordeals (Iamb. 68), are doubtless the exaggerations of a later age. There is more probability in the statement (Taurus, ap. Gol. i. 9) that the period of noviciate varied according to the aptitude which the candidates manifested for the Pythagorean discipline. As regards the nature of the esoteric instruction to which only the most approved members of the fraternity were admitted, some (e. g. Meiners, Gesch. der Wissenschaften) have supposed that it had reference to the political views of Pythagoras. Ritter (l. c. p. 47, &c,) with greater probability, holds that it had reference mainly to the orgies, or secret religious doctrines and usages, which undoubtedly formed a prominent feature in the Pythagorean system, and were peculiarly connected with the worship of Apollo (Aelian, V. H. ii. 26; Diog. Laërt. vii. 12; Stobaeus, frag. 141; comp. Krische, l. c. p. 37; Brandis, l. c. p. 432; Müller, Dorians, iii. 9, § 17.) The admission of women to PYTHAGORAS.

A knowledge of these (if indeed they were members of the club) is far more intelligible than their initiation into political secrets. And the atoikes ἃπα of the master connects itself most easily with the priestly character of Pythagorians, and the belief which his disciples, and probably he himself also, entertained, that he enjoyed a closer and more direct intercourse with the gods than other men. It is possible enough, however, that some of the more recondite speculations of the philosopher were connected with these religious views, while the ordinary scientific studies—mathematics, music, astronomy,—were open to all the disciples. That there were some outward peculiarities of an ascetic kind (many of which had, perhaps, a symbolic meaning) in the mode of life to which the members of the brotherhood were subjected, seems pretty certain (comp. Porph. 32; Iamb. 56, &c.). Some represent him as forbidding all animal food (as Empedocles did afterwards, Arist. Athet. i. 14, § 2; Sext. Emp. ix. 127. This was also one of the Orphic precepts, Aristoph. Ran. 1032). This, if to any extent the case, may have had reference to the doctrine of metempsychosis (comp. Plut. de Eu. Caru. pp. 993, 996, 997). It is, however, pointed out by Grote (vol. iv. p. 533), that all the members cannot have been subjected to this prohibition; Milo, for instance, could not possibly have dispensed with animal food. The best authorities contradict the statement. According to Ariston (ap. Diog. Laërt. viii. 29) he allowed the use of all kinds of animal food except the flesh of oxen used for ploughing, and rams (comp. Porph. 7; Iamb. 85, 108). There is a similar discrepancy as to the prohibition of fish and beans (Diog. Laërt. viii. 19, 34; Gell. iv. 11; Porph. 34, de Abst. i. 28; Iamb. 98). But temperance of all kinds seems to have been strictly enjoined. It is also stated that they had common meals, resembling the Spartan syssitia, at which they met in companies of ten (Iamb. 98; Strabo, vi. p. 263). Considerable importance seems to have been attached to music and gymnastics in the daily exercises of the disciples. Their whole discipline is represented as tending to produce a lofty serenity and self-possession, regarding the exhibition of which various anecdotes were current in antiquity (Athen. xiv. p. 623; Aelian, V. H. xiv. 15; Iamb. 197; comp. Krische, l. c. p. 42). Iamblichus (96—101, apparently on the authority of Aristoxenus) gives a long description of the daily routine of the members, which suggests many points of comparison with the ordinary life of Spartan citizens. It is not unlikely that many of the regulations of Pythagorians were suggested by what he saw in Crete and Sparta. Among the list of forbidden articles of the brotherhood are the devoted attachment of the members to each other, and their sovereign contempt for those who did not belong to their ranks (Ariston. ap. Iamb. 94, 101, &c., 229, &c.; comp. the story of Damon and Phintias; Porph. 60; Iamb. 233, &c.). It appears that they had some secret conventional symbols, by which members of the fraternity could recognize each other, even if they had never met before (Schol. ad Arist. Nub. 611; Iamb. 237, 239; Krische, pp. 43, 44). Clubs similar to that at Crotona were established at Sybaris, Metapontum, Tarentum, and other cities of Magna Græcia.

The institutions of Pythagorians were certainly not intended to withdraw those who adopted them from active exertion and social and political connections, that they might devote themselves exclusively to religious and philosophical contemplations. Rather he aimed at the production of a calm bearing and elevated tone of character, through which those trained in the discipline of the Pythagorean life should exhibit in their personal and social capacities a reflection of the order and harmony of the universe. But the question whether he had any distinct political designs in the foundation of his brotherhood, has been variously answered. It was perfectly natural, even without any express design on his part, that a club such as the Three Hundred of Crotona should gradually come to mingle political with other objects, and by the facilities afforded by their secret and compact organization should speedily gain extensive political influence, which, moreover, the political condition of Crotona, where the aristocracy was with difficulty holding its ground, rendered more than usually easy. That this influence should be decisively on the side of aristocracy or oligarchy, resulted naturally both from the nature of the Pythagorean institutions, and from the rank and social position of the members of the brotherhood. Through them, of course, Pythagorians himself exercised a large amount of indirect influence over the affairs both of Crotona and of other Italian cities. It does not appear however that he ever held any official rank, though we are told that the senate urged him to accept the office of Prytanis. But we have no evidence that the objects of Pythagorians were (as Krische, Müller, and others believe) from the first predominantly political, or even that he had any definite political designs at all in the formation of his club. That he intended to exhibit in Crotona the model of a pure Dorian aristocracy (Müller, Doriêa, iii. 9, § 16), is a mere fancy (comp. Grote, vol. iv. p. 545, note). It is true that the club was in practice at one "a philosophical school, a religious brotherhood, and a political association" (Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. ii. p. 148), but there is nothing to show that "all these characters appear to have been inseparably united in the founder's mind." Mr. Grote, more in accordance with the earliest and best authority on the subject (Plato, de Rep. x. p. 600, comp. de Leg. vi. p. 782, who contrasts Pythagorians, as the instigator of a peculiar mode of private life, with those who exercised a direct influence upon public life), remarks, "We cannot construe the scheme of Pythagorians as going farther than the formation of a private, select order of brethren, embracing his religious fancies, ethical tone, and germs of scientific idea, and manifesting adhesion by those observances which Herodotus and Plato call the Pythagorean orgies and the hecatomb. But the private order became politically powerful because he was skilful or fortunate enough to enlist a sufficient number of wealthy Crotoniates, possessing individual influence, which they strengthened immensely by thus regimenting themselves in intimate union" (Hist. of Greece, vol. iv. p. 544). The notion of Müller and Niebuhr, that the 300 Pythagorians constituted a kind of smaller senate at Crotona, is totally without foundation. On the other hand, it seems quite as unfounded to infer from the account that Pythagorians was the first to apply to himself the epithet φιλόσοφος (Cic. Tus. v. 3; Diog. Laërt. i. 12), that philosophical contemplation was the sole end that he had in view. Respecting the Pythagorean life, and its analogy

With the Orphic life, see Lobeck, Apologetarius, Orphica, lib. ii. pp. 347, 696, 800. The resemblance in many respects of the Pythagorean brotherhood or order to that founded by Loyola has been more than once pointed out. It is easy to understand how this aristocratical and exclusive club would excite the jealousy and hostility not only of the democratical party in Crotona, but also of a considerable number of the opposite faction. The hatred which they had excited speedily led to their destruction. The circumstances attending this event are, however, involved in some uncertainty. In the hostilities which broke out between Sybaris and Crotona on the occasion of the refusal of the Crotoniates (to which, it is said, they had been urged by Pythagorians) to surrender some exiles of Sybaris, the forces of Crotona were headed by the Pythagorean Milo [Milo]; and the other members of the brotherhood doubtless took a prominent part. The decisive victory of the Crotoniates seems to have elated the Pythagoreans beyond measure. A proposal (occasional, according to the statement in Iamblicus, c. 355, by a refuse for the part of the senate to distribute amongst the people the newly conquered territory of Sybaris; though this account involves considerable difficulty; see Grote, L.c., p. 549) for establishing a more democratical constitution, was unsuccessfully resisted by the Pythagoreans. Their enemies, headed by Cylon and Ninon, the former of whom is said to have been irritated by his exclusion from the brotherhood, excited the populace against them. An attack was made upon them while assembled either in the house of Milo, or in some other place of meeting. The building was set on fire, and many of the assembled members perished; only the younger and more active escaping (Iamb. 255—259; Porph. 54—57; Diog. Laërt. viii. 39; Diod. x. fragm. vol. iv. p. 56, ed. Wess.; comp. Plut. de Gen. Socr. p. 583). Similar commotions ensued in the other cities of Magna Graecia in which Pythagorean clubs had been formed, and kept up. A memorable time in the history of great disquietude, which was at length pacified by the mediation of the Peloponnesian Achaeanas (Polyb. ii. 39). As an active and organised brotherhood the Pythagorean order was everywhere suppressed, and did not again revive, though it was probably a long time before it was put down in all the Italian cities [Lysis; Philolaus]. Still the Pythagoreans continued to exist as a sect, the members of which kept up among themselves their religious observances and scientific pursuits, while individuals, as in the case of Archytas, acquired now and then great political influence. Respecting the fate of Pythagoras himself, the accounts varied. Some say that he perished in the temple with his disciples (Arnob. adv. Gentes, i. p. 20), others that he fled first to Tarentum, and that, being driven thence, he escaped to Metapontum, and there starved himself to death (Diog. Laërt. viii. 39, 40; Porph. 56; Iamb. 524; Fabric. in Stoic. Rep. 37). His tomb was shown at Metapontum in the time of Cicero [Cic. de Fin. v. 2]. According to some accounts Pythagoras married Theano, a lady of Crotona, and had a daughter Dama, and a son Telages; others say two daughters, Dama and Myia; but other notices seem to imply that he had a wife and a daughter grown up, when he came to Crotona. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 12; Fabric. Bibl. Gracc. vol. i. p. 772.)

PYTHAGORAS.

For a considerable time after the breaking up of the clubs at Crotona and elsewhere great obscurity hangs over the history of the Pythagoreans. No reliance can be placed on the lists of them which later writers have given, as they have been amplified, partly through mere invention, partly through a confusion between Pythagoreans and Italian philosophers generally. The writings, or fragments of writings, which have come down to us under the names of Archytas, Timaeus, Ocellos, Brontinus, &c., have been shown to be spurious. Pythagorism seems to have established itself by degrees more and more in different parts of Greece. About the time of Socrates, and a little later, we get some trustworthy notices of Philolaus, Lysis, Cleinias, Eurytus, and Archytas. These men, and others who applied themselves to the development of the Pythagorean philosophy, were widely different from the so-called Pythagoreans of a later age (from the time of Cicero onwards), who were characterised by little except an exaggeration of the religious and ascetic fanaticism of the Pythagorean system [Apollonius Tyana]. This Neo-Pythagorean system was fully embraced in the kindred mysticism of the Neo-Platonists.

When we come to inquire what were the philosophical or religious opinions held by Pythagorians himself, we are met at the outset by the difficulty that even the authors from whom we have to draw possessed no authentic records bearing upon the subject of the age of Pythagoras himself. If Pythagoras ever wrote any thing, his writings perished with him, or not long after. The probability is that he wrote nothing. (Comp. *Plut. de Alex. fort. p. 329; Porph. l.c. 57; Galen, de Hipp. et Plat. Placc. v. 6.) The statements to the contrary prove worthless on examination. Every thing current under his name in antiquity was spurious. (See Fabric. Bibl. Gracc. vol. i. pp. 779—803; Ritter, Gesch. der Pyth. Phil. p. 56.) It is all but certain that Philolaus was the first who published the Pythagorean doctrines, at any rate in a written form. Philolaus was so marked a peculiarity running through the Pythagorean philosophy, by whomsoever of its adherents it was developed, and so much of uniformity can be traced at the basis even of the diversities which present themselves here and there in the views expressed by different Pythagoreans, as they have come down to us from authentic sources, that there can be little question as to the germ of the system at any rate having been derived from Pythagoras himself. (Brandis, l.c. p. 442.) The Pythagoreans seem to have striven in the main to keep their doctrine uncorrupted. We even hear of men being expelled from the brotherhood for philosophical or other herodoxy; and a distinction was already drawn in antiquity between genuine and spurious Pythagorism (Iamb. 81; Villlola. Aenod. ii. p. 316; Syrian. in Arist. Met. xii. fol. 71, b., 85, b.; Simplex. in Arist. Phys. fol. 104, b., Stob. Ecl. Phys. p. 385, 443, 496). Aristotle manifestly regarded the Pythagorean philosophy as something which in its leading features characterised the school generally. He found it, however, after it had passed through a considerable period of development, in the hands of adherents of varying tendencies. It was to be expected therefore that varieties should make their appearance (comp. Arist. de Caelo, iii. 1, at the end, with Met. i. 6). Nearly every thing that can in any degree depended on seems to have been derived from the writings of Philolaus and Archytas, especially the former (Ritter, l. c. p. 62, &c.). On the philosophy of Archytas Aristotle had composed a treatise in three books, which has unfortunately perished, and had instituted a comparison between his doctrines and those of the Timaeus of Plato (Athen. xii. 12; Diog. Laërt. v. 23).

Pythagoras resembled greatly the philosophers of what is termed the Ionic school, who undertook to solve by means of a single primordial principle the vague problem of the origin and constitution of the universe as a whole. But, like Anaximander, he abandoned the physical hypotheses of Thales and had passed from the province of physics to that of metaphysics, and his predilection for mathematical studies led him to trace the origin of all things to number, this theory being suggested, or at all events confirmed, by the observation of various numerical relations, or analogies to them, in the phenomena of the universe.

"Since of all things numbers are by nature the first, in numbers they (the Pythagoreans) thought they perceived many analogies to things that exist and are produced, more than in fire, and earth, and water; as that a certain affection of numbers was justice; a certain other affection, soul and intellect; another, opportunity; and of the rest, so to say, each in like manner; and moreover, seeing the affections and ratios of what pertains to harmony to consist in numbers, since other things seemed in their entire form to be divided in the likeness of numbers, and in all nature numbers are the first, they supposed the elements of numbers to be the elements of all things" (Arist. Met. i. 5, comp. especially Met. xiii. 3). Brandis, who traces in the notices that remain more than one system, developed by different Pythagoreans, according as they recognised in numbers the inherent basis of things, or only the patterns of them, considers that all started from the common conviction that it was in numbers and their relations that they were to find the absolutely certain principles of knowledge (comp. Philolaus, ap. Stob. Écl. Phys. i. p. 458; Böckh, Philolaos, p. 62; Stob. l. c. p. 10; Böckh, l. c. p. 145, φεύδως οὐδαμός ἐστὶν αὐτὸμον ἐπιτείπτυς — ὁ δ' Ἀθηναῖος οἰκεῖον καὶ σύμφωνα τῷ τῶν ἀριθμών γενεύ), and of the objects of it, and accordingly regarded the principles of numbers as the absolute principles of things; keeping true to the common maxim of the ancient philosophy, that like takes cognisance of like (καθαρότερες ηλέγχαι καὶ φόλακας, διεφθορίζοντες τὰ ὅρια τῶν μαθημάτων περιγραμμένων) τῆς τῶν διόνομα φύσεως ἦχον τοιαύτης συμμετρίας πρὸς τάπητι, ἐπίσης ὅπου τοῦ ὁμοίου τὰ διαμενὰ κατακλυσμάτως, Sext. Emp. adv. Math. vii. 92; Brandis, l. c. p. 442).

Aristotle states the fundamental maxim of the Pythagoreans in various forms, as, φαίνεται δὴ καὶ οὖν τῶν ἀριθμῶν νομιζόμενες ἀρχήν εἶναι καὶ ὁ λόγος τῶν οὐσιῶν καὶ τῶν αἰτίων τῆς ζωῆς (ibid. p. 987. 19, ed. Bekker) or, τους ἀριθμοὺς αὐτοὺς εἶναι τοῖς ἀλλοῖς τῆς ζωῆς οὐσία (Arist. Met. i. 6, p. 987. 24); nay, even that numbers are things themselves (Ibid. p. 987. 28). According to Philolaus (Syrin. in Arist. Met. xii. 6. p. 1000, b. 19), number is the "dominant and self-produced bond of the eternal continuous order of things." But number has two forms (as Philolaus terms them, ap. Stob. l. c. p. 456; Böckh, l. c. p. 56), or elements (Arist. Met. i. 5), the even and the odd, and a third, resulting from the mixture of the two, the even-odd (ἀριθμόπερτον, Philol. l. c.). This third species is one itself, for it is both even and odd (Arist. l. c. Another explanation of the ἀριθμόπερτον, which accords better with other notices, is that it was an even number composed of two uneven numbers, Brandis, l. c. p. 465, &c.). One, or unity, is the essence of number, or absolute number, and so comprehends these two opposite species. As absolute number it is the origin of all numbers, and so of all things. (Arist. Met. xiii. 4. ἐν δὲ ἀριθμῷ πάντων; Philol. ap. Böckh, § 19. According to another theory, the whole (Arist. Met. xii. 6. p. 1000, b. 7. number is produced ἐκ τοῦ ἀριθμοῦ τῆς ἀλλών των). This original unity they also termed God (Ritter, Gesch. der Philol. vol. i. p. 389). These propositions, however, would, taken alone, give but a very partial idea of the Pythagorean system. A most important part is played in it by the ideas of limit, and the unlimited. They are, in fact, the fundamental ideas of the whole. One of the first declarations in the work of Philolaus [Philolaus] was, that all things in the universe result from a combination of the unlimited and the limiting (φύσις δὲ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ἀμύθῳ ἐξ ἀπειρίων τε καὶ περαιώντων, καὶ ἄλογος κόσμος καὶ τὰ ἀνέφορα πάρα. Diog. Laërt. viii. 65; Böckh, p. 45); for if all things had been unlimited, nothing could have been the object of cognition (Phil. l. c.; Böckh, p. 49). From the unlimited were deduced immediately time, space, and motion (Stob. Écl. Phys. p. 398; Simplic. in Arist. Phys. p. 96, b.; Brandis, l. c. p. 451). Then again, in some extraordinary manner they connected the ideas of odd and even with the contracted notions of the limited and the unlimited, the odd being limited, the even unlimited (Arist. Met. i. 5, p. 986, a. 18, Bekker, comp. Phys. Aeus. iii. 4, p. 203. 10, Bekker). They called the even unlimited, because in itself it is divisible into equal halves ad infinitum, and is only limited by the odd, which, when added to the even, prevents the division (Simp. ad Arist. Phys. Aeus. iii. 4. f. 105; Brandis, p. 450, note). Limit, or the limiting elements, they considered as more akin to the primary unity (Syrin. in Arist. Met. xiii. 1.). In place of the plural expression of Philolaus (τὰ περαιώντα) Aristotle sometimes uses the singular πέρας, which, in like manner, he connects with the unlimited (τὰ ἀπειράν. Met. i. 6, p. 990, b. 8, xiii. 3. p. 1001, b. 10, ed. Bekker).

But musical principles played almost as important a part in the Pythagorean system as mathematical or numerical ideas. The opposite principle of the unlimited and the limiting are, as Philolaus expresses it (Stob. l. c. p. 458; Böckh, l. c. 62), "neither alike, nor of the same race, and so it would have been impossible for them to unite, had not harmony stepped in." This harmony, again, was, in the conception of Philolaus, neither more nor less than the octave (Brandis, l. c. p. 456). On the investigation of the various harmonical relations of the octave, and their connection with weight, as the measure of tension, Philolaus bestowed considerable attention, and some important fragments of his system on this subject have been preserved, which Böckh has carefully edited (ibid. p. 65—89, comp. Brandis, l. c. p. 457, &c.). We find running through the entire Pythagorean system the idea that order, or harmony of relation, is the regulating principle of the whole universe. Some of the Pythagoreans (but by no means all, as it appears) drew out a list of ten pairs of opposites, which they termed the elements of the universe.
(Arist. Met. i. 5. Elsewhere he speaks as if the Pythagoreans generally did the same, Eth. Nic. i.
4, ii. 5.) These pairs were —

Limit and the Unlimited.
Odd and Even.
One and Multitude.
Right and Left.
Male and Female.
Stationary and Moved.
Straight and Curved.
Light and Darkness.
Good and Bad.
Square and Oblong.

The first column was that of the good elements (Arist. Eth. Nic. i. 4); the second, the row of the bad. Those in the second series were also regarded as having the character of negation (Arist.
Phys. iii. 2). These, however, are hardly to be looked upon as ten pairs of distinct principles.
They are rather various modes of conceiving one and the same opposition. One, Limit and the Odd, are spoken of as though they were synonymous (comp. Arist. Met. i. 5, 7, xiii. 4, Phys.
 iii. 5).

To explain the production of material objects out of the union of the unlimited and the limiting, Ritter (Gesch. der Pyth. Phil. and Gesch. der Phil.
vol. i. p. 403, &c.) has propounded a theory which has great plausibility, and is undoubtedly much the same as the view held by later Pythagorizing mathematicians; namely, that the áxov is nether more nor less than void space, and the peratou ita points in space which bound or define it (which points he affirms the Pythagoreans called monads or units, appealing to Arist. de Caelo, iii. 1 ; comp.
Alexand. Aphrod. quoted below), the point being the dichv or principium of the line, the line of the surface, the surface of the solid. Points, or monads, therefore are the source of material existence; and as points are monads, and monads numbers, it follows that numbers are at the base of material existence. (This is the view of the matter set forth by Alexander Aphrodisiensis in Arist. de prin. Phil. i. fol. 10, b.; Ritter, l. c. p. 404, note 3.) Ephednus of Syrauce was the first who made the Pythagorean monads to be corporeal, and set down indivisible particles and void space as the principia of material existence. (See Stob. Eel.
Phys. p. 368.) Two geometrical points in themselves would have no magnitude; it is only when they are combined with the intervening space that a line can be produced. The union of space and lines makes surfaces; the union of surfaces and space makes solids. Of course this does not explain very well how corporeal substance is formed, and Ritter thinks that the Pythagoreans perceived that this was the weak point of their system, and so spoke of the áxov, as mere void, as little as they could help, and strove to represent it as something positive, or almost substantial.

But however plausible this view of the matter may be, we cannot understand how any one who compares the very numerous passages in which Aristotle speaks of the Pythagoreans, can suppose that his notices have reference to any such system.
The theory which Ritter sets down as that of the Pythagoreans is one which Aristotle mentions several times, and shows to be inadequate to account for the physical existence of the world, but he nowhere speaks of it as the doctrine of the Pythagoreans. Some of the passages, where Ritter tries to make this out to be the case, go to prove the very reverse. For instance, in De Caelo, iii. 1, after an elaborate discussion of the theory in question, Aristotle concludes by remarking that the number-theory of the Pythagoreans will no more account for the production of corporeal magnitude, than the point-line-and-space-theory which he has just described, for no addition of units can produce either body or weight (comp. Met. xiii. 5).
Aristotle nowhere identifies the Pythagorean mo-

nads with mathematical points; on the contrary, he affirms that in the Pythagorean system, the monads, in some way or other which they could not explain, get magnitude and extension (Met.
xii. 6, p. 1080, ed. Bekker). The keep again, which Aristotle mentions as recognised by the Pythagoreans, is never spoken of as synonymous with their áxov; on the contrary we find (Stob.
 Eel. Phys. i. p. 390) that from the áxov they deduced time, breath, and void space. The frequent use of the term ópov, too, by Aristotle, instead of peratou, hardly comports with Ritter's theory.

There can be little doubt that the Pythagorean system should be viewed in connection with that of Anaximander, with whose doctrines Pythagoras was doubtless conversant. Anaximander, in his attempt to solve the problem of the universe, passed from the region of physics to that of metaphysics. He supposed "a primary principle without any definite determining qualities whatever;
but including all qualities potentially, and manifesting them in an infinite variety from its continually self-changing nature; a principle which was nothing in itself, yet had the capacity of producing any and all manifestations, however contrary to each other—a primaeval something, whose essence it was to be eternally productive of different phenomena." (Grote, l. c. p. 518; comp. Brandis, l. c.
p. 123, &c.). This he termed the áxov; and he was also the first to introduce the term ópov (Simplic. in Arist. Phys. fol. 6, 32). Both these terms hold a prominent position in the Pythago-orean system, and we think there can be but little doubt as to their parentage. The Pythagorean áxov seems to have been very nearly the same as that of Anaximander, an undefined and infinite something. Only instead of investing it with the property of spontaneously developing itself in the various forms of actual material existence, they regarded all its definite manifestations as the determination of its indeterminate essence by the definiteness of number, which thus became the cause of all actual and positive existence (toûs ádhamov aitov elvai toûs Ælla toûs Ællas tês oðelas, Arist. Met. i. 6).
It is by numbers alone, in their view, that the objective becomes cognisable to the subject; by numbers that extension is originated, and attains to that definiteness by which it becomes a concrete body. As the ground of all quantitative and qualitative definiteness in existing things, therefore,
number is represented as their inherent element, or even as the matter (ópov), as well as the passive and active condition of things (Arist. Met. i. 5).
But both the peratou and the áxov are referred to a higher unity, the absolute or divine unity. And in this aspect of the matter Aristotle speaks of unity as the principium and essence and element of all things (Met. xii. 6, i. 6, p. 987, b. 22); the divine unity being the first principle and cause, and one, as the first of the limiting numbers and the element of all, being the basis of positive existence, and when itself become possessed of extension (Met. xii. 3. p. 1091, a. 15) the element of all that possesses extension (comp. Brandis, l.c. p. 511, &c.). In its development, however, the Pythagorean system seems to have taken a twofold direction, one school of Pythagoreans regarding numbers as the inherent, fundamental elements of things (Arist. de Caelo, iii. 1); another section, of which Hippasus seems to have been the head, regarding numbers as the patterns merely, but not as entering into the essence of things (Arist. Met. i. 6). Though Aristotle speaks of the Pythagoreans generally here, there can be no doubt that the assertion, in which the Greek commentators found a difficulty, should be restricted to a section of the Pythagoreans. Comp. Iambl. in Nicom. Arithm. p. 11; Syrian, in Arist. Met. xii. p. 1080, b. 18; Simplic. in Phys. f. 104, b.; Iambl. Pyth. 81; Stob. Ecl. Phys. p. 302; Brandis, l.c. p. 444.

As in the octave and its different harmonic relations, the Pythagoreans found the ground of connection between the opposed primary elements, and the mutual relations of existing things, so in the properties of particular numbers, and their relation to the principia, did they attempt to find the explanation of the particular properties of different things, and therefore addressed themselves to the investigation of the properties of numbers, dividing them into various species. Thus they had three kinds of even, according as the number was a power of two (δρυίδας όπτριον), or a multiple of two, or of some power of two, not itself a power of two (περισσότερον), or the sum of an odd and an even number (δριποςεριττον— a word which seems to have been used in more than one sense. Nicom. Arithm. i. 7, 8). In like manner they had three kinds of odd. It was probably the use of the decimal system of notation which led to the number ten being supposed to be possessed of extraordinary powers. "One must contemplate the works and essential nature of number according to the principle which is in the number ten for it is great, and perfect, and all-working, and the first principle (ἀρχή) and guide of divine and heavenly and human life." (Philolaus ap. Stob. Ecl. Phys. p. 8; Böckh, p. 130.) This, doubtless, had to do with the formation of the list of ten pairs of opposite principles, which was drawn out by some Pythagoreans (Arist. Met. i. 5). In like manner the tetraectys (possibly the sum of the first four numbers, or 10) was described as containing the source and root of everlasting nature (Carm. Auct. l. 48). The number three was spoken of as defining or limiting the universe and all things, having end, middle, and beginning, and so being the number of the whole (Arist. de Caelo, i. 1). This part of their system they seem to have helped out by considerations as to the connection of numbers with lines, surfaces, and solids, especially the regular geometrical figures (Theol. Arithm. 10, p. 61, &c.), and to have connected the relations of things with various geometrical relations, among which angles played an important part. Thus, according to Philolaus, the angle of a triangle was consecrated to four deities, Kronos, Iliades, Pan, and Dionysus; the angle of a square to Rheia, Demeter, and Hestia; the angle of a dodecagon to Zeus; apparently to shadow forth the sphere of their operations (Procl. in Euclid. Elen. i. p. 36; Böckh, l.c. p. 152, &c.). As we learn that he connected solid extension with the number four (Theod. Arithm., p. 56), it is not unlikely that, as others did (Nicom. Arithm. ii. 6), he connected the number one with a point, two with a line, three with a surface (σφάερον). To the number five he appropriated beauty and colour, and to six life; to seven intelligence, health, and light; to eight love, friendship, understanding, insight (Theod. Arithm., l.c.). Others connected marriage, justice, &c. with different numbers (Alex. in Arist. Met. i. 5, 13). Guided by similar faulcful analogies they assumed the existence of five elements, connected with geometrical figures, the cube being earth; the pyramid, fire; the octaedron, air; the eikosaedron, water; the dodecagon, the fifth element, to which Philolaus gives the curious appellation of ἀρκτική ἀνδρας (Stob. l.c. i. p. 10; Böckh, l.c. p. 161; comp. Plut. de Place. Phil. ii. 6).

In the Pythagorean system the element pure was the most dignified and important. It accordingly occupied the most honourable position in the universe—the extreme (πέρας), rather than intermediate positions; and by extreme they understood both the centre and the remotest region, the ἐκείνην καὶ τὸ μέτωπον πέρας, Arist. de Caelo, ii. 13). The central fire Philolaus terms the heart of the universe, the house or watch-tower of Zeus, the mother of the gods, the altar and bond and measure of nature (Stob. l.c. p. 488; Böckh, l.c. p. 94, &c.). It was the enlivening principle of the universe. By this fire they probably understood something purer and more ethereal than the common element fire (Brandis, l.c. p. 491). Round this central fire the heavenly bodies performed their circling dance (περιφερον is the expression of Philolaus);—farthest off, the sphere of the fixed stars; then, in order, the five planets, the sun, the moon, the earth and the counter-earth (ἀντίφυσον)—a sort of other half of the earth, a distinct body from it, but always moving parallel to it, which they seem to have introduced merely to make up the number ten. The most distant region, which was at the same time the purest, was inhabited by the goddesses (Brandis, l.c. p. 476). The space between the heaven of the fixed stars and the moon was termed κόσμος; the space between the moon and the earth ἐθνός (Stob. l.c.). Philolaus assumed a daily revolution of the earth round the central fire, but not round its own axis. The revolution of the earth round its axis was taught (after Iliictas of Syracuse; see Cic. Acad. iv. 39) by the Pythagorean Ephantus and Heracleides Ponticus (Plut. Place. iii. 13; Procl. in Tim. p. 281): a combined motion round the central fire and round its own axis, by Aristarchus of Samos (Plut. de Fac. Lus. p. 385). The infinite (περιφερον) beyond the mundane sphere was, at least according to Archytas (Simplic. Corp. Phys. l. 106), not void space, but occupied by the physical existence of the universe, which, in the view of the Pythagoreans was a huge sphere (Stob. l.c. p. 452, 468), was represented as a sort of vital process, time, space, and breath (πνεύμα) being, as it were, ῥιπαθευτότα τοῦ ἀτέρου (ἐκάτερου ἄτέρου χρόνον το τετετείκτον καὶ τὸ κενόν καὶ τὸ κενόν, Stob. l.c. p. 330; see espe-
PYTHAGORAS.

The intervals between the heavenly bodies were supposed to be determined according to the laws and relations of musical harmony (Nicom. Harm. i. 6, ii. 33; Plin. H. N. ii. 20; Simplic. in Arist. de Caelo Schol. p. 496, b. 9, 497, 11). Hence arose the celebrated doctrine of the harmony of the spheres; for the heavenly bodies in their motion could not but occasion a certain sound or note, depending on their distances and velocities; and as these were determined by the laws of harmonical intervals, the notes altogether formed a regular musical scale or harmony. This harmony, however, we do not hear, either because we have been accustomed to it from the first, and have never had an opportunity of contrasting it with stillness, or because the sound is so powerful as to exceed our capacities for hearing (Arist. de Caelo, ii. 9; Porphyr. in Harm. Philol. 4. p. 257). With all this fanciful hypothesis, however, they do not seem to have neglected the observation of astronomical phenomena (Brandis, l. c. p. 481).

Perfection seemed to have considered to exist in direct ratio to the distance from the central fire. Thus the moon was supposed to be inhabited by more perfect and beautiful beings than the earth (Plut. de Place. Philol. ii. 30; Stob. l. c. i. p. 562; Böckh, l. c. p. 131). Similarly imperfect virtue belongs to the region of the earth, perfect wisdom to the region of the heaven, the bond or symbol of connection again being certain numerical relations (comp. Arist. Met. i. 8; Alex. Aphrod. in Arist. Met. L. 7. fol. 14, n.). The light and heat of the central fire are received by us notwithstanding through the sun (which, according to Philebus, is of a glassy nature, acting as a kind of lens, or sieve, as he terms it, Böckh, l. c. p. 124; Stob. l. c. i. 26; Euseb. Praep. Evangel. xv. 23), and the other heavenly bodies. All things partake of life, which of Philebus distinguishes four grades, united in man and connected with successive parts of the body,—the life of mere sensual production, which is common to all things; vegetable life; animal life; and intellect or reason (Theod. Arilith. 4. p. 22; Böckh, p. 159.) It was only in reference to the principles, and not absolutely in point of time, that the universe is a production; the development of its existence, which was perhaps regarded as an intermitting process, commencing from the centre (Phil. ap. Stob. l. c. p. 369; Böckh, p. 90, &c.; Brandis, p. 463); for the universe is "imperishable and unwearied; it subsists for ever; from eternity did it exist and to eternity does it last, one, controlled by one akin to it, the mightiest and the highest." (Phil. ap. Stob. Eld. Philol. p. 418, &c.; Böckh, n. 164; Dei. Philol. p. 463; where also speaks of as one, eternal, abiding, unmoved, like himself (Böckh, p. 151). He is described as having established both limit and the infinite, and was often spoken of as the absolute unity; always represented as pervading, though distinct from, and presiding over the universe: not therefore a mere germ of vital development, or a principle of which the universe was itself a manifestation or development; sometimes termed the absolute good (Arist. Met. xii. 4. p. 1091, b. 13, Bekker), while, according to others, good could belong only to concrete existences (Met. xi. 7, p. 1073, b. 31). The origin of evil was to be looked for not in the deity, but in matter, which prevented the deity from conducting every thing to the best end (Theophr. Met. 9. p. 322, 14). With the popular superstition they do not seem to have interfered, except in so far as they may have reduced the objects of it, as well as all other existing beings, to numerical elements. (Plut. de Is. et Os. 10; Arist. Met. xiii. 5.) It is not clear whether the all-pervading soul of the universe, which they spoke of, was regarded as identical with the Deity or not (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 11). It was perhaps nothing more than the ever-working energy of the Deity (Stob. p. 422; Brandis, p. 497, note n.). It was from it that human souls were derived (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 11, de Sens. 21). The soul was also frequently described as a number or harmony (Plut. de Place. iv. 2; Stob. Eld. Philol. p. 862; Arist. de An. i. 2, 4); hardly, however, in the same sense as that unfolded by Simmias, who had heard Philebus, in the Phaedo of Plato (p. 85, &c.), with which the doctrine of metempsychosis would have been totally inconsistent. Some held the curious idea, that the particles floating as motes in the sunbeams were souls (Arist. de An. i. 2). In so far as the soul was a principle of life, it was supposed to partake of the nature of the central fire (Diog. Laërt. viii. 27, &c.). There is, however, some want of uniformity in separating or identifying the soul and the principle of life, as also in the division of the faculties of the soul itself. Philebus distinguished soul (φῶς) from spirit or reason (νόος, Theod. Arilith. p. 22; Böckh, p. 149; Diog. Laërt. viii. 30, where φῶς is the term applied to that which distinguishes men from animals, νόος and ζωής residing in the latter likewise). The division of the soul into two elements, a rational and an irrational one (Cic. Tuscul. iv. 5), comes to much the same point. Even animals, however, have, for the sake of reason, only the defective organisation of their body, and their want of language, prevents its development (Plut. de Place. v. 20). The Pythagoreans connected the five senses with their five elements (Theod. Arilith. p. 27; Stob. l. c. p. 1104). In the senses the soul found the necessary instruments for its activity; though the certainty of knowledge was derived exclusively from number and its relations. (Stob. p. 8; Sext. Emp. adv. Math. vii. 92.)

The ethics of the Pythagoreans consisted more in ascetic practice, and maxims for the restraint of the passions, especially of anger, and the cultivation of the power of endurance, than in scientific theory. What of the latter they had was, as might be expected, intimately connected with their number-theory (Arist. Eth. Magn. i. 1, Eth. Nic. i. 4, ii. 5). The contemplation of what belonged to the pure and elevated region termed κόσμος, was second to the preceding. On the other hand, they were to have nothing to do with the inferior, subhuman region (Philol. ap. Stob. Eld. Philol. pp. 490, 498). Happiness consisted in the science of the perfection of the virtues of the soul, or in the perfect science of numbers (Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. p. 417; Theodor. Serm. xi. p. 165). Likeness to the Deity was to be the object of all our endeavours (Stob. Eld. Eth. p. 64), man becoming better as he approaches the gods, who are the guardians and guides of men (Plut. de Def. Or. p. 413; Plut. Phaed. p. 62, with Heindorf's note), exercising a direct influence upon them, guiding the mind or reason, as well as influencing external circumstances (γενεσθαι γὰρ ἐπιπέδω σε ὁπλα τοῦ διαμαντόν.
PYTHAGORAS.

Stob. Ecl. Phys. p. 206; ὅστε καὶ διδοταῖον τῆς καὶ πάντων οὐκ ἐν ὃιν ἦσαν, Arist. Eth. End. i. i. 6; man’s soul being a possession of the gods, confined at present, by way of chastisement, in the body, as a species of prison, from which he has no right to free himself by suicide (Plat. Phaed. p. 61; Cic. de Sen. 20). With the idea of divine influence was closely connected that of the influences of daemons and heroes (Diog. Laërt. viii. 32).

Great importance was attached to the influence of music in controlling the force of the passions (Plut. de Is. et Os. p. 334; Porph. Vit. Pyth. 30; Iamb. 64). Self-examination was strongly insisted on (Cic. de Sen. 11). Virtue was regarded as a kind of harmony or health of the soul (Diog. Laërt. viii. 33). Precepts for the practice of virtue were expressed in various obscure, symbolical forms, many of which, though with the admixture of much that is of later origin, have come down to us in the so-called Ἔστιν χρώνα and elsewhere (Brandi, l. c. p. 493, note 9).

The transmission of souls was viewed apparently in the light of a process of purification. Souls under the dominion of sensuality either passed into the bodies of animals, or, if incurable, were thrust down into Tartarus, to meet with expiation, or condign punishment. The pure were exalted to higher modes of life, and at last attained to incorporeal existence (Arist. de An. i. 2, 3; Herod. ii. 123; Diog. Laërt. vii. 31; Lobeck, Aepplag. p. 893).

What we find in Plato, Phaedr. p. 246, b., and in Pindar, Thren. fr. 4, Olymp. ii. 68, is probably in the main Pythagorean.

As regards the fruits of this system of training or belief, it is interesting to remark, that wherever we have notices of distinguished Pythagoreans, we usually hear of them as men of great uprightness, conscientiousness, and self-restraint, and as capable of devoted and enduring friendship. [See Archytas; Clinias; Damon; Phintias.]

For some account of the very extensive literature connected with Pythagoras, &c., the reader is referred to Fabric. Bibl. Græc, vol. i. pp. 750—804. The best of the modern authorities have been already repeatedly referred to.

Besides a Samian pupil of the name of Pythagoras, who gained a victory in Ol. 48, and who has been frequently identified with the philosopher, Fabricius (l. c. p. 776, &c.) enumerates about twenty more individuals of the same name, who are, however, not worth inserting. [C. P. M.]

PYTHAGORAS (Πυθαγώρας), artists. i. Of Rhegium, one of the most celebrated statuaries of Greece. Pausanias, who calls him "excellent in the plastic art, if any other was so," gives the following as his artistic genealogy (vi. 4. § 2, s. 4)—

Sydras and Charatas of Sparta.

Eucheirus of Corinth.

Clearchus of Rhegium.

Pythagoras of Rhegium.

His precise date is difficult to fix. In Pliny's list he is placed at Ol. 87 (n. c. 432) with Ageladas, Callon, Polycleitus, Myron, Scopas, and others. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19.) How little dependence is to be placed on Pliny's chronological groups of artists, we have had occasion more than once to notice, and the very names now mentioned furnish a sufficient proof. It is indeed possible, as Sillig proposes, to apply the statement of Pliny to Pythagoras of Samos; but, as Pliny does not say which of the two artists he refers to, it is natural to suppose that he means the more distinguished one.

We are inclined to believe that Pliny's reason for placing Pythagoras at this date was the circumstance which he refers to, i.e., his mention (l. c. § 4), that Pythagoras was in part contemporary with Myron, whose true date was Ol. 87. The genealogy quoted above from Pausanias affords us no assistance, as the dates of the other artists in it depend on that of Pythagoras.

Most of the modern writers on ancient art attempt to determine the date of Pythagoras by his statues of Olympic victors. This test is, however, not a certain one; for there are several instances of such statues not having been made until a considerable time after the victory. Still, at a period when art was flourishing, and when the making of these statues formed one of its most important branches, the presumption is that an Olympic victor would not be allowed to remain long without the honour of a statue; and therefore the date of the victory may be taken as a guide to that of the artist, where there is no decisive evidence to the contrary. Now, in the case of Pythagoras, one of his most celebrated works was the statue of the Olympic victor Astylus of Croton, who conquered in the single and double foot-race in three successive Olympiads, and on the last two of these occasions he caused himself to be proclaimed as a Synnusian, in order to gratify Hiero. (Paus. vi. 13. § 1.) Now, supposing (as is natural) that this was during the time that Hiero was king (n. c. 478—467, Ol. 75, 3—78. 2), the last victory of Astylus must have been either in Ol. 77, or Ol. 78; or, even if we admit that Hiero was not yet king, and place the last victory of Astylus in Ol. 75 (Müller, Dorier, Chron. tab.), the earliest date at which we should be compelled to place Pythagoras would be about n. c. 460, and, comparing this with Pliny's date, we should have n. c. 460—430 as the time during which he flourished. This result agrees very well with the indications furnished by his other statues of Olympic victors, by his contests with Myron, and by the statements respecting the character of his art.

According to Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 47), Pythagoras was the first who paid special attention to order and proportion in art; and Pliny states that he was the first who expressed with care and accuracy the muscles and veins and hair (Plin. l. c. §§ 4). Hence it would seem that he was the chief representative of that school of improved development in statuary, which preceded the schools of perfect art which were established at Athens and at Argos respectively by Phidias and Polycleitus; and that, while Ageladas was preparing the way for this perfection of art in Greece Proper, another school was growing up in Magna Graecia, which claimed to its highest fame in Pythagoras; who, in his statues of athletes, practised those very principles of art, as applied to the human figure, which Polycleitus brought to perfection; and who lived long enough to gain a victory over one of the most celebrated masters of the new Attic school, namely Myron.

The most important works of Pythagoras, as has just been intimated, appear to have been his statues of athletes. Unfortunately, the passage in which Pliny describes his works is extremely corrupt, but it can be pretty well corrected by the help of Pausanias. (Respecting the correction of the text, see Siligh, "Cat. Art. s. e., and edition of Pliny, with Janus's supplement; and Thiersch, "Epochen, pp. 216, 217.

Besides the statue of Astylus already mentioned, and the panegyrist at Delphi by which he gained his victory over Myron, he also made the statues of Leontiscus of Messana, an Olympic victor in wrestling (Paus. vi. 4. § 2), of Protolos of Mantinea (vi. 6. § 1), of Euthymus, a very beautiful work of art (ib. § 2. 6), of Dromens of Smythias (vi. 7. § 3. s. 10), of Museus of Cyrene, who was known by the sur-noun "Sibi," a statue of his son and brother Pythorgo was represented in a chariot, with a Victory by his side (vi. 13. § 4. s. 7, 18. § 1).

His other works, mentioned by Pliny, are, a naked figure carrying apples, perhaps Hercules with the golden apples of the Hesperides; a lame figure, at Syracuse, called "Caeliciana," the "pain of whose wound even the spectator seems to feel," a description which almost certainly indicates a Philoctetes; two statues of Apollo, the one slaying the serpent Python with his arrows, the other playing the harp, of which two statues the latter was known by the surname of "Dioscurus," from a story that, when Thesen was taken by Alexander, a fugitive hid his money in the bosom of the statue, and found it afterwards in safety. There are still other works of Pythagoras, mentioned by other authors, namely, a winged Perses (Dion Chrysost. Orat. 37, vol. ii. p. 106, ed. Reiske); Europa sitting on the bull (Tation, "De Graec. 53, p. 116, ed. Worth; Varr, vii. 7. § 3); Achilles and Polyneices dying by their mutual fratricide (ibid. 54, p. 118); and a statue of Dionysus, mentioned in an epigram by Proclus, in which, though the name of Pythagoras does not occur, we can hardly be wrong in apply-

There are still extant various medals, gems, and bas-reliefs, on which there is a figure of Philoctetes, which some antiquaries believe to be after the type of the statue by Pythagoras, but the matter is quite uncertain.

Pliny tells us that Pythagoras had for a pupil his sister's son, Sostratros (L. c. § 5).

2. Of Samos, a statuary, whom Pliny (L. c. § 5) expressly distinguishes from the former; to whom, however, he says, the Samian bore a remarkable personal likeness. He was at first a painter, and was celebrated as the maker of seven naked statues, and one of an old man, which, in Pliny's time, stood near the temple of Fortune, which Catulus had erected out of the spoils of the Cimbri. (This is the meaning of Pliny's expression, "hujusce die.") There is no indication of his date, unless we were to accept the opinion of Siligh, already noticed, that Pliny's date of Ol. 87 ought to be referred to this artist rather than to Pythagoras of Rhegium.

PYTHAEUS (Πυθαγελύς), an Athenian tragic poet at the close of the fifth century B. C., who is only known by one passage in Aristophanes ("Ist. 87"). It is, however, quite enough to show the sort of estimation in which he was held. Aristophanes places him at the very foot of the anti-climax of tragedians who were still living, and the question of Hecules, whether he is likely to supply the void left by the death of Euripides, does not even obtain an answer, except by a jest of Xanthias. [P. S.]

PYTHEAS (Πυθέας), historical. 1. The son of Lampoon, of Aegina, was a conqueror in the Nemean games, and his victory is celebrated in one of Pindar's odes ("Nem. v.") He is in all probability the same as the Pytheas who distinguished himself in the Persian wars [No. 2], since we know that he was the father of the name of Lampoon.

2. Or Pytheus, the son of Ischenus, of Aegina, was in one of the three Greek guard-ships stationed off the island of Scilthus, which were taken by the Persians shortly before the battle of Ther-omancy; his epithet "Euthymus," which was evidently given by the Persians, was, perhaps, a reminiscence of his bravery in the engagement, and was in consequence treated by the Persians with distinguished honour. At the battle of Salamis the Sidonian ship, in which he was kept as a prisoner, was taken by an Aeginetan vessel, and he thus recovered his liberty. Lampoon, the son of this Pytheus, was present at the battle of Plataea, and urged Pausanias, after the engagement, to avenge the death of Leonidas by insulting and mutilating the corpse of Mardonius. (Herod. vii. 181, viii. 92, ix. 78; Paus. iii. 4. § 10.)

3. Or Pytheus, of Abdera, the father of Nymphophorus. (Herod. vii. 137.) [NYPHOPHORUS.]

4. An Athenian orator, distinguished by his uncompelling animosity against Demosthenes. He was self-educated, and, on account of the harshness and ineligance of his style, was not reckoned among the Attic orators by the grammarians. (Snidas, s. v.; "Syrian, ed Hermg. 16; comp. Phil. Phil. 21.) His private character appeared liberal, and he had no political principles, but changed sides as often as suited his convenience or his interest. He made no pretensions to honesty. On being reproached on one occasion as a rascal, he frankly admitted the charge, but urged that he had been so for a shorter time than any of his contemporaries who took part in public affairs. (Aelian, "V. H. xiv. 28.") Snidas relates (s. v.) that having been imprisoned on account of a debt, probably a fine incurred in a law-suit ("δια δρα̂ματος"), he made his escape from prison and fled to Macedonia, and that after remaining there for a time, he returned to Athens. The statement that he was unable to pay his debts is confirmed by the account of the author of the Letters which go under the name of Demothesthenes ("Ep. 3. p. 1481, ed. Reiske"), where it is related that Pytheas had acquired such a large fortune by dishonest means that he could at that time pay five talents with more ease than five drachmae formerly. We learn from the same authority that he obtained the highest honours at Athens, and was in particular entrusted with the distinguished duty of offering the sacrifices at Delphi for the Athenians. He was accused by Deinarchus of "εὐκλοσ" (Dionys. Deinar. ed Harpocrat. s. v. διαφαν σφραξ; Steph. Byz. s. v. Αφρωιομ), probably on account of his long residence at Macedonia. Of the part that he took in political affairs only two or three facts are recorded. He opposed the honours which the Athewar, b. c. 322, he joined Antipater (Plut. Dem. 27), and had thus the satisfaction of surviving his great enemy Demostenes. His hostility to Demostenes is frequently mentioned by the ancient writers, who have preserved many of his jests against the great orator. He is said to have been the author of the well-known saying, that the orations of Demostenes smelt of the lamp. (Aelian, V. H. vii. 7; Plat. Dem. 8; comp. Athen. ii. p. 44, f.) The titles of two of the orations of Pytheas are preserved by Harpocration, Πρὸς τὴν ἐνδείξιν ἔπολογία (ἐν ἑ. ἐγγραφ.ι.; and Κατ’ ἈθέαμΙωτα (ἐν ἑ. δεξθερία). Two short extracts from his orations are given in Latin by Rutillus Lupus (i. 11, 14). (Comp. Ruhnken, ad Rutil. Lup. i. 11; Westermann, Geschichte der Grich. Beredsamkeit, § 84.)

5. Boeotarch of Thebes, was, next to Criotianus, the chief instigator of the Achaenians to undertake the fatal war against the Romans, which destroyed for ever the liberties of Greece. He was put to death by Metellus at the beginning of b. c. 146. (Polyb. xi. 3, ii. 2; Paus. viii. 14, &c.)

PYTHEAS (Πυθέας), of Massilia, in Gaul, a celebrated Greek navigator, who sailed to the western and northern parts of Europe, and wrote a work containing the results of his discoveries. We know nothing of his personal history, with the exception of the statement of Polybius that he was a poor man (ap. Strab. ii. p. 104). The time at which he lived cannot be determined with accuracy. Bougainville (Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscr. vol. xix. p. 143) maintained that he lived before Aristotle, but the passage on which he relied (Arist, Met. ii. 5) is not sufficient to warrant this conclusion. Vossius (de Historiae Graeciae, p. 123, ed. Westermann) places him in the time of Ptolemy Philadeph, but this is certainly too late a date. As he is quoted by Dicaearchus, a pupil of Aristotle (Strab. ii. p. 104) and by Timaeus (Plin. N. H. xxxvii. 11), he probably lived in the time of Alexander the Great, or shortly afterwards.

The works of Pytheas are frequently referred to by the ancient writers. One appears to have borne the title Περὶ τοῦ Ἑκατον (ἐν τούτῳ τοῦ Ἑκατον, Geminus, Elem. Astron, in Ptoam. Uraol. p. 22), and the other to have been called Ἐπιστάμονος (Marcianus, in Geogr. Min. vol. i. p. 63, ed. Husdon), or as it is termed by the Schooliast on Apollonius Rhodius (iv. 761), Ἐπιστάμονος. That he gave an account of the north-western coasts of Europe is evident from Strabo, who refers to his statements respecting Iberia, Gaul, and other countries (Strab. i. p. 64, ii. p. 75, iii. p. 138, iv. p. 195). It would appear from Pytheas' own statement, as related by Polybius (ap. Strab. ii. p. 104), that he undertook two voyages, one in which he visited Britain and Thule, and of which he probably gave an account in his work On the Ocean; and a second, undertaken after his return from his first voyage, in which he coasted along the whole of Europe from Gadeira (Cadiz) to the Tannais, and the description of which probably formed the subject of his Periplus. Some modern writers, however, maintain that the passage in Strabo may be interpreted to mean that Pytheas undertook only one voyage; but we think that the words are scarcely susceptible of such an interpretation.

The following are the principal particulars which ancient writers have preserved from the works of Pytheas.

1. He related that at the extreme west of the inhabited world was a promontory of the Ostitanumii, called Cablibon, and that islands lay to the west of it, the furthest of which named Uxismara was a three days' sail (Strab. i. p. 64). Strabo treats all this as the pure invention of Pytheas. 2. He further related that he visited Britain, and travelled over the whole of the island as far as it was accessible; and he said that it was 40,000 stadia in circumference. As to Thule and those distant parts he stated that there was neither land, sea, nor air, but a sort of mixture of all these, like to the mollusca, in which the earth and the sea and every thing else are suspended, and which could not be penetrated either by land or by sea. The substance like the mollusca Pytheas had seen himself, but the other part of the account he gave from hearsay (Polyb. ap. Strab. ii. p. 104). Pytheas made Thule a six days' sail from Britain; he said that the day and the night were each six months long in Thule (Strab. i. p. 63; Plin. N. H. ii. 77). 3. He spoke of a people called Guttones, bordering upon Germany, and dwelling upon the south-east of the sea called Menitum, in a space of 6000 stadia. He added that at the distance of a day's sail there was an island named Abalos, to which amber was brought by the waves in spring; that the inhabitants used it instead of firewood, and sold it to the neighbouring Teutoni. Timaeus gave credit to this account, but called the island Basilia. (Plin. N. H. xxxvii. 11.)

The credibility of the statements of Pytheas was differently estimated by the ancient writers. Eratosthenes and Hipparchus refer to them as worthy of belief; but other writers, especially Polybius and Strabo, regard them as of no value at all. Polybius says that it is incredible that a private man, and one who was also poor, could have undertaken such long voyages and journeys (ap. Strab. ii. p. 104); and Strabo, on more than one occasion, calls him a great liar, and regards his statements as mere fables, only deserving to be classed with those of Enhymenes and Antiphanes. (Strab. i. p. 63, ii. p. 102, iii. pp. 148, 157, 158.) Most modern writers, however, have been disposed to set more value upon the narrative of Pytheas. In reply to the objection of Polybius it has been urged that he may have been sent on a voyage of discovery by the Massilians, at the public expense, in order to become acquainted with the country from which the Carthaginians procured amber. There seems no reason to doubt that he did go on a voyage to the northern parts of Europe; but the reasons for his undertaking it must be left in uncertainty. It would appear from the extracts which have been preserved from his works, that he did not give simply the results of his own observations, but added all the reports which reached him respecting the different countries, without either drawing a distinction between what he saw himself and what was told him by others. His statements, therefore, must be received with caution and some mistrust. It is equally uncertain how far he penetrated. Some modern writers have regarded it as certain that he must have reached Iceland in consequence of his remark that the day was six months long at Thule, while others have supposed that he advanced as far as the Shetland Islands. But either supposition is very improbable, and neither is necessary; for reports of the great length of the day and night in the northern parts of Europe had already reached the Greeks before the time of Pytheas. There has been like-
PYTHEAS.

PYTHEAS, a Corinthian general, who commanded the detachment of ships sent with Gyippus for the relief of Syracuse. His name occurs now and then in the account of the operations which followed. (Tusc. vi. 104, vii. 1, 70.)

PYTHIUS.

PYTHIUS (Πύθηος), a Corinthian general, who commanded the detachment of ships sent with Gyippus for the relief of Syracuse. His name occurs now and then in the account of the operations which followed. (Tusc. vi. 104, vii. 1, 70.)

PYTHEUS.

PYTHEUS, architect. (PHILEUS.)

PYTHIAS (Πυθίας). 1. The sister or adopted daughter of Hermes, became the wife of Aristotle. (ARISTOTELES, p. 318.)

2. Daughter of Aristotle and Pythias. She was married three times: her first husband being Niccanor of Stagnus, a relative of Aristotle; her second Procles, a descendant of Demaratus, king of Sparta; and her third Metrodorus, the physician (Sext. Emp. adv. Math. i. 12, p. 657, ed. Bekker).

PYTHIONICE. [HARPALUS, No. 1.]

PYTHIS, a sculptor, who made the marble quadriga, by which the celebrated Mausoleum was surmounted. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 6. s. 19,) according to the common reading, as one of the statuaries who flourished about the time of the revival of the art. The MSS. vary much as to the form of the name; and, taking also into account the very loose way in which some of these names are inserted by Pliny (comp. POLYCRUS), it is by no means impossible that he may be one and the same person with the silversger Pythias. (See Siliig, edition of Pliny, ad loc.)

PYTHIUS (Πύθεος), the Pythian, from Pytho, the ancient name of Delphi, often occurs as a surname of Apollo, whose oracle was at Delphi. (Hom. Hymn. in Apoll. 373; Aeschyl. Agam. 521; Hornt. Carm. i. 18; Tac. Hist. iv. 83.) [L. S.]

PYTHIUS (Πύθεος): called Πύθηος by Plutarch, vol. ii. p. 262, d, and some others), a Lydian, the son of Atys, who lived in the time of the Persian invasion of Greece. He was a man of enormous wealth, which he derived from his gold mines in the neighbourhood of Celaenae in Phrygia, of which place he seems to have made himself governor. So eagerly did he prosecute his search for gold, that his subjects were almost all withdrawn from agriculture. Plutarch (c.) tells an amusing story of the device adopted by his wife to point out to him the absurdity of the course he was pursuing. She had a quantity of gold wrought into representations of various kinds of food, and set nothing but these before him one day for dinner.

When Xerxes arrived at Celaenae, Pythius

wise much dispute as to what river we are to understand by the Tanais. Without stating the various opinions which have been advanced, we may remark that the supposition of Ukert appears to us the most probable, namely, that the country which Pytheas describes as the one from which amber came may have been the Cimbrian peninsula (Denmark, &c.), and that when he reached the Elbe, he concluded that he had arrived at the Tanais, which separated Europe from Asia.

Pytheas cultivated science. He appears to have been the first person who determined the latitude of a place from the shadow of the sun; and it is expressly stated that he determined the position of a place by observing the shadow of the sun by the gnomon (Strab. ii. pp. 71, 115). He also paid considerable attention to the phenomena of the tides, and was well aware of the influence of the moon upon them. (Fuhr, De Pythea, p. 19.)

The voyages of Pytheas have been discussed by a large number of modern writers: we can only refer to the most important works on the subject: — Bougainville, Sur l’Origine et sur les Voyages de Pytheas, in Mem. de l’Acad. des Insér. vol. xix. pp. 146—165; D’Anville, Sur la Navigation de Pytheas à Thule, ibid. vol. xxxvi. pp. 435—442; Ukert, Bemerkungen über Pytheas, in his Geographie der Griechen und Römer, vol. i. part i, pp. 298—309; Arvedson, Pytheae Massiliensis Fragmenta, Upsalae, 1824; Fuhr, De Pythea Massiliensi, Darmstadt, 1835; Slessrewicck, Pytheas de Marseille et la Geographie de son Temps, Paris, 1836, translated into German by Hoffmann, Leipzig, 1839.

PYTHEAS, artists. 1. A silver-chaser, who flourished at Rome in the age immediately following that of Pompey, and whose productions commanded a remarkably high price. (Plin. H. N. xxxii. 12. s. 55; Pliny states the precise value of every two ounces of silver plate engraved by him, but the number is differently given in the MSS. as 10,000 or 20,000 sterceres, see Siliig’s edition.) A very celebrated work by him was a cup, on which Ulysses and Diomedes were represented carrying off the Palladium, in that sort of chasing which was called emblema. According to the opinion of Thiersch, the greatest gem engravers of that and the succeeding age did not disdain to copy from the design of Pytheas, whose figure of Diomed is still to be seen on gems by Diocrichites, Gaecus, Calpurnius Severus, and Solon: the grounds of this opinion, however, are not stated by the author. (Thiersch, Epochen, pp. 286—292.)

The suggestion of Meyer appears more probable, that the designs of both the vase of Pytheas and the gems referred to were copied from some more ancient work of art. (Meyer, Gesch. d. bild. Kunst, vol. iii. pp. 172, 173; comp. Levezow, Über den Rautb des Palladium.)

Pytheas also chased small drinking vessels with grotesque subjects, of the most elaborate and delicate workmanship, which are thus described by Pliny: — Feci idem et cocos majesticeps appellatos, parcella potoria, sed o quilus no exemplaria quidem licet exprimere, tam opportunae injuriae subdilus erat.

2. A painter, of Burn in Achaea, whose painting on a wall at Pergamus, representing an elephant, is mentioned by Stephanus Byzantinus (v. Boepr.)
PYTHODAMUS.

banqueted him and his whole army. He had previously sent a golden plane tree and vine as a present to Dareius. He informed Xerxes that, intending to offer him a quantity of money to defray the expenses of his expedition, he had reckoned up his wealth and found it to consist of 2000 talents of silver coin and 4,000,000, all but 7000, darics of gold coin. The whole of this he offered to Xerxes, who however did not accept it; but made him a present of the odd 7000 darics, and granted him the rights of hospitality. His five sons accompanied Xerxes, Pythius, alarmed by an eclipse of the sun which happened, came to Xerxes, and begged that the eldest might be left behind. This request so enraged the king that he had the young man immediately killed and cut in two, and the two portions of his body placed on either side of the road, and then ordered the army to march between them. His other sons perished in different battles. Pythius, overwhelmed with grief, passed the rest of his days in solitude (Herod. vii. 27—29, 39, 39; Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 19; Plut. l.c.)

PYTHOCHLUS, architect. [PHIL.]

PYTHOCLIDES (Πυθοκλῆς), a celebrated musician of the time of Pericles, was a native of Ceos (Plut. Protag. 316, e.), and flourished under Athens, under the patronage of Pericles, whom he instructed in his art. (Plut. Per. 4; Pseudo-Plat. Acib. i. p. 118, c.) The Scholiast on the passage last cited states that Pythoclides was also a Pythagorean philosopher, and that Agathocles was his disciple. Pythoclides was one of those musicians to whom some writers ascribed the invention of the Mixolydian mode of music. (Plut. de Mus. 16, p. 1136, d.)

PYTHOCLES, a statuary, of whom nothing is known, beyond the mention of his name by Pliny among those artists whom he places at the revival of the art in Ol. 156, and whom he characterizes as longe guidem infra praeceditos, probati tamen. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. 19.)

PYTHOCRITUS (Πυθόκριτος), of Sicyon, a flute-player, exceedingly distinguished for his victories in the musical contests which were instituted by the Amphiictyon at the Pythian games (b. c. 590). Pausanias tells us that the first victor in these contests was the Argive Saucadas, after whom Pythocritus carried off the prize at six Pythian festivals in succession, and that he had also the honour of acting six times as musician during the pentathlon at Olympia. In reward of these services a pillar was erected as a monument to him at Olympia, with the following inscription, Πυθοκρίτου τοῦ Καλλικρίτου μνημία ταύλητα τόδε. (Paus. vi. 14. § 4. s. 9, 10.)

PYTHOCRITUS, a statuary, who is mentioned by Pliny as one of those who made athletas et armarios et venatores sacrificialtes, but of whom nothing more is known. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 34.)

PYTHODAMUS, a medallist, whose name occurs on a coin of Aptera in Crete. (Nagler, Allg. Künstler-Lexicon, s. v.)

PYTHODICTUS, one of the statuaries, who are mentioned by Pliny as equalitate celebrati sed nullis operum suaum praecipui. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 32.)

PYTHODO'RIS (Πυθόδωρις), queen of Pontus. She was the daughter of Pythodorus of Tralles, the friend of Pompey; and became the wife of Polemon I. king of Pontus, and the Bosporus. After the death of Polemon she retained possession of Colchis as well as of Pontus itself, though the kingdom of Bosporos was wrested from her power. She subsequently married Archeclus, king of Cappadocia, but after his death (A. D. 17) returned to her own kingdom, of which she continued to administer the affairs herself until her decease, which probably did not take place until A. D. 38. She is said by her contemporary Strabo to have been a woman of virtuous character, and of great capacity for business, so that her dominions flourished much under her rule. Of her two sons, the one, Zenon, became king of Armenia, while the other, Polemon II. after assisting her in the administration of her kingdom during her life, succeeded her on the throne of Pontus. (Strab. xi. p. 499, xiii. pp. 555, 556, 557, 560, v. xiv. p. 649; Eckehl, vol. ii. p. 370.)

PYTHOD'US, artists. 1. A Thban sculptor, of the archaic period, who made the statue of Hera (δανία ὀμαγία) in her temple at Coronae. The goddess was represented as holding the Sirens in her hand. (Paus. ix. 34. § 2. 3; comp. Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 352, n. 4.)

2, 3. Two sculptors, who flourished under the early Roman emperors, and are mentioned by Pliny among those who "filled the palace of the Caesars on the Palatine with most approved works." (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 5. § 4. 11; comp. Thiersch, Στοιχεία, pp. 330, 325, foll.)

PYTHION (Πηθών), historical. Concerning the frequent confusion between this name and those of Peithon and Pithon, see PITHON.

1. Son of Agenor. [PITHON.]

2. Son of Cratenus. [PITHON.]

3. One of the leading citizens of Abdera, who betrayed that city into the hands of Eumenes II., king of Pergamus; an act of treachery which afterwards caused him so much remorse, as to be the occasion of his death. (Diod. xxx. Exc. Vales. p. 578.)

4. The chief of the embassy sent by Prusias, king of Bithynia, to Rome, in b. c. 164, to lay before the senate his complaints against Eumenes, king of Pergamus. (Polyb. xxxi. 6.)

5. A citizen of Enna, in Sicily, who was put to death by Enus (whose master he had been), in the great servile insurrection in b. c. 130. [EUNUS.] (Diod. Exc. Phot. p. 528.)

PYTHION (Πηθών), literary. 1. Of Catana, a dramatic poet of the time of Alexander, whom he accompanied into Asia, and whose army he entertained with a satyrical drama, when they were celebrating the Dionysia on the banks of the Hy-QUADRATUS.
daspes. The drama was in ridicule of Harpalus and the Athenians. It is twice mentioned by Athenaeus, who has preserved nearly twenty lines of it. (Ath. xiii. p. 586 d., e. p. 582, e. f. p. 592, n.) In the second of these passages, Athenaeus mentions the poet as either of Catana or of Byzantium; and it seems very doubtful whether he was con- founded with the Byzantine rhetorician of the same name, who makes some figure in the history of Philip and Alexander, or whether he was really the same person. Some writers ascribed the drama to Alexander, but no doubt erroneously. Respecting the meaning of the title of the play, Ἀγαθή, there are various conjectures, all of them very uncertain. (Casab. de Poes. Sat. Gracce. pp. 150, 151, with Rambach's Note; Fabric. Bibl. Gracce. vol. ii. pp. 319, 320; Wagner, F. G., Poetarum Trag. Graec. Fragmenta. pp. 134—136, in Didot's Edit. Script. Graec. Paris, 1846.)

2. Of Aenus, in Thrace, a Peripatetic philosopher, who, with his brother Hermocleides, put to death the tyrant Cotys. [COTTYS, HERACLEIDES.]

3. A Peripatetic philosopher, mentioned in the will of Lycon. (Diog. Laert. v. 70.) [P. S.]

PYTHON, artist. This name occurs twice on painted vases; in the first instance, on a cylis-kshaped vase, of the best style of the art, found at Vulci, with the inscription ΠΥΘΩΝ ΕΦΟΙΣΕΝ, and with the name of Epictetus as the painter; in the other case, on a Lucanian vase, of the period of the decline of the art, with the inscription ΠΥΘΩΝ ΕΦΩΑΦΕ. On comparing these vases, and the inscriptions on them, although there are examples of the same person being both a maker and painter of vases, it can hardly be doubted that, in this case, the artists were two different persons, at different periods, and probably living in different parts of Italy. (B. Richelet, Lettres à M. Schorn. pp. 58, 59, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

PYTHONICUS (Πθωνίκους), of Athens, a writer mentioned by Athenaeus (v. p. 220, f.) among those who wrote systematically on allu-mements to love. [W. M. G.]

Q.

QUADRATILLA, UMMIDIA, a wealthy Roman lady, who died in the reign of Trajan within a little of eighty years of age, leaving two-thirds (ex esse) of her fortune to her grandson and the other third to her granddaughter (Plin. Ep. vii. 24). Her grandson was an intimate friend of Pliny. [QUADRATUS, No. 2.] Quadratilla was probably a sister of Ummidius Quadratus, the governor of Syria, who died in A. D. 60, and appears to be the same as the Quadratilla mentioned in the following inscription, discovered at Casinum in Campania:— Ummidia C. F. Quadratilla amphitheatrum et templum Casinatibus sua pecunia fecit. (Orelli, Inscr. No. 751.) It seems that the Ummidii came originally from Casinum. [Ummi-dia GENS.]

QUADRATUS (Καθαρός, Euseb. H. E., Syncellus, and the Greek Menaon; or Kouaθαρος, Euseb. Chron. p. 211, ed. Scaliger, 1681), one of the Apostolic Fathers and an early apologist for the Christian religion. The name of Quadratus occurs repeatedly in Eusebius (H. E. iii. 37, iv. 3, 23, v. 17. Chron. lib. ii.), but it is questioned whether that father speaks of one person or of two. Valesius, and others (including Tillemont) after him, contend for the existence of two Quadrati, one the disciple of the Apostles and the Apologist, the other, bishop of Athens and contemporary with Dionysius of Corinth [Dionysius, literary, No. 22], who was of somewhat later date than the Apologist. But Jerome, among the ancients, and Cave, Grabe, Le Clerc, and Fabricius, among the moderns, offer the different notices, and we think correctly, one person.

Quadratus is said by Eusebius (Chron. l. c.), Jerome (De Viris Illustr. c. 19, and Ad Magnum, c. 4, Epistol. 84, edit. vet., 83, ed. Bene-dictin., 70, ed. Vallars.), and Orosius (Hist. viii. 13) to have been a hearer or disciple of the Apostles, an expression which Cave would limit by referring the term "Apostles" to the Apostle John alone, or by understanding it of men of the apostolic age, who had been familiar with the Apostles. But we see no reason for so limiting or explaining the term. Quadratus himself, in his Apology (apud Euseb. H. E. iv. 3), speaks of those who had been cured or raised from the dead by Jesus Christ, as having lived to his own days (εἰς τοὺς μνεῖον χρόνους, "ad tempora nostrae"), thus carrying back his own recollections to the apostolic age. And as Eusebius, in a passage in which he ascribes to him the gift of prophecy, seems to connect him with the daughters of the Apostle Philip, we may rather suppose him to have been a disciple of that Apostle than of John. Cave con-jectures that he was an Athenian by birth; but the manner in which an anonymous writer cited by Eusebius (H. E. v. 17) mentions him, in connection with Ammian of Philadelphia and with the daughters of Philip, would lead us to place him in early life in the central districts of Asia Minor.

He afterwards (assuming that Eusebius speaks of one Quadratus, not two, as bishop of the Church at Athens, but at what time we have no means of ascertaining. We learn that he succeeded the martyr Publius; but, as the time of Publius' martyrdom is unknown, that circumstance throws no light on the chronology of his life. Quadratus presented his Apology to Hadrian, in the tenth year of his reign (A. D. 126), according to the Chronicon of Eusebius, but we know not whether he had yet attained the episcopate. As Eusebius does not give him in this place the title of bishop, the probable inference is that he had not; but, as the passage seems to intimate that he and the Athenian Aristides presented their respective Apologies simultaneously, it is likely that Quadratus was already connected with the Athenian Church. The Menaon of the Greeks (a. d. Sept. 21) commemorate the martyrdom under the emperor Hadrian of the "ancient and learned" Quadratus, who had preached the gospel of Magnesia and Athens, and being driven away from his faith, had obtained at length the martyr's crown; and the Monologium of the emperor Basil commemorates (a. d. 21 Sept.) the martyrdom of a Quadratus, bishop of Magnesia, in the persecution under Decius. That our Quadratus was a martyr is, we think, from the silence of Eusebius and Jerome to such a circumstance, very questionable; and that he was martyred under Hadrian, is inconsistent with the statement of those writers (Euseb. Chron. ; Hieronym., Ad Magnus, c. 4), that the Apologies of Quadrat-us and Aristeides led that emperor to put a stop to the persecution. We think it not an improbable QUADRATUS.

The Apology of Quadratus is described by Euseb. as generally read in his time, and as affording clear evidence of the soundness of the writer's judgment and the orthodoxy of his belief. It has been long lost, with the exception of a brief fragment preserved by Euseb. (H. E. iv. 3), and given by Grabe, in his Spieilegion SS. Petrum, Sac. ii. p. 125; by Galland, in the first volume of his Bibliotheca Patrum; and by Routh, in his Reliquiae Sacrae, vol. i. p. 73. (Cave, Hist. litt. ad ann. 108, vol. i. p. 52; Tillenmont, Mémoires, vol. ii. pp. 232, &c., 588, &c.; Grabe, l. c.; Galland, Bibl. Patrum, vol. i. Proleg. c. 13; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 154; Lardner, Credib. part ii. book i. c. 28, § 1.)

[ J.C.M.]

QUADRATUS, C. ANTIUS AULIUS JULIUS, consul a. d. 105, with Tit. Julius Candidus, in the reign of Trajan (Fasti). Spartanius (Hadri. 3) mentions these consuls under the names of Candidus and Quadratus.

QUADRATUS, ASINIUS, the author of a single epigram in the Greek Anthology (Bruneck. Anth. Græc. ii. p. 299; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. iii. p. 13), which is described in the Plannean Anthology (p. 203, Steph., p. 206, Wechel,) as of uncertain authorship, but in the Palatine MS, is headed 'Ασινιος Κομάνδρατος, with the further superscription, εις τοὺς ἀναμέθυντος ύπό τοῦ τῶν Ρωμαίων ύπότην Σώλα, according to which it would be inferred that the writer of the epigram was contemporary with Sulla. (Anth. Pal. vii. 312.) But this lemma can scarcely be regarded as anything more than the conjecture of a grammarian, on the truth of which the epigram itself does not furnish sufficient evidence to decide. It is the epitaph of some enemies of the Romans (apparently foreign enemies), who had fallen by a secret and treacherous death, after fighting most bravely. There is nothing in it to support the conjecture of Salmasius, that it refers to the death of Catiline and his associates. Therefore, the lemma of the Palatine MS., suggests that it may refer to the slaughter of many of the Athenians, after the taking of Athens by Sulla. (Anniuad. in Anth. Græc. vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 306.) To these another conjecture might be added, namely, that the epigram refers to some event which occurred in the later wars of Rome, and that its author is no other than the Roman historian of the time of Philipicus. See below. [P. S.]

QUADRATUS, ASINIUS, lived in the times of Philipicus I. and II., emperors of Rome (a. d. 244—249), and wrote two historical works in the Greek language. 1. A History of Rome, in fifteen books, in the Ionic dialect, called Χρόνεριστος, because it related the history of the city, from its foundation to the thousandth year of its nativity (a. d. 248), when the Ludi Saeulares were performed with extraordinary pomp. It probably passed over with brevity the times of the republic, and dwelt at greater length upon the imperial period. Suidas says that the work came down to Alexander, the son of Mamæa; but this is a mistake, as Alexander died fifteen years before the thousandth year of Rome. (Suidas, s. v. Καθοριστός; Steph. Byz. s. v. "Αριστος, Θανικος, Οδησιος; Dion Cass. lxx. 3; Zoïsm. v. 27; Vulcat. Gall. Avid. Cass. 1; Agathias, i. 17, p. c.) 2. A history of Parthia, which is frequently quoted by Stephanus Byzantius under the title of Παρθονος or Παρθονος. (Quadratus bellii Parthici scriptor, Capitol. Ver. 3; Steph. Byz. s. v. Παρθονος, Tarass, or chill; comp. Vossius, De Hist. Graec. p. 206, 207, ed. Weisermann; Clinton, Fasti Rom. p. 263.)

QUADRATUS, FANNIUS, a contemporary of Horace, who speaks with him contempt as a parasite of Tigellius Hermogenes. He was one of those envious Roman poets who tried to depreciate Horace, because his writings threw their own into the shade. (Hor. Sat. i. 4, 21, i. 10, 80, with the Schol.; Weichert, Poetareum Latin. Rhetoricae, p. 290, &c.)

QUADRATUS, L. NNIUSIUS, tribune of the plebs a. c. 58, distinguished himself by his opposition to the measures of his colleague P. Clodius against Cicero. After Cicero had withdrawn from the city, he proposed that the senate and the people should put on mourning for the orator, and as early as the first of June he brought forward a motion in the senate for his recall from banishment. In the course of the same year he dedicated the property of Clodius to Caesar (Cass, l. c. 366.) Cic. pro Sext. 31, post Red. in Sena. 2, pro Dom. 48). Two years afterwards Quadratus is mentioned along with Favonius, as one of the opponents of the Lex Trobonia, which prolonged the government of the provinces to Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus (Dion Cass. xxxix. 35). The last time that his name occurs is in b. c. 49, when he was in Cicero's neighbourhood in Campania (Cic. ad Att. x. 16, § 4). In many editions of Cicero, as also in the Annales of Pighius, he is erroneously called Mammianus. Glanvold, in his Onomasticon, calls him Numerius.

QUADRATUS, NUMMIUS. [Quadratus, Ummidius.]

QUADRATUS, L. STATIUS, consul a. d. 142, with C. Cuspius Rufinus (Fasti).

QUADRATUS, UMMIDIUYS, the name of several persons under the early Roman emperors. There is considerable discrepancy in the orthography of the name. Josephus writes it Numidius, which is the form that Glanvold (Onomast. p. 631) has adopted; whilst in the different editions of Tacitus, Pliny, and the Scriptores Historiae Augustae, we find it written variously Numidius, Vindius, and Ummidius. The latter, which occurs in some of the best manuscripts, is supported by the authority of inscriptions, and is evidently the correct form. In the passage of Horace (Sat. i. 1. 95) where the present reading is Ummiudius, there is the same variation in the manuscripts, but Bentley has shown that the true reading is Ummidius.

1. UMMIDIUYS QUADRATUS, was governor of Syria during the latter end of the reign of Claudius, and the commencement of the reign of Nero. He succeeded Casius Longinus in the province.

about a. d. 51, and continued to govern it till his death in a. d. 60. Only three circumstances are mentioned in connection with his administration.

In a. d. 52 he allowed Rhadamistus to dethrone and put to death Mithridates, the king of Armenia, whom Tiberius had placed upon the throne, and whose the Romans had hitherto supported. In the same year he marched into Judea, and put down the disturbances which prevailed in that country. He is said to have condemned, or, according to other accounts, to have sent to the empire Claudius for trial, Ventidius Cumanus, one of the procurators, but to have protected Antonius Felix, the other procurator. [Comp. Felix, p. 143, a.] The other circumstance is his disagreement with Domitius Corbulo, who had been sent into the East to conduct the war against the Parthians. His name occurs on one of the coins of Antioch. (Joseph. Ant. xx. 5. § 2, B. J. ii. 12. §§ 5, 6; Tac. Ann. xii. 43, Xc., 54, xiii. 8, 9, xiv. 26; Eckhel. vol. iii. p. 200.) In the editions of Tacitus the praenomen of Quadratus is Titus, but it appears from an inscription that this is a mistake, and that his real praenomen was Caius. (Orelli, Inscrip. 3663.) We learn from the same inscription that his full name was Ummidius Quadratus, of Bocchus, that he had been previously the legatus of Caligula in Lusitania. The Ummidia Quadratilla, whose death in the reign of Trajan is mentioned by Pliny [Quadratilla], was in all probability a sister of the above. She could hardly have been a daughter, as some modern writers have supposed, since she had a grandson of the age of twenty-four and upwards at the time of her death [see below, No. 2], and it is not probable that Ummidius, who died in a. d. 60, could have had a great-grandson of that age about a. d. 100.

2. Ummidius Quadratus, a friend and admirer of the younger Pliny, whom he took as his model in oratory. Pliny speaks of him in the highest terms, and praises both his abilities and his excellent moral character. He was the grandson of the wealthy Ummidia Quadratilla, and inherited two-thirds of her property. [Quadratilla.] In the estate thus bequeathed to him was the house where the celebrated jurist Caius Longinus. He married at the age of twenty-four, in the life-time of his grandmother, but lost his wife soon after their marriage. (Plin. Ep. vi. 11, vii. 24.) Two of Pliny's letters are addressed to him (Ep. vi. 29, ix. 13), in the latter of which Pliny gives an account of the celebrated attack which he made upon Publicius Certus in the senate, in the reign of Nerva, a. d. 96.

3. Ummidius Quadratus, is mentioned as one of the persons whom Hadrian persecuted. (Spartian. Hadr. 15.) He may have been a son of No. 2, who probably married again after the time that Pliny's letter was written. It seems to have been this Quadratus who married the sister of Antoninus Pius.

4. M. Ummidius Quadratus, the son of No. 3, was the nephew of Antoninus Pius, being his sister's son. Antoninus Pius gave his maternal property to this Quadratus. (Capit. M. Aurel. 7, where he is in some editions erroneously called Mummius Quadratus.) He was consul in a. d. 167, with M. Aurelius Vetus.

5. Ummidius Quadratus, the son of No. 4, was induced by Lucilla to enter into a conspiracy against her brother Commodus, by whom he was put to death, a. d. 183. (Herodian. i. 8; Lampried. Commod. 4; Dion Cass. lxxix. 4.)

QUADRATUS, C. VULUS' NUS, a tribune of the soldiers in Caesar's army in Gaul, is described as "vir et consili magi et virtutis." He held the rank of Proconsul equum under his old commander in the campaign against Pompey in Greece, in b. c. 48. (Caes. B. G. iii. 5, viii. 23, B. G. iii. 60.) He was a tribune of the plebes, b. c. 43, and one of the supporters of Antony. (Cic. Phil. v. 7. § 21, where the correct reading is idem Ventidium, cum aliis praetorem, tribunum Volusenum, ego semper hostem.)

QUADRIFRONIS, a surname of Janus. It is said that after the conquest of the Faliscans an image of Janus was found with four foreheads. Hence afterwards a temple of Janus quadrifrons was built in the Forum transitorium, which had four gates. The fact of the god being represented with four heads is considered by the ancients to be an indication of his being the divinity presiding over the year with its four seasons. (Serv. ad Aen. vii. 607; Isid. Orig. viii. i.; August. De Civ. Dei, vii. 4.)

QUADRIGARIUS, Q. CLAU' D' IUS, a Roman historian who flourished about b. c. 100 (Vell. Pat. ii. 9). His work, which is generally quoted under the title Annales (Gell. ii. 13. § 6), sometimes as Historiae (Priscian. p. 697, ed. Putsch.) and sometimes as Rerum Romanarum Libri (Non. s. v. pristis), commenced immediately after the destruction of Rome by the Gauls, and must in all probability have extended down to the death of Sulla, since there were at least twenty-three books (Gell. x. 13), and the seventh consulship of Marius was commemorated in the nineteenth.

The first book embraced the events comprised in the period from b. c. 390 down to the subjugation of the Samnites. The struggle with Pyrrhus was the chief subject of the second and third; the first Punic war commenced in the third, and was continued through the fourth; the second Punic war commenced in the fifth, which contained the battle of Cannae; the siege of Capua was included in the sixth; the hostilities with the Achaean league and Numantia in the eighth, and the seventh consulship of Marius in the nineteenth, as was remarked above.

By Livy he is uniformly referred to simply as Claudius or Cludius, and is thus distinguished from Cludius Licinius (Livy. xxii. 22), and from "Clau' dius qui Annales Caecilianos ex Graeco in Latinum seremonem vertit." (Livy. xxv. 39. Comp. xxxv. 14.) By other authors he is cited as Quintus (Priscian. p. 960, ed. Putsch), as Claudius (Non. Marcell. s. v. Retulium), as Q. Claudius (Gell. ix. 13. § 6; Priscian. p. 757, ed. Putsch.), as Claudius Quadrari' garius (Non. Marcell. s. v. Torquem; Gell. ii. 19. § 7), or as Quadrigrarius (Non. Marcell. s. v. Pos' setor; Gell. ii. 23. § 6.)

The fragments still extant enable us to conclude that he was very minute in many of his details, for several particulars recorded by him were omitted by Livy (e.g. Gell. v. 17; Macrobr. Sat. i. 16; comp. Livy. vii. 18, xxxviii. 41, while from the caution evinced by the latter in making use of him as an authority (Liv. vi. 42, viii. 19, ix. 5, x. 37, xxxiii. 10, 30, 36, xxxviii. 23, 41, xiv. 15; comp. Oros. iv. 20), especially in matters relating to numbers, it would appear that he was disposed to indulge, although in a less degree, in those exag-QUETIUS, a friend of the emperor Alexander Severus, who, after the murder of that prince, was dismissed from the camp by his successor, and having been encountered by some soldiers of Osrhoene deeply attached to the memory of their late sovereign, was forced by them to place himself at their head, and reluctantly assumed the purple. Soon after, while sleeping in his tent, he was assassinated by a certain Macedo, who had formerly commanded this body of foreign troops, and had been the chief instigator of the insurrection, but who now sought to ingratiate himself with Maximinus by presenting him with the head of his rival. He received the reward which he merited. Maximinus accepted the offering with joy, and then issued a command that the double traitor should himself be put to death, as the original author of the revolt. (Herodian. viii. 3, 4.) This Quetius seems to be the same person with the Tycus mentioned by Capitolinus (Maxim. c. 11), and with the Trrus of Trebellius Pollio (Tit. Tyrann. xxxix.).

QUÆRÆTÚIÀ/NAE, or Querquetulanae vi-ræ, nymphs presiding over the green oak forests, near the porta querquetularia, or querquetulana, were believed to be possessed of prophetic powers. (Festus, p. 261, ed. Müller; Plin. H. N. xvi. 10, 15. § 37.) It should be observed that the word viræ is the ancient feminine of vir, and signifies women. Hence virago or virgo.

QUIES, the personification of tranquillity, was worshipped as a divinity by the Romans. A chapel dedicated to her stood on the via Livicana, probably a pleasant resting-place for the weary traveller; another sanctuary of her was outside the porta Collina. (Liv. iv. 41; August. De Civ. Dei, iv. 16, 21.)

QUIETUS, AVI'DIUS, a contemporary of the younger Pliny, had been a friend of Paetus Thrasea, and used to relate to Pliny many things concerning that distinguished man. He supported Pliny when the latter accused Publicius Cestus in the senate in A. D. 96, on account of the share he had had in the condemnation of Helvidius by Domitian. (Plin. Ep. vi. 29, ix. 13, § 15.)

QUIETUS, CLAVIDIE'NUS, was implicated in Piso's conspiracy against Nero, and was banished to one of the islands in the Aegean Sea. (Tac. Ann. xv. 71.)

QUIETUS, C. FULVIUS, included in the list of thirty tyrants enumerated by Trebellius Pollio [see AUREOLUS], was one of the two sons of that Marianus who assumed the purple after the capture of Valerian. Having been associated with his father and brother in the empire, he was entrusted with the government of the East when they marched upon Italy. Upon receiving intelligence of their defeat and death, he took refuge in Eresus where he was besieged, captured, and slain by Odenathus in A. D. 262 (Trebell. Prol. Trig. Tyrann.). He is called Quintus by Zonaras (xii. 24). [W. R.]

COIN OF QUIETUS.

QUETIUS, Q. LU'SIUS, was an independent Moorish chief, not belonging to the Roman province of Mauritania. He served, however, with a body of Moorish cavalry in the Roman army, but in consequence of some offence which he had committed, he was dismissed from the service with disgrace. At a later time, A. D. 101, when Trajan was going to carry on war against the Moors, and was in want of Moorish cavalry, Quetius offered his services again of his own accord, and was received with welcome by the emperor. In this war, and still more in the Parthian war, which began in A. D. 114, Quetius gained great distinction, and became one of the favourite generals of Trajan. He took the towns of Nisibis and Edessa, and subdued the Jews, against whom he had been sent. Trajan made him governor of Judaea, and rewarded him still further by raising him to the consularship in A. D. 116 or 117. His name does not appear in the Fasti, and he must, therefore, have been only one of the consules suffecit for the year. The honours conferred upon him by Trajan excited much envy; but so great a favourite was he with the emperor, that there was a report, if we may believe Themistius, that Trajan destined him as his successor. Quetius is represented on Trajan's column at the head of his Moors. After Trajan's death he returned to his native country, but he was suspected by Hadrian of fomenting the disturbances which then prevailed in Mauritania. He was first deprived of the tribes whom he governed, and was then summoned to Rome. There he was accused of entering into a conspiracy against Hadrian's life, and was murdered on a journey, probably while travelling from Mauritania to Rome. (Dion Cass. lviii. 8, 22, 30, 32, lix. 2; Themistius, Orot. xvi. p. 205, ed. Petavius, Paris, 1684; Euseb. H. E. iv. 2, with the note of Valesius; Spartili. Hadr. 5. 7; Amm. Marc. xxix. 5.)

QUI'NTIÀ GENS, originally patrician, but subsequently plebeian also. The ancient and more correct form of the name is Quinetius, which occurs on coins and in the Fasti Capitolini. The Quintia gens was one of the Alban houses removed to Rome by Tullius Hostilius, and enrolled by him among the patricians (Liv. i. 30). It was consequently one of the minores gentes. (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. pp. 291, 292.) Its members often held throughout the whole history of the republic the highest offices of the state, and it produced some men of importance even during the imperial period. For nearly the first forty years after the expulsion of the kings the Quintii are not mentioned, and the first of the gens, who obtained the consulship, was T. Quintius Capitolinus Quintilianus, a senator of dissolute life, had been ridiculed by Nero in a poem, and in revenge took part in Piso's conspiracy against that emperor. On the detection of the conspiracy he had to put an end to his life, which he did, says Tacitus, "non ex priore vitae mollitia." (Tac. Ann. xiv. 49, 56, 70.)

Quintilia, or Quintilia gens, patrician. This name occurs in the earliest legends of Roman history, for the followers of Romulus among the shepherds are said to have been called Quintili, just as those of his brother Remus were named Fabii. The Luperci, who were among the most ancient priests of Rome, were divided into two classes, one called Quintili or Quintiliani, and the other Fabii or Fabiani. (Festus, s. v. Quinctiliani Luperci, and Fabiani; Ovid. Fast. ii. 373.)

Hence it has been conjectured with much probability that this priesthood was originally confined to these gentes. (Comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. Luperci.) But although the gens was so ancient, it never attained any historical importance, and its name is best known from the unfortunate Quintillus Varus, who was destroyed with his whole army by the Germans in the reign of Augustus. The Quintillii obtained only one consulship and one dictatorship during the whole of the republican period, the former in B.C. 453, and the latter in B.C. 331. During the republic Varus is the only family-name that occurs in the gens; but in the times of the empire we find one or two other cognomina, which are given below.

Quintilianus, M. Fabius, the most celebrated of Roman rhetoricians, was a native of Calagurris (Calahorra), in the upper valley of the Ebro. He was born about A.D. 40, and if not reared at Rome, must at least have completed his education there, for he himself informs us (v. 7. § 7) that, while yet a very young man, he attended the lectures of Domitius Afer, at that time far advanced in life, and that he witnessed the decline of his powers (v. 7. § 7, x. 1. §§ 24, 36, xii. 11. § 3). Now we know from other sources that Domitius Afer died in A.D. 59 (Tac. Ann. xiv. 19; Frontius de Aquaeuct. 102). Having revisited Spain, he returned from thence (A. d. 63) in the train of Galba, and forthwith began to practise at the bar (vii. 2), where he acquired considerable reputation. But he was chiefly distinguished as a teacher of eloquence, bearing away the palm in this department from all his rivals, and associating his name even to a proverb, with pre-eminence in the art. Among his pupils were numbered Pliny the younger (Plin. Ep. ii. 14, vi. 6) and the two grand-nephews of Domitian. By this prince he was invested with the insignia and title of consul (consularia orna menta), and is, moreover, celebrated as the first public instructor, who, in virtue of the endowment by Vespasian (Suet. Vesp. 18), received a regular salary from the imperial exchequer. After having devoted twenty years, commencing probably with A. d. 69, to the laborious duties of his profession, he retired into private life, and is supposed to have died about A. d. 118.

Martial, himself from the neighbourhood of Calagurris (Ep. i. 62), and fond of commemorating the literary glories of his own land, although he pays a tribute to the fame of Quintilian (xi. 90). "Quintiliana, vagae moderator summe juventae, Gloria Romanae, Quintiliane, togene," nowhere claims him as a countryman, and hence it has been concluded that he was not by birth a Spaniard, but this negative evidence cannot be allowed to outweigh the direct testimony of Ausonius (Prof. i. 7), confirmed by Hieronymus (Chron. Euseb. Olymp. cxxi. ccxvi. and Cassiodorus (Chron. sub Domitian. ann. viii.).

It is frequently affirmed in histories of Roman literature that the father of Quintilian was a pleader, and that his grandfather was Quintiliian the declarer spoken of by Seneca, but the passages referred to in proof of these assertions will be found not to warrant any such inferences (ix. 3. § 73; Senec. Controv. v. praef. and 33).

Doubts have been expressed with regard to the emperor to whom Quintilian was indebted for the honours alluded to above, and it has been confidently maintained that Hadrian, not Domitian, was his patron. In the proemium to the fourth book of the Institutions the author records with grateful pride that Domitians Augustus had committed to his care the grandsons of his sister,—that is, the sons of Flavius Clemens and Domitilla the younger (see Stenton, Dom. 15; Dion Cass. p. 1112, ed. Reimar). Again, Ausonius, in his Gratiam Actio ad Gratianum, remarks "Quintilianus consularia per Clementem ornamenta sortitus honestamenta nominis potius videtur quam insignia potestatis habuisse." It would be false scepticism to doubt that the Clemens here named is the Flavius Clemens to whose children Quintilian acted as preceptor, and if this be admitted, the question seems to be set at rest. To this distinction doubtless the satirist alludes, when he sarcastically declares "Si Fortuna volet fies de rhetore consul."
QUINTILIANUS.

“Hos inter summus sesteria Quintiliano
Ut multum duo sufficiens; res nulla minoris Constabat patri quam filius. Unde igitur tot Quintilians habet saltus,” and then proceeds to ascribe his singular prosperity to the influence of good luck. On the other hand, Pliny, in a letter inscribed “Quintiliano suo” (vi. 32, comp. D), makes him a present of 50,000 sentences, about 400,000 sterlings, as a contribution towards the outlay of a daughter about to be married, assigning as a reason for his liberality “Te porro, animo beatissimam, medium faculatibus, scis.” Passing over the untenable supposition that Pliny may have been addressing some Quintilian different from the rhetorician, or that the estates indicated above may have been acquired at a later period, we must observe that Juvenal here employs a tone of declamatory exaggeration, and that he speaks with evident, though suppressed bitterness of the good fortune of Quintilian, probably in consequence of the flattery lavished by the latter on the hated Domitian (e. g. proem. lib. iv.); we must bear in mind also, that although the means of Quintilian may not have been so ample as to render an act of generosity on the part of a rich and powerful pupil in any way unacceptable, still the handsomely income which he enjoyed (100,000 sentences = 800, Suet. Vesp. 18) must have appeared boundless wealth when compared with the indigence of the troops of half-starved grammarians who trudged the metropolis, and whose miseries are so forcibly depicted in the piece where the above lines are found.

The epistle of Pliny has suggested another difficulty. Quintilian, in the preface to his sixth book, laments in very touching language the death of his only son, whose improvement had been one of his chief inducements to undertake the work. He is thus led on to enter into details regarding his family bereavements: first of all he lost his wife, at the age of nineteen, who left behind her two boys; the younger died when five years old, the elder at ten; but there is no allusion to a daughter, and indeed his words clearly imply that two children only had been born to him, both of whom he had lost. Hence we are driven to the supposition that he must have married a second time, that the lady was the daughter of a certain Tutilius (Plin. L.c.), and that the offspring of this union was the girl whose approaching marriage with Nonius Celer called forth the gift of Pliny. It will be seen too that Quintilian, at the lowest computation, must have been nearly fifty when he was left childless, consequently he must have been so far advanced in life when his daughter became marriageable, that it is impossible to believe that he amassed a fortune subsequent to that event.

The great work of Quintilian is a complete system of rhetoric in twelve books, entitled De Institutione Oratoria Libri XII., or sometimes, Institutiones Oratoriae, dedicated to his friend Marcellus Victorius, himself a celebrated orator, and to his son, the late Celer. The former of these titles was written during the reign of Domitian, while the author was discharging his duties as preceptor to the sons of the emperor’s niece (Proem. lib. iv. x. 1. § 9). In a short preface to his bookseller Trypho, he acquaints us that he commenced this undertaking after he had retired from his labours as a public instructor (probably in A. D. 89), and that he finished his task in little more than two years. This period appears, at first sight, short for the completion of a performance so comprehensive and so elaborate, but we may reasonably believe that his professional career had rendered him so familiar with the subject, and that in his capacity as a lecturer he must have so frequently enlarged upon all its different branches, that little would be necessary except to digest and arrange the materials already accumulated. Indeed, it appears that two books upon rhetoric had been already published under his name, but without his sanction; being, in fact, notes taken down by some of his pupils, of conversations which he had held with them.

In an introductory chapter addressed to Marcellus, he briefly indicates the plan which he had followed, and the distribution of the different parts. The first book contains a dissertation on the preliminary training requisite before a youth can enter directly upon the studies necessary to mould an accomplished orator (ea quae sunt ante officium rhetoris), and presents us with a carefully sketched outline of the method to be pursued in educating children, from the time they leave the cradle until they pass from the hands of the grammarian. In the second book we find an exposition of the first principles of rhetoric, together with an investigation into the nature of the art (prima apta rhetoricae substantia quaeruntur). The five following are devoted to invention and arrangement (inventio, dispositio); the eighth, ninth, tenth and eleventh to composition (including the proper use of the figures of speech) and delivery, comprised under the general term elocutio, and the last is occupied with what the author considers by far the most important portion of his project (partem operis destinat longe gravissimum), an inquiry, namely, into various circumstances not included in a course of scholastic discipline, but essential to the formation of a perfect public speaker; such as his manners—his moral character,—the principles by which he must be guided in undertaking, in preparing, and in conducting causes,—the peculiar style of eloquence which he may adopt with greatest advantage,—the collateral studies to be pursued — the age at which it is most suitable to commence pleading — the necessity of retiring before the powers begin to fail—and various other kindred topics.

This production bears throughout the impress of a clear, sound judgment, keen discrimination, and pure taste, improved by extensive reading, deep reflection, and long practice. The diction is highly polished, and very graceful. The fastidious critic may, indeed, detect here and there an obscure, affected phrase, or a word employed in a sense not authorised by the purest models of Latinity, but these blemishes, although significant of the age to which the treatise belongs, are by no means so numerous or so glaring as seriously to injure its general beauty. In copiousness, perspicuity, and technical accuracy, it is unquestionably superior to the essay on the same subject ascribed to Cicero, although each possesses its peculiar merits, which are fully expounded in the laborious comparison instituted by Caesarius. The sections which possess the greatest interest for general readers are those chapters in the first book which relate to elementary education, and the commencement of the tenth book, which furnishes us with a com-of the Declamations, the two others the Institutions only. The Institutions have been translated into English by Guthrie, 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1756, 1805, and by Patsall, 2 vols. 8vo. Lond. 1774; into French by M. de Pure, 2 vols. 4to. Paris, 1663; by the Abbé Gédon, 4to. Paris, 1718, 12mo. 1732, 1770, 1810, 1820; and by C. V. Quizille, 8vo. Paris, 1829; into Italian by Orazio Toscanella, 4to. Venez. 1568, 1564; and by Garilli, Vercelli, 1790; into German by H. P. C. Henke, 3 vols. 8vo. Helmstedt, 1775—1777; republished with corrections and additions, by J. Billerbeck, 3 vols. 8vo. Helmstaedt, 1825.

The Declamations have been translated into English by Warr, 8vo. Lond. 1686 (published anonymously); into French by Du Teil, 4to. Paris, 1638 (the larger declamations only); into Italian by Orazio Toscanella, 4to. Venez. 1568; and into German by J. H. Steffens, 8vo. Zelle, 1767 (a selection only).

QUINTILLUS, NO'NIUS. 1. SEX. NO'NIUS L. P. L. N. QUINTILLUS, was consul a. d. 8 with M. Furius Camillus (Fasti Capit.; Dion Cass. iv. 33). It appears from coins that he was also triumvir of the mint under Augustus (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 262).

2. SEX. NONIUS QUINTILLUS, probably a son of the preceding, was consul suffectus in the reign of Caligula, a. d. 40 (Fasti).

QUINTILLUS CONDI'ANUS. [CONDI'ANUS.]

QUINTILLIUS MAXIMUS. [CONDI'ANUS.]

QUINTILLUS, a gem-engraver, of unknown time. Two of his works are extant; the one representing Neptune drawn by two sea-horses, cut in beryl (Stosch, No. 57; Bracci, pl. 100); the other a naked Mercury (Spilsbury Gems, No. 27).

[& P. S.]

QUINTILLUS, M. AURE'LIUS, the brother of the emperor M. Aurelius Claudius Gothicus, was elevated to the throne by the troops whom he commanded at Aquileia, in a. d. 270. But as the army at Sirmium, where Claudius died, had proclaimed Aurelian emperor, Quintillus put an end to his own life, seeing himself deserted by his own soldiers, to whom the rigour of his discipline had given offence. Most of the ancient writers say that he reigned only seventeen days; but since we find a great number of his coins, it is probable that he enjoyed the imperial dignity for a few months, as Zosimus states. He had two children. His character is said to have been unblemished, and his praises are sounded in the same high strain as those of his brother. [See Vol. I. p. 777.] (Trebell. Poll. Claud. 10, 12, 13; Eutrop. ix. 12; Vict. Epit. 34; Zosim. I. 47; Eckhel, vol. vii. pp. 477, 478.)

COIN OF QUINTILLUS.

QUINTILLUS, PLA'UTIUS. 1. Consul in a. d. 159 with Statius Prisci (Fasti).
QUINTUS. 2. M., consul with Commodus in A.D. 177 (Fasti).

QUINTUS. 1. D. QUINTUS, a man of obscure birth, but of great military reputation, commanded the Roman fleet at Tarentum in B.C. 210, and was slain in a naval engagement in that year. (Liv. xxvi. 39.)

2. P. QUINTUS, the person whom Cicero defended in B.C. 81. The oration in his behalf is still extant.

3. L. QUINTUS, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 74, is characterised by Cicero as a man well fitted to speak in public assemblies (Cic. Brut. 62). He distinguished himself by his violent opposition to the constitution of Sulla, and endeavoured to regain for the tribunes the power of which they had been deprived. The unpopularity excited against the judges by the general belief that they had been bribed by Cluentius to condemn Opianicus, was of service to Quintus in attacking another of Sulla's measures, by which the judges were taken exclusively from the senatorial order. Quintus warmly espoused the cause of Opianicus, constantly asserted his innocence, and raised the flame of popular indignation to such a height, that Julius, who had presided at the trial, was obliged to retire from public life. L. Quintus, however, was not strong enough to obtain the repeal of any of Sulla's laws. The consul Lucullus opposed him vigorously in public, and induced him, by persuasion in private, says Plutarch, to abandon his attempts. It is not improbable that the aristocracy made use of the powerful persuasion of money to keep him quiet. (Plut. Lucull. 5; Sallust, Hist. p. 173, ed. Orelli; Pseudo-Ascon. in Div. in Cael. p. 103, in Act. i. in Verg. pp. 127, 141, ed. Orelli; Cic. pro Cluent. 27—29, 37, 39.)

In B.C. 67 Quintus was praetor, in which year he took his revenge upon his old enemy Lucullus, by inducing the senate to send him a successor in his province, although he had, according to a statement of Sallust, received money from Lucullus to prevent the appointment of a successor. (Plut. Lucull. 55, where he erroneously called L. Quintus; Sall. op. Schol. in Cae. in Leg. Man. p. 441, ed. Orelli.)

QUINTUS, an eminent physician at Rome, in the former half of the second century after Christ. He was a pupil of Marinus (Galen, Comment. in Hippocr. "De Nat. Hom." ii. 6, vol. xv. p. 136), and not his tutor, as some modern writers assert. He was tutor to Lycus (id. ibid.) and Satyrus (id. ibid., De Anatom. Admin. i. 1, 2, vol. ii. pp. 217, 225, De Antid. i. 14, vol. xiv. p. 71), and Iphicratus (id. Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. III." i. 29, vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 575). Some persons say he was also one of the tutors of Galen himself, but this is probably an error. He was so much superior to his medical colleagues that they grew jealous of his eminence, and formed a sort of coalition against him, and forced him to quit the city by charging him with injuring his patients. (id. De Præead. ad Epid. c. 1, vol. xiv. p. 602.) He died about the year 148 (id. De Anat. Admin. i. 2, vol. ii. p. 225). He was particularly celebrated for his knowledge of anatomy (id. De Libris Propriis, 2, vol. xii. p. 22), but wrote nothing himself, either on this or any other medical subject (id. Comment. in Hippocr. "De Nat. Hom." i. 25, ii. 6, vol. xv. pp. 68, 136); his pupil Lycus professing to deliver his master's opinions (id. Comment. in Hippocr. "Aphor." iii. p. pref. vol. xvii. pt. ii. p. 562). He appears to have commented on the "Aphorisms" and the "Epidemics" of Hippocrates, but Galen says that his explanations were not always sound (Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. I." i. p. pref. vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 6, De Ord. Libror. suor. vol. xix. p. 57). Several of his sayings have been preserved, which show more radeness than wit, and (as Galen says) are more suitable to a jester than to a physician (De Santit. Tu. iii. 13, vol. vi. p. 228, Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. VI." iv. 9, vol. xvii. pt. ii. p. 151; Pallad. Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. VI." ap. Dietz, Schol. in Hippocr. et Gal. vol. ii. p. 113). He is mentioned in several other passages of Galen's writings, and also by Aëtius (i. 1, p. 39); and he is probably the physician quoted by Oribasius (Synops. ad Eustath. iii. p. 56) (W. A. G.)

QUINTUS, a gem-engraver, and his brother Aulus, flourished probably in the time of Augustus. There are several works of Aulus extant, but only a fragment of one by Quintus. From the manner in which their names appear on their works, AuloS AAE3A EiP. KOINHO3 AAE EiPoiEi, Winckelmann and Silius conclude that their father's name was Alexander; but Osann endeavored to prove the contrary for the genitive, not of AΛE3A3OpO3, but of AΛE3A3X. (Brucii, fol. 8; Silius, Cat. Art. s. v.; Osann, in the Kunstblatt, 1830, p. 336.) (P. S.)

QUINTUS CURTIUS. [CURTIUS.]

QUINTUS SYMRNAEUS (Κύριτος Συμύρνα), commonly called QUINTUS CALABER, from the circumstance that the first copy through which his poem became known was found in a convent at Otranto in Calabria, was the author of a poem in 14 books, entitled τα μεθ Ομηρου, ο περακειμέναι Ομηρη. Scarcely any thing is known of his personal history; but from the metrical and poetic characteristics of his poem, as compared with the school of Nonius, it appears most probable that he lived towards the end of the fourth century after Christ. From a passage in his poem (xii. 308—313), it would seem that even in early youth he made trial of his poetic powers, while engaged in the theatre, and performed his first tragedy at the temple of Artemis in the territory of Smyrna. The matters treated of in his poem are the events of the Trojan war from the death of Hector to the return of the Greeks. It begins rather abruptly with a description of the grief and consternation at the death of Hector which reigned among the Trojans, and then introduces Penthesileia, queen of the Amazons, who comes to their aid. In the second book we have the arrival, exploits, and death of Menon; in the third, the death of Achilles. The fourth and fifth books describe the funeral games in honour of Achilles, the contest about his arms, and the death of Ajax. In the sixth book, Neoptolemus is sent for by the Greeks, and Eurypylus comes to the help of the Trojans. The seventh and eighth books describe the arrival and exploits of Neoptolemus; the ninth contains the exploits of Deiphobus, and the sending for Philoctetes by the Greeks. The tenth, the death of Paris and the suicide of Oenone, who had refused to heal him. The eleventh book narrates the last unsuccessful attempt of the Greeks to carry Ilium by storm; the twelfth and thirteenth describe the capture of the city by means of the wooden horse; the fourteenth, the rejoicing of the Greeks,—the reconciliation of Menelaus and Helena,—the sacrifice of Polyxena at the tomb of Achilles,—the embarkation of the Greeks,—the scattering of their ships, and the death of Ajax.

In phraseology, similes, and other technicalities, Quintus closely copied Homer. The materials for his poem he found in the works of the earlier poets of the epic cycle. But not a single poetical idea of his own seems ever to have inspired him. He was incapable of understanding or appropriating any thing except the majestic flow of the language of the ancient epics. His gods and heroes are alike devoid of all individuality. Every thing else in his style was devoid of the power of attracting the reader by any thing that was original in character. His style is clear, and marked on the whole by purity and good taste, without any bombast or exaggeration. There can be little doubt that the work of Quintus Smyrnaeus is nothing more than an amplification or remodelling of the poems of Arctinus and Lesches. It is clear that he had access to the same sources as Virgil, though there is nothing from which it would appear that he had the Roman poet before his eyes. He appears, however, to have made diligent use of Apollonius.

The first edition of Quintus was published by Aldus Manutius in 1504 or 1505, from a very faulty MS. Laur. Rhodomanus, who spent thirty years upon the correction and explanation of the text of Quintus, published an improved edition in 1604. But the standard edition, founded on a collation of all the extant manuscripts, is that of Tytchsen, Strasburg, 1807. It is also printed along with Hesiod, Apollonius, &c., in Didot's edition, Paris, 1840. A smaller poem on the Twelve Labours of Hercules, ascribed to Quintus Smyrnaeus, is extant in MS. (Bernhardy, Grundriss der Griech. Literatur, vol. ii. p. 216, &c.; &c.; Tytchsen, Comment, de Quinti Smyrnaei Paralip., Göttingen, 1783; the materials of which are also contained in his edition.)

[ C. P. M.]

QUIRINALIS, CLODIUS, praefectus of the rowers at Ravenna, anticipated his condemnation by taking poison, a.d. 56. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 30.)

QUIRINUS, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus (i. 48), a Sabine word, and perhaps to be derived from qa'risa, a lance or spear. It occurs first of all as the name of Romulus, after he had been raised to the rank of a divinity, and the festival celebrated in his honour bore the name of Quirinalia. (Verg. Aen. i. 292; Cic. De Nat. Deor. ii. 24; Ov. Am. iii. 6. 51; Fast. iv. 56, 803, vi. 375, Met. xv. 862.) Owing to the probable meaning of the word it is also used as a surname of Mars, Janus, and even of Augustus. (Ov. Fast. ii. 477; Serv. ad Aen. vii. 610; Sueton. Aug. 22; Macrobr. Sat. i. 9; Verg. Georg. iii. 27; Lydus, De Mens. p. 144; comp. Romulus.) [L. S.]

2. Consul a. d. 12 with M. Valerius Messalla. It would appear from his name that he was the son of the preceding; but the language of Tacitus (Ann. iii. 49) implies that he was of obscure origin. This historian relates that he was a native of Lanuvium, and had no connection with the ancient Sulpicia gens; and that it was owing to his military abilities and active services that he gained the consulship under Augustus. He was subsequently sent into Cilicia, where he subdued the Homonadenses, a fierce people dwelling in Mount Taurus; and in consequence of this success, he received the honour of the triumphal ornaments. In n. c. 1, or a year or two afterwards, Augustus appointed him to direct the counsels of his grandson C. Caesar, then in Armenia; and on his way to the East he paid a visit to Tiberius, who was at that time living at Rhodes. Some years afterwards, but not before a. d. 5, he was appointed governor of Syria, and remained there till 15, while in this office he took care of the Jewish people. This is the statement of Josephus, and appears to be at variance with that of Luke, who speaks as if the census or enrolment of Cyrenius was made at the time of the birth of Christ. This discrepancy has given rise to much discussion and various explanations, of which the reader will find an able account in Winers 'Bibliothek Realliteratur band, s. v. Quirinus.'

Quirinus had been married to Aemilia Lepida, whom he divorced; but in a. d. 20, twenty years after the divorce, he brought an accusation against her, because she pretended to have had a son by him. She was at the same time accused of other crimes; but the conduct of Quirinus met with general disapprobation as harsh and revengeful. Tiberius, notwithstanding his dissimulation, was evidently in favour of the prosecution, as he was anxious to conciliate Quirinus, who had no children, and might therefore be expected to leave his property to the emperor. Quirinus died in a. d. 21, and was honoured with a public funeral, which Tiberius requested of the senate. (Dion Cass. liv. 28; Tac. Ann. ii. 30, iii. 22, 48; Suet. Tib. 49; Strab. xii. p. 569; Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 1. § 1; St. Luke, ii. 1; comp. Acts of Apost. v. 37.)

C. RABIRIUS, defended by Cicero in the year of his consulship, n. c. 63, in a speech still extant. In n. c. 100 L. Appuleius Saturninus, the tribune of the plebs, had been declared an outlaw by the senate, besieged in the Capitol, and put to death with his accomplices, when he had been obliged to surrender through want of water. This had happened in the consulship of Marius, who had been compelled to conduct the attack, and had been supported by the leading men in the state. Among the few survivors of the actors in that scene was the senator C. Rabirius, who had since lived in retirement, and had now attained a great age. As nearly forty years had elapsed, it would have appeared that he could have had no danger to apprehend on account of the part he had taken in the affair; and he would doubtless have been allowed to continue undisturbed, had not Caesar judged it necessary to deter the senate from resorting to arms against the popular party, and to frighten every one in future from injuring the sacred person of a tribune, even in obedience to the senate's decree. Caesar, therefore, resolved to make an example of Rabirius, and accordingly induced the Senate, T. Labienus, whose uncle had perished among the followers of Saturninus, to accuse Rabirius of having murdered the tribune. To make the warning still more striking, Labienus did not proceed against him on the charge of injuriis, but revived the old accusation of perduellio, which had been discontinued for some centuries, since persons found guilty of the latter crime were given over to the public executioner and hanged on the accursed tree. In accusations of perduellio, the criminal was brought to trial before the Duumviri Perduellionis, who were specially appointed for the occasion, and who had in former times been nominated by the comitia, first of the curiae and afterwards of the centuries. On the present occasion, however, but on what ground we are not told, the duumviri were appointed by the praetor. They were C. Caesar himself and his relative L. Caesar. With such judges the result could not be doubtful; Rabirius was forthwith condemned; and the sentence of death would have been carried into effect, had he not availed himself of his right of appeal to the people in the comitia of the centuries. The case excited the greatest interest; since it was not simply the life or death of Rabirius, but the power and authority of the senate, which were at stake. The aristocracy made every effort to save the accused; while the popular leaders, on the other hand, used every means to excite the multitude against him, and thus secure his condemnation. On the day of the trial Labienus placed the bust of Saturninus in the Campus Martius, who thus appeared, as it were, to call for vengeance on his murderers. Cicero and Hortensius appeared on behalf of Rabirius; but that they might not have much opportunity for moving the people by their eloquence, Labienus limited the defence to half an hour. Cicero did all he could for his client. He admitted that Rabirius had taken up arms against Saturninus; but denied that he had killed the tribune, who had perished by the hands of a slave of the name of Sceva. The former act he justified by the example of Marius, the great hero of the people, as well as of all the other distinguished men of the time. But the eloquence of the advocate was all in vain; the people demanded vengeance for the fallen tribune. They were on the point of voting, and would infallibly have ratified the decision of the duumvirs, had not the meeting been broken up by the praetor, Q. Metellus Celer, who removed the military flag which floated on the Janiculum. This was in accordance with an ancient custom, which was intended to prevent the Campus Martius from being surprised by an enemy, when the territory of Rome scarcely extended beyond the boundaries of the city; and the practice was still maintained, though it had lost all its significance, from that love of preserving the form at least of all ancient institutions, which so particularly distinguishes the Romans. Rabirius thus escaped, and was not brought to trial again; since Caesar could have had no wish to take the old man's life, and he had already taught the senate an important lesson. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 26–28; Suet. Jul. 12; Cic. pro C. Rabir. passim, in Pis. 2, Orat. 29.)

The previous account has been taken from Dion Cassius, who relates the whole affair with great minuteness, following the account of the praetor. In his speech Cicero's oration for Rabirius, has questioned the accuracy of the account in Dion Cassius; urging that Cicero speaks (c. 3) of the infliction of a fine by Labienus, which could have nothing to do with a trial of perduellio; and also that Labienus complained of Cicero's having done away with the trial for perduellio ("nam de perdelliomis judicio, quod a me sublatum case crimini noles, meum crimen est, non Rabirii," c. 3). Niebuhr, therefore, thinks that the decision of the duumviri was quashed by the consul and the senate, on the ground that the duumviri were appointed by the praetor, contrary to law; and that the speech of Cicero, which is extant, was delivered before the people, not in defence of Rabirius on an accusation of perduellio, but to save him from the payment of a heavy fine, in which Labienus attempted to condemn him, despairing of a more severe punishment. In which the first case, the strong language which Cicero employs throughout this speech would be almost ridiculous, if the question only related to the imposition of a fine; and in the second place the objections which Niebuhr makes to the account of Dion Cassius, from the language of Cicero, can hardly be sustained. With respect to the former of the two objections, it will be seen by a reference to the oration (c. 3), that Labienus proposed to inflict two punishments on Rabirius, a fine on account of the offences he had committed in his private life, and death on account of the crime of perduellio in murdering Saturninus: to render the vengeance more complete, he wished to confiscate his property as well as take away his life. Cicero most clearly distinguishes between the two. As to the latter objection, that Labienus said that Cicero had done away with trials for perduellio, it is probable that these words only refer to the resolution of Cicero to defend Rabirius, and to certain assertions which he may have made in the senate respecting the illegality or inexpediency of renewing such an antiquated form of accusation. (Comp. Drumm. Geschichte Rome, vol. iii. p. 163; Mérimeé, Études sur l'Histoire Romaine, vol. ii. p. 99, &c.)

C. Rabirius had no children of his own, and adopted the son of his sister, who accordingly took his name. As the latter was born after the death of his father, he is called C. Rabirius Postumus. This Rabirius, whose Cicero also defended, in b. c. 54, is spoken of under Postumus.

RABIRIUS. Velleius Paterculus, after enumerating the distinguished literary characters who lived in the last years of the republic, in passing on to those who approached more nearly to his own age, uses the words "interque (sc. iœnitus) proximi nostri sevem eminens princeps carmine Virginulis, Rabiriusque," where some critics have unjustifiably sought to substitute "Variusque" or "Horatiusque" for "Rabiriusque." Ovid also pays a tribute to the genius of the same individual when he terms him "magnique Rabirius oris" (Ep. ex Pont. iv. 16. 5), but Quintilian speaks more coolly, "Rabirius ac Pedo non indigni cognitio- ni, si vacet" (x. 1. § 90). From Seneca (De Benef. vi. 3), who quotes with praise an expression placed in the mouth of Antonius, Hoc habeo quoddam delit i vel we are led to conclude that the work of Rabirius belonged to the epic class, and that the subject was connected with the Civil Wars.

No portion of this piece was known to exist until among the charred rolls found at Hercu- lanium, a fragment was discovered which many believe to be a part of the poem of Rabirius. It was first printed in the Volulina Herulenaenia (vol. ii. p. 13, fol. Neap. 1809), and subsequently, in a separate form, in a volume edited by Kreyssig under the title "Carminis Latini de bello Actino- s. Alexandrinia fragmenta," 4to. Schneeburg, 1814. A translation into Italian appeared at Forli, 4to. 1830, styled "Fragmenti di Rabirio poeta tra-
RACILIUS.

RACILIUS CONSTANS, governor of Sardinia, under Septimius Severus, by whom he was put to death. (Dion Cass. lxxx. 16.)

RADAGAISUS (Poçorajoers, according to Zosimus), invaded Italy at the head of a formidable host of barbarians, in the reign of the emperor Honorius. The swarm of barbarians collected by him beyond the Rhine and the Danube amounted to 200,000, or perhaps to 400,000 men, but it matters little how many there were. This formidable host was composed of Germanic tribes, as Suevians, Burgundians, and Vandals, and also of Celtic tribes. Jornandes calls Radagaisus a Scythin; whence we may infer that he belonged to one of those Germanic tribes which, at the beginning of the fifth century, arrived in Germany from their original dwellings north of the Euxine, especially as he is sometimes called a king of the Goths. In A.D. 406 Radagaisus invaded Italy, destroyed Florence, was entangled and besieged at a Maremma, then a young but flourishing city. The safety of Italy had been entrusted to Stilicho, who had been observing his movements with a small army, consisting of picked soldiers, and reinforced by a contingent of Huns and Goths, commanded by their chiefs Huldn and Sarus. Stilicho now approached to save Florence if possible, and to do his utmost for the preservation of Rome. The barbarians were entrenched on the hills of Faesulae in a strong position, but Stilicho succeeded in surrounding those barren rocks by an extensive line of circumvallation, till Radagaisus was compelled, by the failure of food, to issue forth and offer battle. He was driven back within his own lines, and at last capitulated, on condition that his own and his people's lives should be saved. But Stilicho violated the agreement; Radagaisus was put to death, and his warriors were sold as slaves. This miserable end of the barbarians and the fortunate de- stroyers of Florence was not to yield siege to a Maremma. (Zosim. v. p. 331, ed. Oxon. 1679; Jornand. De Regn. Success. p. 56, ed. Lindenborg; Oros. vii. 37; Augustin. de Civ. Dei, v. 23; Marcellin. and Prosper, Chronic.)

M. RAECIUS. 1. Was sent as ambassador into Gaul, with Sex. Antistius, in B.C. 208, to make inquiries respecting the apprehended march of Hasdrubal into Italy. (Liv. xxvii. 36.)
2. Praetor b.c. 170. (Liv. xlii. 11.)
RAGONIUS. 1. Ragonius Celsus, governed the Gauls under the emperor Severus, who addressed a letter to him, which is preserved by Spartianus. (Spartian. Psec. Niger. 3.)
2. Ragonius Clarus, praefectus of Illyricum and the Gauls under the emperor Valerian, who addressed a letter to him, which is likewise preserved. (Trebell. Poll. Tripl. Tyr. 19.)
3. L. Ragonius Quintianus, consul with M. Marcius Bassus, in the reign of Diocletian, a.d. 289 (Fasti.)
RALLA. The name of a plebian family of the Marcia gens.
1. M. Marcius Ralla, praetor urbanus b.c. 204. He accompanied Scipio to Africa, and was one of the legates whom Scipio sent to Rome in b.c. 202, with the Carthaginian ambassadors, when the latter sued for peace. (Liv. xxix. 11, 13, xxx. 38.)
2. Q. Marcius Ralla, was created duumvir in b.c. 194, for dedicating a temple, and again in b.c. 192, for the same purpose. (Liv. xxxiv. 52, xxxv. 41.)

RACILIUS.

RACILIUS, a Roman architect of the time of Domitian, who is highly praised by Martial for his skill as an artist and his virtues as a man (vii. 56, x. 71). The erection of Domitian's palace on the Palatine is ascribed to him by modern writers, but on what authority we have been unable to discover. (Hirt, Geschicthe der Baukunst, vol. ii. p. 350; Müller, Archäologie der Kunst, § 190, n. 3.)

L. RABO'N IUS, was one of the sufferers from the unrighteous decisions of Verres, in his praetorship, B.C. 74. (Cic. Verr. i. 50, 51.)

RABUL' E IUS. 1. C. Rabuleius, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 456, attempted to mediate between the consuls in the disputes occasioned between them by the agrarian law; opposed by the praetor Faunus;Liv. iii. 3; Varr. Post. Dei, x. 15; Sueton. Longi. x. 8.)
2. M. Rabuleius, a member of the second centurione, B.C. 450 (Liv. iii. 35; Dionys. x. 58, xi. 23.). Dionysius (x. 58) calls him a patri- cian, whereas he speaks of the other Rabuleius [No. 1] as a plebeian. As no other persons of this name are mentioned by ancient writers, we have no means for determining whether the gens was patrician or plebeian.

RAC' ILIA, the wife of L. Quintius Cincinnatus.

(RLiv. iii. 26.)

L. RACL' IUS, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 56, was a warm friend of Cicero and of L. Lentulus Spinther. Cicero had returned from exile in the preceding year, and Racilius had then distinguished himself by his exertions to obtain the recall of the orator. In his tribunitiate he attacked Clodius in the senate, with the utmost severity; and he allowed Cicero to publish, under his name, an edict against the Roman citizens in arms. This document, which is cited by an ancient scholiast under the name of Edictum L. Racillii Tribuni Plebi, is now lost (Cic. pro Scaev. 22; ad Q. Fr. ii. 1. § 2, ii. § 5, ad Fam. i. 7. § 2; Schol. Bob. pro Planc. p. 268, ed. Orelli). In the civil war Racilius espoused Caesar's party, and was with his army in Spain in B.C. 48. There he entered into the conspiracy formed against the life of Q. Cassius Longinus, the governor of that province, and was put to death with the other conspirators, by Longinus. (Longinus, No. 15.) (Hirt, B. Alex. 52, 55.)
REBLIUS.

L. RA'MMIUS, a leading man at Brundisium, was accustomed to entertain the Roman general as his guest. It was said that Perseus, king of Macedonia, endeavoured to persuade him to poison such Roman generals as he might indicate, but that Ramnius disclosed the treacherous offer first to the legate C. Valerius, and then to the Roman senate. Persius, however, in an embassy which he sent to the senate, strongly denied the truth of the charge, which he maintained was a pure invention of Ramnius. (Liv. xlii. 17, 41; Appian, Mac. 9, § 4, who calls him Erennius.)

RAMNIUS, a freedman of M. Antonius, whom he accompanied in the Parthian war. (Plut. Ant. 48.)

RAMSES, the name of many kings of Egypt of the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth dynasties. It was during this era that most of the great monuments of Egypt were erected, and the name is consequently of frequent occurrence on these monuments, where it appears under the form of Rameses. In Julius Africanus and Eusebius it is written Ramses, Rameses, or Ramesses. The most celebrated of the kings of this time is, however, usually called Sesostri by the Greek writers. [Sesostris.]

RA'NIUS, a name of rare occurrence. Cicero (ad Att. xii. 21) speaks of a Ranius, who may have been a slave or a freedman of Brutus. There was a L. Ranius Acontius Optatus, who was consul in the reign of Constantine, A.D. 334 (Vasti).

RAVILLA, an agnomen of L. Cassius Longinus, consul b. c. 127. [Longinus, No. 4.]

REBLIUS, the name of a family of the plebeian Castrinian gens.

1. C. CATINIUS REBLIUS, praetor b. c. 171, obtained Sicily as his province. (Liv. xlii. 20, 31.)

2. M. CATINIUS REBLIUS, probably a brother of the preceding, was sent by the senate into Macedon, in b. c. 170, along with M. Fulvius Plaetus, in order to investigate the reason of the want of success of the Roman arms in the war against Persus. In b. c. 167 he was one of the three ambassadors appointed by the senate to conduct the Thracian hostages back to Cotys. (Liv. xliii. 11, xlv. 42.)

3. C. CATINIUS REBLIUS, was one of Caesar's legates in Gaul in b. c. 52 and 51, and accompanied him in his march into Italy in b. c. 49. Caesar sent him, together with Scribonius Libo, with overtures of peace to Pompey, when the latter was on the point of leaving Italy. In the same year he crossed over to Africa with C. Curio, and was one of the few who escaped with their lives when Curio was defeated and slain by Juba. In b. c. 48 he again fought in Africa, but with more success, for he now undertook the command of Caesar himself. After the defeat of Scipio he took the town of Thapsus, on which occasion Hirtius calls him proconsul. In the following year, b. c. 45, during the war in Spain, there was a report that he had perished in a shipwreck (Cic. ad Att. xii. 37, § 4, 44, § 4); but this was false, for he was then in command of the garrison at Hispalis. On the last day of December in this year, on the sudden death of the consul Q. Fabius Maximus, Caesar made Reblius consul for the few remaining hours of the day. Cicero made himself merry at this appointment, remarking that no one had died in this consulate; that the consul was so wonderfully vigilant that he had never slept during his term of office; and that it might be asked under what consulship he had been consul. (Caes. B. G. vii. 83, 90, xvi. 24, &c., B. C. i. 26, ii. 24; Hort. B. Afr. 86, 93, B. Hisp. 35; Dion Cass. xliii. 49, 50; Cic. ad Fam. vii. 30; Suet. Cat. 76, Nov. 19, Plin. H. N. vii. 53, s. 54; Tac. Hist. iii. 37; Plut. Cat. 58; Macrob. Sat. ii. 3.)

4. (CANINIUS) REBLIUS, probably a brother of No. 3, was proscribed by the triumvirs b. c. 43, but escaped to Sex. Pompey in Sicily. (Appian, B. C. iv. 48.)

5. C. CATINIUS REBLIUS, probably a son of No. 3, was consul successively in b. c. 12 (Joseph. Antig. xiv. 10, § 20). In the Fasti Capitolini he is said to have died in his year of office, and could not therefore have been the man of consular rank mentioned by Seneca (de Benef. ii. 21), according to the supposition of Drummann.

6. (CANINIUS) REBLIUS, a man of consular rank, and of great wealth but bad character, sent a large sum of money as a present to Julius Gracchi, who refused to accept it on account of the character of the donor (Sen. de Benef. ii. 21). The name of this Reblius does not occur in the Fasti, and he must, therefore, have been one of the consules suffecti. As Julius Gracchus was put to death in the reign of Caligula, it is very probable that the Reblius mentioned above is the same as the C. Aminius Reblus, who put an end to his own life in the reign of Nero. Tacitus describes him as a person of great wealth and bad character, and also states that he was then an old man (Ann. xiii. 30). As the name of C. Aminius Reblus is evidently corrupt, there can be little doubt that we should change it, as Lipsius proposed, into Caninius Reblus. (Respecting the Canini Reblus in general, see Drummann, Geschichte Rom., vol. ii. pp. 107-109.)

REBLIUS, C. AMI/NIUS. [REBLIUS, No. 6.]

RECARANUS, also called Garanus, a fabulous Italian shepherd of gigantic bodily strength and courage. It is related of him that Cacus, a wicked robber, once stole eight oxen of the herd of Recaranus, which had strayed in the valley of the Circus Maximus, and which the robber carried into his den in Mount Aventine. He dragged the animals along by their tails, and Recaranus would not have discovered them, had not their hiding-place been betrayed by their lowing. Recaranus accordingly entered the cave and slew the robber, notwithstanding his great strength. Hereupon he dedicated to Jupiter the ara maxima, at the foot of the Aventine, and sacrificed to the god the tenth part of the booty. The name Recaranus seems to be connected with gevre or creare, and to signify the recoverer. The fact of his being a gigantic shepherd is recorded, according to Festus, nobody had ever seen a shepherd who led the Romans at an early time to consider him as identical with the Greek Heracles, who was said to have made an expedition to the west of Europe; but the whole story of Recaranus is a genuine Italian legend, without any connection with that about Heracles, although the belief in the identity of the two heroes was so general among the later Romans, that Recaranus was entirely thrown into the back ground. (Serv. ad Aen. viii. 203, 275; Macrob. Sat. i. 12; Aurel. Vict. Orig. Gent. Rom. 6; comp. Hartung, Die Religion der Römer, vol. ii. p. 21, &c.)

RECENTUS, NONIUS. [NONIUS, No. 9.]

RECTUS, AEMILIUS, governor of Egypt during the reign of Tiberius, sent to the emperor upon one occasion a larger sum of money than was ordered, whereupon Tiberius wrote back to him that he wished him to shear, not shave his sheep. (Dion Cass. iv. 10; comp. Suet. Tib. 10; Oros. vii. 4.)

REDICULUS, a Roman divinity, who had a temple near the Porta Capena, and who was believed to have received his name from having induced Hannibal, when he was near the gates of the city, to return (redire) southward (Fest. p. 292, ed. Müller). A place on the Appian road, near the second mile-stone from the city, was called Campus Rediculi (Plin. H. N. xiii. 60. § 122; Propert. iii. 3, 11). This divinity was probably one of the Lares of the city of Rome, for, in a fragment of Varro (ap. Non. p. 47), he calls himself Tutanus, i.e., the god who keeps safe. [L. S.]

REDUX, i.e., "the divinity who leads the traveller back to his home in safety," occurs as a surname of Fortuna. (Martial, viii. 83; Claudian, de Consol. Hon. vi. 1.) [L. S.]

REGALIA'NUS, P. C., as the name appears on medals; REGALLIANUS, as he is called by Victor (de Caes.).; or REGILLIANUS, according to Victor, in his Epitome, and Trebellus Pollio, who ranks him among the thirty tyrants [see Aurelius Victor, de Caesaribus, iv. 34, 35, and Liv. xlii. 23, 24]; he was, as it is said, to Decibalus, distinguished himself by his military achievements on the Ilyrian frontier, was commended in the warmest terms by Claudius, at that time in a private station, and promoted to a high command by Valerian. The Moesians, terrified by the cruelties inflicted by Gallienus on those who had taken part in the rebellion of Ingenuus, suddenly proclaimed Regalianus emperor, and quickly, with the consent of the soldiers, in a new fit of alarm, put him to death. These events took place A. D. 265. (Aurel. Vict. de Caes. xxxiii. Epist. xxxiii.; Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrann. ix.) [W. R.]

REGILLA, the wife of Herodes Atticus. (Philostro. Vit. Soph. vi. 1, §§ 5, 8.) [Atticus, Herodes.]

REGILLENSIS, an agnomen of the Claudii [Claudius], and of the Albinii, a family of the Postumius gens [Albinus].

REGILLUS, the name of a family of the patrician house of Regillus.

1. M. Aemilius Regillus, had been declared consul, with T. Otacilius, for B. C. 214, by the centuriae praerogativa, and would undoubtedly have been elected, had not Q. Fabius Maximus, who presided at the comitia, pointed out that there was need of generals of more experience to cope with Hannibal, and urged in addition, that Regillus, in consequence of his being Flamen Quirinalis, ought not to leave the city. Regillus and Otacilius were therefore disappointed in their expectations, and Fabius Maximus himself was elected, with M. Claudius Marcellus, in their stead. Regillus died in B. C. 205, at which time he is spoken of as Flamen Martialis. (Liv. xxiv. 7, 8, 9, xix. 11.)

2. L. Aemilius Regillus, probably son of the preceding, was praetor B. C. 190, in the war against Antiochus. He received as his province the command of the fleet, and carried on the naval operations with vigour and success. Supported by the Rhodians, he defeated the fleet of Antiochus, commanded by Polyzenidas, near Myonnesus, a small island off the Ionian coast, and afterwards took the town of Phocaea [Polyzenidas]. He obtained a triumph on his return to Rome in the following year. (Liv. xxxvi. 45, xxxvii. 2, 4, 14—32, 58; Appian, Syr. 26, 27.)

3. M. Aemilius (Regillus), a brother of No. 2, whom he accompanied in the war against Antiochus: he died at Samos in the course of the year, B. C. 186. (Liv. xxxvii. 22.)

It would appear that this family became extinct soon afterwards. We learn from a letter of Cicero (ad Att. xii. 24. § 2) that Lepidus, probably M. Aemilius Lepidus, consul B. C. 78, had a son named Regillus, who was dead at the time that Cicero wrote. It is probable that Lepidus wished to revive the cognomen of Regillus in the Aemilian gens, just as he did that of Paulus, which he gave as a surname to his eldest son. [See Vol. II. p. 765, b.]

L. REGIL'NUS, tribune of the people, B. C. 95, is cited by Valerius Maximus (iv. 7. § 3) as a striking instance of a true friend. He was not only content with liberating from prison his friend Q. Servilius Caepio, who had been condemned in that year on account of the destruction of his army by the Cimbri, but he also accompanied him in his exile.

REGIN'NUS, C. ANTI'STIUS, one of Caesar's legates in Gaul (Caes. B. G. vi. 1, vii. 83, 90). This Regenus appears to be the same person as the one who Cicero mentions as his friend in B. C. 49 (ad Att. x. 12), and who had then the command of the coast of the Lower Sea. He is also in all probability the same as the C. Antonius Regius, whose name appears as a triumvir of the mint on the coins of Augustus. On the coin annexed the obverse represents the head of Augustus, and the reverse various instruments used by the pontiffs. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 137.)

COIN OF C. ANTI'STIUS REGI'NUS.

REGI'NUS, T. POM'PEIUS, lived in Further Gaul, and was passed over by his brother in his testament. (Val. Max. vii. 8. § 4; Varr. R. R. iii. 12.)

REGULUS, M. AQUI'L'US, was one of the delatores or informers in the time of Nero, and thus rose from poverty to great wealth. He was accused in the senate at the commencement of the reign of Vespasian, on which occasion he was defended by L. Vipstanus Messalla, who is described as his frater, whether his brother or cousin is uncertain (Tac. Hist. iv. 42). Under Domitian he resumed his old trade, and became one of the instruments of that tyrant's cruelty. He survived Domitian, and is frequently spoken of by Pliny with the greatest detestation and contempt (Ep. i. 5, ii. 10, iv. 2, vi. 2). Martial, on the contrary, who flattered all the creatures of Domitian, can scarcely find language strong enough to celebrate the virtues of the wise man, and the eloquence of Regulus. (Ep. i. 13, 83, 112, iv. 16.)

REGUL'US, ATT'IUS. 1. M. ATTIUS RE'GULUS, consul B. C. 335, with M. Valerius Corvus, marched with his colleague against the Sidicini. (Livy viii. 16.)
2. M. Attilius Regulus, probably son of No. 1., was consul B.C. 294, with L. Postumius Megellus, and carried on war with his colleague against the Samnites. The events of this year were related very differently by the annalists. According to the account which Livy followed, Regulus was first defeated with great loss near Luceria, but on the following day he gained a brilliant victory over the Samnites, of whom 7200 were sent under the yoke. Livy says that Regulus was refused a triumph, but this is contradicted by the Post Flavius, according to which he triumphed de Volosonis et Samnitibus. The name of the Volosones does not occur elsewhere. Niebuhr conjectures that they may be the same as the Volcentes, who are mentioned along with the Hirpini and Lucani (Liv. xxvii. 15), or perhaps even the same as the Volscini of Volscinuses. (Liv. x. 32—37; Zonar. viii. 1; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. pp. 389, 390.)

3. M. Attilius, M. F. L. N. Regulus, was consul for the first time in B.C. 267, with L. Julius Libo, conquered the Sallentini, took the town of Brundusium, and obtained in consequence the honour of a triumph. (Eutrop. ii. 17; Flor. i. 20; Zonar. viii. 7; comp. Liv. Epit. 15.) Eleven years afterwards, B.C. 256, he was consul a second time with L. Manlius Vulo Longus, and was elected in the place of Q. Caecidius, who had died soon after he came into office. This was the ninth year of the first Punic war. The Romans had resolved to make a strenuous effort to bring the contest to a conclusion, and had accordingly determined to invade Africa with a great force. The two consuls set sail with 330 ships, took the legions on board in Sicily, and then put out to sea from Emmaus in order to cross over to Africa. The Carthaginian fleet, however, was waiting for them under the command of Hamilcar and Hanno at Hercules' Minos, and immediately sailed out to meet them. In the battle which followed, the Romans were victorious; they lost only twenty-four ships, while they destroyed thirty of the enemy's vessels, and took sixty-four with all their crews. The passage to Africa was now clear; and the Carthaginian fleet hastened home to defend the capital. The Romans, however, did not sail straight to Carthage, but landed their forces near the town of Clypea or Aspis, which they took, and there established their head quarters. From thence they devastated the Carthaginian territory with fire and sword, and collected an immense booty from the defenceless country. On the approach of winter, Manlius, one of the consuls, returned to Rome with half of the army, by order of the senate; while Regulus remained with the other half to prosecute the war. He carried on operations with the utmost vigour, and was greatly assisted by the incompetency of the Carthaginians. The enemy had collected a considerable force, which they intrusted to three commanders, Hasdrubal, Bostar, and Hamilcar; but these generals avoided the plains, where their cavalry and elephants would have given them an advantage over the Roman army, and withdrew into the mountains. There they were attacked by Regulus, and utterly defeated with great loss; 15,000 men are said to have been killed in battle, and 5000 men with eighteen elephants to have been taken. The Carthaginians succeeded in burning without the walls of the city, and Regulus now overran the country without opposition. Numerous towns fell into the power of the Romans, and among others Tunis, at the distance of only 20 miles from the capital. To add to the distress of the Carthaginians, the Numidians took the opportunity of recovering their independence, and their roving bands completed the devastation of the country. The Carthaginians in despair sent a herald to Regulus to solicit peace. But the Roman general, who was intoxicated with success, would only grant it on such intolerable terms that the Carthaginians resolved to continue the war, and hold out to the last. In the midst of their distress and alarm, success came to them from an unexpected quarter. Among the Greek mercenaries who had lately arrived at Carthage, was a Laesicaedonuan of the name of Xanthippus, who appears to have already acquired no small military reputation, though his name is not mentioned previously. He pointed out to the Carthaginians that their defeat was owing to the incompetency of their generals, and not to the superiority of the Roman arms; and he inspired such confidence in the people, that he was forthwith placed at the head of their troops. Relying on his 4000 cavalry and 100 elephants, Xanthippus boldly marched into the open country to meet the enemy, though his forces were very inferior in number to the Romans. Regulus was neither able nor willing to measure the battle thus offered; but it ended in his total overthrow. Thirty thousand of his men were slain; scarcely two thousand escaped to Clypen; and Regulus himself was taken prisoner with five hundred more. This was in the year B.C. 255. (Polyb. i. 26—24; Liv. Epit. 17, 18; Eutrop. ii. 21, 22; Oros. iv. 8; Zonar. viii. 12, 13; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 40.)

Regulus remained in captivity for the next five years, till B.C. 250, when the Carthaginians, after their defeat by the proconsul Metellus, sent an embassy to Rome to solicit peace, or at least an exchange of prisoners. They allowed Regulus to accompany the ambassadors on the promise that he would return to Rome if their proposals were declined, thinking that he would persuade his countrymen to agree to an exchange of prisoners in order to obtain his own liberty. This embassy of Regulus is one of the most celebrated stories in Roman history. The orators and poets related how Regulus at first refused to enter the city as a slave of the Carthaginians; how afterwards he would not give his opinion in the senate, as he had ceased by his captivity to be a member of that illustrious body: how, at length, when he was allowed by his countrymen to speak, he endeavoured to dissuade the senate from assenting to a peace, or even to an exchange of prisoners, and when he saw them wavering, from their desire of redeeming him from captivity, how he told them that the Carthaginians had given him a slow poison, which would soon terminate his life; and how, finally, when the senate through his influence refused the offers of the Carthaginians, he firmly resisted all the persuasions of his friends to remain in Rome, and returned to Carthage, where a martyr's death awaited him. On his arrival at Carthage he is said to have been put to death with the most excruciating tortures. It was related that he was placed in a chest covered over in the inside with iron nails, and thus perished; and other writers stated in addition, that after his eyelids had been cut off, he was first thrown into a dark dungeon, and then suddenly exposed to the full rays of a burning sun. When the news of the barbarous death of Regulus reached Rome, the senate, the people of Rome, to have given him burial and Bostar, two of the most barbarous prisoners, to the family of Regulus, who revenged themselves by putting them to death with cruel tortures. (Liv. Epit. 18; Gall. vi. 4; Diod. xxiv. p. 566, ed. Wesseling; Appian, Sc. 2, Pun. 4; Dion Cass. Fragm. p. 62, ed. Reimarus, p. 541, ed. Mai; Zonar. viii. 15; Val. Max. i. 1, § 14, ix. 2. ext. 1; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 40; Flor. ii. 2; Cic. de Off. iii. 26, pro Sext. 59, Cat. 20, in Pison. 19, de Fin. v. 27, 29, et alibi; Hor. Carm. iii. 5; Sil. Ital. vi. 299, &c.)

This celebrated tale, however, has not been allowed to pass without question in modern times. Even as early as the sixteenth century Palmerius declared it to be a fable, and supposed that it was invented in order to excuse the cruelties perpetrated by the family of Regulus on the Carthaginian prisoners committed to their custody. (See the remarks of Palmerius, in Schwighäuser's Appian, vol. iii. p. 554, ed. 1846.) This opinion has been adopted by many modern writers; but their chief argument is the silence of Polybius respecting it. Niebuhr believes (Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 599) that Regulus died a natural death; but since all the ancient authorities agree in stating that he was put to death by the Carthaginians, we see no reason for disbelieving this fact, though the account of his barbarous treatment is probably only one of those wild stories which the Romans constantly indulged in against their hated rivals. The pride and arrogance with which he treated the Carthaginians in the hour of his success must have deeply exasperated the people against him; and it is therefore not surprising that he fell a victim to their vengeance when nothing was any longer to be gained from his life. The question of the death of Regulus is discussed at length by Hallius (Geschichte Romes im Zeitalter der Punicischen Kriege, Leipzig, 1846, pp. 356–360), who maintains the truth of the common account.

Regulus was one of the favourite characters of early Roman story. Not only was he celebrated on account of his heroism in giving the senate advice which secured him a martyr's death, but also on account of his frugality and simplicity of life. Like Fabricius and Curius he lived on his hereditary farm which he cultivated with his own hands; and subsequent ages loved to tell how he petitioned the senate for his recall from Africa when he was in the full career of victory, as his farm was going to ruin in his absence, and his family was suffering from want. (Comp. Liv. Epit. 18; Val. Max. iv. 4. § 6.)

4. C. ATILIU S M. P. M. N. REGULUS SERRANUS, was consul for the first time in B.C. 257, with Cn. Cornelius Blasio, and prosecuted the war against the Carthaginians. He defeated the Carthaginian fleet off the Liparian islands, though not without considerable loss; obtained possession of the islands of Lipara and Melite, which he laid waste with fire and sword, and received the honour of a naval triumph on his return to Rome (Polyb. i. 25; Zonar. viii. 12; Oros. iv. 8; Fasti Capitol.). Regulus was consul a second time in B.C. 250, with L. Manlius Vulso. In this year the Romans gained a brilliant victory at Paonumus, under the proconsul Metellus, and thinking that the time had now come to bring the war to a conclusion, they sent the consuls to Sicily with an army of four legions and two hundred ships. Regulus and his colleague Cn. Labienus, the most important possession of the Carthaginians in Sicily; but they were foiled in their attempts to carry the place by storm, and after losing a great number of men, were obliged to turn the siege into a blockade. (Polyb. i. 39, 41–48; Zonar. viii. 15; Oros. iv. 10; Diod. Fragm. xxiv.)

This Regulus is the first Atilius who bears the surname Serranus, which afterwards became the name of a distinct family in the gens. The origin of this name is spoken of under Serranus.

5. M. ATILIU S M. P. M. N. REGULUS, son of the Regulus who perished in Africa (No. 3), was consul for the first time in B.C. 227, with P. Valerius Flaccus, in which year no event of importance is recorded (Fasti; Gall. iv. 9). He was elected consul a second time in B.C. 217, to supply the place of C. Flaminius, who had fallen in the battle of the Marsimene lake. He carried on the war against Hannibal together with his colleague Servilius Geminius, on the principles of the dictator Fabius. At the end of their year of office their imperium was prolonged, as the new consuls had not yet been elected; but when Aemilius Paullus and Terentius Varro were at length appointed, and took the field, Regulus was allowed to return to Rome on account of his age, and his colleague Servilius remained with the army (Liv. xxii. 25, 32, 34, 40). Polybius, on the contrary, says (iii. 114, 116) that Regulus remained with the new consuls, and fell at the battle of Cannae, where he commanded, with Servilius, the centre of the line. This statement, however, is erroneous, and we must for once follow Livy in preference to Polybius, since it is certain that the same Regulus was censor two years after the battle of Cannae. (Comp. Perizoneis, Anaisude. Hist. c. 1, sub san.; and Schwighäuser, ad Polyb. iii. 114.)

After the battle of Cannae, B.C. 216, Regulus was one of the triumviri mensariori, who were appointed on account of the scarcity of money. In B.C. 214 he was censor with P. Furius Philus. These censors punished with severity all persons who had failed in their duty to the state during the great calamities which Rome had lately experienced. All those who had formed the project of leaving Italy after the battle of Cannae, and all those who had been taken prisoners by Hannibal, and when sent as ambassadors to Rome on the promise of returning to the Carthaginian camp, had not redeemed their word, were reduced to the condition of aerarians. The same punishment was inflicted on all the citizens who had neglected to serve in the army for four years without having a valid ground of excuse. Towards the end of the year, when the new tribunes of the people entered upon their duties, one of their number, Metellus, who had been reduced to the condition of an aerarian by the censors, attempted to bring these magistrates to trial before the people, but was prevented by the other tribunes from prosecuting such an unprecedented course (Metellus, No. 2). As Furius Philus died at the beginning of the following year, before the solemn purification (lustrum) of the people had been performed, Regulus, as was usual in such cases, resigned his office. (Liv. xxiii. 21, xxiv. 11, 18, 43; Val. Max. ii. 9. § 8.)

6. C. ATILIU S M. P. M. N. REGULUS, probably a brother of No. 5, consul B.C. 225, with L.
Zonar. and Plin. Oros. quickly of Aerailiug man name NEius (Dion B. B. war, below. struck on were curulis, praefects when C. On of the first these given below. The head on the obverse of the first four is the same, and is probably intended to represent some ancestor of the Reguli. On the obverse of the first we have the legend L. REGULVS FP., and on the reverse REGULVS F. PRAEF. (vr.) The FP. on the obverse signifies praetor, and REGULVS F. on the reverse signifies REGULUS FLIVS. It would, therefore, appear that the coins were struck by Regulus, the son of L. Regulus the praetor; and from the addition of PRAEF. VR., that is, Praefectus Urbi, it would further seem that he was one of the praefecti urbi, who were left by Caesar in charge of the city, when he marched against the sons of Pompey in Spain in B.C. 45. (Dion Cass. xiii. 28.) These praefects had the right of the fases and the sella curulis, as appears from the reverse of the first two coins. The combats of wild beasts on the reverse of the third coin probably refer to the splendid games exhibited by Julius Caesar. The fifth coin was struck at a later time by Regulus, when he was triumvir of the mint under Augustus. On the obverse is the head of Augustus with C. CAESAR III. VIR R. P. C. (i.e. triumvir reipublicae constituentes), and on the reverse a figure of Victory. (Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 235, 237.)

REGULUS, LIVINEIUS. 1, 2. M. LIVINEIUS REGULUS and L. LIVINEIUS REGULUS, two brothers, who were friends of Cicero, and displayed their zeal in his cause when he was banished, B.C. 58. Cicero does not mention their gentle name; but as he speaks of Livineius as a freedman of M. Regulus, and L. Livineius Trypho as a freedman of L. Regulus, there can be no doubt that their gentle name was Livineius (Cic. ad Att. iii. 17, ad Fam. xiii. 60). One of these brothers, probably Lucius, fought under Caesar in the African war, B.C. 46 (Hirt. B. Afr. 69), and he is apparently the same as the L. LIVINEIUS REGULUS, whose name occurs on a great number of coins struck in the time of Julius Caesar and Augustus. Specimens of the most important of these are given below. The head on the obverse of the first four is the same, and is probably intended to represent some ancestor of the Reguli. On the obverse of the first we have the legend L. REGULVS FP., and on the reverse REGULVS F. PRAEF. (vr.) The FP. on the obverse signifies praetor, and REGULVS F. on the reverse signifies REGULUS Filius. It would, therefore, appear that the coins were struck by Regulus, the son of L. Regulus the praetor; and from the addition of PRAEF. VR., that is, Praefectus Urbi, it would further seem that he was one of the praefecti urbi, who were left by Caesar in charge of the city, when he marched against the sons of Pompey in Spain in B.C. 45. (Dion Cass. xiii. 28.) These praefects had the right of the fases and the sella curulis, as appears from the reverse of the first two coins. The combats of wild beasts on the reverse of the third coin probably refer to the splendid games exhibited by Julius Caesar. The fifth coin was struck at a later time by Regulus, when he was triumvir of the mint under Augustus. On the obverse is the head of Augustus with C. CAESAR III. VIR R. P. C. (i.e. triumvir reipublicae constituentes), and on the reverse a figure of Victory. (Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 235, 237.)

3. LIVINEIUS REGULUS, a senator in the reign of Tiberius, who defended Cn. Piso in A.D. 20, when many of his other friends declined the unpopular office. [Piso, No. 23.] He was afterwards expelled from the senate, though on what occasion is not mentioned; and at a still later time, in the reign of Nero, A.D. 59, he was banished on account of certain disturbances which took place at a show of gladiators which he gave. (Tac. Ann. iii. 11, xiv. 17.)

REGULUS, MEMMIUS. [MEMMIUS, Nos. 11 and 12.]

REGULUS, M. METILIUS, consul A.D. 157, with M. Cicero Barbarus (Fasti).

REGULUS, RO'SCIUS, was consul suffectus in the place of Caecina, for a single day in A.D. 69. (Tac. Hist. iii. 37.)

REMMIUS PALAEMON. [Palaemon.]
REMUS, the twin brother of Romulus. [See ROMULUS.]

RE'NIA GEN'S, known to us only from coins, a specimen of which is annexed. On the obverse is the head of Pallas, and on the reverse a chariot drawn by two goats, with C. REN, and underneath ROMA. To what circumstance these goats allude, it is quite impossible to say. (Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 291, 292.)

REPENTINUS. CALPURNIUS, a centurion in the army in Germany, was put to death on account of his fidelity to the emperor Galba, A.D. 69. (Tac. Hist. 1. 56, 59.)

REPOSIA'NUS, the name prefixed to a poem, first published by Burmann, extending to 182 hexameter lines, and entitled, "Concenibus Martis et Veneris." With regard to the author nothing is known. Unless we attribute some inaccuracies in metre and some peculiarities in phraseology to a corrupt text, we must conclude that he belongs to a late epoch, but the piece is throughout replete with grace and spirit, and presents a series of brilliant pictures. Wernsdorff imagines, that for Reposianus we ought to read Nepotianus, merely because the former designation does not elsewhere occur; but this conjecture being altogether unsupported by evidence, will be received with favour by but few. The verses are to be found in Burmann, Anthol. Lat. i. 72, or No. 559, ed. Meyer; see also Wernsdorff, *Poët. Lat. Min. vol. iv. par. i. pp. 32, 319, vol. v. par. iii. pp. 1470, 1477. [W.R.]

RESTIO', A'NTIUS. 1. The author of a sumptuary law, which, besides limiting the expense of entertainments, enacted that no magistrate or magistrate elect should dine abroad anywhere except at the houses of certain persons. This law, however, was little observed; and we are told that Antius never dined out afterwards, that he might not see his own law violated. We do not know in what year this law was passed; but it was subsequent to the sumptuary law of the consul Aemilius Lepidus, b.c. 78, and before the one of Caesar (Gell. ii. 24; Macrobr. Sat. i. 13).

2. Probably a son of the preceding, was proscribed by the triumvirs in b.c. 43, but was preserved by the fidelity of a slave, and by his means escaped to Sex. Pompeins in Sicily. (Val. Max. vi. 8. § 7; Appian, B. C. iv. 43; Macrobr. Sat. i. 11.)

The name of C. Antius Restio occurs on several coins, a specimen of which is annexed. On the obverse is the head of a man, and on the reverse Hercules, holding in one hand a club, and in the other a trophy, with the skin of a lion thrown across his arm. It is conjectured that the head on the obverse is that of the proposer of the sumptuary law mentioned above [No. 1], and that the coin was struck by his son [No. 2]. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 139.

COIN OF C. ANTIUS RESTIO.

RESTITU'TUS, CLAÚ'DIUS, an orator of considerable reputation in the reign of Trajan, was a friend of the younger Pliny, and is likewise celebrated by Martial in an epigram on the anniversary of his birth-day. (Plin. Ep. iii. 9. § 16, vi. 17, viii. 1; Martial, x. 87.)

REX, MA'R'CIUS. 1. Q. MARCIUS REX, tribune of the plebs b.c. 196, proposed to the people to make peace with Philip. (Liv. xxxiii. 25.

2. P. MARCIUS REX, was sent by the senate with two colleagues on a mission to the consul C. Cassius Longinus, in b.c. 171. (Liv. xlii. 1.

RIAMNUSIA.

3. Q. MARCIUS REX, praetor b.c. 144, was commissioned by the senate to build an aqueduct, and in order that he might complete it, his imperium was prolonged for another year. This aqueduct, known by the name of Agua Marcia, was one of the most important, and is spoken of at length in the Dictionary of Antiquities (p. 110, 2d ed.). (Frontin. de *Aquaed. 12; Plin. H. N. xxxi. 3. s. 24; Plut. Coriol. 1.)

4. Q. MARCIUS Q. P. Q. N. REX, consul b.c. 118, with M. Porcius Cato. The colony of Narbo Martius in Gaul was founded in this year. Marcius carried on war against the Stomi, a Ligurian people at the foot of the Alps, and obtained a triumph in the following year on account of his victories over them. Marcius lost during his consulship his only son, a youth of great promise, but had such mastery over his feelings as to meet the senate on the day of his son's burial, and perform his regular official duties (Plin. H. N. iii. 19; Liv. Epit. 62; Oros. v. 14; Fasti Capit.; Val. Max. v. 10. § 3). The sister of this Marcius Rex married C. Julius Caesar, the grandfather of the dictator. [MARCIA, No. 2.]

5. Q. MARCIUS Q. P. REX, probably a grandson of No. 4, was consul b.c. 68, with L. Cassius Metellus. His colleague died at the commencement of his year of office, and as no consul was elected in his place, we find the name of Marcius Rex in the Fasti with the remark, solus consulatum gessit. He was proconsul in Cilicia in the following year, and there refused assistance to Lucullus, at the instigation of his brother-in-law, the celebrated P. Clodius, whom Lucullus had offended. In b.c. 66, Marcius had to surrender his province and army to Pompeius in compliance with the Lex Manilia. On his return to Rome he sued for a triumph, but as obstacles were thrown in the way by certain parties, he remained outside the city to prosecute his claims, and was still the centre of the Catilinarian conspiracy broke out in b.c. 63. The senate sent him to Faesulae, to watch the movements of C. Mallius or Manlius, Catiline's general. Mallius sent proposals of peace to Marcius, but the latter refused to listen to his terms unless he consented first to lay down his arms (Dion Cass. xxxv. 4, 14, 15, 17, xxxvi. 26, 31; *Cic. in Pison. 4; Sall. Hist. 5, Cat. 30, 32—34). Marcius Rex married the eldest sister of P. Clodius [CLAUDIA, No. 7]. He died before b.c. 61, without leaving his brother-in-law the inheritance he had expected (Cic. ad Att. i. 16, § 10).

REX, RU'BRIUS, probably a false reading in Appian (B. C. ii. 113) for Rubrius Ruga. [RUGA.]

RHADAMANTHUS ('Paínamepos'), a son of Zeus and Europa, and brother of king Minos of Crete (Hom. I. xiv. 322), or, according to others, a son of Haphnestes (Paus. viii. 53. § 2). From four of his brother he fled to Oecusis in Boeotia, and there married Alcmea. In consequence of his justice throughout life, he became, after his death, one of the judges in the lower world, and took up his abode in Elysium. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 2, ii. 4. § 11; Hom. Od. iv. 564, vii. 323; Pind. Ol. ii. 137; comp. Gortys. [L.S.]

RHADAMISTUS. [Aρασαδιά, p. 362, b.]

RHAMNUSIA ('Ραμνούσια'), a surname of Nemesis, who had a celebrated temple at Rhamnus in Attica. (Paus. i. 33. § 2, iii. 5. § 3; Strab. ix. p. 396, &c.; Stephan. B. s. v. [L.S.]
RHASCUPORIS.

RHA'AMPHIAS ('Ρακιόνος), a Lacedaemonian, father of Clearchus (Thuc. viii. B. 39; Xen. Hell. ii. I. § 35), was one of the three ambassadors who were sent to Athens in B. C. 432, with the final demand of Sparta for the independence of all the Greek states. The demand was refused, and the Peloponnesian war ensued. (Thuc. i. 139, &c.) In B. C. 422 Rhampis, with two colleagues, commanded a force of 900 men, intended for the strengthening of Brasidas in Thrace; but their passage through Thessaly was opposed by the Thessalians, and, bearing also of the battle of Amphipolis and the death of Brasidas, they returned to Sparta. (Thuc. v. 12, 13.) [E. E.]

RHAMPISNITUS ('Ρακοποτόρος), called RheamPhis by Diodorus, one of the ancient kings of Egypt, is said to have succeeded Proteus, and to have been himself succeeded by Cheops. This king is said to have possessed immense wealth, and in order to keep it safe he had a treasury built of stone, respecting the robbery of which Herodotus relates a romantic story, which bears a great resemblance to the one told by Pausanias (ix. 37, § 4) respecting the treasury built by the two brothers Agamedes and Trophonius of Orchomenus [AgameDes]. Rhampisnitus is said to have built the western propylaeum of the temple of Hephæastus, and to have placed in front of it two large statues, each of the size of twenty-five cubits, which the Egyptians called Summer and Winter. It is further stated that this king descended to Hades and played a game at dice with Demeter, and on his return to the earth a festival was instituted in honour of the goddess (Herod. ii. 121, 122, iv. 62). Rhampisnitus belongs to the twentieth dynasty according to Bunsen, and is known on inscriptions by the name of Rhamessus Neter-bk-pen (Bunsen, Aegypt. Stellen in der Weltgeschichte, vol. iii. pp. 119, 120).

RHAMSES, another form of the name Ramses. [RAMES.] RHARIAS ('Ραράς), a surname of Demeter, which she derived from the Rharian plain in the neighbourhood of Eleusis, the principal seat of her worship. (Paus. i. 38. § 6; Steph. Byz. and Suid. s. v.) [L. S.]

RHARUS ('Ραρός), the father of Triptolemus at Eleusis (Paus. i. 14, § 2). It is worthy of remark, that according to the scholiast (on Il. i. 56), the P in this name had the spiritus lenis. [L. S.]

RHASCUPORIS ('Ρακοποτόρος). 1. Brother of Rhascopus, and with him chieflain of a Thracian clan, whose territories extended from the northern shores of the Propontis to the Hebrus and the neighbourhood of Philippi. Whether the clan were that of the Sapaei or the Korphali, or comprised both races, is uncertain. But it occupied both the mountain ridge that skirts the Propontis and the southern plains which lie between the base of Mount Rhodope and the sea (comp. Appian, B. C. iv. 87, 105; Tac. Ann. ii. 64; Plin. H. N. iv. 11 (18)). We can only thus explain the seeming inconsistency in Appian's account of these chieflains; for he describes their territory as a lofty, cold, and woody region, and yet assigns to them a powerful body of cavalry. In the civil war, B. C. 49—48, Rhascopus joined Ca. Pompey, with 200 horse, as Disturbant, and, in the war that ensued, he aided Cassius 3000, while his brother Rhascos, at the head of an equal number of cavalry, embraced the cause of the triumvirs. According to Appian this was a politic and provident device for mutual security; and it was agreed beforehand that the brother whose party was triumphant, should obtain the pardon of the brother whose party was vanquished. And so, after the victory at Philippi, Rhascopus owed his life to the intercession of Rhascus. Each brother rendered good service to his respective party. When the road from Asia into Macedonia, by Aenos and Maroneia, had been preoccupied by the triumviral leagues, Rhascopus, in whose dominions the passes were, led the armies of Brutus and Cassius by a road through the forest, known only to himself and Rhascus. And Rhascus, on the other hand, by his local knowledge, detected the march of the enemy, and saved his allies from being cut off in the war. (Caes. B. C. iii. 4; Appian, B. C. iv. 87, 103—106, 136; Lucan, Pharsal. v. 55; Dion Cass. xlvi. 25.) For the varieties in the orthography of Rhascopus, e. g., Rhascopolis, Rascyporus, Thracyspolis, &c., see Fabricius, ad Dion Cass. xlvi. 25; Adrian, Turneb. Advers. xiv. 17. On the coins we meet with Varleos 'Rhoskoporkos (Cary, Hist. des Rois de Thrace, pl. 2), and 'Rhoskoporkos (Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 59). Lucan (l. c., ed. Oudendorp) calls him "gelidæ dominum Rhascuporiae one." 2. Brother of Rhometalaces, king of Thrace, and jointly with him defeated, A. d. 6, the Dalmatians and Breucians in Macedonia [Iatø, No. 2]. On the death of Rhometalaces, Rhascopus received from Augustus a portion of his dominions, the remainder being awarded to his nephew Cotys, son of the deceased [Cotys, No. 5]. Rhascopus was, however, an equal with his share of Thrace — the barren mountainous district — assigned him,— or with divided power; but so long as Augustus lived he did not dare to disturb the apportionment. On the emperor's decease, however, he invaded his nephew's kingdom, and hardly desisted at Tiberius' command. Next, on pretence of an amicable adjustment, Rhascopus invited his nephew to a conference, seized his person, and threw him into prison; and finally, thinking a completed crime safer than an imperfect one, put him to death. To Tiberius Rhascopus alleged the excuse of self-defence, and that the arrest and murder of his nephew merely prevented his own assassination. The emperor, however, summoned the usurper to Rome, that the matter might be investigated, and Rhascopus, on pretext of war with the Scythian Bastarnae, began to collect an army. But he was enticed into the Roman camp by Pompeius Flaccus [No. 2], preceptor of Myas, sent to Rome, condemned, and relegated to Alexandria, where an excuse was presently found for putting him to death, A. D. 19. He left a son, Rhometalaces, who succeeded to his father's moiety of Thrace. (Tac. Ann. ii. 64—67, iii. 38; Vell. Pat. ii. 129; Suet. Tib. 37; Dion Cass. lv. 30.)

3. Son of Cotys (probably No. 4), was defeated and slain in battle by Vologases, chief of the Thracian Bessi, and leader of the general revolt of Thrace against the Romans in B. C. 13. (Dion Cass. lv. 34; comp. Vell. Pat. ii. 96.) [W. B. D.]

RHASCUS ('Ραράς), was one of the two chieflains of a Thracian clan. In the civil wars of Augustus and Antony, he espoused the party of Augustus and M. Antony, while his brother Rhascopus embraced that of Brutus and Cassius. After the victory of the triumvirs at Philippi, Rhascus obtained from the conquerors his brother's pardon. (Appian, B. C. iv. 87, 104, 136.) [W. B. D.]

RHATHINES ('Paulyi), a Persian, was one of the commanders sent by Pharnabazus to aid the Bithynians in opposing the passage of the Cyrenian Greeks under Xenophon through Bithynia, b.c. 400. The satrap's forces were completely defeated (Xen. Anab. vi. 5, §§ 7, &c.). We have accounts of him as late as B.c. 396, as one of the commanders of Pharnabazus of a body of cavalry, which worsted that of Agisilas, in a skirmish near Dascyleium. (Xen. Hell. iii. 4, § 13; Plut. Ages. 9.) [E. E.]

RHAZES ('Paulyi), the author of a Greek medical treatise Πείρας Ανωμέχης, which was published at the end of Alexander Trallius, 1514, fol. Latet. Paris, ex offic. Rob. Stephani. His real name is اب بكر محمد بن زكريا الرزاز.

Abû Dâr Mohammed ibn Zawâriqî Ar-Razi, who was born (as his name implies) at Rai, in a town on the right ('Irâk 'Ajenî, near Chorasan, probably about the middle of the ninth century after Christ, and died either a. h. 311 (A. D. 923, 924), or perhaps, more probably a. h. 320 (A. D. 932). The treatise in question is in fact no other than his well known work, يٌ جدري والوصة.

Fi Jadârî tex stał-Hosâb, "On the Small Pox and Measles," which was translated from the original Arabic into Syriac, and from that language into Greek. Neither the date nor the author of either of these versions is known; but the Greek translation (as we learn from thepreface) was made at the command of one of the emperors of Constantinople, perhaps, as Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 692, ed. vet.) conjectures, Constantine Ducas, who reigned from 1059 to 1067. In one of the Greek MSS. at Paris, however (§ 2228, Catal. vol. ii. p. 465), it is attributed to John Acacius [Ac- tuarius] and, if this be correct, the emperor alluded to will probably be only Andronicus II. Palaeologus, A. D. 1281—1328. It was from this Greek translation (which appears to have been executed either very carelessly, or from an imperfect MS.), and from Latin versions made from it, that the work was first known in Europe, the earliest Latin translation made directly from the original Arabic being that which was published by Dr. Mend, in 1747, 8vo, Lond., at the end of his work "De Variolis et Morbillis." The Arabic text was published for the first time by John Channing, in 1766, 8vo, Lond., together with a new Latin version by himself, which has been reprinted separately, and which continues to be the best up to the present time. Altogether the work has been published, in various languages, about five and thirty times, in about three hundred and fifty years,—a greater number of editions than has fallen to the lot of almost any other ancient medical treatise. The only English translation made directly from the original Arabic is that by Dr. Greenhill, 1847, 8vo, London, printed for the Sydenham Society; from which work the preceding account is taken. It may be added that the particular interest which the work has excited, arises from the fact of its being the earliest extant medical treatise in which the Small Pox is certainly mentioned; and accordingly the Greek translator has used the word Ανωμέχη to express this disease, there being in the old Greek language no word that bears this signification. [W. A. G.]

RHEA. ('Pela, 'Pela, 'Peln, or 'Pen). The name as well as the nature of this divinity is one of the most difficult points in ancient mythology. Some consider 'Pela to be merely another form of θεός, the god of the earth, while others connect it with πέλα, I flow (Plut. Cratyl. p. 401, &c.); but thus much seems undeniable, that Rhea, like Demeter, was a goddess of the earth. According to the Hesiodeic Theogony (133; comp. Apollod. i. § 3), Rhea was a daughter of Uranus and Ge, and accordingly a sister of Oceanus, Coeus, Hyperion, Crius, Iapetus, Thein, Themis, and Mnemosyne. She became by Cronos the mother of Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Aides, Poseidon, and Zeus. According to some accounts Cronos and Rhea were preceded in their sovereignty over the world by Opion and Eurynome; but Opion was overpowered by Cronos, and Rhea cast Eurynome into Tartarus. Cronos is said to have devoured all his children by Rhea, but when she was on the point of giving birth to Zeus, she, by the advice of her parents, went to Ilycus in Crete. When Zeus was born she gave to Cronos a stone wrapped up like an infant, and the god swallowed it as he had swallowed his other children. (Hes. Theog. 446, &c.; Apollod. i. § 5, &c.; Diod. v. 70.) Homer (II. xv. 187) makes not only a passing allusion to Rhea, and the passage of Hesiod, which accordingly must be regarded as the most ancient Greek legend about Rhea, seems to suggest that the mystic mysteries of Crete had already formed connections with the more northern parts of Greece. In this manner, it would seem, the mother of Zeus became known to the Thracians, with whom she became a divinity of far greater importance than she had been before in the south (Orph. Hymn. 13, 25, 26), for she was connected with the Thracian goddess Bendis or Cotys (Heo- cete), and identified with Demeter. (Strab. x. p. 470.)

The Thracians, in the mean time, conceived the chief divinity of the Samothracian and Lemnian mysteries as Rhea-Heo-cte, while some of them who had settled in Asia Minor, became there acquainted with still stranger beings, and one especially who was worshipped with wild and enthusiastic solemnities, was found to resemble Rhea. In like manner the Greeks who afterwards settled in Asia identified the Asiatic goddess with Rhea, with whose worship they had long been familiar (Strab. x. p. 471; Hom. Hymn. 13, 31). In Phrygia, where Rhea became identified with Cybele, she is said to have purified Dionysus, and to have taught him the mysteries (Apollod. iii. 5, § 1), and thus a Dionysiac element became amalgamated with the worship of Rhea. Demeter, moreover, the daughter of Rhea, is sometimes mentioned with all the attributes belonging to Rhea. (Enri. Helen. 1304.) The confusion then became so great that the worship of the Cretan Rhea was confounded with that of the Phrygian mother of the gods, and that the orgies of Dionysus became interwoven with those of Cybele. Strangers from Asia, who must be looked upon as jugglers, introduced a variety of novel rites, which were fondly received, especially by the populace (Strab. l. c.; Athen. xii. p. 553; Demosth. de Coron. p. 313). Both the name and the connection of Rhea with Demeter suggest that she was in early times revered as goddess of the earth.
RHEA.

Crete was undoubtedly the earliest seat of the worship of Rhea; Diodorus (v. 66) saw the site where her temple had once stood, in the neighborhood of Chonossus, and it would seem that at one time she was worshipped in that island even under the name of Cybele (Euseb. Chron. p. 56; Synell. Chronogr. p. 125). The common tradition, further, was that Zeus was born in Crete, either on Mount Dicte or Mount Ida. At Delphi there was a stone of not very large dimensions, which was every day anointed with oil, and on solemn occasions was wrapped up in white wool and this stone was believed to have been the one which Cronus swallowed when he thought he was devouring Zeus (Paus. x. 24 § 5). Such local traditions implying that Rhea gave birth to Zeus in this or that place of Greece itself occur in various other localities. Some expressly stated that he was born at Thbes (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 1194). The temple of the Dindymenian goddess had been built by Pindaros (Paus. ix. 25 § 3; Philostr. Ion. ii. 12). Another legend stated that Rhea gave birth at Chersones in Boeotia (Paus. ix. 41 § 3), and in a temple of Zeus at Platanea Rhea was represented in the act of handing the stone covered in cloth to Cronos (Paus. ix. 2 § 5). At Athens there was a temple of Rhea in the peribolos of the Olympicium (Paus. i. 18 § 7), and the Athenians are even said to have been the first among the Greeks who adopted the worship of the mother of the gods (Julian, Orat. 5). Her temple there was called the Metron. The Arcadians also related that Zeus was born in their country, on Mount Lycon, the principal seat of Arcadian religion (Paus. viii. 36 § 2, 41 § 2; comp. Callim. Hymn. in Iov, 10, 16, &c.). Similar traces are found in Messenia (Paus. ix. 33 § 2), Laconia (iii. 22 § 4), in Myssia (Strab. xiii. p. 589), at Cyzicus (i. p. 45, xii. p. 575). Under the name of Cybele, we find her worship on Mount Sipylos (Paus. v. 13 § 4), Mount Codinus (iii. 22 § 4), in Phrygia, which had received its colonists from Thrace, and where she was regarded as the mother of Sabazios. There her worship was quite universal, for there is scarcely a town in Phrygia on the coins of which she does not appear. In Galatia she was chiefly worshipped at Pessinus, where her sacred image was believed to have fallen from heaven (Herod. i. 35). King Mithradates I built a temple to her, and introduced festive solemnities, and subsequently a more magnificent one was erected by one of the Attaii. Her name at Pessinus was Agdistis (Strab. xiii. p. 567). Her priests at Pessinus seem from the earliest times to have been, in some respects, the rulers of the place, and to have derived the greatest possible advantages from their priestly functions. Even after the image of the goddess was carried from Pessinus to Rome, Pessinus still continued to be looked upon as the metropolis of the great goddess, and as the principal seat of her worship. Under different names we might trace the worship of Rhea even much further east, as far as the Euphrates and even Bactria. She was, in fact, the great goddess of the Eastern world, and we find her worshipped there in a variety of forms and under a variety of names. As regards the Romans, they had from the earliest times worshipped Jupiter and his mother Ops, the wife of Saturn. When, therefore, we read (Liv. xxix. 11, 14) that, during the Hannibalian war, they fetched the image of the mother of the gods from Pessinus, we must understand that the wor-

Thracian. The name of the Thracian kings appears under the form of Rhescoporis, both on coins and in the best writers, while on the coins of the kings of Bosporus we always have the form Rhescoporis. (Eckhel, vol. ii. pp. 375—377.)

Rhescoporis I., was king in the reign of Tiberius, as is evident from the annexed coin, by which we learn that he assumed the name of Tiberius Julius. He continued king at the accession of Caligula, as both the name and head of that emperor appears on his coins; but he must have died or been driven out of his kingdom soon afterwards, as Caligula made Polemon king both of Pontus and Bosporus in A.D. 39. [Polemon, p. 434, b.]

Rhescoporis II., a contemporary of Domitian, whose head appears on the annexed coin.

Rhescoporis III., a contemporary of Caracalla and Alexander Severus, whose heads appear on his coins.

There was also a Rhescoporis IV., who was a contemporary of Valerian, and a Rhescoporis V., a contemporary of Constantine the Great.

Rhesus (Ῥῆσος). 1. A river-god in Bithynia, one of the sons of Oceanus and Thetys. (Hes. Theog. 340; Hom. II. xii. 21; comp. Strab. xiii. p. 590.)

2. A son of king Eionus in Thrace, and an ally of the Trojans in their war with the Greeks. He possessed horses white as snow and swift as the wind, which were carried off by night by Odysseus and Diomedes, the latter of whom murdered Rhesus himself in his sleep (Hom. II. x. 435, 495, &c.; Virg. Aen. i. 469, with Serv. note).

In later writers Rhesus is described as a son of Strymon and Euterpe, or Calliope, or Terpsichore. (Apollod. i. 3. § 4; Conon, Narral. 4; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 817; Eurip. Rhesus.) [L.S.]

Rheks'enos (Ῥήξ'ένος), two mythical personages, one the father of Chalciope, and the second a son of Nausithous the king of the Pheacians, and accordingly a brother of Alcinous. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 6; Hom. Od. vii. 64, &c.) [L.S.]

Rhianus (Ῥιάνος), of Crete, was a distinguished Alexandrian poet and grammarian, in the latter part of the third century B.C. According to Suidas (s. v.), he was a native of Bene, or, as some said, of Cernea, two obscure cities in Crete; while others made him a native of Ithome in Messenia, a statement easily explained by the supposition that Rhianus spent some time at Ithome, while collecting materials for his poem on the Messenian Wars. He was at first, as Suidas further tells us, a slave and keeper of the palaestra; but afterwards, having been instructed, he became a grammarian. The statement of Suidas, that he was contemporary with Eratosthenes, not only indicates the time at which he lived, but suggests the probability that he lived at Alexandria in personal and literary connection with Eratosthenes.

On the ground of this statement, Clinton fixes the age of Rhianus at B.C. 222.

He wrote, according to the common text of Suidas, ἐμετρα ποιμάτα, ἡρακλέδα ἐν βιδλούς β', where there can be little doubt that we should read ἐμετρα ποιμάτα, since the epic poems of Rhianus were certainly those of his works to which he chiefly owed his fame. Thus Athenaeus expressly designates him ἐπονοῦς (ξ. p. 499 d.). His poems are mentioned by Suetonius (Tit. 70), as among those productions of the Alexandrian school, which the emperor Tiberius admired and imitated.

The subject of the epic poems of Rhianus were taken either from the old mythology, or from the annals of particular states and countries. Of the former class were his Ἡρακλεία (not Ἡρακλείας, as Suidas has it), and of the latter his Ἀδαία, Ἡλιακά, Θεσσαλικά, and Μεσσηνιακά. It is quite uncertain what was the subject of his poem entitled Φίμη, which is only known to us by a single line quoted by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Αράκλενος). For a full account of the extant fragments of these poems, and for a discussion of their subjects, the reader is referred to Meineke's essay on Rhianus, in his Analekta Alexandrinia. (See also Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 764, 785; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. pp. 512, 513.)

Like most of the Alexandrian poets, Rhianus was also a writer of epigrams. Ten of his epigrams are preserved in the Palatine Anthology, and one by Athenaeus. They treat of amatory subjects with much freedom; but they all excel in elegance of language, cleverness of invention, and simplicity of expression. He had a place in the Garland of Melineger. (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 479, ii. p. 526; Jacob's Anth. Græc. vol. i. p. 229, vol. xiii. pp. 945—947; Meineke, pp. 206—212.)

Respecting the grammatical works of Rhianus, we only know that he is frequently quoted in the Scholiast on Homer, as one of the commentators on the poet.

The fragments of Rhianus have been printed in most of the old collections of the Greek poets (see RHODE.

RHINTHON (πρήθων), of Syracuse or Tarentum, a dramatic poet, of that species of burlesque tragedy, which was called φασκογραφία or ἑλαφροτριγυρία, flourished in the reign of Ptolemy I, king of Egypt (Suid. s. v.). When he is placed by Suidas and others at the head of the composers of this burlesque drama, we are not to suppose that he actually invented it, but that he was the first to develop in a written form, and to introduce into Greek literature, a species of dramatic composition, which had already long existed as a popular amusement among the Greeks of southern Italy and Sicily, and especially at Tarentum. He was followed by other writers, such as Seopater, Sciras, and BLaæus.

The species of drama which Rhinthon cultivated may be described as an exhibition of the subjects of tragedy, in the spirit and style of comedy. It is plain, from the fragment which has been given to us, that the comic licence extended to the metres, which are sometimes even more irregular than in the Attic comedians (Heathast. p. 9, Gaisf.). A poet of this description was called φασκογραφ. This name, and that of the drama itself, φασκογραφία, seem to have been the genuine terms used at Tarentum.

Of the personal history of Rhinthon we know nothing beyond the statement of Suidas, that he was the son of a potter. He is said to have written thirty-eight dramas (Suid. s. v.; Steph. Byz. s. v. Τάρατος), of which we still possess the following titles: Αμφίρρωπος, Πράξαλκης, Τριγυρίας ἐν Ἀδηλίς, Τριγυρίας ἐν Τάρατος, Οἰστέρης, Τάλαφος. He is several times quoted by Athenaeus, Hesychius, and other Greek writers, and by Cicerio (ad Att. i. 20), and Varro (R. R. iii. 3 § 1285).

One of the Greek grammarians tells us that Rhinthon was the first who wrote comedy in hexameter verse; the meaning of which probably is, that in his dramas the dactylic hexameter was largely used, as well as the iambic trimeter (I. Lydus, de Magistr. R. i. 41). The same writer further asserts that the satire of Lucilius sprung from an imitation of the comedy of Rhinthon, just as that of the subsequent Roman satirists was derived from the Attic comedians; but to this statement little credit can be attached.

RHODE (Ῥόδη), a daughter of Poseidon by Amphitrite, was married to Helios, and became by him the mother of Phaeton and his sisters (Apollo. i. 4 § 4). It should be observed that the names Rhodos and Rhode are often confounded (Died. v. 55, comp. Rhodos). A second person bearing the name of Rhode, was one of the Danaids. (Apollod. ii. 1 § 5.) [L. S.]

RHODEIA (Ῥόδεια), a daughter of Oceanus and Thetys, was one of the playmates of Persophone. (Hes. Theog. 351; Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 451.) [L. S.]

RHODOGUNE. [Aristot. p. 355, a.]

RHODON (Ῥόδων), called, in the Hœirotonica Indicata, extant under the name of Jerome, Corodon, a Christian writer of the second century. He was a native of Proconsular Asia, but appears to have removed to Rome, where he was instructed (μαθητευθεὶς), perhaps converted to Christianity, by Tatian [Tattianus]. Nothing more is known of his history than that he took an active part against the heretics of his day; being certainly engaged against the Marcionites, with one of whom, Apelles [Apelles], he had a personal discussion; and probably against the Montanists. Jerome places him in the time of Commodus and Severus, i.e. A. D. 180—211.

He wrote:—1. Adversus Marcionem Opus. From this work Eusebius, in his account of Rhodon, has given one or two brief citations. It was addressed to one Callistion, and contained Rhodon’s account of his conference with Apelles, which is extracted by Eusebius. According to this account Rhodon silenced his antagonist, and held him up to ridicule. Certainly he appears to have possessed too much of that self-confidence and fondness for reviling which has characterized polycrimal writers. Marcion is term’d by him “the Pontic Wolf.” The fragments of this work of Rhodon are valuable as showing the diversity of opinions which prevailed among the Marcionites. 2. Et ἡν ἡ ἐξήγησις ὑπόμνημα, Commentarius in Hexaëmerom., which Jerome characterizes as consisting of “elegantes tractatus.”

3. Adversus Purgas (sc. Cataphrygos s. Montanistas) insigne Opus. Jerome thus characterizes a production of Rhodon, perhaps ascribing to him (as some have judged, from a comparison of cc. 37 and 39 of his de Vir. Ill.) the work against the Montanists in three books, addressed to Abercius or Abirius Marcellus, from which Eusebius has given a long citation (H. E. v. 16). The work is, however, ascribed by Rufinus and Nicephorus Callist., among the other writers, and by Baronius, Baluze, and Le Quien, among the moderns, to Claudio of Hierapolis [Apollinaris, No. 1]; by others to the Apollonius [Apollonius, Iren. No. 13] mentioned and cited by Eusebius (H. E. v. 18), and to whom Tertullian [Tertullianus] replied in his lost work de Ecclesiæ; and by Valerie (Not. ad Euseb. H. E. v. 16), Tillemont, Ceiliger, and others, to Asterius Urbanus [Urbanius]. The claims of any of these writers to the authorship of the work cited by Eusebius are, we think, feeble. Eusebius, according to some MSS. (for the text is corrupt), cites the author simply as τίς, “a certain writer”; and it is quite unaccountable that he should have omitted to mention his name if he had known it; or that he should have omitted all notice of the work of Rhodon just before, if he had believed it to be his. That Jerome ascribed the work to Rhodon is only an inference: he says, in speaking of Miltiades (de Vir. Illustr. c. 39), that he mentioned Rhodon; and as a notice of Miltiades occurs in the anonymous citation given by Eusebius, it is supposed that Jerome refers to that citation, and that he therefore supposed it to be from Rhodon.
RHODOPIS.

But it is surely not unlikely that a writer of considerdation like Miltiades, who had been engaged in the Montanist controversy, would be mentioned both by the anonymous writer and by Rhodon, in writing on the same side of the dispute. At any rate, if Jerome identified the anonymous writer with Rhodon, it does not appear that such identification was more than a conjecture, which weighs little against the silence of the earlier, and probably better informed Eusebius.

The fragments of the work against Marcion are given in the second volume of Galland's Bibliotheca Patrum, p. 144, and in Routh's Religionis Sacrae, vol. i. p. 346, &c.; those from the work against the Montanists in the third volume of Galland, p.
273, under the name of Asterius Urbanus, to whom the author ascribes them; and in the second volume of Routh, p. 73, &c., anonymously.

Rhodon, in his work on the Marcionites, had promised to prepare a work in elucidation of the obscure passages of Scripture, the design of which had been formed by his instructor Tatian: but we have no evidence that Rhodon ever carried his purpose into effect. (Euseb. H. E. v. 16, 17; Hieron. de Viris Illustri. cc. 37, 39, 40; Cave, Hist. Litt. ed. ann.
183, 189, s. v. Asterius Urbanus and Rhodon, vol.
Greec. vol. vii. pp. 161, 163; Tillemont, Mémoires,
vol. iii. p. 64; Ceillier, Auctores Sacrae, vol. ii. p.
135; Lardner, Credib. part ii. book i. c. 28. § 14;
Galland, Biblioth. Patrum, vol. ii. proleg. c. 5,
vol. iii. proleg. c. 2.)

RHODOPHE (Ροδόπη), the nympha of a Thracian well, was the wife of Haemus and mother of Hebrus, and is mentioned among the playmates of Persephone. (Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 423; Lucian, de Solvit. 51.)

RHODOPHON (Ροδόφων), a Rhodian, was one of those who, when hostilities broke out between Perseus and the Romans, in b. c. 171, strove successfully to retain their countrymen in their alliance with Rome, and continued throughout the war to adhere firmly to the Roman cause.
In b. c. 167, when the anger of the senate against the Rhodians had been with difficulty appeased by Astymedes and his fellow-ambassadors [comp.
Philophon and Polyaratus], Rhodophon and Theanetus were appointed to convey to Rome the present of a golden crown. (Polyb.
xxvii. 6, xxvii. 2, xxx. 5; comp. Liv. xiv. 29, &c.)

RHODOPIS (Ροδώπης), a celebrated Greek courtesan, was of Thracian origin. She was a slave with the poet Aesop, both of them belonging to the Samian Iadmon. She afterwards became the property of Xanthes, another Samian, who carried her to Naukratis in Egypt, in the reign of Amasis, and at this great sea-port, the Alexandria of ancient times, she carried on the trade of an hetaera for the benefit of her master. While thus employed, Charaxus, the brother of the poetess Sappho, who had come to Naukratis in pursuit of gain as a merchant, fell desperately in love with the fair courtesan, and ransomed her from slavery for a large sum of money. She was in consequence attacked by Sappho in a poem, who accused her of robbing her brother of his property. She continued to live at Naukratis after her liberation from slavery, and with the tenth part of her gains she dedicated at Delphi ten iron spits, which were seen by Herodotus. She is called Rhodopis by Herodotus, but it appears clear that Sappho in her poem spoke of her under the name of Doricha. It is therefore very probable that Doricha was her real name, and that she received that of Rhodopis, which signifies the "rosy-cheeked," on account of her beauty. (Herod. ii. 134, 135; Athen. xii.
p. 596, b; Suid. s. v. Ροδώπης δράμησα; Strab.
xxvi. p. 608; comp. Ov. Her. xv. 63.)

There was a tale current in Greece that Rhodopis built the third pyramid. Rhodopis takes great pains (i. e.) to show the absurdity of the story, but it still kept its ground, and is related by later writers as an unquestionable fact. (Plin.
H. N. xxxvii. 2, § 17; comp. Strab. l. c.) The origin of this tale, which is unquestionably false, has been explained with great probability by Zoega and Bunsen. In consequence of the name Rhodopis,
The "rosy-cheeked," she was confounded with Nitocris, the beautiful Egyptian queen, and the heroine of many an Egyptian legend, who is said by Julius Africanus and Eusebius to have built the third pyramid. (Comp. Nitocris, No. 2.)

Another tale about Rhodopis related by Strabo
(l. c.) and Aelian (V. H. xii. 33), makes her a queen of Egypt, and thus renders the supposition of her being the same as Nitocris still more probable. It is said that as Rhodopis was one day bathing at Naukratis, an eagle took up one of her sandsals, flew away with it, and dropit in the lap of the Egyptian king, as he was administering justice at Memphis. Struck by the strange ocurrence and the beauty of the sandal, he did not rest till he had found out the fair owner of the beautiful sandal, and as soon as he had discovered her made her his queen. Aelian calls the king Psammitichus; but this deserves no attention, since Strabo relates the tale of the Rhodopis, who was loved by Charaxus, and Aelian probably inserted the name of Psammitichus, simply because no name was given in Strabo or the writer from whom he copied. (Comp. Bunsen, Aegypten Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, vol. iii. pp. 236—238.)

RHODOS (Ρόδος), was, according to Diodorus (v. 55), a daughter of Poseidon and Italia, and sometimes called Rhode. The island of Rhodes was believed to have derived its name from her.
According to others, she was a daughter of Helios and Amphitrite, or of Poseidon and Aphrodite, or lastly of Oceanus (Pind. Olymp. vii. 24; Tzetz. ad Iliod. 925). She was a sea-nymph, of whom the following legend is related. When the gods distributed among themselves the various countries of the earth, the island of Rhodes was yet covered by the waves of the sea. Helios was absent at the time; and as no one drew a lot for him, he was not to have any share in the distribution of the earth. But at that moment the island of Rhodes rose out of the sea, and with the consent of Zeus he took possession of it, and by the nymph of the isle he then became the father of

RHOEUCUS (Ρωίευκος), a centaur who, conjointly with Hylaeus, pursued Atalanta in Arcadia, but was killed by her with an arrow (Apollod. iii. 9, § 2; Callim. Hymn. in Diana. 221; Aelian, V. H. xxii. 1). This centaur is perhaps the same as the one who is called Rhoecus by Latin poets. (Rheoucus.)

RHOEUCUS (Ρωίευκος), the son of Phileus or Philaeus, of Samos, an architect and statuary, belonging to the earliest period in the history of Greek art, is mentioned as the head of a family of Samian artists, the accounts respecting whom present considerable difficulties, the discussion of which belongs more properly to the articles Telecles and Theodorus. It is enough, in this place, to give as the most probable result of the inquiry, the genealogy by which Müller (Arch. d. Kust. § 60) exhibits the succession and dates of these artists.

Rhoeus, about Ol. 35, B.C. 640.

Teleclus and Telecles, about Ol. 45, B.C. 600.

Theodorus, about Ol. 55, B.C. 560.

Respecting Rhoeus himself we are informed that he was the first architect of the great temple of Hera at Samos (Herod, iii. 60), which Theodorus completed; and also, in conjunction with Smilia and Theodorus, of the labyrinth at Lemnos (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 13, s. 19. § 3); that he, and the members of his family who succeeded him, invented the art of casting statues in bronze and iron (Paus. viii. 14. § 5, s. 3; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 12, s. 43), and that there still existed, at the time of Pausanias, in the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, a bronze statue of rude antique workmanship, which was said to represent night, and to have been the work of Rhoeus. (Paus. x. 33. § 3, s. 6.)

RHOEMETALCES I. (Ροημητάλκης), king of Thrace, was the brother of Cotys [No. 4], of Rhacoporus [No. 2], and uncle and guardian of Rhacoporus [No. 3]. On his nephew's death, B.C. 13, Rhoeumetalces was expelled from Thrace, and driven into the Chersonesos, by Vologeneses, chief of the Thracian Bessi. About two years afterwards L. Piso, praetor of Pamphylia, drove the Bessi from the Chersonesos, and Rhoeumetalces received from Augustus his nephew's dominions, with some additions, since Tacitus calls him king of all Thrace. On his death Augustus divided his kingdom between his son Cotys [No. 5], and his brother Rhacoporus [No. 2]. (Tac. Ann. ii. 64; Dion Cass. liv. 20, 34; comp. Vell. Pat. ii. 98.) On the obverse of the annexed coin is the head of Augustus, and on the reverse that of Rhoeumetalces and his wife. [W. B. D.]

RHOEMETALCES II. (Ροημητάλκης), king of Thrace, was the son of Rhacoporus [No. 2] and nephew of the preceding. On the deposition of his father, whose ambitious projects he had opposed, Rhoeumetalces shared with the sons of Cotys [No. 5] the kingdom of Thrace. He remained faithful to Rome, and aided in putting down the Thracian malcontents in A.D. 26. Caligula, in A.D. 38, assigned the whole of Thrace to Rhoeumetalces, and gave Armenia Minor to the son of Cotys. (Cotys, No. 6.) (Dion Cass. lix. 12; Tac. Ann. ii. 67, iii. 38, iv. 5, 47, xl. 9.) On the obverse of the annexed coin is the head of Caligula, and on the reverse that of Rhoeumetalces. [W. B. D.]

COIN OF RHOEMETALCES II., KING OF THRACE.

RHOEUS (Ῥόης), 1. A daughter of Staphylus and Chrysosthemis, was beloved by Apollo. When her father discovered that she was with child, he put her in a chest, and exposed her to the waves of the sea. The chest floated to the coast of Euboea (or Delos), where Rhoeus gave birth to Anius (Diod. v. 62; Tzet. ad Lyocph. 570). Subsequently she was married to Zarex. (Tzet. ad Lyocph. 580.)

2. A daughter of the river-god Scamander, became by Laomedon the mother of Tithonus. (Tzet. ad Lyocph. 13.)

[R. S.]

RHIEETIA (Ῥηεῖτα), a daughter of the Thracian king Sithon and Achrioe, a daughter of Neilos. She was a sister of Pallene, and the Trojan promontory of Rhoeetia was believed to have derived its name from her. (Tzet. ad Lyocph. 563, 1161; Steph. Byz. s. v.)

[R. S.]

RHIOETUS. 1. A centaur, probably the same whom Greek poets call Rhoeus. At the wedding of Peirithous he was wounded by Dryas and took to flight. (Ov. Met. xii. 300; comp. Virg. Georg. ii. 456.)

2. One of the giants who was slain by Bucebas (Horat. Carm. i. 19, 23); he is usually called Hyrtius. (Apollod. i. 6. § 2; comp. Virg. L. c.)

3. A companion of Phineas, was slain by Persians. (Ov. Met. v. 38.)

4. A mythical king of the Marrubians in Italy, who married a second wife Casperia, with whom his son Anchemolus committed incest. In order to escape from his father's vengeance, Anchemolus fled to king Daunus. (Serv. ad Aen. x. 383.) [L. S.]

RHOIPALUS (Ῥηιπάλος), a son of Ilaeraches and father of Phaestus (Ptolem. Heph. 3; Eustath. 653.
RICIMER. Ov. Serv. (L.S.)

RICIMER, one of the most extraordinary characters in later Roman history, and worthy of being called the Roman "King-Maker," was the son of a Suevian chief who had married the daughter of Wallia, king of the West Goths. He spent his youth at the court of the emperor Valentinian, served with distinction under Aetius, and was raised to the dignity of comes. His rare talents, boundless ambition, and daring courage urged him on to still higher eminence, and his treacherous disposition and systematic selfishness assisted him greatly in attaining his object. In A.D. 456, Ricimer gained a decisive naval victory off Corsica over a fleet of the Vandals, then at war with Avitus, and he defeated the land-forces of the Vandals near Agrigentum in Sicily. These victories made his name so popular that he resolved upon carrying out a scheme which he seems to have formed some time previously, namely, to depose Avitus, who had, ever since his accession, ceased to display his former great qualities, and had incurred the hatred and contempt of his subjects. After his return to Italy, Ricimer kindled a rebellion at Ravenna, gained the assistance of the Roman senate, and then set out to encounter Avitus, who approached from Gaul. A bloody battle was fought at Placentia, on the 16th (17th) October, 456, in which Avitus lost his crown and liberty. Ricimer made him bishop of Placentia, but soon afterwards contrived his death. Marcinus, and after him Leo, emperors of the East, now assumed the title of Western emperors also; but the power was with Ricimer, who might have seized the diadem, in spite of the law that no barbarian should be Roman emperor, but preferred to give it to Majorian. He had previously obtained the title of patrician from Leo, who also gave consent to the nomination of Majorian (475). A proof that the real power remained in Ricimer is given by Majorian himself, who in a letter to the senate, preserved in the Codex Theodosianus, says that he and "his father Ricimer" would take proper care of military affairs. Majorian having displayed uncommon energy, and, to Ricimer, most unexpected wisdom, the latter was filled with jealousy, and contrived the sudden and famous plot, in consequence of which Majorian lost his life (451). Ricimer put Vitalianus Serenus Serpentinus on the throne in his stead. The accession of the new emperor was not approved of by Leo, and was contested by Aegidius, in Gaul, a province where Ricimer had not succeeded in obtaining more than nominal power. The revolt of Aegidius, however, was absorbed by other intestine troubles in Gaul, and caused no danger to Italy. Severus died in 465, perhaps poisonéd by Ricimer, and during eighteen months the empire was without an emperor, though not without a head, for that was always Ricimer's. The Romans, however, were displeased with his despotism, and requested Leo to give them an emperor. Anthemius was accordingly proposed and accepted, not only by the people, but also by Ricimer, who showed great diplomatic skill in this transaction: he made a sort of bargain with the successful candidate, and promised to lend him his assistance on condition that Anthemius should give him his daughter in marriage. This was accordingly complied with, and for some time the two supreme chiefs ruled peacefully together. Soon, however, their harmony was disturbed by jealousy, and Ricimer withdrew to Milan, ready to declare war against his father-in-law. St. Epiphanius recognised them, and matters went on to their mutual satisfaction till 472, when Leo got rid of his overbearing minister, Aspar. This event made Ricimer reflect upon his own safety, for he justly apprehended that the western emperor would follow the example set by his colleague in the East. He therefore forthwith sailed out from Milan with a picked and devoted army, and laid siege to Rome. Even before the city was taken, Ricimer offered the diadem to Olybrius, whom Leo had sent thither to negotiate a peace between the rivals. Anthemius was massacred some days after Rome had been taken by Ricimer and plundered by his warriors. Olybrius now reigned as emperor as far as was possible under the over-hanging sword of the King-Maker; but only forty days after the sack of Rome, Ricimer died of a malignant fever (18th August 472), after having made and unmade five Roman emperors. (The authorities quoted in the lives of Anthemius, Avitus, Majorianus, Olybrius, and Severus.) [W.P.]

ROBIGUS (or fem. ROBIGA) is described by some Latin writers as a deity worshipped for the purposed of averting blight or too great heat from the young cornfields. The festival of the Robigalia was celebrated on the 25th of April, and was said to have been instituted by Numà (Varro, de Lang. Lat. vi. 16; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 151; Gallius, v. 12; Ov. Fast. iv. 907, 911). But considering the uncertainty of the ancients themselves as to whether the divinity was masculine or feminine, and that the Romans did not pay divine honours to any evil demon, it is highly probable that the divinity Robigus, or Robigo, is only an abstraction of the later Romans from the festival of the Robigalia. (Comp. Varro, de Re Rust. i. 2.)

ROCUS, Q. CREPEREIUS. [CREPEREIUS.]

ROCUS, ROMYLIUS. [ROMILIUS.]

ROLES, a king of some tribes of the Gete, fought under Crassus, the proconsul of Macedonia, b.c. 29, against the neighbouring barbarians, and was recognised by Augustus as a friend and ally. According to Leunardi, the name is the same as the Norman Rollo, and the German Roland. (Dion Cass. li. 24, 26.)

ROMA (Rōma). 1. The personification of the city of Rome, and as such called Dea Roma. Temples were erected to her, not only at Rome, but in other cities of the empire, such as Smyrna (Tac. Ann. iv. 56; Spartan. Haid. 19). She was represented clad in a long robe, and with a helmet, in a sitting posture, strongly resembling the figures of the Greek Athena. She was in reality the genius of the city of Rome, and was worshipped as such from early times; but it seems that previous to the time of Augustus, there was no temple dedicated to her in the city ; but afterwards their number increased in all parts of the empire (Liv. xliii. 5; Tac. Ann. iv. 58; Dion Cass. li. p. 458; P. Vict. Reg. Urb. iv.). As Roma (Rōma) also signifies "strength," it is not impossible that the ode of Erinnus, addressed to Roma, may be an ode to the personification of strength.

2. A Trojan captive, who advised her fellow-captives on the coast of Italy to set fire to the fleet.
of the Greeks. (Plut. Romul. i; Tzet. ad Lycoh. 921.)

3. A daughter of Italus and Lucania, or a daughter of Telephus. In some traditions she is said to have been the wife of Aeneas or Ascanius, and to have given her name to the city of Rome. (Plut. Romul. 2.)

[L.S.] ROMANUS, a friend of the younger Pliny, to whom several of his letters are addressed (Ep. iv. 29, vi. 15, 33, viii. 8, ix. 7). Pliny had two friends of this name, Romanus Firmus and Vocoonus Romanus, and it is probable that some of the above letters are addressed to one of these persons, but it is impossible to say to which.

ROMANUS, FIRMUS, a friend and minister of the younger Pliny, with whom the latter had been brought up, and to whom he addresses one of his letters, in which he offers to give him a sufficient sum of money to raise him to the equestrian rank. (Ep. i. 19.)

ROMANUS, FABIIUS, one of the friends of the poet Lucan, accused Mela, the father of the poet, after the death of the latter, because Nero was anxious to obtain his property. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 17.)

ROMANUS HISPO, a Roman rhetorician, who earned an infamous character by undertaking prosecutions to please the early emperors. He is first mentioned at the commencement of the reign of Tiberius, when he supported the accusation of Caepio Crispinus against Granius Marcellus. In A.D. 62, he accused Seneca as one of the associates of C. Piso, but the accusation was retorted upon him by Seneca (Tac. Ann. i. 74, xvi. 17). Romanus Hispo constantly occurs as one of the declaimers in the Controversiae of the elder Seneca.

ROMANUS, JULIUS, a Roman poet, whose name is prefixed to an epigram on Petronius Arbiter in the Latin Anthology (i. 235, ed. Burmann, No. 1544, ed. Meyer). This Julius, however, as Niebuhr points out (Kleine Schriften, p. 347), is not an ancient writer, but Julius Sabinius, otherwise called Julius Pomponius Laetus, who died in the year 1497. (Comp. Meyer, Annal. ad Anthol. Lat. vol. ii. p. 129.)

ROMANUS, VOCUSNIUS, a fellow-student and an intimate friend of the younger Pliny, was the son of an illustrious Roman eques, and his mother belonged to one of the most distinguished families in Neerar Spain (Plin. Ep. ii. 13). If we may trust the testimony of his friend, Vocoonus was a distinguished orator, and possessed great skill in composition. Several of Pliny's letters are addressed to him. (Ep. i. 5, ii. 1, ix. 28.)

ROMANUS, LECAPEIUS (Ρωμανος ο Λέκαπης), Byzantine emperor from A.D. 919—944, was the son of Theophylactus Abastactus, a brave warrior, who had once saved the life of the emperor Basil. Romanus served in the imperial fleet, acquired himself on many occasions, and enjoyed the esteem of his fellow-soldiers on account of his rare bravery. One of his men having been attacked by a lion, Romanus, who was near, rushed to his assistance and killed the monster in single combat. When the young Constantin VII. Porphyrogenitus, ascended the throne, Romanus was high admiral, and commanded the fleet on the Danube in the war with the Bulgarians, but as he suddenly withdrew with his ship and made sail for Constantinople, he was accused of treachery by Leo Phocas. It must, however, be understood that both the accused and the accuser aimed at supreme power, and Romanus left the theatre of the war, probably for the purpose of being within reach of the throne, as well as of the man who wanted to place himself thereon. A civil war was on the point of breaking out, when Romanus, patronised and perhaps loved by the dowager empress, seized upon the chamberlain Constantine, one of the most influential adherents of Phocas, who avenged the captivity of his friend by taking up arms. Romanus, who had been appointed Magnus Hetneriarcha, or commander in chief of the foreign body-guard of the emperor, worsted Phocas, and in reward was made Caesar in September, and crowned as Augustus and emperor on the 17th December, 919. He had previously given his daughter Helena in marriage to the young emperor Constantine, and shortly after his accession he conferred the rank of Augustus and Augusta upon his son Christopher and his wife Theodora. Romanus was now the legitimate colleague of Constantine VII., over whom he exercised such authority as to cause many plots against his life, and sometimes open rebellions, which he succeeded in quelling.

The following are the principal events of his reign. The great schism of the church, which had lasted ever since the deposition of the patriarch Euthynius and the famous fourth wedlock of the emperor Leo VI., was at last healed, in 920, through the intervention of Pope John X.; and by an edict of Constantine VII. of the same year, a fourth marriage was declared anti-canonical, and made punishable. In 921 another of those interminable wars with the Bulgarians, or perhaps only a fresh and formidable invasion, drew the attention of Romanus towards the Danube, but the Bulgarians saved him the trouble of going so far away from Constantinople by advancing thither with all their force, and ravaging the country. This war became still more formidable when Simeon, the king of the Bulgarians concluded, in 923, an alliance with the Arabs. But we purposely refrain from giving the details of these barbarous wars, presenting little more than an uninterrupted series of bloodshed and devastations without profit to either party. A remarkable interview between Romanus and Simeon, which took place in 926, under the walls of Constantinople, put a temporary end to these troubles. In the previous year the patrician John Radianus worsted and destroyed the fleet of the famous pirate chief Leo of Tripolis, who had sacked Thessalonica twenty-two years previously. In 927 King Simeon died, after having ruined Bulgaria through his very victories, and was succeeded by his son Peter, who was less warlike, though not less courageous than his father; for he entered the Byzantine territory at the head of a strong army, proposing to the emperor to choose between certain conditions of peace; or of giving him his grand-daughter in marriage, a proposition which Romanus the more eagerly accepted, as he wanted all his forces to check the progress of the Arabs. His possessions in Italy also required protection against the petty Lombard princes. In 901 Christopher died, the eldest son of Romanus and husband of Sophia, the daughter of Niceta magister palatii, who a short time previously had been sent into a convent for a conspiracy against the emperor,
ROMANUS.

Romanus, so wise in many respects, compromised himself extremely in 933, by making his son Theophyllactus, a lad of sixteen, patriarch of Constanti- nopolis, after first obtaining the approbation of Pope John XI. Theophyllactus proved a very miserable prelate. From 934 to 940 the empire enjoyed an almost universal peace, Italy excepted, where the petty warfare with the Lombard princes went on as before. But in 941 Constantinople was in terror at the sudden appearance of a Russian fleet of 10,000 boats, commanded by Prince Ingor, who cast anchor at the very entrance of the Bosporus, and whose troops ravaged the neighbouring country. Romanus, however, equipped in all haste a small number of galleys (155) lying in the Golden Horn, with which Theophanes boldly attacked the Russians, destroyed a great number of their boats, and compelled Ingor to fly. Theophanes soon afterwards obtained a second victory over the rest of the fleet on the coast of Thracia, and of this formidable armada very little came back to Russia. Ingor died soon afterwards, and in 945 his wife Olga came to Constantinople to receive baptism: she was christened Helena, and is held in the utmost veneration in the Russian church.

Down to this period Constantine Porphyrogenitus, although the legitimate emperor by descent, had only enjoyed the title of his rank, and he now resolved upon having the power also. To this effect he excited the ambition of the two surviving sons of Romanus, Stephanus and Constantine, both Augusti, who in their turn were tired of the autocracy of their aged father. A conspiracy was set on foot, headed by Stephanus, who had the assistance of several energetic and distinguished men. Sure of success, he suddenly seized upon the person of his father, and with secret despatch had him carried to the island of Protea, at the entrance of the Propontis, where Romanus was thrown into a convent and had his head shaved forthwith, as he was thus rendered incompetent to reign (20th of December, 944). The sons of Romanus, however, did not reap the fruits of their treachery, for Constantine VII. was proclaimed sole emperor, after the unnatural children of the deposed emperor had enjoyed the title of co-emperors during the short space of five weeks. They were then arrested and sent to Protea, where a touching interview took place between them and their unfortunate father. Stephanus died nineteen years afterwards in exile, and Constantine survived his captivity only two years, when he was massacred in an attempt at making his escape. Romanus lived a quiet monkish life in his convent, and died a natural death on the 15th of June, 948. (Cedren. p. 614, &c.; Leo. Diacon. p. 492, &c.; Manass. p. 111, &c.; Zonaras, vol. ii. p. 186, &c.; Glycas, p. 300, &c. all in the Paris editions.)

ROMANUS II., or the Younger, Byzantine emperor from A. D. 939—963, the son and successor of Constantine VII. Porphyrogenitus, was born in 933, and succeeded his father on the fifteenth of November 939. His short reign offers a few events of note. Endowed with great personal beauty and bodily strength, he preferred gymnastics, hunting, and other pleasures to the duties of an emperor, which he left to his minister Brignas. His wretched wife Theophana, who had persuaded him to poison his father, was no sooner independent than she excelled Romanus against his own family; his five sisters were compelled to leave the palace, and confined in the same convent where Sophia, the widow of Christopher Augustus had then been during thirty years; but the empress dowager, Helena, possessed too much energy to yield to her daughter-in-law, and she accordingly remained in the palace, but she died soon afterwards of a broken heart. Although Romanus never showed himself in the field, he had two renowned generals by whom some glorious deeds were done, namely, the two brothers Nicephorus and Leo Phocas. Nicephorus recovered the flourishing island of Creta, after a long siege of its capital Candia, and after the Arabs had ruled there during 150 years (961); and Leo was successful against the Arabs in Asia. After the fall of Candia, and the splendid triumph of Nicephorus in Constantinople, the two brothers joined their forces against the Arabs, and obtained most signal victories over them. A rumour having spread of the death of Romanus, Nicephorus approached the capital through fear of Brignas; but the rumour was false, and Nicephorus remained in Asia, observing Constantinople. Events showed the prudence of this step; for Romanus, already exhausted by his mode of life, was despatched by poison administered to him by his own wife Theophano. He died on the 15th of March, 963, at the age of twenty-four. Ambition, and perhaps the secret advice of the eunuch Brignas, urged the Theophano to commit the foul deed. Romanus married first Bertha, afterwards called Eudoxia, the natural daughter of Hugo, king of Italy, who died a child before the marriage was consummated. By his second wife Anastasia, afterwards called Theophano, a woman of base extraction, he left two sons, Basil II. and Constantine VIII., who followed him on the throne, and two daughters, Theophano, who married Otho II. emperor of Germany, an excellent woman, who became the ancestress of most of the reigning houses in Europe, and Anna Posthuma, who married Vladmir, first Christian prince of Russia. (Cedren. p. 642, &c.; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 196, &c.; Manass. p. 115, Glyc. p. 304; Leo Diacon. p. 500, &c. in the Paris editions.)

ROMANUS III., ARGYRUS or ARGY- ROPULUS (Ρωμανός ο' Ἀργυρός ο' Ἀργυρο- πούλος), Byzantine emperor from A. D. 1028—1034, was the son of Leo Argyrus Dux, and belonged to a distinguished family. Romanus obtained such military glory in the reign of Constantine VIII., that this prince appointed him his successor, and offered him the hand of one of his daughters, a few days before he died. Romanus was married to Helena, a virtuous woman, whom he tenderly loved, and declined both the crown and the bride. Constantine, however, left him the choice between his offer, or the loss of his eyes. Even then Romanus did not yield to the temptation, and would have declined it again but for the prayers of his own wife, who implored him to accept both, and rather sacrifice her than the empire. Their marriage was accordingly dissolved; and Romanus, now married to the princess Zoe, succeeded Constantine on the 12th of November, 1028. He was a brave, well-instructed man, perhaps learned; but he over-valued himself, and thought himself the best general and the best scholar of his time. Numerous acts of liberality

and clemency gained him the hearts of his new subjects at the very beginning of his reign, but did not prevent some court conspiracies. At the same time his arms met with disgrace in Sicily and Syria, nor did he retrieve his fortune when he took the field in person. The Arabs worsted him near Azar in Syria, and he only escaped captivity by shutting himself up in Antioch (1030), whence he hastened to Constantinople. His henchmen Nicetas and Simeon, and especially Theoctistus, however, soon restored the honour of the Greek armies. Their success so mortified Argyros that he became the prey of a deep melancholy, and only occupied himself with building churches and convents, his wife Zoe seizing the reins of the empire. Meanwhile the war with the Arabs was carried on with varying success, till at last the Greeks obtained great advantages in a decisive naval engagement, and by the conquest of Edessa, which was obliged to surrender in 1033. But the plague ravaged the provinces, and in the North the Patzinégeois and other barbarians made destructive inroads. These disasters roused Romanus from his indolence. But it was too late: he had made himself unpopular for ever, and his own family had become strangers to him. The more his generals were successful against the Arabs, the more the emperor was piqued; and the more the Turks were defeated the more he scrutinized his plans to find out what he still greater advantages might be obtained. Hence arose a criminal intrigue between Zoe, an ambitious and voluptuous wife, though past fifty, and the general Michael, surnamed Paphlagon. Zoe administered a slow poison to her husband, in consequence of which he died a lingering death (1034), which was accelerated by the cruel deed of Zoe's assistants, who held the enfeebled emperor, who was taking a bath, under water till life was nearly gone. Half dead, he was taken out and placed on a bed, when his wife despatched him by a dose of active poison. Romanus died at the age of sixty-six, and was succeeded by Michael IV. The Paphlagonian, married Zoe. It is certain that Romanus left no issue by Zoe, and it is doubtful whether he had any by Helena; but his family continued to flourish in Constantinople down to its capture by the Turks, and more than 150 years afterwards. ROMANUS IV. DIOGENES (Ρωμανος η Διογένης), Byzantine emperor from A.D. 1067—1071, was the son of one Constantine Diogenes, a rather extravagant character, who conspired against the emperor Romanus Argyrus, but escaped pursuit by leaping out of a high window. Romanus Diogenes was the grand-nephew of Romanus Argyrus, through his mother; and enjoying the patronage of the court notwithstanding his father's conduct, soon rose to the dignities of patrician and duke of Sardica or Trabizith. In the reign of Constantine X. Ducas, he solicited the place of Magnus Ver- tiarius, and having received the answer, "Deserve it through your merits," forthwith returned to Sar- dicia, sallied out with the garrison, and routed a party of Patzinégeois marauders, of whose heads he sent a collection to Constantinople. The emperor returned the compliment by granting him the desired appointment, adding: "You owe your prefer- ment not to me, but to your sword." This piqued Romanus; and from that time he entered schemes of rebellion and of raising himself to the throne. After the death of Constantine, and during the reign of his widow Eudoxia, he became bolder; but his manoeuvres were seen through, and he was arrested, tried, and sentenced to death. Previous to execution he was presented to the empress; and as he had obtained great military renown, and was besides a remarkably handsome man, he made such a visible impression upon Eudoxia, that his judges thought it convenient to annul their sentence, in consequence of which he was sent into nominal exile in his native country Cappadocia. Two days after his departure he was joined by some messengers of the empress, who or- dered him to return to Constantinople. At his arrival there he was immediately appointed commander-in-chief of the army. The end of this force was his marriage with the empress, and his proclamation as emperor three days after their marriage. Constantine X., however, had left three sons, who considered themselves prejudiced through the accession of Romanus, and entered into a danger- ous plot against his life; but their mother suc- ceeded in pacifying them, and submitting them to her authority. There remained, however, a strong party of malcontents at the court, composed of eminent and high-born men. Romanus, active and energetic, not only counteracted their plans, but introduced a radical reform into his un- ruptured administration, and freed himself from the authority of his wife, by leaving Constantinople and keeping his court on the Asiatic side of the Bosporus.

To these domestic quarrels the Turks put a sud- den end. Their sultan, Alp-Arslân, approached by rapid marches from the shores of the Caspian and the highlands of northern Persia, while one of his lieutenants attacked Syria. Romanus took the field against them with his usual energy and promptitude. His intention was to cover Syria, and he was already on its frontiers when he was informed of the progress of the Turkish arms in the North. He consequently left Syria to his generals, and marched to Pontus with such rapidity, that he surprised and routed several Turkish bodies station- ed on its frontier. This was sufficient to keep the main body of the Turks within Persia. Romanus then determined to attack Syria. He made a successful campaign down to Antioch and up again along the Euphrates, and wherever he carried his arms the enemy was worsted. One of his gen- erals, less fortunate, or less skilful, was surprised by the Turks, and lost the day and half of his army. Romanus flew to his support; and in a nocturnal engagement, took the camp of the Turks and routed them with great slaughter (20th of November, 1068). He then marched again up the Euphrates as far as Ara, constantly annoyed by the light troops of the enemy; but he placed his troops in good and safe winter-quarters, and returned to the capital. Eudoxia, reconciled to her husband, had meanwhile governed the state with wisdom; and, in acknowledgment of the vic- tories of the emperor, presented him with a sort of miscellaneous work, entitled "Ionia," which she had just finished. The campaign was renewed in 1069, and the imperial arms were again successful, though not uniformly so, as the Turks succeeded in taking and pillaging Iconium. The third cam- paign, in 1070, was carried on under the command- in-chief of Manuel Comnenus, the emperor requir- ing repose after so many fatigues. Ere long, news reached the court that Manuel had been defeated and taken prisoner. The emperor was artfully persuaded by some false friends to refrain from taking the command once more, and matters would have taken a bad turn, but for the rare shrewdness of Manuel. It happened that Chrysosolus, the victorious Turkish general, pretended to have a better right to the sultanship than Alp-Arslan, and Manuel was no sooner aware of it than, a real Connemite as he was, persuaded him to desert the sultan, and fly with him to Constantinople, promising him the assistance of the emperor for the recovery of his rights. The vanquished thus led his victor to Constantinople, to the utmost astonishment of the court. Romanus took as much advantage of this strange incident as circumstances would allow; and, in 1071, again set out in person against Alp-Arslan. But little acquainted with human baseness, he left many of his real friends at home, and took with him many a secret enemy invested with high power. He penetrated as far as the Araxes, not without a manly resistance from the Turks and many a partial defeat of his generals. His position in those wild regions became dangerous, but he stoutly refused the peace offered him by the sultan. Upon this a pitched battle was fought at Manzeara on the Araxes (26th of August, 1071); and owing to the treachery of one of his officers, invested with the command of Alp-Arslan, Romanus lost the day and his liberty. It has been said that the noble sultan ill-treated his captive, but this is not true, on the contrary he received him well, and discoursed with him as a friend. "What would you have done with me," asked the sultan, "if I had been your prisoner?" "Beaten you to death," was the Byzantine's answer. "I will treat you differently," replied the barbarian infidel, "and according to the precepts of your own religion, which commands humanity and forgiveness of injuries." Alp-Arslan accordingly gave him 10,000 pieces of gold, and all those prisoners whom the emperor chose to pick out. Upon this a peace was concluded on equitable terms, except a ransom of 1,500,000, and an annual tribute of 300,000 pieces of gold. Romanus shed tears when he took leave of his noble victor, who allowed him to return to Constantinople before the conditions of the treaty of peace were fulfilled, this disaster caused a complete revolution in the capital, so that when Romanus appeared at its gates, he was refused admittance. Michael Parapinaces had been raised to the imperial dignity, but Romanus did his utmost to crush him and recover his throne. He was not successful. Twice defeated in pitched battles, he at last surrendered, and was put to death by order of Michael. Romanus left three sons, of whom Nicephorus made himself conspicuous in after years. The reign of Romanus Diogenes, though short, is full of highly interesting events, especially of military adventures, such as those of the noble Scott Ursel or Russell Baldwin; but space forbids us to enter upon these details. (Zonar. vol. ii. p. 277, &c.; Glycus, p. 526, &c.; Manass. p. 131; Byrnn. p. 112, &c., in the Paris editions.) [W. P.]

T. ROMILUS ROGUS VATICANUS, was consul c. 655, with C. Veturius Genius, and was a member of the last decadervate, a. c. 451 (Liv. iii. 31, 33; Dionys. x. 33, &c.; 56). Respecting the events in the year of his consulship, see Cic. Rer. Marcell. No. 4. He was condemned along with his colleague, and sentenced to pay a heavy fine.

ROMILUS POLLO. [POLLIO.]

ROMILUS DENTOR, is said to have been appointed praefectus urbi by Romulus. (Tac. Ann. vi. 11.)

ROMULUS, the founder of the city of Rome. It is unnecessary in the present work to prove that all the stories about Romulus are mythical, and merely represent the traditional belief of the Roman people respecting their origin. Romulus, which is only a lengthened form of Romus, is simply the Roman people represented as an individual, and must be placed in the same category as Aeolus, Dorus, and Ion, the reputed ancestors of the Aeolians, Doriens, and Ionians, owing to the universal practice of antiquity to represent nations as springing from eponymous ancestors. But although none of the tales about Romulus can be received as an historical fact, yet it is of importance to know the general belief of the Roman people respecting the life of the founder of their city. It is, however, very difficult to ascertain the original form of the legend; since poets, on the one hand, embosomed it with the creations of their own fancy, and historians, on the other hand, omitted many of its most marvellous incidents, in order to reduce it to the form of a probable history. The various tales related respecting the foundation of Rome may be reduced to two classes, one of Greek and the other of native origin. The former bring Romulus into close connection with Aeneas. A few Greek writers make Aeneas the founder of Rome, and speak of his wife under the name of Roma; others represent Romulus as his son or a remote descendant; but the greater part make him his grandson by his daughter Ila. In most of these accounts the twin brothers are spoken of, but they appear under the names of Romulus and Remus, not Remus (comp. Dionys. i. 72, 73; Plut. Rom. 2, 3; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. i. 274; Festus, s. v. Rome). These accounts, however, scarcely deserve the name of traditions, as Niebuhr has remarked; they are for the most part the inventions of Greek writers, who were ignorant of the native legend, but having heard of the fame of Rome, wished to assign to it an origin.

The old Roman legend was of a very different kind. It was preserved in popular poems, which were handed down from generation to generation, and some of which were in existence in the time of Dionysius (i. 79); and it seems to have been recorded in prose in its most genuine form by the annalist Q. Fabius Pictor, who lived during the second Punic War. This legend probably ran nearly as follows:—At Alba Longa there reigned a succession of kings, descended from Iulus, the son of Aeneas. One of the last of these kings left two sons, Numitor and Amulius. The latter, who was the younger, deprived Numitor of the kingdom, but allowed him to live in the enjoyment of his private fortune. Fearful, however, lest the heirs of Numitor might not submit so quietly to his usurpation, he caused his only son to be murdered, and made his daughter Silvia

* Many writers call her Rhea or Rea Silvia. Nie-one of the Vestal virgins. As Silvia one day went into the sacred grove, to draw water for the service of the goddess, a wolf met her, and she fled into a cave for safety; there, while a total eclipse obscured the sun, Mars himself overpowered her, and then consolled her with the promise that she should be the mother of heroic children (Serv. ad Virg. Aen. i. 274; Dionys. ii. 56; Plut. Rom. 27).

When her time came, she brought forth twins. Amulius doomed the guilty Vestal and her babes to be drowned in the river. In the Anio Silvia exchanged her earthly life for that of a goddess, and became the wife of the river-god. The stream carried the cradle in which the children were lying into the Tiber, which had overflowed its banks far and wide. It was stranded at the foot of the Palatine, and overturned on the root of a wild fig-tree, which, under the name of the Ficus Ruminalis, was preserved and held sacred for many ages after. A she-wolf, which had come to drink of the stream, carried them into her den hard by, and suckled them; and there, when they wanted other food, the woodpecker, a bird sacred to Mars, brought it to them (Ov. Fast. iii. 54). At length this marvellous sight was seen by Faustulus, the king's shepherd, who took the children to his own house, and gave them to the care of his wife, Acca Larentia. They were called Romulus and Remus, and grew up along with the twelve sons of their foster-parents, on the Palatine hill (Massu-rius Sabinius, ap. Gall. vi. 7).

They were, however, distinguished from their comrades by the beauty of their person and the bravery of their deeds, and became the acknowledged leaders of the other shepherd youths, with whom they fought boldly against wild beasts and robbers. The followers of Romulus were called Quintili; those of Remus, Fibi. A quarrel arose between them and the herdsmen of Numitor, who stalled their cattle on the neighbouring hill of the Aventine. Remus was taken by a stratagem, during the absence of his brother, and carried off to Numitor. His age and noble bearing made Numitor think of his grandsons; and his suspicions were aroused by the tale of the marvellous twin of the two brothers. Meanwhile Romulus hastened with his foster-father to Numitor; suspicion was changed into certainty, and the old man recognised them as his grandsons. They now resolved to avenge the wrongs which their family had suffered. With the help of their faithful comrades, who had flocked to Alba to rescue Remus, they slew Amulius, and placed Numitor on the throne.

Romulus and Remus loved their old abode, and therefore left Alba to found a city on the banks of the Tiber. They were accompanied only by their old comrades, the shepherds. The story which makes them joined by the Alban nobles, is no part of the old legend; since the July and similar families do not appear till after the destruction of buhr remarks that Rheas is a corruption introduced by the editors, apparently from thinking of the goddess Rhea; whereas Rea seems to have signified nothing more than theculpits, reminding us of the expression Rea femina, which often occurs in Boccaccio. Niebuhr also calls attention to the remark of Perizonius, that when the mother of Romulus is represented as the daughter of Aeneas, she is always called Aea, and that Rea is never prefixed to the latter name. (Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 211.)

Alba. As the brothers possessed equal authority and power, a strife arose between them where the city should be built, who should be its founder, and after whose name it should be called. Romulus wished to build it on the Palatine, Remus on the Aventine, or, according to another tradition, on another hill three or four miles lower down the river, called Remurium or Remoria, which Niebuhr supposes to be the hill beyond S. Paolo (comp. Dionys. i. 85; Plut. Rom. 9).* It was agreed that the question should be decided by augury; and each took his station on the top of his chosen hill. The night passed away, and as the day was dawning Remus saw six vultures; but at sun-rise, when these tidings were brought to Romulus, twelve vultures flew by him. Each claimed the augury in his own favour; but most of the shepherds decided for Romulus, and Remus was therefore obliged to yield. Romulus now proceeded to mark out the pomerium of his city (see Dict. of Ant. s. c.). He yoked a bullock and a heifer to a plough with a copper ploughshare, and drew a deep furrow round the foot of the Palatine, so as to include a conidia Iemius compass to raise a wall. Romu-
